and P. Ælius Tubero, to be L. deputy of Sardinia. Concerning the Provinces wherein the Consuls were to be employed, it was not thought good to determine any thing, before the Embassadors of King Philip and likewise of the Carthaginians, had delivered their embassages: for as they saw the end of one war, so they foresaw the beginning of another. Cn. Lentulus the Consul was inflamed with an ardent desire of the Province of Affrick: for if the war continued, he aimed at an easy victory: and if it were at the point of an end, he gaped at the honor of finishing the same, and hoped to have the name, That determined it was whiles he was Consul. And therefore he protested plainly, that he would suffer nothing to pass before that the Province of Affrick were assigned to him. His colleague (a sober, temperate, and discreet man) gave his consent; for he saw full well, that as the contending for that glory with Scipio, was unjust and unreasonable, so in it he would be overmatched, and never able to import and carry it away from him. Q. Minutius Thermus and M. Acilius Glabrio, two Tribuns of the commons, gave out and said, That Cn. Cornelius went about to compass that, which was commenced and assaied in vain the year before by T. Claudius the Consul. For when by warrant from the Senat a bill was proposed unto the people, whom their pleasure was to nominate for government of Affrick, all the 35 Tribes gave their voices and awarded that Province to P. Scipio. Much contention there passed and many bickerments both in Senat-house and before the people, in the debating of this question: but in the end they grew to this point, to refer all to the judgment of the Senat. So the LL. of the Senat having taken their oath (for so it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order. First, that the two Consuls should either agree together between themselves, or else cast lots for their Provinces; namely, which of them should have the rule of Italy, and who the charge of a fleet of fifty sail. Item, to whether of them twain befel the navy, he should sail over into Sicily: and if peace might not be fully concluded with the Carthaginians, then to cross over into Affrick; where the Consul should war by Sea, and Scipio by Land, by vertue of the same commission and authority that he had already. Moreover, if the conditions of peace were accepted of both parts, that then the Tribuns of the Commons should propound unto the people, as touching their will and pleasure, whether the Consul or P. Scipio should conclude the peace; and which of them (if the victorious army after conquest obtained, were to be brought back out of Affrick) should have the conduct thereof home again. Also, if they nominated Scipio for to make the peace, and bring away the army likewise, then the Consul should not cut over from Sicily to Affrick. As for the other Consul who had the government of Italy, he should receive of M. Sestius the Pretor, two legions. So P. Scipio had his commission sealed again for to remain in the Province of Sicily, with the same forces which he there had. M. Valerius Falco the Pretor in the Brutians country was allowed those legions whereof C. Livius had the command the year before. It was further-more agreed, that P. Ælius the Pretor should take the two legions in Sicily of Cn. Tremellius: and that one legion which P. Lentulus the Propretor had under his conduct, was appointed to M. Fabius for Sardinia. And M. Servilius the Consul of the former year, continued also in his government with his own two legions for Hetruria. As concerning the provinces of Spain, sith L. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Manlius Acidinus had been there for certain years, the said Consuls were to deal with the Tribuns, that if they thought it good, they should propound unto the Commons, for to know their minds whom they would appoint to govern Spain: and that he whosoever it was, should out of two armies enrol one entire legion of Roman souldiers, and of the allies of the Latin nation make up fifteen cohorts or regiments, and with the strength of them joyntly, keep in obedience and defend the province. Item, that L. Cornelius and L. Manlius should bring over the old souldiers into Italy. Unto Cornelius the Consul was assigned a fleet of fifty ships, to be deducted and drawn out of two other Armadoes; the one of Cn. Octavius which was in Africk, the other of P. Villius which guarded the coasts of Sicily; and to choose thereout what ships he would: and that P. Scipio should keep those fifty ships of war which he had already. And in case his pleasure was that Cn. Octavius should be Admiral over them still, like as heretofore; then Octavius was to continue in government for that year as Vice-pretor: but if he made Lælius the Admiral, then Octavius should depart and come home to Rome, and bring back with him those ships that the Vice-consul had no use or need of. M. Fabius likewise had ten gallies of service allowed him into Sardinia. And the Consuls were appointed to muster and enrol two legions of citizens, that with the power of fourteen legions, and an hundred ships of war, the affairs of Rome that year might be managed.

These things thus ordered, they began to debate in counsel about the Embassadors of Philip and the Carthaginians: and thought good it was to admit the Macedonians into place for to have audience. Divers and sundry speeches they made, whiles they laboured partly to cleer that point as touching the complaints that the Embassadors sent from Rome made before the King, for the forraging and spoiling of their confederats: and partly complained themselves of the allies of the people of Rome, laying much to their charge: but far more bitterly accusing M. Aurelius, for that he being one of the three Embassadors sent unto them, staid behind and took musters of souldiers; yea, and against the covenant comprised in the league, made war upon them, and oftentimes gave battel unto their Captains and Governors in open field: partly also they demanded, that the Macedonians and their Captain Sopater, who had served in the wars of Annibal for wages, and were taken prisoners and kept bound in prison, might be enlarged and set at liberty,

To

To theſe points M. Furius, ſent of purpoſe from Aurelius out of Macedonia, made anſwer briefly in this wiſe, That Aurelius who was left behind, for fear that the aſſociats of the people of Rome, wearied with rodes and incurſions into their territories and other injurious oppreſſions, might revolt unto the King; never departed out of the confins of the aſſociats aforeſaid, and endeavoured only, that thoſe robbers and forragers of the country ſhould not invade and over-run their lands, and go clear away without any harm. As for Sopater, he was a ſtate and peer of the realm, and one neerly allied unto the King, who lately was ſent into Affrick with four thouſand Macedonians and with money, to aid and aſſiſt Annibal and the Carthaginians. When as the Macedonians being required what they could ſay to theſe challenges framed but a doubtful and intricate defence, before they had well made an end they received this for their anſwer: That ſince the King ſought war if he proceeded and went on ſtill, he ſhould ſhortly have his hands full: but forasmuch as he had broken the league in two points, firſt in offering wrong to the allies of the people of Rome, and moleſting them by way of war and hoſtility; and ſecondly, in helping their enemies with men and money, they deemed thus much of it that not only P. Scipio both did & doth well and juſtly, in keeping them ſtill in priſon as enemies, who bare arms againſt the people of Rome, and were taken captive; but alſo M. Aurelius performed good ſervice to the State, and a great pleaſure to the Senat, in defending the Allies of the people of Rome by force of arms, when by right of league he could not. When the Macedonians had their diſpatch, and were ſent away with this heavy anſwer, then the Carthaginian Embaſſadors were called in.

When they beheld their reverent age, and the dignity of their perſonage (for they were the beſt and principal men ſimply of their City) then every man was fully perſwaded for his own part and ſaid, That now they dallied no longer, but meant in deed and good earneſt to crave & have peace. But the chief and moſt portly perſon of them all was one Aſdrubal, in his countrey and among his citizens ſurnamed Hædus, a man that ever perſwaded peace, & oppoſed himſelf againſt the Barchine faction. And therefore he had the more credit and authority, when he derived "the blame from the Common-weal, and laid all the fault upon the wilfulneſs and greedy ava- "rice of ſome few. Who after he had uſed diverſe and ſundry ſpeeches, one while excuſing and "clearing the crimes, another while confeſſing ſome things objected, leſt if they had denied cer- "tain truths, they ſhould with more difficulty have obtained pardon and peace: now and then "alſo giving the LL. of the Senat an admonition and warning by the way, to uſe their proſperity "and good fortune modeſtly and with moderation, he added moreover and ſaid, That if the Car- "thaginians would have been ruled by him & Hanno, and had been ſo wiſe as to have taken their "time and the opportunity when it was, they ſhould themſelves have given thoſe conditions of "peace, which now they are conſtrained to crave. But for men to be fortunate and wiſe both at "once, it is a rare and ſpecial gift, and ſeldome ſeen. And here it is that the people of Rome (quoth "he) is invincible, becauſe in proſperity they can remember to be wiſe, and to take the beſt way "for themſelves. And certainly, a wonder it were, if ever they ſhould do otherwiſe. For thoſe "commonly who happen to meet with ſome new good ſucceſs, and have not been uſed thereto "before, overſhoot and paſs themſelves too much in exceſſive joy; which they have not the grace "to govern with ſobriety and diſcretion: whereas the people of Rome have ever been accuſto- "med to the continual felicity of joyous victories, inſomuch as they are grown into a diſuſe of "taking pleaſure and delight in them (ſo common they are) and have encreaſed their dominion "and Empire, more (in manner) by ſparing and pardoning thoſe whom they have conquered, "than by the very conqueſt of them indeed.

"The ſpeech that the other Embaſſadors made, was more pitiful and lamentable, whiles they "recounted before the Senat from what high eſtate, and to how baſe condition they were fallen: "who but a while ſince held by force of arms, as it were the whole world, & had nothing left them "now but the bare walls of the City of Carthage, within which they were ſhut up, and could ſee "nothing either by land or ſea, which they might rightfully claim as their own. Nay, the very "City it ſelf and their houſes, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is willing, "and forbeareth to proceed by rigour and extremity againſt the ſame, ſince there is nothing elſe "behind to work upon. Now when as the LL. of the Senat ſeemed to encline to mercy and com- paſſion one Senator there was amongſt them (by report) who upon a deep and inveterate hatred of the Carthaginians trechery, ſpake out aloud and ſaid, "What Gods will they regard and ſwear "by in making of a new league, who have broken their oath, and taken their name in vain whom "they called to witneſs in the former? Mary (qd. Aſdrubal) even thoſe and no other that are ſo ſharp revengers and heavy enemies to the breakers of league and covenant. So when all their minds were enclined to peace, Cn. Lentulus the Conſul, who had the government of the navy, oppoſed himſelf againſt the decree of the Senat for to croſs the ſame. Then M. Attilius, and Q. Minutius, Tribuns of the Commons, preferred a ſolemn bill unto the people, in this form: Pleaſeth it you, and will you grant, That the Senat ſhall reſolve and determine, that peace may be concluded with the Carthaginians? Pleaſeth it you to chuſe and appoint who ſhall be the man to make that peace, and who ſhall bring the army out of Africk? As concerning peace, the tribes every one as they were demanded their voices, granted affirmatively (Uti rogatis) that Scipio ſhould conclude it, and alſo bring away the army. By vertue of this Act paſſed by the people, the Senat made a decree, that P. Scipio by the advice and counſel of ten Commiſſioners, ſhould contract an accord with the people of Carthage, under what conditions he thought good. After this

the Carthaginians rendred thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requeſted that they might enter H into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives aforetime, and lay in the common goal and priſon. For there were amongſt them ſome of their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of birth and of good quality; others alſo, unto whom they were to deliver ſome meſſage and credence from their kinſmen. When they had ſpoken and communed with them, they came with a new petition and made earneſt ſuit, to give them leave to ranſome and redeem as many of them as they would: whereupon they were willed to give them their names; and when they had named faſt upon two hundred, an order was granted out of the Senat, that the Roman Commiſſioners ſhould take over with them into Affrick unto Scipio two hundred of thoſe captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of; and declare unto him from the Senate, that in caſe the peace were fully agreed upon and finiſhed, he ſhould deliver I thoſe two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any ranſome. Now when the heralds of arms were appointed to go into Affrick, for to confirm and eſtabliſh the peace according to the ſolemn order, at their own requeſt there paſſed an act of the Senat framed in this form and tenor. Imprimis, That they ſhould carry with them every one by himſelf, certain flint ſtones of their own, and likewiſe Verven. Item, That the Roman Pretors ſhould command them ſo-lemnly to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Pretor ſacred herbs or Verven. A kind of graſs or herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians diſmiſſed and ſent from Rome: who being come into Affrick to Scipio, concluded peace with the ſame capitulations as is aboveſaid. And ſo they delivered up K their gallies and ſhips of war, their Elephants, the renegate traitors, the vagrant fugitives, and four thouſand priſoners. Among whom was Q. Terentius Cuello, a Senator by his calling. As for the ſhips, ſo ſoon as they were lanched forth into the deep, Scipio cauſed them to be ſet on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, one with another, of every ſort, and all directed and guided by oars. Preſently were they ſet a burning: a dolorous ſight and heavy ſpectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage it ſelf had been on a light fire. The renegat traitors and rebels were puniſhed more grievouſly than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latin Nation loſt their heads: all that were natural Romans, were crucified and roundly truſſed up on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace laſt made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Luctatius and A. Manlius were Conſuls. The war began three and L twenty years after, whiles P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Conſuls. And the ſame ended in the eighteenth year after, P. Cornelius, and P. Ælius Pætus being Conſuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would ſay, that the willful and covetous deſire of T. Claudius firſt, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the only ſtay and let, that this war ended not with the final ruin and utter deſtruction of Carthage.

When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continual wars were grown bare & poor, thought the levy and contribution of money for to furniſh out the firſt payment, lay heavy and ſore upon them, inſomuch as in their Senat-houſe, there was great ſorrow and heavineſs, yea, and piteous weeping; it is ſaid, that Annibal was ſeen to laugh a good while. And when A. Hedus rebuked him for laughing in that publick lamentation of the City, conſidering that himſelf was the cauſe of M thoſe tears, "If (qd. Annibal) as we ſee by our eye the outward diſpoſition of the face and coun"tenance, ſo we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, ye might ſoon perceive,
"that this laughter of mine, which ye ſo much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad
"and joyful, but rather ſenſeleſs, ſtupified, and aſtonied with the exceeding griefs and calamities
"that have hapned. Yet is not it ſo unſeaſonable and impertinent to our preſent condition, as "theſe tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is abſurd and nothing to the purpoſe. Then
"ſhould ye have wept and ſhed tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from us, when
"our ſhips were ſet on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with forrain "nations: for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never "think that the Romans have proceeded hardly againſt you, in compariſon of the hatred that ye N
"bare one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and reſt in quiet. If it
"have no enemies abroad, it findeth ſome at home: much like unto ſtrong and luſty bodies, which "ſeeming ſure enough againſt all outward accidents and cauſes of ſickneſs, are overcharged with "their own ſtrength and fulneſs of humours, and thereby ſubject to moſt deadly maladies. So "much, forſooth, and no more we feel of the publick miſeries & common calamities, as toucheth
"and concerneth our ſelves in particular: wherein nothing pincheth us more, nor goeth neerer
"to the quick, than to forgo our mony, and part with our pence. And therefore when Carthage
"was conquered and deſpoiled of all her ancient honors, when ye ſaw her diſarmed and ſtripped
"naked, when ye ſaw her forlorn of all the armed nations of Affrick; no man then ſighed, no man
"groned thereat: but now when the tribute impoſed, is to be paid out of your privat purſes, ye O
"keep a weeping and wailing, as in ſome publick funeral and mortuary carried forth. But alas, I "fear me greatly that ere it be long, ye ſhall find and feel, That your weeping this day hath been "for the leaſt loſs of all the reſt. Thus ſpake Annibal to the Carthaginians.

Scipio having aſſembled his whole army together before them all, reſtored Maſaniſſa to his fathers Kingdom: and over and beſides, endued him with the poſſeſſion of the City Cirtha, and other Towns and territories which belonged to the realm of Syphax, and were now in ſubjection

A to the people of Rome. Unto Cn. Octavius he gave order to conduct the fleet into Sicily, and there to make it over to Cn. Cornelius the Conſul. The Carthaginian Embaſſadors he willed to go to Rome, that thoſe acts and capitulations which were concluded by him with the advice of the ten Commiſſioners, might likewiſe paſs under the approbation of the Senat, and the conſent of the people, and ſo be ratified and confirmed for ever.

Thus Scipio having obtained peace both by ſea and land, and embarked his army, ſailed toward Sicily, & arrived at Lilybæum. From whence he ſent away a great part of his army by ſea, and himſelf paſſed by land through Italy, which now was joyfull as well for the peace concluded, as the victory atchieved. Where all the way as he went, not only the people came forth in multitudes out of the Cities to do him honour, but numbers alſo of the country peaſants out of the Villages, filled
B all the high-waies along untill he came to Rome: where he entred the City, riding in the moſt ſtately and magnificent triumph that ever had been. He brought into the City Chamber 100033 pound weight of ſilver. He divided among his ſouldiers out of the ſpoil * four hundred Aſſes a peece. Syphax by his death rather diſappointed the people of a goodly ſhew and pageant in the triumph, than diminiſhed any whit the glory of the triumpher: he died at Tybur not long afore, to which place he had been removed from Alba: howbeit his death was not obſcure, by reaſon that he was ſolemnly carried to his buriall, with the pomp of a publike funerall at the charges of the City. But Polybius a writer of good account, reporteth, That this King was led in the very triumph. As Scipio rode triumphant Q. Terentius Culleo followed after with a cap of liberty ſet upon his head; and ever after, ſo long as he lived, he honoured him (as beſeeming it was) and acknowledged C him the author of his freedom. But as concerning his ſurname Africanus, I cannot for certain learn, whether it were the favour of his ſouldiers firſt, or the affectionate love of the people afterwards that brought it up, or rather began upon ſome of his own houſe and linage that courted and flattered him therewith: like as in our fathers daies Sulla was ſurnamed * Fœlix, and Pompeius, * Magnus. This is certain that he was the firſt General that ever took his name of the country and nation by himſelf ſubdued, and thereby was renowned. But by his example afterwards, others nothing comparable to him in victory and conqueſt won goodly titles and glorious inſcriptions to their Images, and honoured their houſes with noble ſtiles and additions.

The one and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

FUll well apaid am I likewiſe, that I am now come to an end once of the Punick war, as if my ſelf had been in perſon there, and born my part in the toil and danger thereof. For albeit unfitting it is for me (who have undertaken and profeſſed ſo boldly to write a compleat and full ſtory of the Romans) to be wearied in the ſeverall parts of ſo great a work: yet when I think and conſider, how threeſcore years and three (for ſo many are reckoned from the firſt Punick war, to the end of the ſecond) have taken up no fewer books of mine than four hundred eighty eight years before, even from the foundation of Rome unto the Conſulſhip of that Appius Claudius, who was the firſt that warred upon the Carthaginians; methinks I foreſee already, that like as they who being once entred into the ſhallows near the ſhore, are trained on ſtill, and venture to wade into the ſea, even ſo I, the farther I go forward, the deeper I ſtep, and am carried away in a vaſt Ocean, and bottomleſs gulph (as it were) which cannot be ſounded; and that my work groweth ſtill upon me in my hands, which as I went away apace, and rid matters at the firſt, I would have thought by this time ſhould have decreaſed. H

The Carthaginian peace was no ſooner concluded, but the Macedonian war ſtraightwaies enſued: nothing comparable to the Punick, if ye regard the hazard and danger, the vertue of the Captains for direction, or proweſs of the ſouldiers: but if a man conſider the Nobility and reputation of the ancient Kings, the fame and antiquity of the nation, the greatneſs of their ſeignory and dominion, who in times paſt had conquered and held by the ſword much in Europe, and the better part of Aſia, I dare well ſay, as noble and renowned, if not more. But the war commenced againſt Philip ten years almoſt before, had ere three years end been laid down and diſcontinued by means of the Ætolians: who as they gave occaſion to enter into arms, ſo they wrought a compoſition of peace. But afterwards in proceſs of time, when the Romans by reaſon of peace with the Carthaginians, had nothing to do, and were at leiſure; and yet bearing an inward grudge, and owing a diſpleaſure to Philip, as well for his faithleſs peace with the Ætolians and other allies and confederates of that country, as alſo for aid both of men and money lately ſent into Affrick to Annibal and the Carthaginians: behold, the Athenians, whoſe territories he had clean waſted and ſpoiled, and whom he had driven within their City walls, importuned them with their prayers, and perſwaded them to take arms and renew the war aforeſaid. And much about the ſame time there arrived Embaſſadors from King Attalus, as alſo from the Rhodians, giving notice that divers Cities and States of Aſia were ſollicited likewiſe by Philip to band againſt the Romans. Theſe Embaſſadors had their diſpatch, and received this anſwer, That the Senat would have a careſull eye to the affairs of Aſia. But the entire treaty and conſultation concerning the Macedonian war was wholly reſerved and referred unto the Conſuls, who then were employed in the war with the Boii. In the mean ſeaſon three Embaſſadors were addreſſed unto Ptolomeus the King of Ægypt, to I wit, C. Claudius Nero, M. Æmilius Lepidus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, with this commiſſion: Firſt, to ſignifie and let him underſtand, that Annibal & the Carthaginians were ſubdued: ſecondly, to give thanks unto the King for continuing ſo faſt and faithfull unto the Romans in their diſtreſs and adverſity, when other of their allies, and even their next neighbours forſook and abandoned them: laſt of all, to requeſt him, that in caſe they ſhould be forced by wrongs and injuries offered, to wage war againſt Philip, he would vouchſafe the ſame mind ſtill and his wonted affectionate favour toward the people of Rome.

Near about this time, P. Ælius the Conſul being in France, advertiſed that the Boians before his coming had made rodes into the lands of the friends and allies of the Romans, preſently in all haſte levied and enrolled two legions upon the rumour of this tumult and trouble; and joyning M thereunto four cohorts of footmen out of his own army, ſent C. Appius a Colonell or Captain of the Confederates, with this power ſo ſuddenly raiſed, and with commandment to march through that part of Umbria, which is called, the Tribe Sappinia, and to invade the territories of the Boii, whiles himſelf in perſon led his forces the open way traverſing through the mountains, and came thither. Appius being entred into the confines of the enemies, at the firſt had a good hand, and ſped well in forraging the country with ſafety of himſelf. But afterwards, having made choice of a meet place near unto a Caſtle called * Mutilum, for to cut down and reap the corn, (for now the fields were ready for harveſt) but yet, without eſpials ſent out to diſcover the coaſts about, without ſetting ſtrong and ſufficient guards, which being well appointed and armed, might defend the unarmed that were buſie in their harveſt work; he chanced himſelf and all his forragers and N reapers to be ſurpriſed at unawares by the Frenchmen, and aſſailed on every ſide. Whereupon they alſo that were armed fled in great fright; and 7000 men ſtragling here and there over the corn fields were ſlain; and among them C. Appius himſelf their leader. The reſt for fear were driven to put themſelves within their Camp: from whence without direction and guidance of any certain Captain and only upon a generall conſent of the ſouldiers, the night next following they abandoned their hold, left much of their baggage behind them, and through blind forreſts, chaſes, and wild mountains (in manner unpaſſable) they came in the end to the Conſul: who, after he had performed in his Province no memorable act, ſave only that he waſted the borders and frontiers of the Boii, and made a league with the Ingauni (a nation of the Ligurians) returned to Rome. So ſoon as he had aſſembled the Senat, all the whole houſe with one voice called upon him to treat O and conſult upon no other matter before they had determined of King Philip, and the complaints made by their allies: ſo he propoſed that out of hand to be debated in Councill. And the Senate in a frequent number there met, paſſed a decree, that P. Ælius the Conſul ſhould ſend whom he thought good with commiſſion and authority for to receive the Armado which Cn. Octavius was to bring out of Sicily, and therewith to croſs over into Macedonia. So M. Valerius Lævinus the Vice-Prætor was ſent; and when he had taken the charge of the fleet, conſiſting

* Medina, Leandro.

A sting of eight and thirty sail, at the hands of Cn. Octavius about Vibo, he passed the seas to Macedonia. Now when M. Aurelius the Lieutenant was come, and had enformed and advertised him, what puissant armies, what numbers of ships the King had prepared and got together; how partly himself in person by going about not only to all the Cities of the Continent, but also the Islands in the sea; and partly by sending his Embassadors every way, had sollicited unto war, and raised much people to take arms: shewing moreover, that the Romans were not to enterprise that war without preparation of greater forces: and that more speedily, for fear left if they made slow haste and lingred, Philip might enterprise that adventure, which Pyrrhus (a Potentate and Prince of a far lesser Dominion) had done before: it was thought meet that Aurelius should dispatch his letters to the same effect unto the Consuls and

In the end of this year, when a motion was propounded in the Senat-house as concerning the setting out of lands unto the old souldiers for recompence of their good service, who, under conduct and fortunate government of Scipio the Pro Consul, had brought the war in Affrick to an end: the LL. enacted a decree, that M. Junius the Prætor of the City, if he thought so good, should create ten Decemvirs as surveyors, for to measure out and divide among them the lands in Samnium and Apulia, so much as had been forfeit and confiscate to the people of Rome. And these were they: namely, P. Servilius, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, Cneus and Marcus, named Servilii and both surnamed Gemini, Lucius and Aulus both Hostilii, and surnamed Catoes likewise, P. Villius Tappulus, M. Fulvius Flaccus, P. Ælius Pætus, and Q. Flaminius.

C At the same time P. Ælius the Cos. called the assembly and high Court of Parliament for election of Magistrates: and for Cos. were created P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. After them were the Prætors chosen, to wit, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Fulvius Gillo, and C. Sergius Plancus. The Roman stage-plaies were that year exhibited with great state and magnificence most sumptuously, by L. Valerius Flaccus, and T. Quintius Flaminius, Ædiles of the Chair, and for two daies together were represented anew. These Ædiles distributed and divided most faithfully among the people a mighty deal of corn, which Scipio the Pro-Consul had sent out of Affrick, at four Asses the Modius: whereby they won great love and favour of all men. Also the Plebeian plaies were thrice set forth all whole again by the Ædiles of the Commons, L. Apustius Fullo, and Q. Minutius Rufus. This man from his Ædileship stepped to the Prætors place. And by occasion
D of those plaies there was a solemn feast celebrated in the honour of Jupiter.

In the 544 year from the foundation of the City, when P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius were Coss. the war with King Philip began, within four months after peace granted to the Carthaginians. And before all other matters this affair was propounded in the Senate by P. Sulpitius the Cos. upon the Ides of March, the very day on which at that time they used to enter upon the Consulship. Where by the Senate it was decreed, Imprimis, That the Consuls should sacrifice with greater beasts to what gods themselves thought good, with a solemn prayer in this form: That whatsoever the Senate and people of Rome minded and intended to do, either concerning the affairs of the Common-wealth, or the undertaking and enterprise of this new war, the same might speed well and happily in the end, to the behoof of the people of Rome, their allies, and E namely, the nation of the Latines. Item, That after sacrifice and divine prayer they should consult with the Senat about the state of the City, and the government of the Provinces. At the same time it fell out very fitly to provoke and stir up their minds unto war, that not only letters were brought from M. Aurelius the Lieutenant, and from M. Valerius Lævinus the Vice-Prætor: but also a new Embassie of the Athenians arrived; the one importing, and the other reporting, that the King drew near and approached their confines, and within a while would be not only Lord of their lands and territories, but also Master of their City, unless the Romans set too their helping hand. After that the Consuls had openly pronounced and declared, that the sacrifices were performed rightly and according to order, and that the Gods gave ear unto their prayer, and accepted thereof: and the southsayers and bowell-priers likewise out of their learn-F ing made answer and shewed, that the inwards of the beasts were as they should be, and signified happiness, namely, the enlarging of their confines and frontiers, with the atchieving of victory and triumph. Then were the letters aboveſaid of Valerius and Aurelius read, and the Athenian Ambassadors had a day of audience After this, there passed an Act of the Senate, That thanks should be rendred unto their allies, for that they being long tempted and sollicited for to revolt, yet notwithstanding had not failed in their allegeance, nor forsaken their fealty, no, not for fear of a present siege. As touching sending aid unto them, it was thought good to give answer, when the Consuls had their Provinces allotted unto them; and when that Consul whose hap it should be for to go into Macedony, had proposed unto the people, That defiance should be given to Philip King of Macedony, and open war proclaimed against him. Now it fell by lot unto P. Sulpitius to take that charge in Macedony, who preferred and presented a bill unto the peo-
G ple in this manner: Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed and denounced against King Philip and the Macedonians within his Realm and Dominion for the wrongs offered and the war levied by them upon the friends and allies of the people of Rome? Unto the other Consul Aurelius befell the Province of Italy. Then upon this the Prætors cast lots for their Provinces. Cn. Sergius Plancus had the jurisdiction of the City; Q. Fulvius Gillo was to govern the Province of Sicily, Q. Minutius Rufus of the Brutii, and L. Furius Purpurio of France.

The foresaid bill as concerning the Macedonian war, in the first Parliament assembled about it, H was in manner by all the centuries in the formost scrutinies nipped & flatled denied. Which thing, partly men of themselves were forward enough to do, as being over-wearied with long and sore wars, and worn out for very irksomness of tedious travel, and painfull perils: and partly Q. Fabius a Tribune of the Commons, failed not to set them on: who taking the old course and way of blaming and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they sowed the seeds of war still, and ceased not to raise war upon war, to the end, that the commons might never be at rest, and enjoy the repose of peace. The LL. of the Senat took this to the heart, in such sort, that the Tribune was shaken up and much reviled in the Senat-house with most opprobrious and reproachfull terms; and every man did his part to encourage the Consul to publish a new assembly and scrutiny, for the proposing of the same bill; to chastise and rebuke the sloath and idleness of the people; yea, I and to open and shew unto them what great damage and loss, how much shame and dishonour they should incur by these delaies before the war began. Then the Consul having assembled the people for this purpose in Mars field, before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them all together and made a speech unto them in this wise: "It seemeth (quoth he) that you are "ignorant, my Masters and Citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether ye "would have war or peace, (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure, "who already prepareth mortall war both by sea and land,) but whether ye would rather choose "to transport the legions into Macedony, or receive your enemy here within Italy. And what dif- "ference there is between the one and the other, you have had sufficient proof and experience "(if ever at any time before) even in this last war, especially with the Carthaginians. For who is he K "that maketh doubt, but if we had with speed relieved the Saguntins besieged, who fled unto us "for help, and earnestly craved for our protection, like as our ancestors and progenitors in due "time assisted the Mamertins; we should have turned the whole violence and force of the war "into Spain, which by our long driving off & lingring delaies we entertained in Italy, to our great "loss and grievous calamity. Neither need we to doubt of this, but that we have hitherto staid "Philip in Macedony, (who without question had combined with Annibal by means of letters "and entercourse of Embassadors, for to have passed over into Italy before this time) only by "sending of Lævinus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and to make war in his own king- "dom. Defer we then to do that now, when Annibal is chased out of Italy and the Carthagini- "ans defeated; which then we did, when we had the same Annibal our enemy within Italy? Go L "we on still and suffer the King by winning the City of Athens (like as we permitted Annibal by "forcing of Saguntum) to try and see our slackness and cowardise: we shall have him I warrant "you arrived in Italy, not at five months end, as Annibal was after his departure from Saguntum; "but within five daies, after he is disanchored once & under sail from Corinth. Set case ye will not "compare Philip with Annibal, no, nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; yet I am sure "ye will make them matches, and equall with King Pyrrhus: so far forth I say, as one man excelleth "another in valour, and one nation surpasseth another in power. Epirus hath never been accoun- "ted, nor is at this day, but the smallest appendant to the kingdom of Macedony, and of least im- "portance. But as for Philip, the whole and entire seignory of Peloponnesus is under him, and Lord "he is of Argos it self, a City nobled as well by the death of Pyrrhus, as the ancient name and re- M "nown that goeth of it. Compare now again the times of our state. How much flourished Italy in "those daies more than now? Our affairs were then much more sound and unfoiled: our Cap- "tains safe, our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom the Carthaginian wars after- "ward consumed: yet as puissant and great as we were, Pyrrhus assaied us, he put us to trouble and "sorrow enough, yea, and came in train of victory to shake our free hold, even wel-near to the Ci- "ty of Rome. So as not only the Tarentins, and all that tract of Italy, which they call the greater "Greece, banded with him in such sort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very "language and those of their name: but the Lucans also and the Brutians, yea, and the Samnits re- "volted from us, and rebelled. And are ye of beliefe that these will be quiet and remain in loyalty "and obedience, if Philip once were passed over into Italy? yes mary will they, there is no questi- N "on: for they stood fast afterwards, and continued true in the Punick war. Nay, nay, never make "reckoning that these States will not revolt from us so long as they know any one unto whom "they may turn and range themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and been loath to pass over "into Affrick; in truth at this day ye should have had Annibal and the Carthaginians your enemies "still in Italy. Let Macedony therefore be the seat of war rather than Italy: let our enemies Cities "and lands be destroyed with fire and sword. We have found well by good experience, that our "fortune is better, and our forces wore puissant abroad in forrain parts, than at home in our own "Country. Go to therefore in the name of God to the Scrutiny and give your voyces; and those "things that the LL. of the Senat have devised to do, grant ye the same, and yield your assent. Ye "have not only the Consul author of this advice and counsel, but also the immortal gods (who as O "I offered sacrifice and prayed devoutly unto them, that this war might redound to the good and "benefit of my self, of the Senat, of you, of our allies, of the Latine nation, and finally of our armies "and armadoes) have vouchsafed me all the signs and tokens of comfort and joy, and assured me "that all shall be well, and according to our hearts desire. This Oration of his once ended, they went presently to deliver up their voices and gave* affirmatively for the war, & suffered it to pass according as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat there was a solemn supplication

A for three daies proclaimed: and in all Churches and Chappels, and before every ſhrine & altar the gods were praied unto, that the war (which the people had allowed of) againſt K. Philip might be wel atchieved, and have an happy end. Moreover, the Conſul Sulpitius conferred with the heralds, and asked their advice, Whether they would ordain, that the war to be denounced againſt King Philip ſhould be intimated to himſelf in perſon: or thought it ſufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier town of all, where he kept a garriſon and guard: they pronounced again, That it mattered not, but the Conſul ſhould pleaſe himſelf, and do full wellin the one and the other. Then the Conſul was permitted by the LL. of the Senat to chuſe whom he would, ſo he were not a Senator, for to ſend as a meſſenger or purſevant of arms, to give the King defiance, and to publiſh war. After this it was debated in Council how the armies ſhould B be diſpoſed as well of Conſuls as Prætors. The Conſuls were commanded to enroll two legions, and to diſcharge and caſſe the old armies. Sulpitius, who by a decree was to manage this new war of ſo great name and conſequence, was allowed to take with him out of that army which Scipio the Vice-Conſul had brought out of Affrick, as many voluntaries as he could procure: but in no caſe to urge any old ſouldier againſt his will. Alſo it was decreed, that the Conſul ſhould allow unto the Prætors L. Furius Purpureo, and Quintus Minutius Rufus 5000 men apeece of the aſſociats of the Latine nation: whom they ſhould employ, the one in the Province of Gallia, and the other in the Brutians country to defend thoſe parts and keep them in obedience. Q. Fulvius Gillo was himſelf likewiſe commanded to chuſe out of that army which P. Ælius the Conſul commanded, as many as had ſerved feweſt years, untill he made up the number of 5000 alſo of the allies & C Latines; which ſhould be a garriſon to keep in order and ſafety the Province of Sicily. M. Valerius Falto, Prætor the year before, and L. deputy of the Province of Campan, had his Commiſſion ſigned anew, to continue for the term of one year longer, and as Vice-Prætor to paſs over into Sardinia, with direction to chuſe out of the army there 5000 of the allies and Latines, ſuch as had ſerved leaſt time. And the Conſuls were commanded to take up two legions of Citizens, which might be ſent to any place, as need ſhould require, conſidering that many nations in Italy tainted and infected with the fellowſhip and company of the Carthaginians during the wars and ever ſince, were ſwelled with anger and deſpite againſt the Romans. Thus the Common-weal for that year was to uſe the employment of ſix Roman Legions.

Amidſt theſe preparations for war, there arrived Embaſſadors from K. Ptolomeus, giving intelli- D gence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their King and Maſter, againſt Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romans, yet the King would ſend into Greece neither a fleet of ſhips, nor an army of men, defenſive, or offenſive to any, but by authority and conſent of the people of Rome. In caſe therefore the Romans were reſolved, and ſufficient withall of themſelves to defend their allies, he would be willing to ſit ſtill and take his repoſe at home. Otherwiſe, if the Romans were rather diſpoſed to reſt and take their eaſe, he would himſelf be well content to ſend ſuch forces to the aid of the Athenians, as ſhould defend them eaſily againſt all the power of Philip. The Senat returned great thanks unto the King, with this anſwer, That the people of Rome were purpoſed to protect their own allies: but if during this war they ſtood in need, upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereof to the King: as E being aſſured and making full account, that all the puiſſance and wealth of his kingdom was a ſure prop and truſty pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done, by order from the Senat the Embaſſadors had given them for a reward * five thouſand Aſſes apiece. Now whiles the Conſuls were buſie in taking muſters, and providing all things meet for the war; the City very devout and given much to religion, in the beginnings eſpecially of all new wars, after they had performed their ſupplications aforeſaid, and done their devotions at every altar and ſhrine: becauſe nothing might be for-let and left out, that at any time heretofore had been done; ordained that the Coſ. unto whom the Province of Macedony fell, ſhould vow ſolemnly to exhibit to the honour of Jupiter, the great games and plaies, and a rich preſent beſide. But Licinius the High Prieſt ſtaid this publike vow for the time that it went not forward, alledging that it was not lawful to make a vow F of an uncertain ſum of money not determined: & if ſuch money might not ſerve for the uſe of war, it ought preſently to be ſet by and laid up ſafe, and not be mingled and ſhuffled with other monies: and unleſs that were duly done, the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites. Albeit the thing it ſelf and the perſon of the man that moved this ſcruple, touched and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Conſul ſhould propound the matter to the colledge of the Prieſts and Biſhops, to know their reſolution, whether a vow might not directly be made of an uncertain peece of money. The Biſhops ſet down their opinion and judgment, that it might be well enough, yea, and better than otherwiſe. Whereupon the Conſul pronounced the vow, according to the very ſame form of words (as the High Prieſt endited and ſpake before him) which aforetime they were wont to uſe, in making the quinquennal vows from five G years to five: ſave only thus much, that he vowed and promiſed to repreſent the plaies, and to preſent oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to ſuch a ſum of money, as the Senat ſhould ſet down when the vow was to be performed. So many times before had the great games been vowed, and a determinate ſum of money ever aſſigned: but theſe were the firſt that were not limited within any certain ſtint and compaſs.

Now when all mens minds were wholly bent upon the Macedonian war, behold on a ſud- den, when they feared nothing leſs than ſuch a thing, there aroſe a rumour of French troubles and tumults: for the Insubrians, the Cenomans and Boii, having sollicited and raised up by way of insurrection the Sallii, the Ilvations, and other states of Liguria, under the conduct of Amilcar the Carthaginian, who in those parts staid behind with the remnant of Asdrubal his army, were seized of Placentia: and after they had sacked the City, and for very dispiteous anger burnt a great part of it, leaving hardly two thousand persons of all sorts, which amidst the fire and ruins thereof chanced to save themselves, crossed the river Po, and advanced forward to the spoil and pillage of Cremona. But the inhabitants of that Colony, having heard of the misery and calamity befaln upon their neighbour-City, had some respit and time to shut their gates, and to bestow their guards upon the walls: so as, they should at least wise be first besieged or ever they were forced, and might be able to dispatch messengers unto the people of Rome. L. Furius Purpureo was governor of that Province for the time; who having by order from the Senat discharged all the rest of the army but only five thousand of allies and those Latines, abode with that power in the next country to that Province, about Ariminum. He then addressed his letters unto the Senat, signifying in how bad terms the province stood, namely, that of those two Colonies, which all the time of the Punick war had escaped those great storms and tempests of troubles, the one was won by the enemies and put to the saccage, the other now besieged, and at hand to be lost: neither would his forces be sufficient and able to help the distressed Cremonians, unless he should wilfully cast away five thousand allies, and expose them as a prey unto forty thousand of the enemies (for so many they were strong) to have their throats cut, and to be hewn in peeces; and by so great a loss and overthrow of his, to give more heart and courage to the enemies, who are now in their ruff, and puffed up with pride for the ruin of one Roman Colony already. Upon the reading of these letters, there went forth a decree from the LL. of the Senat, that C. Aurelius the Consul should send out precepts for the army to be ready at Ariminum that very day, on which he appointed them to the Rendezvouz in Hetruria: and that either himself in his own person, if it might stand with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppress these French commotions, or else write to L. Furius the Prætor, that when the Roman Legions presented themselves unto him out of Hetruria, he should send in their stead his own five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the mean time, and make a journey himself in person to raise the siege before Cremona, and to set the Colony free that now was beleaguered. They thought good besides to dispatch Embassadors into Affrick, who should go to Carthage, and afterwards to Masanissa in Numidia. To Carthage, for to intimate unto them, That Amilcar, a Citizen of theirs, left behind in France, (and L whether he were of the army of Asdrubal before or afterwards of Mago, they knew not for certain) waged war there against the covenants in the League contained: that he had assembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into arms against the people of Rome: and therefore, if they had any love to entertain peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome. Over and besides, they had in commission to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the runnagate rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carthage, and there went up and down, and converted openly; which persons were, after diligent search made, to be attached and apprehended, that they might, according to the tenor of the accord, be sent home again, and delivered into the hands of the Romans. And thus much concerning their message to the Carthaginians. Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Masanissa, M and to declare what joy they took in his behalf namely for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdom, but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourishing part of the Realm of Syphax. Moreover, commanded they were to signifie unto him, that they had undertaken to war upon King Philip because he had befriended and aided the Carthaginians; and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italy was full of troubles and wars, enforced and put them to it, for to send their armies and their armadoes into Greece, and so by dismembring and dividing their forces into sundry places, was the principall cause that they were so late ere they passed over into Affrick: requesting him for the maintenance of this war, to send over certain aids of Numidian horsemen. These Orators had great gifts and honourable presents given them for to carry unto the King, to wit, divers peeces of plate both of gold and silver, a purple robe of State, with a rich cassock or coat wrought in palm-tree work, with a royall Scepter of Ivory, also a robe embroydered before with purple, with an Ivory chair of state. Last of all, they are willed to make promise unto the King, that if he could think upon any thing needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdom, or to advance his royall estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compass the same to the uttermost of their power.

There arrived also about that time Embassadors from Vermina the son of Syphax, and presented themselves unto the Senat, excusing the errour, and pretending the youth of the Prince, cleering him of all fault, and laying the whole blame upon the fraud and treachery of the Carthaginians, promising for their King and Master in this wise, That like as Masanissa of a professed enemy O was become a sworn friend to the Romans, even so would Vermina do his best, and strain himself, that in all offices of friendship toward the people of Rome, neither Masanissa, nor any other should surpass and go beyond him; and making petition in his name, that the Senat would vouchsafe to give him the titles of King, of Ally, and Friend unto the Romans. These Orators had this for their answer, That not only Syphax, his father before him, of a confederate friend suddenly without any cause at all proved an enemy to the people of Rome; but also himself had practised already in his young

A young years, and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romans by war; and therefore he was to seek pardon and crave peace at their hands, before he might be invested by them with the terms of King, of Ally, and Friend: for the honour of that stile the people of Rome were wont to vouchsafe to none, but those Kings only who had deserved singularly well of them. Mary there should be certain Roman Legats in Affrick, unto whom the Senate would give order to minister and tender unto Vermina certain conditions of peace according to a large and absolute commission that they had from the people of Rome, To do what they thought
B good. And in case the King misliked ought in those capitulations, and were desirous to have any article added, put out, or altered, he must recourse again to the Senat, and demand the same. So there were Legats or Commissioners sent into Affrick with such a Commission aboresaid namely, C. Terentius Varro, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Octavius, and each of them had a galleace directed with five rows of oars.

After this were the letters read of Q. Minutius Prætor in the Province of the Brutii, importing thus much, That the consecrated money of Proserpina at Locri was by night stoln out of her treasury; but to say who should do the deed, they had no presumptions to give light and lead them
C directly. The Senat took the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly, That sacrilegious men fell still to Church-robbing, and would not give over: and that the late and fresh example of Pleminius (so notorius as well for the hainous fact as the fearful punishment) was not able to terrifie them and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Cos. was enjoyned to write unto the Prætor into the Brutians country, to this effect: That it was the Senats pleasure, that due enquiry and examination should be had of the Treasury thus robbed, after the same precedent and course that M. Pomponius the Prætor took three years before. And look what money could be found, it should be laid up duly in the place; and what was not forth-coming, it should be supplied and made good again. Also (if he thought meet) that there should be certain purgatory sacrifices, according as the Bishops before ordained in the like case, for the expiation and satisfaction of the violating and defiling of the Temple. Moreover, there chanced about the same time divers prodi-
D gious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucans country the rumor and voice went, that the welkin was on fire; and at Privernum, while the sky was bright and fair, the sun appeared red all day long. At Lanuvium, in the Temple of Juno Sospita, there was heard in the night-season a mighty great noise. Nay, and more than this, in sundry places (as men say) were many monstrous and strange births seen. In the Sabins country one child was born, and no man knew what to make of it, male or female: and another likewise was found of sixteen years of age, E a very Hermaphrodite of doubtfull sex between both. At Frusino there was a lamb yeaned with a swines head: and at Sinuessa a sow farrowed a pig with the head of a man. In the Lucans country there was foled upon the common ground a colt with five feet. All these monsters were ugly to see and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working strangely out of kind. But above all others, those births both male and female, (or rather neuter) were most abhorred and detested, and order was given presently, that they should be cast into the sea; even as of late daies when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Consuls the like deformed monster was thither had away and drowned. Nevertheless the Decemvirs were commanded to turn over and peruse F the books of Sibylla, to know what such prodigious monsters might portend: who by their learning and out of those books, gave direction to make the same sacrifices which last of all for the like uncouth sights were made. Moreover, they gave commandment, that certain hymns and songs should be chanted throughout the City by three severall quires, of nine virgins in every one; and an oblation to be offered by them with all devotion to queen Juno. C. Aurelius the Consul caused all this to be performed according to the order and direction of the Decemvirs. And as in our fathers daies Livius composed the ditty of the hymn, so at that time P. Licinius Tegula framed and set down a form of song which they could sing. Thus when all things were expiate, and satisfaction made accordingly for the appeasing of the wrath of the gods, (for even at Locri also the sacriledge was found out by Q. Minutius, and the money missing was raised out of G the goods of the offenders and guilty persons, and bestowed there again in the treasury) as the Consuls were minded to take their journey into their Provinces, there repaired many private Citizens unto the Senat, unto whom the third payment was due that year for the loan of money, which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Consuls they had lent out and disbursed, because that the Consuls had made them answer, That the stock of the City Chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new war, which required maintenance of a mighty Navy and of puissant armies, and therefore flatly denied them, and said, That they had not wherewith to satisfie and make present payment. The Senat could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint; considering, that if the Common-wealth would still employ the money upon the Macedonian war also, which was granted in loan for the Punick war, this would be the end of it, that (one war following thus in the neck of another) their own money which was lent upon a curtesie and benevolence out of their private purses, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeiture, and fall to the Exchequer and common Chest of the City. These private persons demanding nothing but reason and right, and the City withall not able to discharge her debt, the Lords set down a middle and indifferent course between honesty and profit; and that was this: That forasmuch as many of these men said, that the City had much land upon sale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common

grounds lying and being within fifty miles of Rome every way, ſhould be granted unto them in fee H farm, and the Conſuls to ſet down an eſtimate of their value and worth, and charge them with a chief rent or tribute of three farthings an acre by the year, to teſtifie only that they were the Cities lands; to the end that if any man hereafter (when the City ſhould be aforehand and in caſe to repay the former debt) were deſirous to have money rather than land, he ſhould reſtore the lands and poſſeſſions again into the Cities hands and receive his money. Theſe private Citizens (who were the foreſaid creditors) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon this land was called by the name of Trientius and Tributus, becauſe it was ſet out and granted in lieu of a third part of the lone mony. Then P. Sulpitius after he had pronounced his vows aboveſaid in the Capitoll, and departed out of the City in his coat of arms, with the Lictors and Uſhers afore him, arrived at Brunduſium; and ſo with the old voluntary ſouldiers drawn out of I the army that was returned from Affrick, (whom he had enrolled into legions) and ſhips choſen out of the fleet of Cornelius the Conſul; he looſed from Brunduſium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where attended him the Embaſſadors of the Athenians; who humbly beſought him to deliver them from the ſiege that inveſted their City. So C. Claud. Cento was incontinently ſent to Athens, furniſhed with twenty long ſhips of war, and a ſtrength of men: for the King himſelf in perſon beſieged not Athens, but even then made hot aſſault upon the town Abydus, as having already given proof of his forces in ſea-fight, both with the Rhodians and King Attalus, and in neither battell had good ſucceſs. But beſides the ordinary ſtoutneſs and pride engraffed in him by nature, he was aloft now and looked high, by reaſon of the alliance made between him and Antiochus King of Syria, with whom he had parted the riches and Realm of Ægypt, unto K which they both aſpired, upon the news they heard of the death of Ptolomeus. Now the Athenians had drawn upon themſelves the war againſt King Philip, upon a ſmall occaſion and of no importance; who of all their ancient eſtate and glory, retain nothing elſe but great heart and hauty ſpirit. It fortuned that two young men of Acarnania, who had taken no orders and were not conſecrate, entred among the other multitude into the Temple of Ceres, in the time of the feaſtivall daies, and celebration of ſacrifices to that goddeſs belonging: and being altogether ignorant in the cuſtome of that ſolemnity and religion, and asking ſome fooliſh abſurd queſtions, nothing fit for that time or place, were ſoon bewrayed by their ſpeech and language: who being convented before the Prelates of the ſaid Temple, notwithſtanding it was evidently proved and known, that upon an errour only & overſight, and not for any ill intent they were come into the L Church, yet were they put to death as fellons, and guilty of ſome hainous fact in the higheſt degree. The people of Acarnania complained unto King Philip, and informed him of this villanous part and hoſtile act by them committed; and obtained a grant from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians, to make war upon the Athenians. This army at firſt invaded the territories of Athens, and with fire and ſword made waſte & havock of all, and ſo with a rich booty of all ſorts returned into Acarnania. Theſe were the firſt quarrels on both ſides, that ſtirred coals and kindled fire between them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open war proclaimed, by the generall decrees of both States. For when King Attalus and the Rhodians purſued after Philip, as he retired into Macedony, and were come as far as Ægina, then the ſaid King paſſed over to Pyræum, for to renew and confirm the league with the Athenians. Againſt his coming M the whole City went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergy with their rich veſtments and goodly ornaments were ready to receive him as he entred the City: the very gods themſelves in a manner abandoned their ſhrines to give him entertainment. Immediatly was the people ſummoned to a generall aſſembly, that the King might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards, upon more ſage advice, it was thought to ſtand better with the honour and Majeſty of a Prince, that he ſhould ſet down in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place either to bluſh himſelf in recounting his favors and good turns done unto the City, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be abaſhed and aſhamed of their groſs and unmeaſurable flattery. But in his letters which he ſent unto the aſſembly, and were there openly read and publiſhed, firſt he made a rehearſall of the benefits that this con- N federate City had received at his hands. Secondly, he diſcourſed of the worthy exploits which he had performed againſt Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whiles they had himſelf, the Rhodians, and eſpecially the Romans to friend them, they ſhould put themſelves in arms and begin war; as who if they now forſlowed the enterpriſe, and let ſlip the preſent opportunity, ſhould hereafter ſeek in vain to find it, which once they had ſo retchleſly loſt. Then had the Rhodian Embaſſadors audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleaſure, in recovering and ſending home unto Athens four long ſoiſts, which newly had been boorded and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with generall accord they decreed to denounce and wage war againſt King Philip. But firſt they did King Attalus incredible honour beyond all meaſure and then likewiſe to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was ſome ſpeech mo- O ved of adjoyning unto the ten ancient tribes, one other tribe, which of the Kings name ſhould be called Attalis. Unto the City of the Rhodians they gave in token of vertue, a Crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeoſie of their City to the Athenians, ſo they of Athens now endured the Rhodians with their liberties and franchiſes. This done, K. Attalus returned to his fleet in the rode of Ægina. The Rhodians then weighed anchor, and from Ægina ſailed to * Cea. From whence along the * Iſlands, they paſſed to the Rhodes:

A and in their voyage confedered themſelves with them all, excepting * Andros, * Paros, and * Cythnus, which were guarded by garriſons of the Macedonians. In Ægina King Attalus made his abode a certain time, and entred into no action, by occaſion of meſſengers whom he had ſent into Ætolia, and Embaſſadors that were expected from thence. But as he could not prevail with the Ætolians, & perſwade them to take arms, contenting themſelves with the peace that in ſome ſort they had concluded with Philip: ſo himſelf, and the Rhodians (who no doubt, if they had preſſed and followed hard upon Philip might have gained and enjoyed this glorious title, That they alone of themſelves had delivered Greece from ſervitude) by ſuffering him once again to croſs the ſeas as far as * Helleſpontus, and to poſſeſs himſelf of the commodious and important towns of Greece, thereby to re-enforce his power and gather more ſtrength, gave food and nouriſhment to the war, B and in the end let the Romans go away with the honour, both of managing and alſo of finiſhing the ſame. Philip carried with him yet a more princely mind and Kingly courage: who, although he was not able to match and make his part good ſo much as with Attalus and the Rhodians his enemies, yet was he nothing at all danted with the thundring threats of the Roman war; but ſent Philocles, a Captain of his, with a power of two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, to invade and ſpoil the territory of the Athenians, commited his Armado to the charge of Heraclides, to ſet ſail for * Maronea, and himſelf in perſon marched by land thither with another regiment of two thouſand footmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of arms. Maronea he forced at the firſt aſſault. But as for Ænus, after he had with much labour and travell laid ſiege thereto a long time, in the end he was Maſter thereof, through the treaſon of Ganymedes, deputed C L. Governor there for King Ptolomæus. After this he ſurpriſed and won other Caſtles, as Cypſela, Doriſcon, and Serrheum. From thence he advanced forward to Cherſoneſus, where he gained Elæus and Alopeconneſus, which willingly ſurrendred: Callipolis alſo and Madytos, with ſome other peeces of baſe account and reckoning. But the Abydens ſhut their gates againſt the King, and would not ſuffer ſo much as his Embaſſadors to ſet foot within their Cities. There lay Philip a long time before the town and beleaguered it: and ſurely had not Attalus and the Rhodians foreſlacked the time, it might have been ſaved and the ſiege raiſed. Attalus ſent thither three hundred ſouldiers and no more to lie in garriſon, and the Rhodians one galley only with four banks of oars out of the navy when it rode at Tenedos. And afterwards when as Attalus himſelf was thither come, at what time as the townſmen could hardly hold out any longer againſt the ſiege, he made D them a ſhew only near at hand of ſome help: other relief would he afford none to his allies either by land or ſea. The Abydens at firſt planted their engins and artillery along the walls, and with ſhot from thence not only diſtreſſed their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but alſo annoyed them as they lay in harbour with their ſhips: but afterwards, ſeeing part of their walls ruinate and laid open; and perceiving beſides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as far as the inner countermure, which the inhabitants in great haſte had raiſed within, forthwith they ſent Embaſſadors to the King to treat and article about ſome conditions for delivering up the City. The townſmen capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian Galley aforeſaid, with all her mariners, and the garriſon alſo of King Attalus, might be ſent away in ſafety, and themſelves permitted to depart the town every one with a ſin- E gle ſuit only of apparel. But Philip made anſwer again, that they had no peace for them at all, unleſs they would quit the place, and ſimply commit themſelves unto his mercy. This Embaſſage related unto them, ſet them in ſuch an heat and choler, that partly for ſpight and indignation, and partly upon deſpair, they fell into the like rage that the Saguntins did in times paſt. All the dames and wives of the City they commanded to be ſhut up within the Temple of Diana: their young boies and maidens that were free-born, the ſucking babes, together with their nurſes, they cauſed to be beſtowed within the common place of publike exerciſe: their gold and ſilver they took order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their coſtly apparell and furniture, to be caſt into the two Galleys, the one of Rhodes, and the other of Cyzicum, which rid in the haven: and laſt of all, that their Prieſts ſhould be brought forth with their beaſts for ſacri- F fice, and altars erected in the midſt of the place. There firſt were certain men choſen of purpoſe: who ſo ſoon as they perceived the battaillon of their countrimen defeated and ſlain, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediatly ſhould run upon their wives and children, and kill them without mercy, caſt away into the ſea their gold and ſilver, and all the furniture aboveſaid that was in the Galleys, and ſet the edifices and houſes afire, as well publike as private, in as many places as poſſibly they could. For the performing and execution of theſe premiſes, they were bound by an oath miniſtred unto them; the form whereof, with a curſed malediction thereto annexed, they pronounced word for word from the Prieſts mouth. Then, as many as were of lawfull age to bear arms, ſware likewiſe, That not one of them would depart out of the battell alive, but with victory. Thus remembring the oath they had taken, and how they called the gods to G witneſs, they fought ſo reſolutely, that whereas the night would have parted the combate, the King terrified with their furious rage, firſt gave over the conflict. The chief and principall men of the City, whoſe charge was to play the more cruell and horrible part in this tragicall act, ſeeing there remained but few alive after this skirmiſh, and thoſe grievouſly wounded and tired out of heart for wearineſs; the next morning early by day-break ſent their Prieſts with their infules and veiles of peace, to render the City unto Philip. Before the town was fully yielded, M. Æmylius the youngeſt of thoſe three Roman Embaſſadors which were ſent to Alexandria, hearing of the the ſtraight ſiege of the Abydens came by the conſent of the other two unto Philip. Where he laid open their grievances, and made complaint, That he had warred upon Attalus and the Rhodians, and namely even then beſieged and aſſailed Abydus moſt forcibly. And when the King anſwered that Attalus and the Rhodians without juſt cauſe on his part offered, began firſt to moleſt and trouble him. What! (quoth Æmylius again) were you moleſted and troubled firſt by the Abydens too? Philip who was not wont to be told the truth ſo plainly, thinking this rejoynder of his more bold and malapert than to be offered to a King, "Your youthfull age, quoth he, & fair face, "and above all the Roman name maketh you hardy and audacious. But I would adviſe you all, "firſt to remember your covenants, and to entertain peace with me. For in caſe ye once begin "with me, and put me to it: I do you underſtand, that I alſo am fully reſolved to make you feel "the ſmart, and know, that the realm and nation of the Macedonians is no leſs renowned for feats I "of arms than the Romans. Philip having diſmiſſed the embaſſador, and ſeized upon all the gold and ſilver that lay on an heap together, loſt all the booty of men of quality that might have yielded him a round ranſom. For the multitude of common people fell into ſuch a fit of rage and madneſs, that all of a ſudden they imagined thoſe who let their lives in the conflict were betrayed: and ſo caſting one in anothers teeth their perjury, and charging the Prieſts eſpecially that they were forſworn in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted and appointed to death; they ran at once from all parts to the pitifull maſſacre of their own wives and children: and when they had ſo done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by ſword, by drowning, hanging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick diſpatch and clean riddance of themſelves alſo. The King aſtonied to ſee them thus horn-mad, ſtaid the bloudy his own ſouldiers, ſaying, that he would allow the Abydens three daies to dye in. During which term of time, the conquered Abydens exerciſed more fearful cruelty upon their own perſons than ever the conquerors would have put in practice in the height of their heat and cholerick fury. Inſomuch as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but ſuch as either faſt tied with bonds, or otherwiſe by ſome forcible means were ſtaid from being their own hangmen, and the butchers of their proper bodies. Philip after he had placed a garriſon at * Abydus returned into his own Realm. Now when this miſerable calamity of the Abydens had fleſhed Philip to enterpriſe war againſt the Romans, like as Annibal afore him took heart by the woſull deſtruction of Saguntum to do the ſemblable: behold, he was encountred with poſts that brought news, how the Conſul was in Epirus already, and had withdrawn his land-forces to Apollonia, and beſtowed his ſervitors at ſea in Corcyra, there to winter.

* Abydos.

In this while the Embaſſadors who were ſent into Affrica had their diſpatch and this anſwer from the Carthaginian. Firſt, as touching Amilcar the Generall of the army and forces in France, they could do no more but baniſh his perſon, and confiſcat his goods. Then concerning the fugitive traitors and rebels which were run from the Romans, they had ſent home again unto them as many as they could ſearch out and come by: and to that purpoſe they would addreſs Embaſſadors themſelves unto the Romans, to ſatisfie the Senat in that behalf. And preſently they ſent to Rome two hundred thouſand Modii of wheat, and other two hundred thouſand into Macedony to the army there. From thence the Roman Embaſſadors went forward to the King in Numidia. To King Maſaniſſa they delivered the preſents which the Romans ſent, and declared unto him their commiſſion; at whoſe hands they received a thouſand Numidian horſe, whereas he offered them two thouſand: himſelf took order for their embarking, and ſo diſpatched them into Macedony, with proviſion of two hundred thouſand * meaſures of wheat, and as many of barley. A third Embaſſage they had to Vermina, who met the Embaſſadors as far as the utmoſt marches of his Realm, and to their diſpoſition and diſcretion referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themſelves: ſaying withall, that he held any peace whatſoever, that he ſhould have with the people of Rome for good and juſt. So there were preſented unto him certain articles and conditions of peace, and for the ratifying thereof he was enjoyned to ſend his Embaſſadors to Rome.

Much about the very ſame time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Vice-Prætor returned out of Spain: who having declared in the Senat his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many years together he had atchieved in Spain; and in conſideration thereof, demanded that it might be lawfull for him to enter the City in triumph: the Senat judged that his noble acts deſerved no leſs than he ſued for: but they had no ſuch precedent from their anceſtors, that he ſhould be allowed to triumph, who had warred, neither as Dictator, nor Conſul, nor Prætor: and as for Lentulus, in quality of Vice-Prætor only, and not of Conſul or Prætor he took upon him the charge of the Province of Spain. Howbeit, in the end they came down to this point, that he ſhould ride into the City on horſeback as Ovant. But T. Sempronius Longus a Tribune of the Com. interpoſed his negative, alledging that they had as little example to ſhew for that; and no practiſe or cuſtome at all of their ancient predeceſſors. But in fine the Tribune gave place to the generall accord of the LL. and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order ſet down by the Senat, L. Lentulus entred Rome in that ſolemnity and pomp before-named. He preſented in ſhew of the pillage that he had got, * 44000 pound weight of ſilver, * 2450 pound weight of gold. To his ſouldiers he diſtributed out of the ſpoil * 120 Aſſes apeece.

Now was the army of the Conſul tranſlated already from Aretium to Ariminum, and five thouſand Latine allies were paſſed out of France into Etruria. Therefore L. Furius departed from

Ariminum

A Ariminum, made haſte by taking great journeyes to come againſt the Gauls, who then laid ſiege to Cremona, and encamped within a mile and an half from the enemy. Means and opportunity he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies, if immediatly upon his firſt coming he might have aſſailed their Camp: for they wandred to and fro in ſcattering wiſe up and down the country a forraging, and had left no ſufficient guard for the defence of their Camp. But he feared greatly that his ſouldiers were weary and tired: becauſe the companies marched apace thither in exceeding great haſte. Howbeit the Gauls being called back by the hooping and hollowing of their fellows, let go their booty which they had in manner as good as in their hands, and returned to the Camp, and the morrow after ranged themſelves in battel array. The Romans were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to ſet themſelves in order, B the enemies ran ſo ſuddenly, and made ſuch haſte to fight. The right wing (for the army of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard: the two Roman legions in the rereward; M. Furius led the right wing, M. Cecilius had the conduct of the legions; and L. Valerius Flaccus (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavalry. The Prætor kept with him two Lieutenants, Cn. Lectorius, and P. Titinius, by whoſe means he might look about from every part, and be ready to oppoſe himſelf againſt al ſudden attempts whatſoever of the enemies. At the firſt, the Gauls hoped that with their numbers they ſhould be able to tread down and trample under their feet that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they reduced their multitudes into one place, and charged upon it with all their might and main together. But ſeeing that enterpriſe ſped not well, they endeavoured to environ the corners and ſides, and to compaſs C the enemies round about: which they thought they might ſoon do, being ſo many as they were in compariſon of ſo few: which when the Prætor perceived, to the end that he alſo might ſpread out his battelions at large, he diſplaied the two legions in the rereward, ſo as he compaſſed on both hands that wing which fought in the vanguard: and therewith vowed two Chappels to Jupiter, if that day he might be ſo fortunate as to vanquiſh his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one ſide he ſhould with the Cavalry of the two legions, and on the other ſide with the horſe belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, and not ſuffer them in any caſe to encloſe the battell about. Herewithall himſelf alſo, eſpying the midle battaillon of the Gauls to be but thin, by reaſon they were ſtretched out from thence to the corners and points of each hand, commanded his ſouldiers to keep cloſe together, to advance forward and break D through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the horſemen diſcomfited, and they in the midſt repulſed back & chaſed by the footmen: and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten down and killed, they ſhewed their backs, and fled as faſt as they could to the camp. The horſe purſued them in the rout and chaſe; and anon the legionary footmen made after alſo, and gave an aſſault upon their Camp. There eſcaped from thence not all out ſix thouſand: ſlain there were and taken priſoners above 35000, with ſeventy banners and enſigns, and more than two hundred French wagons, charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amilcar the Generall of the Carthaginians loſt his life, and three Noblemen of the French, Leaders of mark and name. The Placentine captives, to the number of two thouſand men of free condition, were delivered again to them of their own Colony. This was a goodly victory; and upon the letters E which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received there with great joy; and ordained it was, that a ſolemn proceſſion ſhould be held for the ſpace of three daies. Of Romans and allies one with another, there died in this battell two thouſand: moſt of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict moſt of all diſcharged their fury.

Albeit the Prætor had brought the war to a good paſs, and in manner finiſhed it, yet the Conſul alſo C. Aurelius, having accompliſhed his neceſſary affairs at Rome, made no ſtay but took his journey into France, and received the victorious army of of the Prætor. The other Conſul who came into his Province but a little before the end of Autumn, wintered about Apollonia. The Roman gallies which from the Armado that lay in dock at Corcyra*, were ſent as is afore- * Corphu.
ſaid to Athens with C. Claudius, were no ſooner arrived at Pyreæum, but they mightily comforted F the allies, whoſe hearts were well-nigh done: for neither were there any more inrodes now by land as there were wont to be from Corinth ſide by the way of Megara along into their territories: and the men of war and Pyrats ſhips which from Chalcis had made not only the ſeas dangerous to the Athenians, but alſo the maritime & ſea coaſts, durſt not now approach nearer than to the cape of Sunium, no, nor venture into the open main ſea from out of the ſtraights of Euripus. Over and beſides, there came in to them three Rhodian gallies with four banks of oars: there were alſo three open ſhips of Athens well rigged and appointed, for to keep the quarters that lay along the river. Claudius was well appaied, and thought he had got enough for the preſent, in caſe the City and Territory of Athens might be ſufficiently guarded by this fleet. But ſee, there preſented unto him an occurrent beſides of far greater importance and conſequence. Cer- G tain baniſhed perſons of Chalcis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and violence of thoſe that ſided with King Philip, advertiſed him, that the City of Chalcis might be eaſily ſurpriſed without any conflict or reſiſtance at all: for, not only the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and down, becauſe there were no enemies near at hand to fear; but alſo the townſmen preſuming upon the garriſon of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the City. Upon the aſſurance of their words, he ſet forward: and although he was arrived at Sunium with ſo good ſpeed, that he might with eaſe have ſailed to the entrance of the ſtreights of Eubœa, yet for fear of being being diſcovered (when he was once got paſt the cape) he kept his fleet within the bay ſtill untill H night: and at the ſhutting in of the evening he weighed anchor and lanched forth, and having a calm ſea, he arrived before Chalcis a little before the break of day, and preſented his forces againſt thoſe parts of the City that were leaſt peopled: and with the help of ſome few ſouldiers he ſca-led and got the Tower that ſtood next, with the wall about it, whiles in ſome places the warders were found aſleep; and in others not at all to be found. Then they advanced forward unto thoſe parts that were more inhabited, and ſtood thicker with houſes; where, after they had killed the guard and broke open a gate, they received into the town all the reſt of their ſouldiers. Whereupon, there was running now on every hand into all parts of the City, and much hurry and confuſion; which was the greater, becauſe the enemies had ſet fire on the houſes about the market place.

The Kings garners alſo were of a light fire, together with the arſenall and armory, where there I was exceeding ſtore of proviſion, of engins, of artillery and other ordnance and inſtruments for war. After this they fell to execution and to maſſacre in every place, as well thoſe that fled as thoſe that made head; ſo as they miſſed not one that was of age meet to bear arms, but either he was killed or put to flight. Sopater likewiſe the Acarnanian Captain of the garriſon was there ſlain. All the pillage was firſt brought and piled up together in the common place of the City, and afterwards embarked. The common Goal beſides was broke open by the Rhodians, and the priſoners and captives let out, whom Philip had there lodged as in a place of ſureſt guard and cuſtody.
Then they overthrew the Images and ſtatues of the King, and brake their necks: which done, they ſounded the retreat, went a ſhipboord, and returned to Pyræum, from whence they came. But if the number of Roman ſouldiers had been ſuch, that they might have kept Chalcis ſtill with a gar- K riſon, without quitting and abandoning the defence of Athens, a great matter had been got in the very beginning of the war: to wit, the City of Chalcis and the paſſage of Euripus, had been taken from the King. For as the narrow paſs of Thermopyle ſtoppeth the waies into Greece by land, ſo the ſtreights of Euripus maketh all ſure by ſea. Philip at that time lay in the City Demetrias; where, after he heard the news of the calamity befain upon a confederate City, albeit now it was too late to help when all was loſt; yet becauſe he would be revenged (which is a thing that cometh near to the nature of aid and ſuccour) he went forth immediatly with five thouſand footmen lightly appointed and nimble, and three thouſand horſemen, with all the ſpeed and haſt he could to reach near unto Chalcis; making full reckoning that the Romans might be ſurpriſed on a ſud-den: but being diſappointed of this hope, and thither come where he could ſee nothing elſe but I a pitious ſpectacle of a friend-City half ruinate and ſtill ſmoaking and ſo few people left alive, that they hardly were able to bury their dead, he returned as haſtily as he came; and having paſſed over Euripus at a bridge, he lead ſtreight to Athens by the way of Bœotia, with a deep perſwaſion and hope, that a like enterpriſe unto the Romans ſhould have the like iſſue. And verily he had not miſſed of the ſemblable effect, correſpondent to his deſigns, but that a certain watchman (one of thoſe whom the Greeks call Hemerodromos, that is, poſts and carriers that in one daies ſpace will run and rid a mighty deal of ground) deſcried from a watch-tower the Kings troops marching: whereupon he ran out afore, and came to Athens ere midnight. There were they all aſleep too, and as retchleſs as they of Chalcis were a few daies paſt, which was the loſs of their town. The Prætor of the Athenians, and Dioxippus the Captain of a regiment of hired ſtrangers and aid- M ſouldiers, awoke at this ſo fearfull and ſudden tidings and got up, aſſembled the ſouldiers into the market-ſtead, and commanded to ſound alarm from the higheſt place of the City, that all men might take knowledge that the enemies were near at hand. By which means they ran every man from all parts to the gates and up the walls. Within few hours after, and ſomewhat before daylight, he approached the City: and ſeeing many lights every where, hearing alſo a noiſe of people running to and fro (as in time of ſuch a tumult) he ſtaid his march, and commanded his ſouldiers to ſit them down and reſt themſelves, intending to proceed by overt and open forces, ſince covert and crafty courſes ſped no better: and ſo at length he came before Dipylos. This Dipylos is a gate, ſtanding in the very front of the City, greater and wider a great deal than the reſt.
Both within and without that gate are large and broad ſtreets, ſo that both the inhabitants N within may marſhall an army, and lead in battell array from the common place directly to the gate, and alſo the enemies without have room at will to conduct a power as well of horſe as foot, by means of a ſpacious cauſey or high-way, which reacheth out almoſt a mile in length from the foreſaid gate, and leadeth to the place of exerciſe or ſchool called Academia. At this quarter of the City the Athenians, together with the garriſon of Attalus, and the regiment of Dioxippus, iſſued forth, and entred the cauſey abovenamed, having firſt within the gate ſet their men in order of battell. Which when Philip ſaw, he made full account, That he had his enemies as he would himſelf to do his pleaſure with them, and that now he ſhould have his fill of a maſſacre and ſlaughter that he had wiſhed for ſo long (for there was not a State or City in all Greece that he maliced more than this of Athens.) And therefore he exhorted and encouraged his ſouldiers, that O they ſhould have their eye upon him ever as they fought, and know well this, that where the King was, there ſhould the banners and cornets be diſplaied, there ſhould the ſtrength and force of the battell be: and ſo he-ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and ran with full carreer to charge the enemies. Thus was he not only carried away with heat of choler, but raviſhed alſo with a deſire of glory, eſteeming it a goodly thing, and a matter tending to his great honour, for to be ſeen fighting in the view of a great multitude of people that had taken up and filled the battlements of the walls

A (as it were) to behold a ſolemn ſpectacle. Thus being advanced a good way before the main battail, accompanied with ſome few men of arms, he rode among the mids of the enemies, where he bare himſelf ſo valiantly, that as he mightily heartned his own men, ſo he affrighted no leſs his enemies. Many a one he wounded with his own hand, reaching at them that were neer, levelling at thoſe that were farther off, and drave them afore him like ſheep and followed hard upon them in perſon to the very gate; where he made ſoul work among them, thronged and crouded as they were together in the ſtreight of the paſſage, for haſt they made to eſcape, and committed a grievous ſlaughter. And albeit this was but an unwiſe and raſh adventure of his, yet he retired himſelf in ſafety, without farther danger of his perſon, by reaſon that they who were placed in the turrets of the gate, forbare to ſhoot and lance their darts, becauſe they would not hurt their own
B ſide, intermingled among the enemies. But after this, when the Athenians kept their ſouldiers within the walls, Philip ſounded the retreat and pitched his tents at Cynoſarges, where there was a Temple of Hercules, and a ſchool of learning and a grove ſtanding about it. As for Cynoſarges, and the ſchool Lyceum, and whatſoever was either religious, or pleaſant and delectable about the City, was burned. And not only the edifices, but the ſepulchres alſo and monuments of the dead were defaced and caſt down: in which furious heat of anger, nothing was ſpared, were it ſacred or prophane, without regard of God and man. The next morrow, when the gates were firſt kept ſhut, and afterwards ſet open again upon a ſuddain, becauſe the garriſon of Attalus entred into the City from Ægina and the Roman from Pyræum ſide; Philip diſlodged and removed back from the City almoſt three miles. From whence he went to Eleuſine, hoping to ſurpriſe the Temple at C unawares, together with the Town and Caſtle, which both environeth the Temple, and alſo commandeth the ſame. But when he perceived that the corps de guard was not neglected, and that a fleet beſides was coming from Pyræum to ſuccour them, he gave over this deſign and led his army to Megara, and ſo ſtreight forward immediately to Corinth; and having intelligence, that the Achæi held a general Diet and counſel at Argos, thither he came unlooked for of the Achæans, and put himſelf amongſt them at the very ſeſſion and aſſembly. Conſultation there was, about waging war with Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians: Who ſeeing, that the Seignory of Achaia was taken from Philopœmenes and conferred upon Cycliades, a Captain not to be named and compared with him, and perceiving alſo that the aids which the Achæans had, were fallen from them and gone, took their vantage, renued the old quarrel, and made freſh war upon them, D waſting the villages and territories of the borderers, yea, and threatning the good Towns and Cities alſo. Now whiles they ſat deviſing and conferring together what number of ſouldiers ſhould be levied and enrolled out of every ſeveral ſtate and City, for to withſtand this common enemy, Philip franckly promiſed to eaſe them all of that care as touching Nabis and the Lacedemonians; and not only to impeach them for ſpoiling the lands of their Allies, but alſo to lead his army out of hand into the very territory of Laconica and Sparta, and thither to turn the whole terror of this war. This kind ſpeech and friendly offer of his, being with a general applauſe of them all accepted. "Mary, this you muſt (quoth he) take withal, that good reaſon it is, whiles
"I my ſelf am content to defend and maintain your country by my forces, mine own territories
"in the mean time be not diſfurniſhed of their garriſons and left naked: and therefore, if ye think E "good, provide me as many ſouldiers as may ſuffice for the guard of Oreum, Chalcis and Corinth,
"that thus making all ſure behind me, I may be ſecured from danger that way, and with more re-
"ſolution proſecute the war againſt Nabis and the Lacedemonians. The Achæans ſmelled him "quickly & knew full well, to what end this gracious promiſe of his and frank offer of aid againſt the Lacedemonians tended. His only driſt was to draw forth of Peloponneſus the youth and flour of the Achæans as a pledge and ſure hoſtage for to engage the whole nation ſo far as they ſhould be intereſſed in the war that he had with the Romans. Cycliades the Prætor of the Achæans thinking it bootleſs, and no good policy, to diſcover ſo much and to enforce that point againſt him, inferred only this ſpeech and ſaid, That it was not lawful by the cuſtomes and ordinances of the Achæans, to propoſe other matters to parle of, than thoſe for which they were aſſembled toge-
F ther: and ſo after the order enacted for levying and waging an army againſt Nabis, he diſſolved and brake up the aſſembly, which he now had held right ſtoutly and with the liberty of the place, who otherwiſe before that time was taken ever for no better than one of the Kings flatterers and favorits. Thus Philip put beſides the great hopes that he had conceived, levied ſome ſmall number of voluntary ſouldiers, and returned to Corinth and the land of Attica.

During the time that Philip was in Achaia, Philocles a Captain under the King, departed out of Eubœa with two thouſand Thracians and Macedonians, for to waſt and ſpoil the confines of the Athenians; and overagainſt Eleuſina paſſed over the forreſt and hill Cytheron, from whence having ſent out the one half of his forces every way to prey upon the plain country, he ſat himſelf down cloſe with the other half in a convenient place for an ambuſh, to the end, that if per-G adventure they ſhould make out from the Fort at Eleuſine, and ſet upon his ſouldiers as they drave booties, he might ſuddainly ariſe and charge upon the enemies at unawares, ſpred and ſcattered all abroad. But this ambuſhment was diſcovered. And therefore after he had called the ſouldiers back who were run all abroad a foraging, he put them in order well armed & appointed to beſiege and aſſault the Fort of Eleuſine, againſt which he led all his forces: but after much hurt and many a wound received from them, he retired, and joyned with Philip as he returned out of Achaia. The King alſo himſelf in perſon, aſſaied to force and batter the ſaid hold: but the Roman ſhips coming from Pyreæum, and a freſh garriſon received into the place, cauſed him perforce to give over the enterprize. After this the King divided his power, and ſent one part thereof againſt Athens, under the conduct of Philocles, and himſelf with the other marched to Pyreæum: that whiles Philocles kept the Athenians within the City, by approaching their walls, and threatning to beſiege and aſſault it, he might himſelf with facility win and gain Pyreæum, wherein there was leſt but a ſmall and ſlight guard. But he found as hot a peece of ſervice about the aſſailing of Pyreæum, as before at Eleuſine, by reaſon of the ſame ſouldiers in manner that defended as well the one as the other. So on a ſuddain he departed from Pyreæum & marched directly toward Athens. From whence he was repulſed and chaſed by a ſuddain ſally both of horſe and foot, made from the ſtreights of the wall half ruinat; which wall ſtretching out, as it were, two arms, joyneth the port Pyreæum to Athens. So he left battering and aſſaulting the City, and parting again his army with Philocles, he went out to forrage and ſpoil the country: and as in his former ſaccage he exerciſed himſelf in demoliſhing the tombs all about the City, ſo becauſe he would leave nothing entire and ſafe, he commanded the chappels of the Gods, which were conſecrate in every village and hamlet, to be pulled down, raſed, and burnt.

The countrey of Attica was marvailouſly beautified and embeliſhed (as it were) with goodly peeces of work in that kind, (by reaſon as well of the ſtore they had of native marble, as alſo of their induſtrious and excellent workmen) which miniſtred matter and occaſion unto him of this outrage and madneſs. For not contented and ſatisfied with the ruin of the Temples, and caſting down of images, he commanded that the very ſtones ſhould be broken and batter'd in peeces, that leſt being whole and ſound they might ſerve to make up and ſtop the breaches of the ruins. And after that his fell mood and anger was not ſo much ſatisfied and ſatiate, as it wanted matter to work upon in that place, he departed out of his enemies countrey into Bœotia, and performed no other deed in Greece worthy of remembrance.

Sulpitius the Conſul at that time lay in camp between * Apollonia and * Dyrrachium, neer the river Apſus: and having cauſed T. Apuſtius the Lieutenant to come thither, he ſent him with part of his forces to waſt the borders of his enemies. Apuſtius after he had forraged the frontiers of Macedony, and forced at the firſt aſſault certain holds, as Corrhagum, Gerrhenium, and Orgeſſum, came with his army before Antipatria, a City ſeated in the narrow ſtreights of a certain paſſage. And firſt he called forth the principal and chief citizens to a parly, and aſſaied to perſwade and induce them for to commit themſelves under the protection and ſafeguard of the Romans: but afterwards, ſeeing they truſted upon their greatnes, the ſtrong walls and ſituation of the Town, and therefore made no reckning of his motives, but rejected them, he aſſailed it by force of arms, and wan it in the end. All that were above fourteen years of age he put to the ſword; the whole pillage he dealt amongſt the ſouldiers; the walls he raſed, and ſet fire on the Town. The fear of like miſery was the cauſe that Codrio, a Town of good ſtrength and well fortified, was yeelded to the Romans without aſſault, or any ſword drawn. There he left a garriſon: and after that, he forced Ilium, a Town better known for the name that it carieth of the other famous Ilium in Aſia, than for any thing elſe. As the Lieutenant returned with a great booty to the Conſul, one Athenagoras a Captain under the King, charged upon the tail of the arreergard, diſordred the hindmoſt, and impeached their paſſage over the river: but the Lieutenant, at their cry and ſuddain affright rode in all haſt back, cauſed them to turn again and make head, ſet them in battail ray, and beſtowed all their bag and baggage in the mids upon a heap. The Kings ſouldiers not able to abide the violence of the Romans, were many of them ſlain, and more taken priſoners. So the Lieutenant having retired his army in ſafety, was immediatly ſent back unto the Conſul to the Armado.

The war being thus begun, and the exploit of this firſt expedition happily performed, the Princes, Potentates, and LL. that bordered upon the Macedonians, repaired into the Roman camp, to wit, Pleuratus the ſon of Scerdiletus, Aminander King of the Athamans: and from Dardania, Bato the ſon of Longarus. This Longarus had waged war aforetime in his own name and quarel, with Demetrius the father of this Philip. Theſe States offring and promiſing their aids unto the Conſul, had this anſwer from him, That for the Dardanians and Pleuratus, he would uſe them, when he entred with an hoſt into Macedony. As for Aminander, he gave him in charge the while to ſollicit the Ætolians to war. The Embaſſadors of Attalus (for they alſo were come at the ſame time) he diſpatched with this order, That their King ſhould attend the coming of the Roman fleet at Ægina, where he wintered; with which and his own jointly together, he ſhould aſſail Philip at ſea like as he had done beforetime. Embaſſadors alſo were addreſſed to the Rhodians, that they likewiſe ſhould have their hand and be ſeen in this war. Philip for his part foreſlowed not to make preparation (for now by this time was he come into Macedony) and ſent with part of his forces for to keep the ſtreights of the paſſage of Pelagonia, his ſon Perſeus, a very child of young years, having choſen certain of his truſty friends, to direct and govern his tender age. As for * Sciathus and * Peparethus, two Towns of no ſmall importance he deſtroied, for fear the enemies fleet ſhould ſeize upon them, and with their pillage content and pay themſelves. He ſent likewiſe Embaſſadors to the Ætolians (a nation inconſtant and unquiet by nature) that they ſhould not upon the arrival of the Romans, change their alleageance. Now the Diet or general councel of all the ſtates of Ætolia, which they call Panætolium, was to be held at a certain day appointed. And therefore to prevent and meet with all dangers, both the Kings Embaſſadors made haſt to be preſent thereat; and alſo L. Furius Purpurio preſented himſelf there, as ſent Embaſſador from the Conſul.

A Conſul. The Athenian Embaſſadors likewiſe were at this aſſembly. And firſt the Macedonians (with whom a league was but lately concluded, and therefore freſheſt in remembrance) had audience, who ſaid, "They had no new matter to ſpeak of, ſeeing there was no new occurrent and "buſineſs fallen out: only this, that upon what motives and conſiderations they were entred into "an accord and peace with King Philip, (as having experience that the alliance with the Romans "never did them good) for the very ſame they ſhould maintain it ſtill, being once concluded & "confirmed. Or, love ye rather (quoth one above the reſt of the Embaſſadors) to imitate the "Romans licentiouſnes or their levity, I know not whether? who, as they gave order and com- "mandment, that your Embaſſadors being at Rome, ſhould receive their diſpatch and anſwer in "theſe terms: Come ye now to us indeed my maſters of Ætolia, when without our conſent and B "warrant ye have made peace with Philip? ſo likewiſe at this preſent are ready to require that ye "ſhould band with them, and war upon Philip. They pretended aforetime that they took arms a- "gainſt him, by occaſion of you, in your quarel and defence; & now they forbid you to be in peace "with Philip. At firſt, they entred into Sicily for to aid and ſuccour Meſſana. A ſecond time they "went thither to ſet free and deliver Syracuſa out of the oppreſſion of the Carthaginians. And "now at this time they hold in poſſeſſion both Meſſana and Syracuſa: and all Sicily entire they "have made it tributary, yea, and reduced it into the form of a Province, to be ruled under their "ſword, and the juriſdiction of their Deputies and Magiſtrates. In good faith, I aſſure you, that as "ye according to your laws & cuſtomes hold your Diets & Councels at Naupactum, by your own "Magiſtrats elected and created among your ſelves, wherein ye have liberty to make choice both C "of friends and enemies whom ye will; and to entertain either peace or war at your pleaſure: ſo, "writs are ſent out to the States of Sicily for their knights and burgeſſes, to aſſemble in Parlia- "ment at Syracuſe, at Meſſana, or Lilybæum. And the Roman Pretor it is and no other that ſum- "moneth them thither, as alſo to their Aſſiſes and Seſſions: at his commandment & not otherwiſe "they are cited to general Councels. Him they ſee ſitting on high in his tribunal ſeat, guarded "with Lictors, attended upon with Uſhers, there to hear and determine cauſes, and from aloft to "pronounce hard ſentences and proud awards. His rods threaten their backs and ſides, his axes are "ready to chop their heads from their ſhoulders: & from year to year new Lords ſtill they chooſe "and ſend among them. And this dealing, none of them either can or ought to marvail at: for "why? they ſee Cities of Italy, by name Rhegium, Tarentum, and Capua, (to ſpeak nothing of their D "neighbour Towns, by whoſe fall they aroſe, by whoſe ruins Rome grew mighty) ſubject likewiſe "to the ſame rule and government. As for Capua, the very ſepulcher and tomb of the Campan na- "tion (now that the natural people thereof are either dead and buried, or driven out as exiled "perſons) remaineth at this day as a monſter and wonder in nature, reſembling a headleſs and "limleſs diſmembred trunk of a body: a Town (I ſay) without Senat, without Commonalty, with- "out Magiſtrats: where more cruelty was ſhewed, in leaving it to it ſelf thus abandoned, and in "this manner to be inhabited, than if it had been clean raſed and laid even with the ground. Meer "folly it is and without all ſenſe and reaſon, to believe or hope, that if theſe ſtrangers and aliens "born (who differ more from us in language, in cuſtomes and laws, than they are diſtant and diſ- "joyned by ſpace between of land and ſea) be once ſeized and poſſeſſed of theſe places, that any E "thing will continue long entire in the preſent ſtate. The Kingdom of Philip (ye will ſay) is a block "in your way, and ſeemeth to prejudice your freedom & liberties: yet he being made your heavy "friend, and that through your own fault and deſert, required no other thing at your hands for a- "mends, but peace: and even now deſireth nought elſe but your alleageance, and the faithful ob- "ſervance of the ſame. Acquaint forein legions once with this your countrey; you take the yoke "of ſervitude upon your necks for ever. Accept the Romans once for your Lords: too late it will "be then and in vain for you, to ſeek Philip again, and wiſh him your ally. Small matters and mo- "mentany occaſions may well cauſe the Ætolians, Acarnanians and Macedonians, (men of one "language) to fall out, and as ſlender motives, will ſoon make them friends again: a little thing "ſetteth them at a jar, and as little bringeth them in tune. But all Grecians both are and ever will F "be at war with Barbarians: enemies they are by nature, which is perpetual and immutable; and "not by occaſions which alter every day. But where I began my ſpeech, there will I leave & make "an end. In this very place you the ſame men, agreed three years paſt to have peace with Philip: "and the ſelf-ſame Romans as they miſliked then & diſavowed that peace, ſo now they wil needs "diſquiet and trouble it after it is once paſſed and accorded. And ſince the caſe ſtill is all one, and "fortune hath made no alteration, I ſee no reaſon why ye ſhould vary and change your minds.

The Oration of the Macedonian Embaſſadors.

After the Macedonians, the Athenians entred in place, for the Romans were well contented therewith, and would needs have it ſo: "Theſe Athenians having ſuffred many wrongs and in- "dignities at the Kings hands, had juſter cauſe of complaint, and more reaſon to inveigh and ag- "gravate matter againſt his cruelty and outragious dealings. Firſt, they bewailed the piteous G "ſpoil & miſerable ſaccage of their territories: neither complained they ſo much and found them- "ſelves grieved, in that they had ſuſtained harms and ſuffred hoſtility from an enemy, (for there be "certain laws and rights belonging unto war, by vertue whereof, to give and take, to ſuffer harm "and to do harm interchangeably, is an ordinary matter and allowable: As for example, the burn- "ing of ſtanding corn in the field, raſing and pulling down of houſes, harrying and driving of boo- "ties both of men and cattail, rather pitiful calamities, than ſhameful indignities to endure.) "But this is the point ſay they, and hereof we complain, That he who termed the Romans,

"strangers born, and barbarous, hath so polluted and violated at once all laws of God and man: H
"so as in his former rode and expedition he seemed to make most impious war with the infernal "Gods and Spirits beneath: and in the second with the heavenly powers and Gods above. All "the monuments and tombs within their confines are defaced and destroyed: the dead in their "graves are all laid bare, not so much as the bones of any one lye covered with mould. Temples
"we had and Chappels, which, as in times past when our ancestors inhabited those small holds,
"hamlets and villages, they consecrated and hallowed: so when they were reduced into one City,
"and enrolled into wards and parishes, they forsook not nor abandoned altogether. Round a"bout these sacred Churches hath Philippe secture, and consumed all: the holy images of the Gods,
"lie some scorched and half burnt: others headless and dismembred, among the pillars and posts "of the Temples thrown along on the ground. And look what foul work he hath made in the I
"country of Attica, so rich and so beautifully adorned in times past, the like havock if he might "be let alone, would he make in Ætolia and in all Greece throughout. For had not the Romans "come in time to succour, our very City also had been so served and piteously disfigured. For
"with like mischievous intent came he to the City which worshipped those Gods, not sparing
"the goddess Minerva, the patroness and protectress of our Town and Castle: the same wicked
"mind he caried against the Temple of Ceres Eleusina: and no better affected was he to Jupiter
"and Minerva in Pyræum. But being repulsed by force and arms not only from our Temples, "but also from the walls of our City he wreaked his anger and raged against those Chappels and "religious houses, which had nothing for their defence but only the reverent regard of the Gods, "whereof he had none. Hereupon, they prayed and humbly besought the Ætolians, to have com- K
"passion of the Athenians, and to enterprise the war, under the conduct first of the immortal "Gods, and then of the Romans, who next to the Gods are most powerful and mighty. Then "the Roman Embassadour spake in this wise. "The Macedonians first, and after them the Athe-

"was to complain of the injuries done by Philip to so many Cities of our allies and associats: the "Macedonians by accusing the Romans first, have put me so hardly to my shifts, that I need ra"ther to employ my wits in making a defence of our selves, than in framing an accusation against "others. The Athenians again in reckoning up and recounting the impious, abhominable, and in"human parts of King Philip committed against the Gods, both above and beneath, what have "they left behind for me or any man else to object against him besides? What they have said, I
"you may well think, and truly suppose, that the men of Chios, Abydus, Ænus, Maronea, Thasos,
"Paros, Samos, Larissa and Messene; those also here of Achaia, complain of the same, yea, and
"of more grievous and cruel enormities: as whom he had greater means to annoy and hurt. As "for such things as he hath laid to our charge, if they deserve not honor and glory, I confess they "cannot be answered and defended. Reproched us he hath with Rhegium, with Capua, and Sy- "racuse. I cannot deny, but during the war of Pyrrhus we sent a legion to Rhegium, there to lie "in garrison at the instant prayer of the Rhegins themselves, who requested us to send them.
"This legion I confess, most wickedly and treacherously seized upon the City, and possessed it "to their own use. for the guard and defence whereof they were first sent. A vowed we (I pray
"you) that act of theirs? Nay, pursued we not by arms that lewd legion and ungratious? and M
"when we had them in our power and at our devotion forced not we them to make amends and "satisfaction to our allies, with the smart of their back and sides, and with the loss of their heads "in the end? And when we had so done, restored we not unto the Rhegins their City, their "Lands, all their goods whatsoever together with their liberties, franchises, and laws? As for "the Syracusians, when they were oppressed by strange and forrain tyrants, we judging it to be a "great indignity, relieved and succoured them: and after we had been (for three years space al"most) wearied and toiled out with continual siege and uncessant assault both by land and sea of "their City, so exceeding strong and so well fortified; we seeing that the Syracusians themselves
"made choice rather to be in servitude under those tyrants, than to be taken by us, gave them "their City again both forced and freed by the same armies. Neither deny we that Sicily is our N "Province; and that the Cities which took part and sided with the Carthaginians, & joyntly with "them accorded to wage war against us, are tributaries unto us, and pay us yearly rents and pen"sions: nay, we are so far from not taking this upon us that contrary-wise we would, that both
"you and all nations besides well knew, that every one received at our hands that measure of for"tune that he duly deserved. And now as touching the Capuans, should we repent that we have
"chastised them in such sort, whereof they themselves verily can not complain? These men, after
"we had maintained war against the Samnits in their quarrel and defence, for the space well near
"of seventy years, to no small dispence of ours, and with many a loss and overthrow after we had
"linked them unto us, first by league and alliance, then by marriage and affinity, and last of all, by "freedom and burgeosie of our City: these men I say, in our adversity, were the first of all other O
"nations of Italy, that villanously massacred our garrison there, and revolted unto Annibal: and
"then for very spight and indignation that they were by us besieged, sent Annibal to assail the City "of Rome. And if we had proceeded in that rigour against them, that we had left neither City
"standing nor any one person of them living, who could take offence thereat, and justly say, That "they had been more hardly entreated and dealt withal than they deserved? There were more of "them, that upon touch and prick of guilty conscience for their lewd and wicked deeds, made "them-

A "themſelves away and ſo periſhed, than were by us executed and put to death. As for the reſt, we "took from them indeed their Town, we deprived them of their poſſeſſions and livings, yet ſo, as "we left them both lands to occupy, and place to dwell in: the guiltleſs Town it ſelf we ſuffered "to ſtand ſtill ſafe and ſound, that whoſoever at this day ſeeth it, can not find the leaſt token or "ſhew of a City either forced or won. But what ſpeak I of Capua? ſeeing we have afforded unto "Carthage (a City conquered and ſubdued) both peace and alſo liberty? Inſomuch as we have "cauſe rather to be afraid, leſt by remiſſeneſs and over-willingnes to pardon thoſe whom we have "vanquiſhed, we give occaſion to many more to be ſo bold as to trie the hazard and fortune of "war againſt us. And thus I had to ſay in defence of our ſelves. Now ſomewhat I have to ſpeak "againſt King Philip; whoſe horrible murders committed upon thoſe of his own houſe, even his B "neereſt kinſfolk and friends; whoſe looſe life and unbridled luſt (more unkind and inhumane in "manner than his cruelty) ye know better that are neerer unto Macedony. As for you, my ma- "ſters of Ætolia, we have for your ſakes begun war with Philip, and you again without us have "concluded peace with him. It may be you will alledge, that whiles we were occupied in the "Punick war, ye were forced and compelled for fear to take ſuch conditions of peace at his hands, "who was the ſtronger: we likewiſe (preſſed with greater affairs and troubles) forbare to proſe- "cute and follow that war, which by you firſt was laid down & given over. At this preſent, ſeeing "by the grace and goodneſs of the Gods the Punick war is come to an end, both we have em- "ploied and bent all our forces againſt Macedony, and ye alſo have good occaſion and opportuni-
C "ty offered to reenter into amity and alliance with us, unleſs ye had rather periſh with Philip, "than vanquiſh with the Romans.

When the Roman Embaſſador had ended this Oration, the Ætolians generally were enclined and affected to the Romans; but Damocritus their Pretor (corrupted as the ſpeech went with a ſum of money received from King Philip, and made for him) gave aſſent neither to the one party nor the other, but ſaid, "That in counſels of great weight and importance, there was nothing "more hurtful and prejudicial, than haſt: for repentance (qd. he) follow it never ſo ſoon, when a "thing is once done, yet it cometh too late and booteth not: conſidering, that raſh counſels can "not be revoked, haſty and headlong courſes cannot poſſibly be recalled, nor matters once paſt be "reduced again to their former ſtate. As for the proper time of that reſolution now in hand, D "whereof my ſelf am of advice, that the due maturity & full ripeneſs ſhould be expected, it might "now at this preſent be ſet down and concluded upon. For ſeeing that by our laws & ordinances "provided it is that we may not treat of any affairs concerning peace or war, but in the general "councels called Panætolaik or Pylaik: therefore for the preſent I would have you to ordain and "decree, that your Pretor without fraud or covin might call and hold a Diet or court of Parlia- "ment, whenſoever he is minded to treat of war or peace; and whatſoever then and there ſhall be "propoſed and determined, it may ſtand in as good force, ſtrength, & vertue, as if it had paſſed in "a full * Panætolaik or * Pylaik councel. Thus the Embaſſadors being diſmiſſed and ſent away in "ſuſpence, and nothing decided and concluded, he ſaid, That he had performed a ſingular peece of "ſervice to his nation and countrey. For now they would ſide and take part with thoſe, whoſe "fortune it were to ſpeed better in the field. Thus went matters in the aſſembly of the Ætolians.

E Now Philip with all diligence prepared for war both by ſea and land. His ſea forces he aſſem- bled together unto Demetrias a port in Theſſaly; making account, that Attalus and the Roman fleet would in the beginning of the next ſpring depart from Ægina. Over his navy and all the ſea coaſts he appointed Heraclides Admiral, like as he had done aforetime. Himſelf levied and gathered his land-forces, ſuppoſing verily that he had debarred and bereft the Romans of two great means of aid, to wit, the Ætolians of the one ſide, and the Dardanians of the other; in that the narrow ſtreights and paſſage of Pelagonia, was ſtopped and made ſure againſt them by his ſon Perſeus. The Conſul on the other ſide made not preparations for war, but was on foot and in action already, conducting his army through the confines of the Daſſaretians, and tranſporting with him out of his wintering harbor all the proviſion of grain, whereof the country yeelded him ſufficient to the F maintenance of his ſouldiers. The great Towns and Villages were ſurrended unto him, partly for love and partly for fear: ſome were forced by aſſault, others abandoned by the inhabitants, and were found deſolat, by reaſon that the barbarous people were retired into the mountains near by, to ſave themſelves: and at Lingum near the river Bevus he encamped; from whence he ſent to pur- vey for corn out of the garners and barns of the Daſſaretians. Philip ſaw well enough that the country all about was in an hurry, and the people in great fear and fright; but being uncertain to what place the Conſul intended to march, he ſent out a cornet of light horſemen as eſpials to diſ- cover what way the enemies took, and whither they pretended to go. The Conſul likewiſe for his part was as doubtful: well he wiſt that Philip was diſlodged from the places where he had win- tered, but in what quarter he journied, he knew not: and therefore he alſo had ſet forth certain G horſe in eſpial to ſcour the coaſts. Theſe two bands or troops from divers and contrary parts, en- countred in the end in one way, after they had a long time wandered at adventure through the countrey of the Daſſaretians. Both parts knew well by the noiſe they heard a far off, as well of men as horſe, that enemies approched; and therefore they had both horſe & armour in readines, before they were in ſight one of another: for ſo ſoon as ever they were within their enterview, they made no ſtay, but charged immediatly and joyned iſſue. It fortuned, that for number and valour both, they were equally matched, as being choice and elect men of either ſide: whereupon they fought

* Panætolium. A general councel, where the States of Ætolia were aſſembled.

* Pylaicum concilium: Another Diet holden at Thermopylæ, where the States of Greece or Amphictyones met, and ſent each one their deputy or agent, called Pylagoras.

for certain hours alike, until ſuch time as their own wearines and the faintneſs of their horſes par- H ted the battail in doubtful victory. Of the Macedonians there died 40 horſemen: and of the Romans, five and thirty. And for all this, neither brought the Macedonians any better intelligence to their King, nor the Romans to their Conſul, of the place where the enemies were incamped. But certain fugitive traitors gave advertiſement thereof: who commonly in all wars, upon a running head and light humour that naturally they have, are given to hearken after news, and to enquire in what terms enemies ſtand. Philip imagining that it would availſomewhat both to purchaſe the affectionat love of his ſouldiers, and alſo to induce them more cheerfully and readily to undertake all hazards for his ſake, in caſe he ſeemed to have a careful regard to bury thoſe horſemen which were ſlain in the journey and expedition aforeſaid; commanded their bodies to be brought into the camp, to the end that all men might ſee what honour he did them in their funerals. But I ſee how nothing is more uncertain, nor whereof a man may make leſs reckoning than the minds and affections of the multitude. That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any danger and jeopardy whatſoever, even that, wrought a contrary effect and cauſed them to be moſt fearful and backward. For they who were uſed to fight with Greeks and Illyrians, and to ſee mens bodies wounded with puſh of pike galled with arrows, and pierced with lance here and there in this or that part; after they beheld once their fellows ſo bucherly mangled with the Spaniſh curtelaxes and arming ſwords, the arms cut away from the body, the heads either ſmitten clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the ſhoulders; their panches ript with the bowels open and guts drawing after; with other deep wounds and broad ſlaſhes, moſt hideous and fearful to behold; then they ſaw all full well (fearful creatures K as they were) what manner of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deal againſt. Nay, the King himſelf was terribly afraid, who had not as yet encountred with the Romans in any ſet field.
Whereupon he ſent for his ſon to come back with the garriſon that he had in the ſtreights of Pe- lagonia, thereby to increaſe and ſtrengthen his own forces: and ſo laid open the way into Mace- donia, for Pleuratus and the Dardanians. Himſelf in perſon with a power of 20000 foot, and 4000 horſe, guided by the fugitives above ſaid, marched toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or ſomewhat leſs from the Roman camp, poſſeſſed himſelf of a little hill neer to Athacum, which he fortified with trench and rampier. From whence, when he beheld the Romans encamped hard under him he wondered (by report) to ſee not only the whole body of the camp, with the form and order thereof in general, but alſo how every part was ranged and ſet out in ſeveral, L both in the manner of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and alſo in the proportion of the wayes for breadth and length between. And having viewed and conſidered every thing accordingly: "Believe me (qd. he) there is no man who ſeeth this, that can either think or ſay, it is the camp "of a barbarous nation. For two daies ſpace the Conſul and the King (expecting one anothers attempts and enterpriſes) kept their ſouldiers cloſe within their holds. When the third day was come, the Roman General brought forth his whole power into the field. But the King fearing to hazard all ſo ſoon upon a caſt, drew forth 400 Triballians (which were, as we have ſaid elſewhere, of the Illyrian nation) and 200 Cretenſians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horſemen; and ſent them under the conduct of Athenagoras, one of his courtiers and gallants, for to brave the Cavalry of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romans, whoſe M main battail was little above half a mile off, put out againſt them their light armed van-curriers, and as it were, two companies or cornets of horſemen: to the end, that they might be equal with the enemy in number both of foot and horſe. They of the Kings part ſupported verily, that they ſhould fight after their old and accuſtomed manner: namely, that the horſemen ſhould by turns ſore while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire again; ſometime follow in chaſe and have uſe of their darts and weapons, and ſometimes turn and ſhew their back parts; that the nimbleneſs and activity of the Illyrians would ſtand in good ſtead to make excurſions and ſuddain skirmiſhes; alſo that the Cretenſian archers ſhould be emploied in ſhooting arrows aloof at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung out all abroad on every ſide:
but the violent charge of the Romans, no leſs continual and obſtinat, than fierce and eager, put N them quite out of this manner of ſervice, and diſordered all. For no otherwiſe than if it had been a ſet battail between two entire armies, their footmen lightly armed, ſo ſoon as they had lanced and let go their javelins from them, took them to their ſwords, and came to hand fight: the horſemen likewiſe, no ſooner affronted the enemies, but either ſtaying their horſes they fought on horſeback, or elſe alighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the skirmiſh. By this means neither the Kings Cavalry could match the Romans, becauſe they had not been uſed to a ſteady battel; nor his footmen who were wont to traverſe their ground, and skirmiſh, never ſtanding ſtill, and withal in manner half naked for any harneſs they had, was able to make their parts good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their ſwords and bucklers, and were furniſhed with armour, as well defenſive as offenſive. So they could not endure long to C maintain fight, but were forced to retire into their camp, and by nothing elſe ſaved themſelves but by good footmanſhip and riding apace. There paſſed one day between, when the King minding to trie a conflict with all his forces of Cavalry, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in await by night certain targatiers, whom they call Peltaſtæ, in a covenient place between both camps, and given direction and charge unto Athenagoras and his men of arms, That if they ſped well in open battel and plain fight, they ſhould on ſtill and follow their good fortune: but if they went by the worſe,

A worſe, and were too weak, they ſhould give ground by little and little, and train the enemy to the place of ambuſh. Well, it fell out ſo, that the horſemen indeed retired accordingly, but the leaders of that cohort aforeſaid of targatiers, not attending the ſignal long enough, but raiſing their men out of ambuſh before time, loſt the opportunity of playing their part & performing a good ſervice.

The Roman Conſul having both obtained victory in open battel, and eſcaped the danger of a covert train, rerired himſelf into his camp. The morrow after, he came down into the plain field with all his forces, and put them in battel array, having arranged his Elephants in the forefront of the vangard. And this was the firſt time that ever the Romans had uſe in their wars, of this beaſt; by occaſion, that in the late Punick war they had taken ſome of them alive from their enemies. But perceiving that Philip kept himſelf cloſe within his camp, he approched under the very
B rampier, yea, and reproched him for his cowardiſe. And ſeeing for all that, he could not even then be drawn to a battel: conſidering alſo, that if he kept there a ſtanding camp long, ſo neer unto the enemy, his proviſion of corn ſhould be expoſed to dangers; for no ſooner ſhould the purveyors and forragers be gone abroad into the countrey, and ſpread over the fields, but the enemies light horſemen would be ready at their heels to fetch them in, and cauſe them to come ſhort home: therefore he removed his camp to a place almoſt eight miles off, called Octolophum, where he might make his proviſion with leſs danger. Now when the Romans purveied for corn and victuals in the territory thereabout, and were come upon a time ſomewhat neer and within danger of Philip at firſt the King let them alone, and kept his men within their camp, to the end, that they might be more bold and venturous, and withal, leſs wary and circumſpect: but eſpying
C them once ſtragling aſunder here and there out of order, he ſet forward with all his Cavalry, and the auxiliaries of the Candiots, and marched ſo faſt, as the ſwifteſt of his footmen by running might keep pace with the horſemen: thus having gotten between them and home, he pitched down his enſigns betwixt the Roman camp and the forragers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he ſent forth to courſe and chaſe them, ſo diſperſed as they were; giving ſpecial charge and direction, not to leave any of them alive that they could reach: with the other he ſtaied himſelf behind, and beſet all the waies, and ſtopped the paſſages by which the enemies were like to retire and have recourſe unto their camp. Soon were they killed or put to flight in every place, and as yet not one eſcaped to the Roman camp, for to bring news of this diſcomfiture: for, as many as fled back chanced upon the guard that the King had ſet: and more were ſlain by them D that beſet the waies, than thoſe that were ſent out to the purſuit and execution. At length ſome hapned to eſcape through the midſt of the Kings corps de guard, and in great haſt and fearful manner came into the camp with a troubleſome noiſe and tumult, rather than any certain tidings. The Conſul, after order given to the horſemen, that every man ſhould ſuccour and reſcue what way ſoever he could, their diſtreſſed fellows in this extremity, himſelf led forth the legions out of the camp, and marching in a fourſquare battaillon advanced toward the enemies. The Horſemen being ſped over the fields in divers places, ſome loſt their right way, being deceived by other outcryes heard from a contrary part: otherſome met with their enemies, and at one inſtant, the skirmiſh began in many and ſundry places. The band that guarded about the King, fought moſt fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their own number as E well of horſe as foot a full army welneer; and alſo moſt of the Romans light upon them, becauſe they kept the very port and rodeway in the mids. In this regard alſo were the Macedonians the better and had the vantage, becauſe the King himſelf was preſent in perſon to encourage and exhort them: and withal the auxiliary Candiots wounded many of the Romans ere they were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared aforehand, ranged thick and cloſe together, and ſo fought againſt them that rode ſcattering abroad one from another, and without array. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and meaſure in their chaſe, they had mightily advanced themſelves, not only in winning the honor of that day, but alſo, in the main point of the whole war. But purſuing them beyond all reaſon, and without diſcretion, upon a bloudthirſty deſire that they had of maſſacre, they chanced upon the Roman Squadrons which were F gone before with the Tribuns and Colonels: inſomuch as the Horſemen aforeſaid, who before fled, when they once ſaw the enſigns of their own infantery, reined their horſe heads, and turned again upon the enemy that ran with bridle in horſe neck: and ſo in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battail changed and came about, and they that erewhile made purſute, now ſhewed their backs and fled amain. Many of them were ſlain that came to cloſe handfight, many likewiſe of thoſe that ran away. Neither fell they all upon the edge of the ſword, for ſome there were who plunged into bogs and mariſhes where both horſe and man ſunk in the deep mud and mire, and ſo were ſwallowed up and periſhed. The King himſelf alſo was in great danger: for his horſe being wounded under him and fallen, he alſo came headlong down to the ground, and hardly eſcaped but he had been troden under foot and miſchieved as he lay along. One horſeman
G above the reſt ſaved his life, who haſtily lept himſelf from horſeback, and withal mounted the King (ſo ſcared as he was) upon his own horſe: who being now on foot, and not able to run as faſt as the horſemen that fled away, was with many a ſtab and thruſt ſoon diſpatched by the enemies that came running together to the King when he was ſeen to fall. And the King after he had ridden in fearful flight about the fenny meers, one while where there was ſome way, and otherwhiles where there was none at all to be ſeen, chanced at length to come to his camp, when moſt men were in deſpair that he could poſſibly eſcape in ſafety. In this skirmiſh there were 200

Mace-

Macedonians ſlain, a hundred almoſt taken priſoners: fourſcore brave and goodly courſers, with H rich capariſons and other furniture, together with the ſpoil of fair armours caried away.

There were that blamed the King for being too raſh that day, and the Conſul for his ſlackneſs. For Philip, ſay they, ſhould have kept him quiet in reſt and repoſe, knowing, as he did, that the enemies within few dayes would have been brought to extream want and penury, now that the territory all about was clean ſpoiled and waſted. And the Conſul for his part, when he had foiled the Cavalry and light armed ſouldiers of the enemies, and as good as taken the King priſoner, ought preſently to have advanced againſt the Kings camp: for never would the enemies ſo diſcomfited have ſtood to it: and ſo in the minute of an hour, they had been vanquiſhed for ever. This is ſoon ſaid, but (as moſt things elſe) not ſo ſoon done. For in caſe that the King had likewiſe brought forth into the field all his Infantery, peradventure in that tumult, when all his men were I diſcomfited and driven to flie out of the field to their camp, yea, and to keep within the rampier, for fear of the enemy, ready upon his victory to get over the counterſcarp and other fortifications, the King might have been diſſeized of his hold, and loſt all. Again conſidering, that the whole power of Philip his footmen remained ſtill intire within the camp, the corps de guard before the gates warding; the ſentinels and watch ſet in convenient places of the rampier attending: what other good ſhould the Conſul have done in advancing thither, but imitated the raſh fool-hardineſs of the King, who a little before ſo hotly followed the chaſe of the horſmen diſcomfited? Neither was the Kings firſt deſignment to be reproved and found fault with, when he charged upon the foragers, ſcattered as they were over all the fields: if he could have ſeen when he was well, and have uſed his good hand in meaſure and moderation. Leſs marvail it is beſides, that K he was willing to trye the fortune of a battail; becauſe there ran a rumor, that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were departed from home, and with a puiſſant power entred already into Macedony: And if he thus were beſet round about with theſe armies, there was no doubt but the Romans might have vanquiſhed and ſubdued him, and never ſtirred foot for the matter. Philip therefore ſuppoſing that upon theſe two late received foils of the horſemen, he ſhould have but unquiet and dangerous ſitting in the ſame ſtanding camp ſtill: and minding to diſlodge from thence, and in his remove to beguil the enemy and not be ſeen, diſpatched a Purſevant at arms or herald unto the Conſul a little before ſun ſetting, to crave ſurceaſe of arms, until he had buried his horſemen that were ſlain: and at the relief of the ſecond watch he deceived the enemy; for leaving many fires through all his camp, he marched without any noiſe and departed. The Conſul had newly ſup- L ped, and was going to reſt, when he was advertiſed that a Purſevant was come, and what his errand was. And for the preſent, he made the meſſenger no other anſwer but this, that the next morning he would talk with him, and give him audience. But Philip by this means got the advantage of that whole night, and part of the next day, to gain riddance of way in his journey, which was the only thing he ſought for. And toward the mountains he took his flight, for that way he wiſt well the Romans would not follow after, with an army ſo heavy and charged as it was. The Conſul by day break, granted the Purſevant a ceſſation of arms, and gave him his diſpatch: but it was not long after that he was advertiſed how the enemy was gone: and not knowing which way to follow after, he paſſed ſome few dayes in foraging and purveying proviſion all about the place where he lay encamped.

After this he marched to Stubera, and gathered together all the grain that was to be had a- M bout Pellagonia. From thence he went forward as far as to Pluvina, and all this while knew not for certain into what quarter of the countrey the enemies were retired. Philip having firſt ſet him down and encamped before Bruana, and departed from thence by croſs and crooked wayes, ſtruck a ſuddain ſtear into the enemy, whereupon the Romans diſlodged from Pluvina, and neer unto the River Oſphagus pitched their pavilions. The King likewiſe reſted himſelf not far from thence, and had caſt a trench and raiſed a rampier along the banks of the River, which the inhabitants call Erigonus. And after he was for certain advertiſed, that the Romans intended to go to Erduæa, he marched afore to ſeize upon the ſtreights, and to empeach the enemies, that they ſhould not gain the paſſage that lyeth as it were in a narrow gullet, barred and encloſed on N each ſide. There he raiſed in one place a rampier, and caſt a trench in another; made barricadoes here and there, partly by piling ſtones up on heaps in ſtead of a wall, partly by felling of trees acroſs, according as either the ground would give leave, or the place afford matter: And thus ſtopping up all the wayes by ſundry devices and means, he made the place (to his thinking) both unpaſſable and impregnable, which of it ſelf by nature was hard enough and troubleſome. The countrey all about was for the moſt part forreſts, and full of wood, very incommodious, eſpecially for that manner of battailons and ordnance of array, which the Macedonians call Phalanx: which ſerveth them in ſmall or no ſtead at all, unleſs with their long pikes they may make a palliſade, or ſtay (as it were) and oppoſe them before their ſhields: which they cannot well do, unleſs they have free ſcope and liberty of plain and open ground. The Thra- O cians alſo were fouly troubled and cumbred with their ſpears named Rhomphæa, which were likewiſe of a mighty length, and by reaſon thereof (catching as they did, and ſnarling within the boughs and branches of Trees that grew in their way every where about) hindred them very much. There remained the Cohort or band of the Candiots, that ſeemed of ſome uſe for to be employed. And yet the ſame alſo as it was able to diſcharge arrows againſt both Horſe and man, and to annoy them ſo long as they lay open and expoſed to ſhot, if haply they

A offered to charge; ſo they were not of ſtrength ſufficient to drive their ſhafts level, and to pierce thorough the Roman targets: for otherwiſe there was no part of the body offered it ſelf unarmed and naked for to aim at. And therefore ſo ſoon as they perceived that kind of ſhot to ſerve them to little or no purpoſe, they caught up ſtones which lay all over the valley, and let them flie at the enemy. Which ſtones, as they light and beat upon their bucklers, kept a great clattering, and with the ſound they made (rather than with any hurt beſides) kept the Romans for a time from mounting up the bank. But the Romans making no reckoning of theſe ſtones neither, partly by pavoiſes and target-fences over their heads, made way directly through the thickeſt of their enemies; and partly by wheeling a little and fetching ſome compaſs about, gained the pitch of the hill, and were got up to the very top: from whence they drave the Macedonians (all affrighted as they were)
B down the hill, and chaſed them from their holds and guards: and by reaſon they had much ado to flie (the ground was ſo rough and uneven) moſt of them were killed and cut in pieces. Thus the difficulty of the ſtreights was overcome, and they were poſſeſſed thereof, with far leſs trouble and conflict than they looked for and made account of. Then they marched on forward as far as to Erdurt, where the Conſul after he had put the fields all over to the waſt, retired himſelf to Elimæa. From thence he forced Oreſtides, and aſſailed the Town Celetrum, ſituate as it were, in a demy Iland: there is a lake that environeth the walls, and but one way by land that leadeth to the Town from the main, and the ſame very ſtreight and narrow, in form of a gullet. At the firſt when the Town was ſummoned the inhabitants truſting to the natural ſtrength of the place, kept their gates ſhut againſt the Conſul, and refuſed his ſummons. But after they ſaw once the enſigns diſ-C played and marching againſt them, when they perceived the enemies defended under a pavoiſe to approch cloſe to the gate, and the narrow ſtreight and avenue aforeſaid, beſet with a band of them; before they would encounter and fight, they yeelded themſelves for very fear. From Celetrum he marched on towards the Daſſaretians, and wan by aſſault the City Pelium. From thence he caried away the bondſlaves, with the reſt of the pillage; but all perſons whatſoever free born, he let go at liberty without paying ranſom. The Town he gave them again after he had planted in it a ſtrong garriſon: for it ſtood well, and in a very good place, for to make rodes and incurſions into Macedony. Thus the Conſul having ranged over the countrey of the enemies, brought his army back through the peaceable parts into Apollonia, where he began firſt to make war.

Now the Ætolians, the Athamans, and Dardanians, and many other wars riſing ſuddainly at D once, ſome from one place and ſome from another, had diverted and turned Philip a contrary way. Againſt the Dardanians (as they returned out of Macedony) he ſent Athenagoras with the footmen lighty armed and appointed, and the greater part alſo of the horſe giving him in charge and direction to follow them hard at their heels as they departed, and to play upon their backs, and cut off the tail of their rereward: to teach them againſt another time, not to be ſo haſty to come abroad with an army again. Democritus the Prætor of the Ætolians (who in the Diet aforeſaid held at Naupactum perſwaded to take a longer time for to conſult about this war) had in the next Councel or Parliament following, moved the Ætolians to enter into arms; namely, upon the fame that was ſpread abroad of the horſemens fight before Octolophus; and alſo upon the coming of the Dardanians, and Pleuratus with the Illyrians into Macedony: beſides the arrival of E the Roman fleet at Oreum, and the general voice and bruit that went, how Macedony ſhould ſhortly be aſſailed alſo by ſea, over & above ſo many nations that from all parts about were come already by land. Theſe motives regained Democritus and the Ætolians to friend the Romans again. Who joyning unto them Aminander the King of the Athamans, went forth together for to beſiege Cercinium. They within the Town had ſhut their gates, whether by conſtraint or willingly of themſelves, it was not known for they had the Kings garriſon within among them. However it was, within few dayes Cercinium was taken and burnt. As many as remained alive after that great defeat, as well bond as free one with another, were with the reſt of the pillage carried away. This fearful example cauſed all the people inhabiting about the mariſh of Bœbe, to abandon their cities, and to retire themſelves for ſecurity into the mountains. The Ætolians for want of F rich prey and booty (which they could not find there) turned from them and marched toward Perrhæbia. In that quarter they won by force the City Cyretia, and cruelly put it to the ranſack. The inhabitants of Mallœa ſurrendred of themſelves without compulſion, and were received into protection as allies. Out of Perrhebæa Aminander was of advice and deſirous to march againſt Gomphos, by reaſon that the countrey of Athamania bordered ſo neer upon that City, and it ſeemed eaſy to be forced without much trouble. But the Ætolians fingers tickled and itched again to be doing with the rich and fertile fields of Theſſalie, and thither went they to raiſe booties and ſeek pillage. Athamander followed ſtill for company, albeit he liked well neither of theſe faſhions of the Ætolians thus outragiouſly to make rodes and to ſpoil every where; nor of their manner of encamping at adventure, in what places ſoever they chanced to come, without all G diſcretion, regard, and care of fortifying and guarding the army. Fearing therefore leſt their inconſiderate raſhnes and ſupine negligence, might be an occaſion that he or his ſhould come to a ſhrewd turn, and incur ſome damage, ſpyed his time; and ſeeing them to incamp in a plain neer to the City Phacadum, he took a little Hill little above half a mile off, where both he and his, might with the help of any ſmall guard, lie in ſecurity. Now when as the Ætolians ſeemed in manner to have forgotten that they were in the enemies country, but that they drave ſome booties: whiles they were ſome of them wandring and ſtragling, diſbanded and half armed,

others within their camp without any corps du guard, ſwilling and ſleeping all night and day long, H and made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they looked for him. And it being once known by the report of ſome that fled out of the fields in great affright, that he approched: then Damocritus and the reſt of the Captains began to quake for fear. Now was it about noonetide of the day, at what time as moſt of them having taken their full lode of wine and viands, lay along faſt aſleep. Then they fell to awake and raiſe one another, and to give the alarm: anon they ſent out every way to call in thoſe that were ſpreading abroad in the fields. So much they were aſtonied, that for haſt many of the horſemen went forth without their ſwords, and moſt of them forgat to put on their cuiraces. Thus being led out in poſt haſt, and hardly in all (foot and horſe together) able to make up the number of ſix hundred, they light upon the Kings Cavalry, for number, armour, and courage much better than themſelves; And therefore at the firſt I puſh were diſcomfited: for before they were well entred into skirmiſh, they fled ſhamefully away toward their camp. Some of them came ſhort thither, and were either ſlain or taken priſoners, even as many as the Kings horſemen overtook, and gat between them and their other companies. Philip, when he ſaw his men approch neer unto their camp, commanded to ſound the retreat: for both horſe and man was weary, not ſo much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding ſpeed that they made. Whereupon he gave commandment, that the Horſemen by troops, and the light armed Footmen by their companies and Squadrons ſhould water their horſes one after another, and go to their dinner and repaſt. Others he kept ſtill in armour for a guard attending the Regiment of the footmen, that came but ſlowly forward, by reaſon they were heavily armed at all pieces; who being come, they alſo were enjoyned to pitch down K their enſigns, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a ſhort bait and haſty pittance, ſending two or three at the moſt out of every band for to water the horſes. All this while the horſemen, together with the light armed ſouldiers, ſtood well appointed and in readineſs, if haply the enemy would have given any attempt. The Ætolians beſtowed armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their ſtrength and fortifications, for now by this time they alſo that were ſcattered over the fields, had retired themſelves into the camp. And ſo long as they beheld the enemies to keep quiet, and not ſtir, and were themſelves in a ſure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very luſty: but after that the enſigns of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battel well appointed, cloſe unto their trench; all at once they abandoned their guards and quarters, and ran out at the back part of their camp, L and fled to the foreſaid hill, where the Athamanians were encamped. Many of the Ætolians were likewiſe in this haſty flight killed or taken priſoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Athamanians alſo might have been driven from their hold, if there had been day enough behind: but the day being ſpent already firſt in the skirmiſh, and afterward in the ranſacking of their camp, he ſet him down upon the next plain, hard at the foot of the hill aforeſaid, intending very early the next morning to aſſail the enemy. The Ætolians ſcared as much now, as they were before when they quit their own camp, fled ſcattering away the night following. Here Aminander ſtood them in very good ſtead, by whoſe good guidance and direction, the Athamanians being skilful in the coaſts of the country, conducted them into Ætolia, over the high mountains, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknown by-wayes. Some few of them M hapned in this confuſed and ſcattered flight to loſe their way, and ſtumble upon the Macedonian horſemen, whom Philip by day light, had ſent to cut off the tail of the enemies, ſo ſoon as he perceived the hill abandoned. About the very ſame time, Athenagoras a Captain under the King, overtook the Dardanians as they returned into their country, and at the firſt put their reerward in diſarray. But afterward the Dardanians turned head again, and embattelled themſelves: ſo they fought on even hand, and nothing was won nor loſt on any ſide. The Dardanians began not ſo ſoon to advance forward and march on again, but the Kings power, with their horſemen and light armed ſouldiers came upon them afreſh, and put them to great trouble. For they had no ſuch means of help, and were beſides ſurcharged with heavy armour, and withal, the place gave great advantage to thoſe of the Kings part. Very few were ſlain, more wounded, none at all taken pri- N ſoners: for the manner of the Dardanians, is not to break out of their ranks and arraies for a little, and upon ſmall occaſions; but as they fight cloſe, ſo they retire together, and part not. Thus Philip having reſtrained theſe two nations, by two brave exploits, which were as happily performed as bravely enterpriſed, recovered the loſſes again, by him received in the Roman war. There hapned beſides, another occurrent, which diminiſhed the number of his enemies the Ætolians. For Scopas, one of the chief noblemen of that nation, being ſent from Alexandria by King Ptolomæus, with a mighty maſs of gold, caried away with him into Ægypt ſix thouſand footmen, and certain horſemen, waged for mony to ſerve. Neither had he left behind him any of the flour and youth of Ætolia, if Damocritus had not chaſtiſed and rebuked them, and ſo by that means kept ſome of them at home; making remonſtrances unto them, one while of the war that was toward, and another O while of the deſolation which was like to enſue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeal and care that he had of his countrey, or only to croſs Scopas becauſe he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat preſents, it is not known. And thus much concerning the affairs paſſed between Philip and the Romans for that ſummer.

The Roman fleet having in the beginning of the ſame ſummer committed to Sea from Corcyra, together with the Lieutenant Au. Apuſtius paſſed beyond the point of the cape Malea, and joyned

A joined with King Attalus, neer Scyllæum in the territory of Hermione. Then the whole City and State of Athens, upon hope of preſent aid and ſuccour, brake out and poured forth at once all the hatred and malice which they had conceived againſt Philip, and which a long time for very fear they had held in, and therefore kept themſelves in good and reaſonable terms with him. Now in this City there never want prompt and ready tongues to ſtir up and provoke the common people to a commotion. And as in all free States generally ſuch kind of men are entertained and born out by the favour of the multitude, ſo in Athens eſpecially, where eloquence is in moſt requeſt, and beareth greateſt ſway. Preſently therefore an Act was put up and propoſed unto the common people, and by them granted and confirmed, That all the Statues and Images of King Philip, together with their titles and ſtiles, likewiſe of all his progenitors and predeceſſors, as B well men as women, ſhould be defaced, pulled down, and deſtroied. Item, That all the feſtival daies, the ſacrifices and ſacrificers, which had been inſtituted and ordained for the honor of him, ſhould be profaned and unhallowed again. Item, That the very places, wherein ought had been erected, or inſcriptions graven to his honour, ſhould be held as deteſtable and accurſed: and that from thence forward, it might not be lawful to ſet up there any of thoſe things that ought to ſtand, and be dedicated in a pure and clean place. Item, That the publick Prieſts of the City, in all their praiers, and ſo often as they praied for the good eſtate of the people of Athens and their allies, for the preſervation of their armies and armadoes; ſhould deteſt and curſe by name King Philip, his children and realm, his forces both by land and ſea, with all the race and name of the Macedonian nation. Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any man from that time forward, C would prefer and propound any thing that might tend to the diſgrace and infamie of Philip, the whole people of Athens ſhould approve and allow the ſame whatſoever, and make an act thereof. Contrary-wiſe, if any perſon ſay or do any thing for honour, or to impeach and check his diſhonour, whoſoever ſhould happen to kill the ſaid party, he ſhould be deemed and reputed, that he had killed him juſtly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was compriſed within the decree, That all things ordained in times paſt againſt Piſiſtratus his line and progeny, ſhould be obſerved and ſtand in force againſt Philip. Thus verily warred the Athenians againſt Philip with letters and words: wherein they are right valiant, and to ſay truth, good at nothing elſe. But Attalus and the Romans, having from Hermiona ſhaped their courſe for Pyræum, arrived there. And after they had ſojourned ſome few daies in Athens, and were loden with a number of decrees, where- D in the Athenians recounted the praiſes and commendations of their allies beyond all meaſure, like as they had before exceeded in ſhewing their malice againſt their enemies; they ſet ſail from Pyræum to Andros. Where, riding at anchor in the bay called Gaureleon, they ſent certain men to ſound the minds of the inhabitants, Whether they would chuſe to yeeld the Town willingly, or rather abide the hazard of a forcible aſſault. Who anſwered again, that the Kings garriſon being poſſeſſed of the Caſtle, and keeping it for Philip, they were not their own maſters. Whereupon the King and the Roman Lieutenant ſet their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and artillery fit for an aſſault, approached the City divers waies. The Roman ſtandards and their arms, not ſeen before in thoſe parts, the reſolute courage alſo of the ſouldiers, who ſo luſtily and nimbly came neer to ſcale the walls, terrified and amaſed the Greeks, much more than any thing E elſe. Therefore immediatly they fled into the Caſtle, and the enemies were LL. of the City. Now, after they had for two daies ſpace held out in the fortreſs, preſuming more upon the ſtrength of the place than the force of their armour and weapons: they and the garriſon together, compounded upon the third day to quit the place, ſo they might be brought with a convoy to Delium, a Town in Bœotia, and every man to have one ſingle ſuit of apparel. Then the Romans leaving the bare City unto King Attalus, ranſacked it themſelves, and took away with them all the pillage and ornaments that beautified the ſame. And to the end, that the Iſle ſhould not lie waſt and deſart, Attalus perſwaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certain alſo of the Andrians, there to remain. Afterwards, they alſo who by compoſition were tranſported to Delium, were by the fair promiſes of the King drawn away from thence: which they gave ear and credit unto the ſooner, for the love of their native country the miſs whereof they might hardly brook. From Andros they croſſed to Cythnus. There they ſpent certain daies in aſſaulting the City, to no purpoſe: and ſeeing the gains would hardly quit their pains, they departed from thence. Neer unto Praſiæ (which is a place of Attica within the main) there joined unto the Roman fleet twenty pinnaſſes of the Iſſæans, who were ſent to rob and ſpoil the territory of the Caryſtians: the reſt of the fleet remained at Gereſtum, a noble rode and port of Eubœa, until ſuch time as the Iſſæi were returned from Caryſtum. Then all together they made ſail, and paſſing the mids of the main ſea, they fell with the Iſle of Icus, neer unto Scyrus. There they were ſtaied for certain daies, by reaſon of the raging Northwind: which being once laid and the ſea calm again, they paſſed to Scyathos a City lately pilled and ranſacked by K. Philip. The ſouldiers ranged over the country, and brought corn with them to their ſhips, & whatſoever elſe was fit for mans food. Other booty neither was there any, nor deſerved had the Greeks to be ſpoiled at their hands. Thence they bent their courſe for Caſandrea; & firſt they rode at anchor neer unto Mendis, a village ſituat by the ſea ſide, and belonging to that State. From whence having ſailed beyond the cape, & deſirous to come about with their veſſels for to approach the very walls of the City, there aroſe a tempeſt & ſuddain guſt: wherin they had like to have been caſt away: but ſcattered they were aſunder: & having for the moſt part loſt the tackling of their ſhips, they eſcaped with much ado to land. This tempeſt at ſea was alſo

a ſore-token preſaging unto them, that they were to follow the war by Land, and to give over ſea H ſervice. For when they had brought all their ſhips together and ſet their men a ſhore, they aſſailed the Town: but they had the repulſe with many a bloudy blow beſides (for there was within a ſtrong garriſon of the Kings) whereupon they gave over their enterpriſe, returned back and ſailed over to Canaſtæum a City of Pallene. And having doubled the point of Torona, they ſet their courſe for Acanthus. There at firſt they forraged the territory, then forced the Town, and ranſacked it.
And for that their ſhips had their full fraught and charge of pillage, they ſailed no farther forward, but returned from whence they came to Scyathus, and from thence to Eubœa: where leaving behind them their main navy, they put in with ten ſhips lightly appointed, to the Bay or gulf of Malea, for to parley with the Ætolians about the whole courſe and managing of the wars. The I chief of this embaſſage ſent from the State, was one Stpyrrhicas an Ætolian, who came to Hera- clea for to treat and confer about theſe affairs together with the King and the Roman Lieutenant.
They demanded of Attalus by vertue of the accord and agreement before made, to furniſh them with a thouſand ſouldiers: for ſo many ought he by right to ſet out and maintain, whenſoever they were to wage war againſt Philip. But this demand was denied to the Ætolians; in regard that aforetime they likewiſe thought much to make a rode to ſpoil Macedony, at what time as Phi- lip kept foul work about Pergamus, burning all edifices before him, as well ſacred as prophane, when they might have drawn him perforce from thence into his own realm to look unto his proper affairs there. Thus the Ætolians were diſmiſſed with more hope than help: for the Romans fed them only with fair words, and large promiſes of all things. Then Apuſtius with King Atta- lus returned to the fleet. K

After this they laid their heads together, and began to conſult about the ſiege and aſſault of Oreum. A ſtrong City this was both in regard of the walls, and alſo of a good garriſon, by reaſon that heretofore it had been once aſſailed. Now there were 20 ſail of Rhodian ſhips all cloſe covered with hatches and decks, which under the conduct of Captain Ageſimbrotus, had joyned with the fleet of Attalus and the Romans, after the winning and conqueſt of Andros. Theſe ſhips they ſent to lie in the Bay of Zelaſium, (a promontory or cape above the City Demetrias, lying very conveniently over againſt Iſthmia) for this intent, that if the Macedonian ſhips ſhould come abroad from thence, they might be ready in gard to make ſail againſt them. Heraclides an Admiral for King Philip, lay there at rode with the navy, attending rather ſome enterpriſe by opportunity and vantage of the enemies negligence, than by plain and open force. The Romans and L Attalus in the mean time planted their ordnance againſt Oreum at divers parts. The Romans at the Caſtle ſide that ſtandeth upon the Sea: The King from the vale that lieth between two ſorts, where as the City is encloſed alſo with a wall. And as they aſſailed in ſundry places; ſo their manner of aſſailing was much different, and their engins divers. The Romans aſſayed to approach the wall with tortoiſes, pavoiſes and mantilets, and to ſhake it with the Ram: They of the Kings part uſed Croſsbows, Baliſts, Catapults, and all manner of enſigns to ſhoot forth quarels and darts, yea, and to level and weigh mighty ſtones of exceeding great weight. They undermined alſo: and in ſum, they practiſed all means which they ſaw by experience did good during the former aſſault and ſiege. But the Macedonians were not only more in number than the time before to defend the City, but alſo of better courage and reſolution; by reaſon that the King had rebuked M them ſharply for their fault paſſed: and they remembred well both his menaces, and alſo his promiſes for the time to come: in ſo much as the aſſailants had ſmall hope to win the Town in haſt. Mean while the Roman Lieutenant, ſuppoſing that ſome other exploit might be performed, leaving a ſufficient number (as he thought) for the finiſhing of the Fabricks begun, and other en-gins of aſſault, put over to the next places of the continent: where he ſurpriſed on a ſudden Lariſſa (not that noble and renowned City in Theſſaly, but another, which they call Cremaſte) and won it, all but the fortreſs. Attalus in like ſort took Ægeleon, fearing nothing leſs than ſuch an accident from them that were buſie in beſieging another Town. By this time, as the en-gins and other Fabricks without Oreum were at the point of finiſhing, and ready to perform the battery for which they were made: ſo the garriſon within was overtoiled with continual pain and travail, ſpent with watching night and day, and faint with many a grievous wound. Moreover, part of the wall, ſhaken underneath with a butt and puſh of the Ram, was already fallen down in ſundry places, in ſo much as the Romans entred by night at the open breaches, and all the way above the Key, and ſo were poſſeſſed of the Caſtle. Attalus likewiſe by the break of day, after he ſaw the banner reared upon the fortreſs, and the ſignal which the Romans put forth, en-tred the City; for now the walls in many places lay along. The garriſon and the Townſmen fled to a ſecond citadel that they had, from whence after two dayes they yeelded. The City was the Kings lot: the bodies of the priſoners were the Romans ſhare. Now drew the ſun neer unto the Æquinoctial line in Autumn, at what time the Euboean gulf called Cœla is dangerous, and not well truſted of mariners. Therefore being deſirous to be gone into a place of ſafe retreat, before the troubleſome winter weather overtook them, they turned their courſe and made head to Pyræum, from whence they came: where Apuſtius leaving behind him thirty ſhips, fet a compaſs about the cape of Malea, and ſailed to Corcyra. But the King ſtayed ſtill ſo long as the feſti-val dayes of Ceres continued, becauſe he would be preſent at the celebration of thoſe ſolemnities.
After the feaſt ended, himſelf likewiſe retired into Aſia: but firſt he ſent Ageſimbrotus and the Rhodians home again. Theſe were the affairs and exploits performed this ſummer by ſea and land.

A by the Roman Conſul and the Lieutenant Generall, with the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians, againſt King Philip and his allies.

The other Conſul C. Aurelius being come into his Province when the war was brought to an end, could not ſmother and conceale his anger conceived againſt the Prætor for fighting in his abſence. When he had taken order therefore to ſend him into Etruria, himſelf with the legions invaded the country of the enemies: where by way of robbing and ſpoiling he warred ſo as he got more prey than praiſe. But L. Furius, ſeeing there was little to do in Etruria, and withall deſirous rather than his life of a triumph over the Gauls (which he ſuppoſed to obtain with more eaſe, whiles the Conſul was abſent, who was both angry with him, and alſo envied at him) arrived at Rome before any man looked for him, and aſſembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellona. Where,
B after he had declared what acts he had atchieved, he requeſted that he might be permitted to ride into the City with triumph. In great credit and account he was with many of the Senators, both for his noble and worthy deeds, in which regard they honoured him: and alſo for a ſpeciall favour and love, in which reſpect they affected him. But the more ancient and elder Senators denied him triumph, as well for that he had warred with the army of another, as alſo becauſe he had abandoned his own Province and government, upon a greedy deſire to catch a triumph, by waiting his opportunity, and taking advantage: a thing not warrantable by any former precedent or example. And as many of them as had been Conſuls ſaid moreover, That above all things he ought to attend upon the Conſul his return. "For well might he (ſay they) being encamped near unto "the City, have defended and guarded the Colony only, and ſo have drawn the time out untill
C "his coming, and never needed to have fought a ſet battell for the matter. And although the Præ- "tor have omitted ſo to do, yet ought not the Senat to follow his example, but expect the Con- "ſul. When as therefore they have heard the Conſul and Prætor diſcourſing and arguing the "matter both together face to face, then they ſhould be able to judge better and more ſoundly "of the cauſe. A great part of the houſe was of opinion that they ought to look unto nothing elſe but the good ſervice done, and whether he were lawfully called thereunto, as a Magiſtrate of himſelf, to manage his affairs by his proper conduct and the guidance of his own fortune. "For, "of the two Colonies (ſay they) which were oppoſed as two forts and bulwarks to reſtrain the "ſudden impreſſions and tumults of the French; when the one was ſacked and burnt, and the "ſame fire like to leap from it to the other ſo near, (as from houſe to houſe, that joyn together) D "what could the Prætor have done otherwiſe in that caſe? For if there might be nothing attempt- "ted without the Conſul, it muſt needs follow that either the Senat did amiſs in giving the Præ- "tor the charge of an army (for if their will was that the war ſhould be managed not by the Præ- "tors army, but by the Conſuls, they might have limited it in the Commiſſion by eſpecial words, "expreſly forbidding the ſervice to be done by the Prætor, but only by the Conſul) or elſe the "Conſul hath committed a fault, who having commanded the army to go out of Tuſcany into "France, came not himſelf in perſon to Ariminum to encounter the enemy, and be preſent in that E "war, which without him might not be lawfully fought. Over and beſides, the occaſions and ſea- "ſons of war attend no ſtaies, and tarry for no politick delaies of Generals. And otherwhiles, fight "a man muſt, not becauſe a man is willing thereto, but becauſe his enemy puts him to it. To con- "clude, the very battell it ſelf, and the happy iſſue thereof, ought only to be conſidered and regar- "ded. The enemies are defeated and ſlain; their Camp taken and ranſacked; the ſiege raiſed "from the one Colony, and it preſerved; the captives of the other recovered and reſtored to "their friends; and to be brief, in one battell the quarrell is decided, and the war finiſhed. And "not only men have rejoyced for this victory, but alſo there have been proceſſions for three daies "ſpace to the honour of the immortall gods: [For that L. Furius hath managed the Common- "weal well and happily and not ill and reſtly.] Finally, theſe Erench wars fall by a fatall deſtiny to the "houſe and race of the Furii. By theſe and ſuch like remonſtrances alledged by himſelf and his friends, the majeſty of the Conſul abſent was over-weighed with the favour born to the Prætor preſent. And ſo in a frequent aſſembly of Senators a decree was granted, That L. Furius ſhould
F ride in triumph. Thus triumphed over the Gauls L. Furius Prætor, whiles he was in office. He brought into the common treaſury 320000 Aſſes, 170000 pound weight of ſilver. But neither were there any priſoners led captives in ſhew, nor ſpoils carried in pomp before his chariot, nor yet his ſouldiers followed after. So as it appeared that all other things beſides victory alone, pertained properly to the Conſul.

After this were the plaies exhibited with great magnificence by P. Cornelius Scipio, which he had vowed in Affrick, during his Conſulſhip. Alſo there paſſed an order for the lands of his ſouldiers; That for ſo long as each one had ſerved in Spain or Affrick, he ſhould have two acres for every year: and that theſe lands ſhould be ſet out and aſſigned unto them by ten Decemvirs for the purpoſe deputed. Then were certain Triumvirs created for to ſupply and make G up the number of the Roman Inhabitants in Venuſia, by reaſon that during the time of Annibal his war, the ſtrength of that Colony was much enfeebled and impaired. C. Terentius Varro, T. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Cornelius Scipio the ſon of Cneus, enrolled new Coloners to inhabit Venuſia.

The ſame year C. Cornelius Cethegus, who governed Spain as Pro-Conſul, diſcomfited a great hoſt of the enemies in the country of the Sedetans. In which battell, by report, were ſlain 15000 Spaniards, and 78 military enſigns taken. C. Aurelius the Conſul, when he was returned out of his Province to Rome againſt the ſolemn election of Magiſtrates, complained, not as men made reckoning he would have done, (That the Senat expected not for his coming, nor that the Conſul was not permitted to debate the matter with the Prætor) but found himſelf grieved, "That the Senat had decreed a triumph ſo, as the party only was ſuffered to ſpeak who was to triumph, and none of them might be heard who were preſent at the battell. And whereas our fore-fathers ordained, that Lieutenants, Colonels, Marſhals, and Centurions, yea, and in one word, "the ſouldiers ſhould be at a triumph; for this end and purpoſe, that the truth might appear to "the world, of al things atchieved by him unto whom ſo great honour was to be done: Was there "any one (quoth he) of all that army which fought with the Gauls, I ſay not a ſouldier, but ſo "much as a lackey or horſe-boy following the Camp, of whom the Senat might enquire, whe-"ther the Prætor ſpake true or falſe? This done and ſaid, he publiſhed the day of aſſembly for the election aboveſaid: wherein were created Conſuls L. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Villius Tappulus. After them were Prætors choſen L. Quintius Flaminius, L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Villius Tappulus, and C. Bebius Pamphilus. Grain and other victuals that year were cheap. Great ſtore of corn was brought out of Affrick, which the Ædiles of the chair diſtributed to the people, at * two Aſſes a Modius. They alſo ſet forth the Roman games and paſtimes right ſumptuouſly; yea, and repreſented them one day more than ordinary. Moreover of the ſilver raiſed by fines and forfeitures, they made ſeven brazen ſtatues, which they ſet up in the treaſure-houſe of the City. The Plebeian plaies likewiſe were thrice renued all over by the Ædiles of the Commons L. Terentius Maſſaliota, and C. Bebius Pamphilus Prætor elect. Finally, the funerall games that year were four daies together exhibited in the common place of the City, occaſioned by the death of M. Valerius Lævinus: and celebrated they were by his two ſons P. and M. who alſo ſhewed unto the people a brave ſpectacle of fencers at the ſharp: wherein there were five and twenty couples that entred the liſts and performed combat. M. Aurelius Cotta, one of the Decemvirs, that year departed this life; and in his place M. Acilius Glabrio was ſubordained. In the ſolemn aſſembly for electing Ædiles of the chair, it chanced that thoſe two which were choſen might not immediately enter into office: for C. Cornelius Cethegus was created in his abſence, whiles he governed the Province of Spain. And C. Valerius Flaccus who was preſent at his own election, might not be ſworn to maintain the laws, becauſe he was the Flamin or Prieſt of Jupiter. For lawfull it was not for any Magiſtrate to exerciſe his place above five daies, unleſs he were ſworn to the laws. Then Flaccus preferred a petition that he might be diſpenſed with: whereupon the Senat ordained, That if the Ædile would find one to ſwear in his name at the good pleaſure and diſcretion of the Conſuls, then the Conſuls (if they thought it meet) ſhould deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, to propound it unto the people that it might paſs under their grant. So L. Valerius Flaccus (the Prætor elect for the year following) was preſented to take the oath for his brother. Then the Tribunes put it to a canvaſe before the people, and they enacted, That the oath of his brother ſhould be of the ſame validity as if the Ædile himſelf had taken it in his own perſon. Concerning the other Ædiles alſo there paſſed an act of the Commons. For when the Tribunes propoſed unto the people, Which two they would have to go into Spain as LL. deputies with command over the armies; the people ordained, that C. Cornelius the Ædile of the chair might come home to bear his office, and L. Manlius alſo after ſo many years, depart out of his Province: the people ordained that Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Stertinius ſhould have the conduct and government in Spain, in quality and title of Pro-Conſuls.

The two and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

WHen the Consul and Prætors were entred into office upon the * Ides of March, they cast lots for the government of the Provinces. To L. Lentulus, fell Italy; and to P. Villius, Macedony. As for the Prætors, L. Quintius had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome, and C. Babius the government of Ariminum; L. Valerius ruled Sicily, and L. Villius his lot was to command Sardinia. Lentulus the Consul had order given him to levy new legions, and Villius to receive the army of P. Sulpitius, with commission and licence to take up as many souldiers as he thought good himself to furnish the same with a fresh supply. Those legions which C. Aurelius Consul had in charge, were assigned over to Babius the Prætor, with condition to keep them with him, untill the Consul were arrived in France with a new army; and so soon as he came, to discharge and dismisse all the souldiers home to their houses except 5000 allies: forasmuch as this number was thought sufficient to govern the Province about Ariminum. * 15 of March.

The Prætors of the former year continued still Commanders of their armies. Cn. Sergius was enjoyned to see and take order, that certain lands should be set out for those souldiers who had served many years together in Spain, Italy, and Sardinia. And Q. Minutius had in charge to go through with that inquisition of certain conspirators and traitors in the Brutians country, upon which he had sitten already as Prætor with great fidelity and diligence: and also to send unto Locri for to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being attainted and convicted of sacriledge, he had sent bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the Temple of Proserpina, to be restored thither again, with an over-encrease, to make satisfaction and to raze out the wicked part committed. The Latine feasts and holy-daies were solemnized again by vertue of an ordinance of the Bishops, upon this occasion, That certain Embassadors from Ardea complained in the Senat, how they had not their ordinary allowance of flesh at the Latine feasts aforesaid in the mount Alba, according to the old custome. News came from Suessa, that two of their City gates, and all the wall between, was smitten with lightning. Messengers also from Formiæ reported that their Temple of Jupiter was likewise blasted. Moreover, they of Ostia brought word of the like mischance with them in the Church of Jupiter. And from Velitræ tidings came of the like mishap, fallen upon the Temples of Apollo and Sangus. And that in the Temple of Hercules there sprung up a bush of hair. Letters came also from Q. Minutius the Pro-Prætor out of the Brutians country, that there was a colt foled with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet apeece. After all this, P. Sulpitius the Pro-Prætor sent letters from out of Macedony, containing among other matters this news, that there was a Laurell tree grew of it self in the poop of a galley.

The Senat in regard of all the former prodigious sights, ordained, that the Consul should sacrifice greater beasts unto what gods he thought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Soothsaiers that pry into beasts inwards, were sent into the Senat-house; and by direction of their answer, an Edict went forth, That the people should go in procession, and make supplications one day, and in all Temples and Altars of the gods there were sacrifices celebrated with great devotion.

The Carthaginians this year came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them: and forasmuch as the treasurers and receivers of the City made report, that the silver was not good and lawful, and being brought to the trial, was found too light by one fourth part washed away those Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and loss of the silver aboveſaid. They put up a petition besides unto the Senat that it might stand with their good pleasure to re-deliver now their hostages. Whereupon an hundred of them were rendred back, and good hope there was of the rest, if so be they continued loyall and fast in their allegeance. And when they made a farther request in behalf of those hostages which were not delivered that they might be transported from Norba (where they were not to their good liking and ease) to some other place, granted it was, that they might remove to Signia and Ferentinum. In like sort, the Gaditans made humble suit, and obtained this liberty, that there should not be sent from the Romans a captain to govern Gades, any thing to the contrary in their covenant (concluded with L. Martius Septimius, when they yielded themselves under the subjection of the Romans) notwithstanding. Moreover, forasmuch as the Embassadors of Narnia made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were certain strangers enterming'ed among them, not of their own nation, who bare themselves as Coloners; therefore L. Cornelius the Consul was commanded to create three Deputies or Commissioners, called Trimvirs for to reform this disorder. And chosen there were for this purpose, Publius and Sextius Ælius, who had both of them the surname of Paetus, and C. Cornelius Lentulus. This that was granted to them of Narnia, was denied to the Embassadors of Cossa, who likewise requested that the number of their inhabitants might be encreased.

The affairs thus finished at Rome that there were to be done, the Consuls went into their several Provinces. P. Villius so soon as he was arrived in Macedony, was welcomed at his first coming with a dangerous mutiny of the souldiers, which long afore being kindled, was not well quenched at the first beginning. These were those two thousand, which after the defeat of Annibal, were H sent out of Affrick into Sicily; and from thence, a year after almost, transported into Macedony for voluntary souldiers: but they themselves stood stoutly to it, that it was no voluntary act of theirs, but that they were shipped by their Colonels and Tribunes full against their wills. And howsoever it was, whether they served willingly or unwillingly, it was but meet and good reason, that the time of their souldiery should run out, and their service have an end at length. Alledging, that for these many years they had not seen Italy; that they waxed old men under their harnes, having born arms in Sicily, in Affrick, and in Macedony; that with toil and travel so tedious, they were weak and feeble; and after so many wounds and hurts received, they had no more bloud to lose. The Consul made them answer, that their cause was good and reasonable, but marred in the handling; and meet he thought it, that they should be dismissed, if they could have requested it I in modest terms: but neither it, nor any cause else whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutiny and sedition. Therefore, if they could be content to keep to their colours, and be at command as loyall souldiers, he would in their behalf write his letters unto the Senat, as touching their conge and dismission: for be they well assured, that they shall get more by sober and gentle behaviour, than by any such stubborn, froward, and wilfull demeanor.

At the same time Philip assailed the City of Thaumaci with terraces & mantelets in all forcible manner, so that he was now at the point to batter & shake the wall with the ram. But the sudden arrival of the Ætolians enforced him to surcease his enterprise; who by the conduct of Archidamus having passed through the midst of the Macedonian guards, & entred the town, never ceased day nor night to make sallies forth, one while upon their standing watch, other whiles upon their K fabricks & engins. The natural situation of the place yielded them good help and vantage: for the town of Thaumaci is seated on high to a mans thinking as he goeth from Pyla & the gulph of Malea by the way of Lamia & sheweth it self aloft, seeming to overlook & command the streight passage of the torrests called Cale. Again, when one travelleth over the craggy places, and the crooked waies entangled with so many windings in the vallies of Thessaly, and is approached once near to the City, all on a sudden he may discover before him a mighty large and open plain, as it were a wide and vast sea, so as a man shall have much ado to reach with his eye so far as these downs lye out every way under him, and see all over them. And herupon by reason of this strange and marvellous prospect, the City is called * Thaumaci. Over and besides that the high grounds affordeth it security, it standeth also upon a huge rock, divided into divers crags and broken cliffs. These L difficulties forced Philip to give over his attempt, and namely, when he considered and weighed withall, that the town it self when it was won, would not quit the painful labour, and pay for the danger about it. Besides, the winter was now at hand, when he departed from thence, and retired his forces into Macedony, there to harbor. Where, when all others, during the time that they could catch any repose and rest, refreshed their spirits and bodies with some recreations and disports; Philip only, how much respit soever he had, either of intermission or remission from continual labour of marching in journey, and fighting in battell; so much more trouble he had in his mind whiles he coursed and discoursed with himself, what the total and finall issue might be of this war: whiles he stood not only in fear of the enemies, which persecuted him by sea and land, but also in doubt, as well of the hearts of his allies, as of the affections of his own inbjects: lest the one in hope M of the Romans friendship should revolt, and the other (even the Macedonians themselves) desire novelties, and long for a change. Therefore he addressed his Embassadors into Achæa, both to exact an oath of the Achæans for their alleageance (for they had capitulated in the accord and agreement made, yearly to swear fealty unto Philip) and also to deliver into their hands, Orchomenus, Herea, and Triphylia. And when they demanded also Aliphera, the Embassadors answered, that the City never pertained to Triphylia, but that of right it ought to be restored unto Philip: as being one of them, which in the generall councill and assembly of the Arcadians, were assigned and set out for the building of Megalopolis. And thus verily he entertained firm alliance with the Achæans. As for the Macedonians he gained their hearts unto him, by occasion of Heraclides: for seeing that by means of him he incurred their exceeding ill will and hard conceit, and that he was N charged with many grievous crimes, he cast him in prison to gratifie his own subjects: whereat the people took great joy and hearts content. Then made he preparation for war, with an earnest endeavor, as at any time before: he exercised as well the Macedonians as mercenary souldiers in pay, namely, to wear their armor and handle their weapons; & in the very prime of spring, he sent all his forrain aids and light armed souldiers, under the leading of Athenagoras into Chaonia by the way of Epirus, to seize upon the straight passage near to Antigonia, which the Greeks call Stena. Himself a few daies after followed with his main army more heavily appointed. And when he had well viewed & considered the situation of the country, and how it lay, he judged that the quarter coasting upon the river Aous was the meetest place to fortifie and encamp in. This river between two hills, the one by the peasants of the country called Æropus the other Asnaus, runneth within O a narrow vale, and yieldeth but a small passage upon the bank side. He commanded Athenagoras to gain and fortifie Asnaus with his light armed souldiers: himself encamped upon Æropus. And look what way as the hill was fenced with broken and cragged rocks, there he kept a small guard of some few souldiers: but whereas there was more danger, and easier acces for the enemy he fortified with trenches, rampiers, and bulwarks. He planted also and disposed in convenient places a great number of engins to send out quarrels and other shot, for to keep the enemies aloof,

* Admirable, or wonderfull.

A aloof. The royal pavillion of the King himself was pitcht before the rampier upon a bank in a most conspicuous place of open sight, for to terrifie the enemy, and also to encourage and hearten his own men, when they should see him so confident and resolute. The Consul advertized by Charopus the Epirot, what passages the King with his army was possessed of, after he had passed the winter in Corcyra, himself likewise in the beginning of Spring, went up into the main land, and held on his march toward the enemy. And being advanced almost within five miles of the Kings camp, he left his legions in a strong fenced place, and went himself in person forward with certain lightly appointed in espiall to discover the quarters, and the morrow after held a consultation, Whether he might do better to assay to pass through the place which the enemy kept (notwithstanding he saw evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure) or to bring his B army about and fetch a compass the same way, whereas the year before Sulpitius entred into Macedony. This deliberation held him for certain daies in even balance and suspence, untill news came unto him that T. Quintius was created Consul; and having the Province of Macedony allotted unto him made haste thither, and was already passed to Corcyra.

Valerius Antias writeth how Villius was entred the pass aforesaid & because he could not take the straight and direct way (by reason that the King and his forces had beset all places) followed the valley along through the middle whereof the river *Aous runneth: and having made a bridge over it, in great haste passed over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there fought a battell: wherein the King was discomfited and put to flight, and driven out of his camp: that C 11600 enemies were slain in that conflict, 2200 taken prisoners, 132 ensigns won and carried away besides 256 horse. Also that during the combat there was a Temple vowed unto Jupiter, in case the Consul sped well in the battell. But all other writers both Greek and Latine, at least wise whose Annals I have read, report that Villius performed no memorable act, and that the Consul T. Quintius who next succeeded, took in hand the whole and entire war himself.

* Æm. Plin. Ovid & Mela. Pirro Nigro. varijs aliis.

Whiles things thus passed in Macedony, the other Consul L. Lentulus who staid behind at Rome, held a general assembly for the election of Censors: And among many famous and noble personages who sued for that dignity, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Ælius Paetus were created Censors. These two agreeing together in great concord, both elected a Senat without defaming any person: and also farmed out the toll for portage of all things that were sold at Capua: Item, they set & to farm let the custome for passage that way whereas the camp stood, and where now
D there is a town built: and enrolled three hundred Colonels (for that number was limited by the Senat) there to inhabit. They sold also the lands of Capua lying under the hill Tifata.

About the same time L. Manlius Acidinus departed out of Spain, and was prohibited by M. Porcius Lecca a Tribune of the Commons, to enter at his return into the City with the solemn pomp of an Ovation, notwithstanding he had that honour granted by the Senat. So he came into Rome as a private person and brought into the Chamber of the City 1200 pound weight of silver, and thirty pound weight well-near of gold. The same year Cn. Babius Tamphilus, who had received the Province of France from C. Aurelius the Consul of the former year, engaged himself rashly within the marches of the French Insubrians, and was environed and enclosed round about, both he and in manner his whole army. He lost above 6600 men. See what an overthrow was E received in a war, whereof there was no reckoning made, and from whence no danger was feared any more. This caused L. Lentulus the Consul to come out of the City of Rome, who being arrived into a Province full of trouble and tumult after he had received the charge of affrighted and dismaied army, gave the Prætor a great check and rebuke, & took him up roundly with reproachfull terms, yea, and commanded him to get him gone out of the Province, and to repair to Rome. Neither performed the Consul himself any exploit worthy of remembrance by reason that he was called home to Rome for to hold the solemn election of Magistrates: which also was staid by M. Fulvius, and M. Curius Tribunes of the Commons: who likewise would not suffer T. Quintius Flamininus, having been but Quæstor, for to stand for a Consulship. "Now adaies, say they,
"the dignities of Ædiles and Prætors are nought set by, and not worth the seeking for: and these F "noblemen will needs mount into the Consuls place, not by steps and degrees of other offices, "wherein they should make proof and give good testimony what their carriage is, but leaping o"ver those in the midst, joyned the lowest and highest together. This debate which began in Mars field in the assembly of the people, came at length to be decided before the Senat. And the Ll. ordained, That forasmuch as he which sued for that dignity was by law capable thereof it was reason that the people should have plenary and absolute power to create him, or whomsoever else they pleased. So the Tribunes submitted themselves under the authority of the Senator. And for Coss. were elected Sex. Ælius Paetus, and T. Quintius Flamininus. Then ensued the election of the Prætors. In which were created L. Cornelius Merula, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Porcius Cato, and C. Helvius, who had been Ædiles of the Commons. By whom the Plebeian plaies were re-G newed; and a solemn feast made in the honour of Jupiter in regard of those plaies. The Curule Ædiles likewise C. Valerius Flaccus, who also was the Flamine Dialis or Priest of Jupiter, and C. Cornelius Cethegus, exhibited the Roman games with great magnificence. The great Pontifices or Bishops Servius Sulpitius, and L. Galba died that year: In whose places were enstalled M. Æmylius Lepidus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. Now when Sex. Ælius Paetus and Titus Quintius Flamininus the Coss. were entred into their Magistracy, they assembled the Senat in the Capitoll: where the Ll. gave order, that concerning the two Provinces of Macedony and Italy, the Consuls should either agree between themſelves, or elſe caſt lots whether of them ſhould govern the one or the other: And that he, whoſe hap was to have the charge of Macedony, ſhould enroll of Romans three thouſand footmen, and three hundred horſemen: Alſo of Latine allies five thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, for to ſupply and furniſh out the legions. And for the other Conſul it was decreed, that he ſhould have an army all entire and new. L. Lentulus the Conſul of the former year, continued ſtill Governour in the Province with expreſs commandment, that neither himſelf ſhould leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Conſul were come with the new legions. So the Conſuls referred themſelves to the direction of the lots. To Ælius fell Italy: and Macedony to Quintius. As for the Prætors, who all were guided by lots, L. Cornelius Merula had the juriſdiction of the City of Rome. M. Claudius governed Sicily. To M. Porcius was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvius his lot was to be L. Deputy in Gaul. After this they began to take muſters. For over and beſides the Conſular armies, the Prætors alſo were charged to levy ſouldiers. To Marcellus were aſſigned four thouſand footmen of Latine allies, and three hundred horſemen to go into Sicily. And for Cato three thouſand foot of the ſame kind of ſouldiers with two hundred horſe to ſerve in Sardinia: upon condition, that when both theſe Prætors were come into their Provinces, they ſhould diſcharge all the old ſouldiers there, as well footmen as horſemen.

Then the Conſuls granted the Embaſſadors of King Attalus leave to come into the Senat-houſe: where having audience given them, "after they had declared how their King and Maſter "had aſſiſted the State of Rome with his forces as well by ſea as land, and ſhewed himſelf chear- "full, ready, and obedient to this preſent day for to execute and perform whatſoever the Roman "Conſuls had enjoyned him to do; they ſaid now, that they much feared leſt from henceforward "he would not be able to do the ſame, by reaſon he was impeached by Antiochus. For Antiochus "taking his vantage, and finding the realm of Attalus diſfurniſhed of garriſons, and unprovided "of forces both by ſea and land had invaded the ſame. For which occaſion Attalus beſought the "LL. of the Senat there aſſembled, that if they minded to uſe his navy, and employ the means "that he could make in the ſervice of the Macedonian war, they would then ſend him a ſuffici- "ent garriſon to defend his kingdom: but if they thought not well thereof, his requeſt was to "permit himſelf to return with his fleet and other forces, to the defence of his own. The Senat gave order to return this anſwer unto the Embaſſadors: "Whereas King Attalus had ſuccoured "the Roman Captains with his Armado and other means of war, the Senat accepted thereof in- "the beſt part. But as touching Antiochus the King, an ally and friend of the people of Rome, they "neither would ſend any aid againſt him: nor yet detain the aids of King Attalus in any ſervice "of theirs, longer than the King himſelf ſhould think it ſtood with his own commodity. For, the "manner of the people of Rome hath alwaies been to ſerve their own turn with the help and aſſi- "ſtance of others, but yet at the good pleaſure & diſcretion of others. And whoſoever were wil- "ling to relieve the Romans, they were at their own liberty to begin and end when they would "themſelves. Howbeit they purpoſed to addreſs their Embaſſadors unto Antiochus, to adverti ſe "him and let him underſtand that the people of Rome employed the help of Attalus his ſhips and "ſouldiers againſt Philip, a common enemy: and the Senat would take it kindly at his hands, if "for their ſakes he forbare the Realm of Attalus, and abſtained from war. For meet and reaſon "it was, that the Kings who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, ſhould likewiſe enter- "tain peace and amity among themſelves.

T. Quintius the Conſul made haſte to be gone into his Province: and when he had levied and muſtered his ſouldiers ſo, as that he had enrolled thoſe old experienced ſervitors for the moſt part, who had given good proof of their valour in the ſervice of Spain and Affrick, he was detained ſo long at Rome by occaſion of certain prodigious ſigns reported, untill he had taken order for the appeaſing of the gods, and expiation of them. The lightning ſcorched and blaſted the great port way from Veii: the Common Hall likewiſe of publike aſſemblies, and the Temple of Jupiter in Lanuvium: alſo the Temple of Hercules in Ardea: the walls beſides and turrets of Capua, and the Temple there which is called Alba. At Aretium the ſky appeared to be on a light fire. At Velitræ the earth ſetled and ſunk down, leaving a great gaping chink for the compaſs of three acres of ground. Word moreover was brought, that in Sueſſa Aurunca a lamb was yeaned with two heads; and in Sinueſſa a porket with a mans head. In regard of theſe prodigies, there was a proceſſion and ſupplication one whole day, and the Conſuls intended devoutly to their ſacrifices: and after they had pacified the gods, they took their journey into their Provinces. Ælius, together with C. Helvius the Prætor went into France and gave unto the ſaid Prætor the army which he received of L. Lentulus, and ſhould have diſmiſſed and diſcharged of their ſervice; becauſe he purpoſed himſelf to employ in his own wars the freſh and new legions which he brought with him: but he performed no action worth the report. The other Conſul T. Quintius having taken the ſea and departed from Brundiſium ſooner than other Conſuls were wont, arrived at Corcyra with eight thouſand foot, and eight hundred horſe. From thence he croſſed the ſeas with a galleace of five ranks of oars, directing his courſe for the neareſt coaſts of Epirus, and by great journeys made haſte until he was come to the Roman camp: from whence after he had licenſed Villius to depart, and ſtaid there ſome few daies, until his forces which were at Corcyra could overtake him, he called his Councill together to reſolve, Whether he ſhould keep on his journey directly, and make way through the midſt of his enemies where they lay encamped, or rather without any

A such attempt (which could not but carry with it great pain and perill) fetch a compass about with safety, and to enter into Macedony by the way of the Dassaretians country and Lyncus. And verily, this latter course of the twain had taken place, but that he feared, when he were retired once far from the sea, and had let the enemy slip out of his hands, if the King haply were minded (as he had done before) to defend himself within the deserts and forrests, that he should spend all the long summer and do no good. Therefore come what would of it, he resolved to assail the enemy in that very place as difficult as it was, with all the disadvantage whatsoever. But as they determined in their intention thus to do, so they were not so ready in the means to execute and effect the same. Thus they sate still and spent forty daies within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt. Then Philip conceived some hope to assay a peace, by the means and intercession of the Epirot
B nation. And after consultation had there were certain agents chosen for that purpose to wit, Pausanias the Prætor, and Alexander Generall of the horse; who brought the Consul and the King together for to parl, unto a place whereas the river Aous is narrowest, and the banks neerest together. The demands of the Consul in sum were these: That Philip should remove his garrisons out of the Cities Item, That whose territories or towns he had pilled and spoiled, he should make restitution again unto them all those things that were extant and to be found: as for the rest, they should be prized and valued indifferently to their worth. Philip made answer again, "That all "those peeces were not of like quality and condition. As for such as he had taken himself, he "would be content to let them at liberty: but for those that were left unto him by his progenitors "and predecessors, he would not forgo the possession thereof, since he held them lawfully in right C "of inheritance. Finally, if those Cities wherewith he had warred made complaint, that they were "ever endamaged by him, he would report himself to what Cities and States they would them-"selves, and stand to their award, so they were neuters, or in peace as well with the one side as "the other. The Consul hereunto replied and said, That for this matter it was needless to refer "themselves to the arbitrement or doom of any. For who seeth not evidently (quoth he) that "he hath done the wrong who first took arms? And that Philip before ever that he was molested "and troubled by any war from others, offered violence first unto all? After, when it was debated "what Cities should be set free, the Consul named first of all Thessalonica: at which word the King was in such a heat of choler that he cried out aloud, "What harder condition O Quintius would D "you impose upon him that you had vanquished? and withall, he flung away in a chafe from off the place of meeting and enterview, and would no longer parl. And much ado they had on both sides to hold their hands from shooting one at another, for the river ran in the midst between them that they could not try it out by the ears. The morrow after there passed many light skirmishes between the corps de guard on both parts by way of excursions, first in a plain that lay out broad enough for that purpose: but afterwards as the Kings men retired themselves into the narrow straights and rough rugged places, the Romans of an ardent desire to be fighting, entred thither soon after. The Romans had on their side the benefit of good order and military discipline and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fit for to maintain a skirmish in a set battell. The enemies again for their parts had the vantage of the ground, and the help of sundry engins to cast forth shot afar off (as balists and catapults) planted and ranged almost upon every E cliff and rock as it had been upon the walls of a City. After they had on both sides given and taken many a wound, so as divers of them were left slain on the earth, as if they had fought in a full battell the night at length parted them asunder.

Things thus standing in these terms, there hapned a certain herdman sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots to be brought before the Consul: who gave him to understand that he kept cattell a grazing in that forrest (which then was overspread with the Kings pavillion) and knew all the cranks, all the windings, turnings, and blind waies of those mountains: promising, that if he would send out a band of souldiers with him, he would conduct them thorow a place that was neither dangerous, nor yet difficult and hard of ascent: which if they had once gained, they F should be over their enemies heads and able to command them. And these things (quoth he) you may surely trust upon: for Charopus willed me to make declaration, That he could wish you the Consul were Master of all rather than any other. The Consul was desirous to beleeve all, but durst not credit him. And thus being troubled in spirit, whiles he entertained in his heart both joy and fear together, at length the authority of Charopus induced him to resolve and give the adventure of this hope thus offered and presented unto him. And to the end that the enemy might distrust and suspect nothing, for two daies following he never ceased to assail and provoke him, setting companies of armed souldiers in every place, to charge upon him, and ever seconding them with fresh men to succeed in the place of the wearied. After this, he delivered to a Tribune or Colonell four thousand chosen footmen, and three hundred horsemen; with this direction, to lead forward the Cavalry, as far as the ground would give leave: and when they were come G once to a place where the horsemen could not pass nor march farther, then to plant them in some plain and even ground: willing the footmen to march on as the guide should lead them and point out their way: but after they were mounted above the enemies heads, according as he undertook and made promise, then to give a sign by smok, and not to shout and to set up a cry untill one might guesse that upon signall of battell by him given, the battell was begun. And the Consul gave commandment to march by night (for as good hap was, the Moon was at full, and shone all night long) and take their refection and sleep in the day time. As for the guide aforesaid,

he made unto him many fair and large promises, if it might appear, that he meant truth, and dealt faithfully: howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custody of the said Colonel. When these companies were thus sent away, the Roman Generall travelled and endeavoured so much the more to gain vantage of the enemies guards. All this while, the Romans that were sent out with the Colonel, marched forward; and upon the third day, when they had given token by smoak, that they had won the pitch of the hill as they intended, and held it still: then the Consul divided his forces into three squadrons, and entred the midst of the valley with the main strength of his army, but he led forth the wings of his battell, both the right and the left, against the very camp of the enemies. Who also for their parts were not behind to re-encounter and receive him. And all the whiles that they advanced without their fortifications of defence upon a hot desire of conflict, it fell out, that the Roman souldier had the better a good deal, as being more valourous, more skilful, and better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the Kings souldiers, whereof many were wounded or killed outright, retired themselves to places of safety, either by natural situation or by art of man the danger returned upon the Romans heads, who inconsideratly were engaged into places of disadvantage, and into narrow streights, from whence they could no retire with ease. And surely they had not returned back again unpunished for their rashness, but that the Kings men hearing first an outcry behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish begun, were astonied at the sudden terror, and put besides themselves. Some fled here and there away; others that made a stand and tarried still, for that they rather wanted ground to flie than had heart enough to fight it out, were environed by their enemies both before and behind. The whole army might have been utterly defeated, if the winners had lustily followed the chase. K But the straights and the roughness of the waies hindred the horse, and the weight of armor cumbred the footmen. At first the King rode amain with bridle in horse neck, without regard of any thing, or looking behind him: but after he was got five miles before & guessing (as it was indeed) that by reason of the disadvantage of the place the enemy could not possible make way after; he rested upon a certain mount and sent his people all abroad over hils and dales, to rally his souldiers together that were dispersed. Thus with the loss not all out of two thousand men, the rest of the multitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Rendezvouz upon some signal given, & so marched with a great train into Thessaly. The Romans pursued them as far as they might with safety, killing them, and rifling the dead; yea and ransacked the Kings camp, which though it were naked without defendants, yet for the difficult access unto it, they had much trouble to win: & that night they lodged in their own camp. The next day the Consul made pursuit after the enemy along the straight, whereas the river runneth amoung the vallies. The K. came the first day unto the hold or camp of Pyrrhus (a place so called) in Triphilia, belonging to the territory of Meloti. From whence the morrow after he marched a mighty journey with his whole army (for needs he must go that fear drives) & approached the mountain Lingos. These mountains are in Epirus, situate between Macedony and Thessaly. The side that lieth to Thessaly regardeth the East: that which butteth upon Macedony hath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overspred with abundance of woods; yet so as the very tops do afford open plains and running waters. The King keeping his camp there for certain daies, was much troubled and perplexed in his mind, casting and revolving, whether it were expedient for him to return immediatly into his own kingdom, or possible M to retire himself into Thessaly. In sum, his resolution was to bring down his army into Thessaly. And so to Tricca he marched the next way he possibly could. From thence he passed in great haste through all the Cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow, he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses. The towns he set on fire: yet he permitted every one to carry away with him as much as he could of his own goods; all the rest fell to the souldiers share. No manner of cruelty there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but he practised among his own allies. And Philip himself in the execution thereof, grieved not a little, and was vexed at the heart; but alas he could do no other: yet his desire was, in that country which within a while should be possessed by the enemy to save the bodies at least wise of his associats. In this manner were ransacked & spoiled these towns following, Phacium, Iresia, Euhydrium, Eretria, & Palæphatus. Against N his coming to Phera the gates were shut upon him. And because it would ask some time to win that town by assault and no leisure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprise, & passed into Macedony: for the bruit went that the Ætolians also approached. Who having heard of the issue of the battell fought by the river Aous, first wasted and ransacked all the country near unto Sperchia and Macra Come (as they call it) and having from thence passed over into Thessaly, won Cymines and Angeas with the first assault. Howbeit, a repulse they took at Metropolis, whiles they harried the fields about it by reason that the townsmen ran together to the defence of their wals. After this they gave the attempt upon Callithera, where they found the like resistance and violence of the enemies: but there they persisted longer, and gave not over, nay, they drave the enemies that issued forth within their walls, and contenting themselves with that victory, they departed thence seeing no great hope to force the town. Then they won and pilled two villages, Theumi and Calathana. As for Acharya, it was surrendred by composition. And upon the like fear Xynia also was abandoned of her own inhabitants. These Citizens thus driven out of their own houses, stumbled at a venture upon a garrison which was a leading into Athamania, for the better guard of the forragers that were to purvey corn. This multitude, I say, marching disorderly without armour, pell mell together, with a sort that were unmeet for war, was hewn in peeces by

A by the armed ſouldiers, and Xynia was ſacked, thus left and forſaken as it was. After this the Ætolians won Cyphara, a fort and town of ſtrength, well ſeated for to empeach and command * Dolopia. Theſe exploits performed the Ætolians haſtily, all in few daies. * Oneblatbo.

Neither reſted Aminander nor the Athamans quiet and ſtill, after they heard the news of the proſperous battell which the Romans had fought. But Aminander repoſing ſmall truſt in his own ſouldiers, craved of the Conſul a ſmall ſupply of other forces: and as he marched toward Gomphi, he ſurprized forthwith and forced a town named Pheca, ſituat between Gomphi and the ſtraights that divide Theſſaly from Athamania. From thence he advanced before Gomphi, and aſſailed the town, which was detended right valiantly for certain daies: but after that he had erected ſcaling ladders againſt it, he forced the townſmen within, for very fear to yield and render all into his B hands. The ſurrender of this City terrified the Theſſalians exceedingly: in ſuch ſort, that the Citizens of Argenta, Pherinum, Thimarum, Liſinas, Stimon, and Lampſum, one after another ſubmitted themſelves, with other peeces thereby of ſmall importance.

Whiles the Athamanians and Ætolians (ſecured from all danger of the Macedonians) made ſpoil and raiſed again to themſelves by the victory of others: whiles Theſſaly was pilled and ſacked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to truſt: the Conſul paſſed over into the country of * Epirus, by the way of the ſtraights which he had opened and made clear by reaſon that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Epirots in generall went, and with whom they had ſided, excepting only Prince Charopus, yet becauſe he ſaw them not only carefull to make amends and ſatisfaction, but alſo willing and C forward to do whatſoever he commanded, he eſteemed and regarded them by their preſent ſtate, more than by their demeanor paſt, and ſo by ſhewing himſelf inclined to mercy and eaſie to pardon a fault, he won their hearts, and gained them unto him for the time to come. After this he diſpatched meſſengers to Corcyra, to will that the kulks and ſhips of burden ſhould put into the gulph of * Ambrasia, whiles himſelf travelled by eaſie journies; and the fourth day after pitched his tents upon the hill * Cercetius: and thither he ſent for Aminander to repair with his aids, not for any need he had of his forces, ſo as much as of his guidance to direct him in his journeys for Theſſaly. Moſt of the Epirots alſo, for the ſame intent were received, who voluntarily offered their help and aſſiſtance. The firſt City that he aſſaulted in Theſſaly, was Phaleria, wherein there lay a garriſon of two thouſand Macedonians. Who at firſt held out and reſiſted moſt manfully, D and as much as either armor or the walls were able to do, defended themſelves. But the aſſault & battery continuing unceſſantly both night and day, overcame at length the conſtant and reſolute valour of the Macedonians. For the Conſul made this reckoning, That upon this point depended the hearts and diſpoſitions of all the other Theſſalians, if the firſt ſhould not be able to abide the violence and force of the Romans. Phaleria was no ſooner won, but there came Embaſſadors from * Metropolis and Piera to render up their Cities into his hands, who craved pardon and obtained it. Phaleria was burnt and ſacked. From thence he ſet forward to Æginium, but ſeeing the place defenſible with any ſmall garriſon, and in manner impregnable, he beſtowed ſome mull ſhot of darts upon the next corps de guard, and turned his army toward the country againſt Gomphi, and from thence he marched down into the Plains of Theſſaly. And becauſe his army was diſtur- E niſhed of all neceſſaries (for that he had forborn to make ſpoil in the territories of the Epirots) after he had ſent out eſpials afore, to diſcover whether the hulks aboue-laid were arrived at * Leucas or Ambracia, he ſent out his companies one after another to Ambracia, for to purvey corn and victuals. The way between Gomphi and Ambracia, as it is cumberous and hard for paſſage, ſo again, it is but ſhort and very compendious. So that within few daies he had tranſported certain convoies of victuals from the port of Ambracia, whereby the camp was ſtored with plenty of all proviſion. From thence he paſſed to Rhages, a town almoſt ten miles diſtant from Lariſſa. The Citizens thereof are deſcended from Perrhæbia, and the City it ſelf ſeated upon the river * Peneus. The Theſſalians were nothing affraid at the firſt coming of the Romans. As for Philip, like as he durſt not himſelf in perſon march forward into Theſſaly, ſo having taken a place within * Tempe, F which he held with a ſtanding camp, he eſpied into what quarters the enemies intended to go, and ever as he could find opportunity and advantage, ſent underhand ſuccour and reliefe thither accordingly.

Quintius* alſo, the Conſul his brother, who by commiſſion from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of all ſea-coaſts, ſailed beyond Corcyra with two Galleaces of five banks of oars: and hearing that the navy was departed from thence ſeeing alſo there was no ſtaying there, he made ſail after apace, and having overtaken them at the Iſle Zamma he diſmiſſed Apuſtius, in whoſe place he ſucceeded: from thence he went fair & ſoftly haling after him the moſt part of the ſhips which followed with the proviſion of victuals, untill he came to Malea. From G whence, when he had given order, that the reſt ſhould make as good ſpeed as poſſibly they could after him, he went with three Quinqueremes lightly appointed, and arrived before at Pyræum, where he received the other ſhips that L. Apuſtius the Lieutenant had left there for the guard and defence of Athens.

At the ſame time there were two Armadoes ſet out of Aſia, the one conducted by King Attalus, conſiſting of four and twenty ſail of Quinqueremes: the other were of Rhodians, and ſtood of twenty covert ſhips with decks and hatches, commanded by Ageſimbrotus the Admirall.

Theſe

These fleets joyning together about the Iſland Andros, croſſed the narrow ſeas from thence to H Eubœea. And firſt they forraged the territory of the Caryſtians: afterwards ſeeing Caryſtus ſtrong enough againſt them by reaſon of a garriſon ſent to them in all haſte from Chalcis, they approached to Eretria. L. Quintius having intelligence that King Attalus was come, repaired thither alſo with thoſe veſſels which had been at Pyræum, & gave commandment, that as many ſhips as arrived thither belonging to his fleet, ſhould bend their courſe for Eubœa. Now was Eretria by all forcible means aſſaulted, for not only the veſſels of three joynt navies had brought thither all ſorts of engins and artillery deviſed for to ſhake and batter the walls of Cities, but alſo the fields and country hard by, yielded them plenty of timber, and other matter to make new. The townsmen from the very firſt day ſhewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and afterwards when they were wearied, and ſome of them hurt, and ſaw withall a part of their wall over- I thrown by the ordnance and engins of the enemy, enclined to yield: but they had amongſt them a garriſon of Macedonians, whom they feared no leſs than the Romans. Moreover, Philocles a Captain under the King ſent meſſengers unto them from Chalcis, aſſuring them, that if they could hold out ſtill and endure the ſiege, he would in good time be with them, and bring relief. Thus hope and fear together conſtrained them to drive off longer than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Philocles had a repulſe by the way, and in great haſte and fear was retired and fled to Chalcis again, then immediatly they ſent their Embaſſadors unto Attalus, to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to ſeek peace (whereof they had ſome hope) and foreſlacked the affairs of war-ſervice, oppoſing their corps de guard on that ſide only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all beſides, behold, Quintius in the K night-ſeaſon gave a camiſſado in that quarter which was leaſt ſuſpected, and with ſcaling ladders won the town. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Caſtle, which alſo afterwards was rendred up. As for money, gold, and ſilver, there was no great ſtore to ſpeak of: but Images, and painted tables of antique work, artificially wrought and ſuch like ornaments, there were more found than for the proportion of the bigneſs, or other wealth beſides, of ſuch a City as that was. From thence they ſet ſail once again for Caryſtus, where the whole multitude, before the enemies were put on land, having abandoned the City, were fled into their fortreſs: from whence they ſent their Orators unto the Roman Generall, humbly craving their merciſull protection. The townſmen preſently had their lives and libertie granted them. L
But the Macedonians were put to their ranſom and they compounded to pay * three hundred ſil-ver ſeſterces apeece, and to give up their armour and weapons, and ſo to depart: With this ſum of money having redeemed themſelves they were ſet out diſarmed into Bœotia. Theſe forces at ſea having in few daies gained two noble and renowned Cities in Eubœa, coaſted about Sunium, a promontory or cape within the territory of Attica, and arrived before Cenchreæ, a town of merchandiſe and traffick belonging to the Corinthians.

The Conſul all this while had a longer and more dangerous piece of ſervice in the ſiege (of Rhages) than all men looked for. And the enemies within made reſiſtance, where he would have leaſt of all ſuſpected. For he ſuppoſed verily that all the trouble and difficulty would be in battering down the wall, & making ſome breach. For thus he thought that if he had once opened way for his armed ſouldiers to enter into the town, the enemies afterwards would either flee or be M ſlain, as it falleth out commonly in Cities when they are forced. Howbeit, when part of the wall by the battery of the Ram lay flat along, and the enemies were got over at the breaches & ruins thereof; then began their labour and pains anew, as if they had had no trouble nor toil afore. For the Macedonians in garriſon, who were many in number, and thoſe approved and ſelect ſouldiers, thinking how honourable a ſervice it would be to defend the City by valour and dint of ſword, rather than by the ſtrength of walls, had ranged themſelves in a battell within, ſtrongly marſhalled into many ranks and files cloſe together: and when they perceived the Romans were mounting over the breaches to enter the City, they repelled and beat them back in that place of great diſadvantage, where they had much ado to recover and retire themſelves. The Conſ. hereat was much diſpleaſed, and vexed in himſelf: and making this account, that ſuch a foul foil and diſgrace was not N only an occaſion of a longer tract of time, before he could force that one City; but alſo materiall and important for the main progreſs and proceeding of the whole war, which commonly dependeth upon the occurrences of light matters and of ſmall moment in the beginning: after he had rid and cleanſed the place which was choaked up with the ruins of the half-broken wall lying there upon heaps, he reared a tower or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls, conſiſting of many ſtories and floors one over another, which contained and carried a mighty number of armed men, and drave the ſame upon wheels and rollers cloſe to the wall. Moreover he ſent out certain enſigns one after another by turns, to break through by force (if it were poſſible) that ſtrong and cloſe battaillon of the Macedonians (which they themſelves call Phalanx.) But the place being ſo ſtreight (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad) O the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they uſed, and of the form of battell wherein they were ranged. For when the Macedonians ſtanding cloſe one to another with a continued roof or fence of targets over their heads, oppoſed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romans neither with their darts could hurt them afar off, nor with their ſwords drawn come near them to fight cloſe at hand, or cut their pikes in two: and if it chanced that they whipt off or ſnapt any aſunder, yet the ſteel and truncheon

A thereof being ſharp ſtill at the point (headleſs though it were) among the other pikes that were headed, ſerved to make a fence as it were an hay or pallaiſade. Over and beſides that part of the wal that ſtood whole and ſound ſtill, was a ſure defence unto both flanks of the enemies: neither had the Romans any room at length to return, and from thence to fetch their beir, and ſo give a violent charge, which is the thing that uſually breaketh and diſordereth ranks. Moreover, there chanced one thing by meer fortune that encouraged them within: for as the tower aforeſaid was in driving over a terraſs or bank whereof the floor was not faſt and ſoundly hardned with the rammer, one of the wheels hapned to ſink in and make a deep rout in the ground, whereby the whole frame nodded ſo forward that the enemies without thought verily it was ready to fall, and the armed ſouldiers ſtanding upon it within, quaked for fear, and were put well-near beſides their wits.
B Thus when nothing that was provided might avail and come to any great effect, the Conſul was vexed at the heart, to ſee himſelf ſo over-matched in ſouldiers, in armour, and in manner of ſervice; and withall he conſidered, that he had no help to force the City and to win it in any ſhort time, nor could make means to paſs the winter in thoſe parts ſo far from ſea, and left naked already and waſte by thoſe calamities that follow wars. Whereupon he raiſed the ſiege: and becauſe there was no haven in all the tract and coaſt of Acarnania and Ætolia, which was able both to receive and harbour all his hulks that brought victuals for his army, and alſo to yield winter lodging for his legions; he thought upon the Iſle Anticyra within the country of Phocis; which lying toward the gulph of Corinth, ſeemed to him moſt fit and commodious for his purpoſe; becauſe they ſhould not remove far from Theſſaly, and the territories belonging to the enemies ha-C ving beſides Peloponneſus affront even over againſt them, divided but by a ſmall arm of the ſea: at their back Ætolia and Acarnania: and of each ſide Locris and Bœotia. At the firſt aſſault, the Conſul without any reſiſtance won Panopea in Phocis. Anticyra likewiſe long endured not the ſiege. Then Ambryſus and Hyampolis were received by compoſition. Daulis by reaſon that it was ſituate upon an high hill could neither be ſcaled nor forced by inſtruments and engins of battery. But the Romans by lancing their darts and ſhooting arrows againſt them that were in guard, trained them forth to skirmiſh; and after ſome light ſcufflings to no effect, whiles one while they ſeemed to flie, and other whiles to purſue, they brought them to be ſo careleſs, ſo negligent and ſo little reſpective, that when the enemies fled back within the gate, they entred pell-mell with them, and ſo were Maſters of the town. Other ſmall forts likewiſe of Phocis yielded rather D for fear than any force offered unto them. Elatia kept their gates ſhut, and made a countenance, that unleſs they were driven thereunto, they would receive within their walls neither Roman captain nor army.

¶ Whiles the Conſul lay at the ſiege before Elatia, there was preſented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely, of withdrawing the nation of the Achæ from the Kings alliance to the amity of the Romans. For they had expelled and baniſhed Cycliadas the chief of that faction that ſided with Philip: and Ariſthenus who friended the Romans and ſought to be confedered with them, was Prætor for the time.

Now the Roman Armado, together with Attalus and the Rhodians, rode at anchor in the haven of Cenchreæ, and they all were agreed in common to aſſail Corinth. But the Conſul thought E good, before that they ſhould put that deſignment in action, to ſend Embaſſadors to the State of Achaia, promiſing, if they would revold from the King and turn to them, to deliver Corinth into their hands, for to be incorporate into the ancient league and councill of their nation. And ſo by the advice of the Conſul, there were Embaſſadors addreſſed to the Achæans from his brother L. Quintius, from Attalus, the Rhodians and the Athenians. And at Sicyone* was there a Councill and Diet held, for to give them audience. Now the Achæans were not all of one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous, an ordinary, and continuall enemy of theirs) put them in fear of one ſide: the Romans they had in dread and horrour of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turns and favours, as well old as new. The K. himſelf they held in jealouſie for his cruelty and treachery: and caſting a proof and conjecture by thoſe
F courſes which he then took, and by his practices for the time, they foreſaw well that after the war ended he would be intollerable and a very tyrant over them. They were beſides not only ignorant, what every man had ſaid in the ſeverall councels of every particular State, and in the generall Diets of the whole nation, when they were required to deliver their opinions; but alſo uncertain and unreſolute among themſelves in their own minds what to will or wiſh. Unto men thus doubtfully diſpoſed and unſetled, the Embaſſadors aboveſaid were admitted, and licenſe was given them to deliver their meſſage. Firſt, the Roman Embaſſador L. Calphurnius; after him, thoſe that were for King Attalus: and in the third place, the Rhodians ſpake and made diſcourſe: and conſequently, the Embaſſadors of Philip were permitted to parl. The Athenians had audience given them laſt of all, and were reſerved of purpoſe to confute whatſoever ſhould be ſpoken G and alledged by the Macedonians. And theſe Athenians inveighed moſt ſharply and bitterly againſt the King, for none had received either more wrongs, or ſuffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this aſſembly verily for that time (by reaſon that the day was ſpent in hearing the continued orations of ſo many Embaſſadors) brake up about ſun-ſetting. The morrow after they aſſembled again: where the Magiſtrates by the voice of the Beadle or publike crier (after the cuſtome of the Greeks) gave liberty to every perſon to deliver his mind, and no man ſtepped forth. Great ſilence there was, and not a word among them for a long time, looking wiſtly of drawing any one of them to utter his opinion, that it cauſed not ſo much as the leaſt noiſe or K

"Philip they think it reaſon to be aided from us. Philip again putteth us in mind of our ſociety

"that Philip ſhould defend us both from Nabis and the Lacedæmonians, and alſo from the Ro- N

"Philip was himſelf the laſt year: who notwithſtanding he frankly promiſed to levy war againſt
"Nabis & thereby aſſaied to train and draw the flower of our youth from hence into Eubœa; af-

"of Cleomedon his Oration me thinks it hangeth not well together, and one peece thereof ſorteth
"not well with another. He ſeemeth to ſpeak of the Roman war contemptuouſly, as if it were a O "matter of nothing; ſaying the event & iſſue thereof would be like the former, which they main-

"Us, I ſay, his ancient allies? But what ſpeak I of us? Why hath he ſuffered them ſo to force and

"ſtrange land to flie unto you for your alliance, becauſe they would gladly ſhroud themſelves un-

"to requeſt, they can command if they liſt. And becauſe they are willing to ſpare and forbear you, with y one upon another who ſhould begin firſt. And no marvell if they whoſe ſpirits were aſtonied in ſome ſort within them, when they of their own accord caſt and toſſed in their minds things ſo different and contrary, were now more troubled and perplexed by thoſe orations beſides that had laſted all the long day, broaching, uttering, & adviſing many matters ſo harſh, ſo difficule, and unpleaſant unto them. At length, becauſe the Councill ſhould not be diſſolved without ſome ſpeech and parl, Ariſthenus the Prætor of the Achæans began to ſpeak, and ſaid: "What is become (my Maſters of Achæa) of thoſe hearts of yours and couragious ſtomacks, whereby at all "your feaſts and in your private meetings (when talk is miniſtred of Philip and the Romans) you "can hardly hold your hands, but are ready to fly one in anothers face? And now, when as this "honourable Cour of Parliament is publiſhed & holden for the ſame purpoſe only; when ye have "heard the reaſons & allegations of the Embaſſadors of all parts; when the Magiſtrats propound I "the matter to be debated in council; when the publike crier calleth you to give your opinions, ye "are mum and mute? If the regard of the common good and welfare of us all, will not cauſe you "to open your lips; cannot the private reſpects and affections neither (which have enclined and "carried your minds to the one ſide or the other) fetch out a word from any of your mouths? "Conſidering eſpecially, that no man is ſo groſs and blockiſh, who can be ignorant that now is "the very time or never for each one to ſay and deliver his mind as he will himſelf, and as he thin- "keth beſt, before we reſolve and determine of any courſe: and when a decree or act is once paſ- "ſed, that all men are bound (even they themſelves that before miſliked it) to defend and main- "tain the ſame, as a good and profitable accord. This admonition of the Prætor was ſo far ſhort of drawing any one of them to utter his opinion, that it cauſed not ſo much as the leaſt noiſe or humming in ſo frequent an auditory and congregation of ſo many States together. Then Ariſthenus the Prætor began again and followed his ſpeech in this manner. "It ſeemeth (my Maſters "and friends of Achæa here aſſembled) that ye are not ſo much to ſeek for counſell and advice, "but ye are as ſhort of your tongues and loath to ſpeak. And every one here is unwilling to pro- "vide for their generall good for fear leaſt he ſhould incur ſome particular perill. My ſelf likewiſe "peradventure would be ſilent and hold my peace if I were a private perſon: But now being Præ- "tor, I ſee thus much, That either there ſhould have no audience at all been given unto the Em- "baſſadors, or elſe, that they ought not to be ſent away from hence without an anſwer: and an- "ſwer them how can I without your ordinance? now ſeeing that there is none of you all, who "have been ſummoned hither to this Councill, that either will or dare ſay a word to the cauſe: "let us examine throughly and conſider well in lieu of your opinions, thoſe ſpeeches which ye- "ſterday were pronounced by the Embaſſadors: let us (I ſay) reviſe them ſo, as if they had not de- "manded thoſe things which concerned their own good and commodity, but as though they pro- "poſed ſuch points they eſteemed profitable and expedient for us all. The Romans, the Rhodi- "ans, and King Attalus require our alliance and amity: and in that war which they wage againſt "Philip they think it reaſon to be aided from us. Philip again putteth us in mind of our ſociety "with him and of our oath. One while he requireth us to ſtand and band with him: otherwhiles, "he ſaith he will be content that we ſhould ſit ſtill, and meddle neither one way nor other. Is "there no man here knoweth the reaſon, why they that are not yet our allies demand and crave "more than he that is our ally already? It is neither the modeſty of Philip, nor the impudency of "the Romans that is the cauſe hereof. The ports and haven-towns they be of Achæa, which mi- "niſter confidence and aſſurance to thoſe demanders, and take away the ſame from them again. "From Philip we ſee nothing but only an Embaſſador. The ſea-forces of the Romans and their "fleet, ride in the harbor of Cenchreæ: they carry afore them in ſhew the ſpoiles of the Cities in "* Eubœa. The Conſul himſelf with his land-army of the legions we ſee diſjoyned from us by a "ſmall arm only of the ſea, ranging at their pleaſure all over Phocis and Locris. Marvell now lon- "ger if you can, why Cleomedon the Embaſſador of Philip demanded erewhile ſo coldly and diffi- "dently, that we ſhould take arms for the King againſt the Romans: who, if we by vertue of the "ſame league and oath, wherewith he ſeemed to charge us in conſcience, required of him again, "that Philip ſhould defend us both from Nabis and the Lacedæmonians, and alſo from the Ro- "mans; would be to ſeek not only of a garriſon and power of armed men to ſhield us, but like- "wiſe of a very anſwer to ſhape us. And verily he would be no more ready to ſatisfie us, than "Philip was himſelf the laſt year; who notwithſtanding he frankly promiſed to levy war againſt "Nabis & thereby aſſaied to train and draw the flower of our youth from hence into Eubœa; af- "ter that he ſaw once that we neither agreed to ſend him that power, nor yet were willing to en- "tangle our ſelves & be intereſſed in the Roman war, forgot ſoon that ſociety that now he ſtan- "deth and vanteth ſo much of, and left us to the mercy and devotion of Nabis and the Lacedæ- "monians, to be ſpoiled pilled, & waſted at their pleaſures. And ſurely ſo much as I can conceive "of Cleomedon his Oration me thinks it hangeth not well together, and one peece thereof ſorteth "not well with another. He ſeemeth to ſpeak of the Roman war contemptuouſly, as if it were a "matter of nothing; ſaying the event & iſſue thereof would be like the former, which they main- "tained with Philip. How is it then, that he keepeth himſelf away, and in his abſence demandeth "our help rather than with his perſonall preſence protecteth us both from Nabis & the Romans? "Us, I ſay, his ancient allies? But what ſpeak I of us? Why hath he ſuffered them ſo to force and "win Eretria and Caryſtum? Why endured he, that ſo many Cities of Theſſaly ſhould be loſt? "How could he abide Locris and Phocis to be over-run ſo as they are? And Elatia now at this day

"howſoever? and when he had forgone and diſſeiſed himſelf of that paſs which he held, why re"tired he into the inland parts of his realm for his ſafety? If willingly and of his own accord he

B "this preſent, either with greater numbers or ſtronger forces than they have done heretofore,

" All this whiles have ye had a deſire to ſave and free your ſelves from Philip, but evermore by

" well in your wits, & have them you muſt either your allies or your enemies, there is no remedy.

After this Oration of the Pretor, there aroſe a muttering and noiſe in the aſſembly, whiles ſome approved and gave aſſent unto that which he ſaid, others rebuked in churliſh wiſe thoſe that accorded. Inſomuch, as they jangled not one with another in particular, but the very States there aſſembled were at variance, yea, and this debate between the Magiſtrates of the whole nation K (whom they call Demiurgi, and ten they are in number) was as hotly maintained, as among the multitude. Five of them ſaid, they would propound unto the people, and debate with them in counſel about accepting the alliance of the people of Rome, and put it to voices. The other five proteſted, that this was directly againſt a law, in that caſe provided, forbidding expreſly that no Magiſtrats ſhould either propound or determine ought in any Diet, prejudicial to the ſociety and league with Philip. Thus was this day alſo ſpent in debating and wrangling, and nothing done. There remained one day yet of a full Diet and Councel, for by law they were to conclude and decree ſomewhat within three dayes at the fartheſt. Againſt that time, the parties were ſo hotly bent one againſt the other, that the fathers could hardly forbear to offer violence to their very children. There was one Rhiſiaſus of Pellenæ, who had a ſon named Memnon, and he was a Demi- L urgus, who took part and ſided with them that would not permit the matter to be put to queſtion, and determined by a ſcrutiny of voices. This Rhiſiaſus having inſtantly a long time importuned his ſon, and beſought him to ſuffer the Acheans to provide for their weal publick, and not by his peeviſh frowardnes undo the ſtate of the whole nation: when he ſaw once that all his prayers prevailed nothing, he ſware a great oath that he would kill him with his own hands, and not take him for his ſon, but for an errant enemy. By which his menaces, he gained thus much in the end, that content he was the next day to joyn with them that put the matter to queſtion: who now being more in number than the other, made a report and propoſed the cauſe to the aſſembly: and when all the States in manner there met enclined thereto, and approved thereof, ſo as they avowed openly what they would ordain; the Dymæans, Megapolitans, and certain Argives, before M the decree was enacted, roſe up all at once, and departed out of the aſſembly, and no man either wondred at it, or blamed them for it. As for the Megapolitans, no longer ago than in their grandfires dayes, at what time as they were expelled out of their country by the Lacedemonians, K. Antigonus had reſtored them again. The Dymeans being but lately taken priſoners, and ranſacked by the Roman army, Philip having given order that they ſhould be redeemed whereſoever they were in ſlavery and bondage, he not only ſet free, but alſo replanted in their own country. The Argives laſt of all, beſides that they are of a ſettled opinion and belief that the Macedonian Kings are deſcended from them, were for the moſt part linked unto Philip in the right and regard of privat hoſpitality, and familiar friendſhip. In theſe reſpects, they went out of that aſſembly which inclined to the contract of alliance with the Romans, and were held excuſed for this departure: being thus N obliged unto Philip the adverſe part by great favours and benefits, yea, and thoſe newly received at his hands. All the other States of the Achæans, when they were demanded their opinions, without delay confirmed by their immediat decree, the ſociety with Attalus and the Rhodians: but the league with the people of Rome, becauſe it could not be ratified and eſtabliſhed without the Act of the people, was referred and put off until the time that Embaſſadors might be ſent unto Rome. But for the preſent it was thought good that three Embaſſadors ſhould be addreſſed unto L. Quintius, and that all the forces of the Achæans ſhould march toward Corinth for that Quintius having won the port of Cenchreæ, was already at the ſiege and aſſault of that City.

Theſe Achæans encamped themſelves over againſt that gate that openeth toward Sicyone: the Romans lay againſt that part of the City which looketh toward Cenchreæ and Attalus having led O his army through the narrow ſtreight of Iſthmus, aſſailed them of Lechæus ſide, which is an haven of the other Sea. At the firſt they made no hot aſſault, hoping that there would be ſome mutiny between the Towns-men and the Kings garriſon. But perceiving they were all of one mind and reſolution, and that both the Macedonians defended the City, as their own native country: and alſo the Corinthians were content to be at the full command and direction of Androſthenes the Captain of the garriſon, as well as if he had been their fellow-citizen, and lawfully choſen by

A their own election and ſuffrages: then the aſſailants had no other hope but in the violent force of arms and engins. And of all ſides they had raiſed banks and mures, and were come cloſe to the walls, although with hard acceſs thereto. Now had the Ram, from that quarter where the Romans lay, beaten down a good part of the wall. To which breach, becauſe it lay naked without defence, all the Macedonians ran to guard and defend it by ſtrength of arms: where there was a cruel fight between them and the Romans. At the firſt the Romans were ſoon repulſed by means of the great numbers of defendants: but after the ſuccours of the Achæi and Attalus came unto them, they received them with equal valour: neither doubted they but to be able with eaſe to drive the Macedonians and the Greeks from their ſtandings, and force them to retreat. But there were within the Town a multitude of Italian fugitives revolted and fled from the Romans: part B of them, a reſidue left of Annibal his army; who having tranſgreſſed the laws, for fear of puniſhment were fled from the Romans, and took part with Philip: part alſo were marriners and ſeafaring men, who for hope of more honorable intertainment and ſervice, had abandoned their ſhips, and were gotten into the City of Corinth. Theſe fellows paſt all hope of life, if the Romans haply ſhould have the better hand, fared more like mad men than hardy and audacious ſouldiers. Now there is over-againſt Sicyone a promontory of Ionio, which they call the Cape of Acræa, and it runneth into the Sea: from whence the paſſage over to Corinth is a cut almoſt of ſeven miles. Thither Philocles, a Captain alſo under King Philip, had conducted through Bœotia 1500 ſouldiers: and certain Brigantins of Corinth were there ready to embark that ſupply of aid, and to tranſport them to Lechæum. By this time Attalus adviſed to ſet on fire the engins and fabricks that they had
C made, and preſently to give over the ſiege. Quintius perſiſted yet more obſtinatly in his enterpriſe begun. But he alſo ſeeing the Kings guards ranged and quartered at every gate, and that if they ſhould hap to ſally out, their violence would hardly be ſuſtrained, was of the ſame mind with Attalus. So without effecting any thing, the Achæans were diſmiſſed, and the reſt returned to their ſhips, Attalus to Piræum, the Romans to Corcyra.

During this ſervice by Sea forces, the (other) Conſul who lay in camp before Elatea in Phocis, firſt aſſaied to gain the City by conference and parly with the principal citizens thereof: but after anſwer made, that it lay not in their hands, and that they who were for the King, outwent the Towns-men both in number and ſtrength: then at once from all parts he gave an aſſault unto the City both by force of arms, and alſo by engins of artillery. The Ram was bent againſt the walls,
D and as much thereof beaten down with a mighty craſh and fearful noiſe, as ſtood between the Towers: whereupon the Town was diſmantelled and laid naked, and withal a cohort of Roman ſouldiers entred at the open breach; ſo as from all parts the defendants abandoned their guards, and ran to that place that thus was diſtreſſed by the enemies. And at one inſtant the Romans advanced themſelves over the breach, and ſet up ſcaling ladders againſt the wall which was ſtanding: and whiles the enemies were amuſed wholly, and had their eye only upon that one place where the conflict was, the wall in many parts was ſcaled, and armed ſouldiers mounted into the City. At which ſuddain tumult and alarm, the armed men having quit the place which they guarded with a thick troop fled all into the caſtle for fear; and the unarmed and naked multitude followed after. Thus the Conſul was maſter of the City: which being ranſacked, he ſent unto the Caſtle
E certain meſſengers, promiſing life to as many of the Kings garriſon as would depart away without arms, and offering liberty to the Elatians: and after ſecurity given hereof, within few dayes the Caſtle alſo was rendred into his hands. Moreover, by the arrival of Philocles (a commander for the King) in Achaia, not Corinth only was delivered from ſiege, but the City alſo of the Argives, was by certain of the principal rulers betrayed unto Philocles, who before had ſounded and ſollicited the minds and affections of the common people. There was a cuſtome in this City that upon the firſt day of their general aſſemblies, the Pretor ſhould in token of good luck pronounce the names of Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules: and afterwards ordained it was beſides by a law, that the name of Philip ſhould make up the fourth. Now after the alliance accorded between them and the Romans it hapned that the beadle or publick cryer left out the name of Philip: whereat the mul-
F titude firſt began to mutter and grumble: then aroſe a loud cry of thoſe that put him in mind to name the King, willing him to give him his honor due by law: until at laſt his name was alſo pronounced with great applauſe and conſent. Upon the confidence and aſſurance of this favour Philocles was ſent for, who by night ſeiſed upon an hill that commandeth the City, which commonly is called the fort of Lariſſa: and having put a garriſon there, the next morning betimes he advanced forward with banner diſplaid, and came down toward the common place lying under the fortreſs aforeſaid: where there encountred him a band of armed men well appointed in order of battail. Theſe were the garriſon of the Achæi lately there placed, to the number of 500 elect men choſen forth of all the States of Achæa: and one Æneſidemus a Dymean was their commander. Unto him Philocles (one of the Kings Captains aforeſaid) addreſſed a ſpecial meſſenger to per-G ſwade and exhort him to quit the City; giving him to underſtand, That he and his Company were not able to match the Town-men alone, who caried the ſame mind that the Macedonians had done: much leſs then ſhould they ſtand out when the Macedonians were joined unto them; the Macedonians (I ſay) whom the very Romans themſelves could not ſuſtain at Corinth. At firſt he did no good either with leader or ſouldier: yea, and when within a while they beheld the Argives alſo marching armed againſt them with a great troop from another part, and ſaw preſent death before their eyes, yet it ſeemed they would have put it to the hazard of a conflict, and fought to the laſt man, in caſe their Captain would have ſtuck to it, and not relented. But Æneſidemus for fear leſt together with the City, the flour of all the youth of Achæa ſhould periſh, capitulated with Philocles, that they might be permitted to depart and go their way: but himſelf kept his ground ſtill in his armour, with ſome few of his followers and vaſſals, and removed not a foot. Then Philocles ſent out unto him, to demand, What he meant thereby? Unto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his ſhield before him made anſwer, That armed as he was he would live and die in the guard and defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandment of the Captains, the Thracians lanced their darts and ſhot at him, and ſo both he and the company about him were ſlain every one. Thus after the accord of alliance between the Achæans and Romans, two moſt noble and famous Cities (Argi and Corinth) came under the ſubjection of the King. Theſe were the acts atchieved by the Romans as well by Land as Sea this ſummer.

In France there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. Ælius the Conſul, notwithſtanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained ſtill with him, which by order he ſhould have diſcharged, and was the ſame that had before been commanded by L. Cornelius the Pro-conſul, and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Ælius: the other, that he brought himſelf with him into the Province. So that he imployed the whole year almoſt in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to return into their Colonies, from whence by ſundry caſualties of war they were chaſed and diſperſed. As France that year was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, ſo about the City of Rome there had like to have been a commotion and tumult of bondſlaves. The Carthaginian hoſtages were in guard and kept at Setia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chief Nobles and Princes of Carthage) a mighty train and retinue of ſervants. The number of them was the greater by occaſion of the late African war; during which time and preſently after, the Setins alſo themſelves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in port-ſale with the reſt of the prizes. Theſe having conſpired together, ſent out certain of their own company to ſollicite alſo the other ſlaves that were in the territory of Setia, and ſo forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circeii. Their plot was, that when all things were provided aforehand, they ſhould upon the very day of the ſolemn games and plaies (which ſhortly were to be exhibited and ſet forth in Setia) take the opportunity of the time, when as the people were buſy in beholding the ſpectacle and ſhew repreſented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and when they had by maſſacre in this ſuddain hurly-burly poſſeſſed themſelves of Setia, then to go forward and ſurpriſe Norba and Circeii. This horrible complot and conſpiracy was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Merula Pretor at that time of the City. For two bondſlaves early in a morning before day, preſented themſelves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had been contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their ſafe cuſtody at home within his own houſe, called the Senate together; where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what theſe informers had revealed, he was commanded to go abroad to ſearch out and repreſs this conſpiracy. Forth he marched with five Lieutenants of the camp, and look how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he tendred unto them a military oath, and conſtrained them to arm and follow him. Thus in this haſty manner of levy, he armed well neer 2000, and with them all together (who knew not whither he meant to go, nor to what peece of ſervice he led them) to Setia he came. At his firſt entrance, he ſuddainly in great haſt apprehended the principal heads of the conſpiracy; whereupon the ſlaves fled out of the Town. Then were ſent out certain into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this buſineſs there were two bondſlaves and one free man that performed ſingular good ſervice. Unto him the LL. of the Senat gave order, that there ſhould be paid 100000 Aſſes in braſs coin: but unto the ſlaves 25000 and their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their maſters were contented their full price out of the Chamber of the City. Not long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conſpiracy purpoſed to ſurpriſe Preneſte. Thither marched L. Cornelius the Pretor of the City, where he executed about 500 perſons who were found guilty. The City was in great fear to ſee how the hoſtages and captives of the Carthaginians practiſed ſuch troubles. Therefore in Rome a ſtanding watch was kept in every ſtreet: and the inferior Magiſtrats were charged to ſee to it and to walk the round, and the Triumvirs likewiſe (or three Sheriffs) to have a better eye and look to the Quarry-priſon. The Pretor alſo directed his letters into all quarters of the Latin nation to this effect, That all the hoſtages ſhould be kept within doors, and not ſuffered to go abroad into the ſtreets: that all captives and priſoners ſhould have gyves about their heels often pound weight at leaſt, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goal.

The ſame year came Embaſſadors from King Attalus, who preſented in the Capitol a golden Crown of 246 pound weight, with great thankſgiving unto the Senate, that King Antiochus in regard of the authority and countenance of the Roman Embaſſadors, had withdrawn his forces out of the confines of Attalus. The ſame ſummer two hundred men of arms, ten Elephants, and 200000 Modii of wheat ſent from King Maſaniſſa, arrived at the camp in Greece. Likewiſe out of Sicily and Sardinia, there was ſent great ſtore of victual and liveries for the army. In Sicily M. Marcellus was L. Governour, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cato, an upright man and living without touch and reproach, ſave only he was thought ſomewhat too ſevere in reſtraining of uſury.

Sex. Ælius the Consul being returned to Rome out of France in regard of the general assembly for election of Magistrats, created Consuls Cn. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minutius Rufus. And two daies after, the election was held for Pretors. This year first were chosen six Pretors, by reason that the number of Provinces encreased, and the Roman Empire and Seignory extended farther. And these were they, to wit, L. Manlius Volso, Cn. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius Silus, M. Helvius, M. Minutius Rufus, and L. Acilius. Of these, Sempronius and Helvius were Æ- Six Pretors first created.
diles of the Commons: Q. Minutius Thermus and T. Sempronius Longus Ædiles of the chair. The Roman games this year were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minutius being Consuls, B above all things went in hand with the Provinces of Consuls and Pretors: and first they dispatched those that concerned the Pretors (a matter that might be decided by casting lots.) To Sergius fell the jurisdiction of the City, and to Minutius the forein, over strangers. Acilius was appointed to Sardinia, Manlius to Sicily, Sempronius to that part of Spain between Italy and Iberus; and Helvius unto the other beyond the River.

When the Consuls were upon the point to cast lots likewise for their provinces; namely, Italy and Macedony, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius Tribuns of the Commons, interposed themselves and staied them alledging, "That Macedony was a province lying far off, and there was no one thing "that had more empeached and hindred the proceeding of wars to that day than this, That in so "remote parts, the Consul ever of the former year was called home before he were setled in his
C "affairs, and when he should be employed most in wars. Now have there four years already "gone over our heads, since we decreed and concluded to follow the Macedonian war; during "which time, Sulpitius spent the greater part of his year in seeking after the King and his army; "Villius, when he should encounter the enemy, was called away before he had effected any ex- "ploit; as for Quintius, he was kept at Rome still for the most part of the year, in attendance a- "bout Church-matters and sacrifices: howbeit the affairs of wars under his conduct were ma- "naged so well, that if either he had gone sooner into his province, or the winter had been later, "he might have dispatched the wars there: and now, that he is ready to retire into his standing "camp and wintring harbors, the report is, that he hath brought the war to that good pass and "forwardness, that unless he be not hindred by a new successor, in all likely-hood and apparence, D "he will make a final end thereof the next summer.

With these speeches they prevailed so much, that the Consuls for their part promised to be ordered and set down by the Senat in this behalf upon condition, that the Tribuns would be content to do the like. Now when of both sides they had referred themselves to a free and absolute consultation the LL. of the Senat assigned to both the Consuls the government of Italy, and continued the command of the army still with T. Quintius, until there came another to succeed him. Two legions were appointed for the Consul, with commission to war upon the Gauls between Rome and the Alps who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintius ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedony unto him, a new supply of 5000 foot, 300 horse, and 3000 sea-servitors and mariners. And likewise, that the same L. Quintius Flaminius should be E Admiral of the navy, as before. For the Pretors who were to go into Spain, there was an allowance of 8000 footmen out of the allies of the Latin nation, and 400 horsemen, so that they dismissed the old souldiers out of Spain: and enjoined they were to limit and set out the bounds of their several provinces, whereas the higher Spain and the lower should part. And for Macedony there were two Lieutenants more for the army appointed, to wit, P. Sulpitius and P. Villius, who had been Consuls both, and in that province.

Before that either Consuls or Pretors went out into their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which hapned. For at Rome the Temple of Vulcan and Summanus at Fregellæ the wall and a gate of the City, were striken with lightning. At Frusino it appeared light (as it had been clear day) in the night season. At Asculum a Lamb was yeaned ha-
F ving two heads and five feet. Also at Formiæ two wolves entred into the Town, and worried some that were in their way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolf, that not only came into the City, but went forward as far as to the Capitol.

C. Acilius a Tribun of the Commons proposed a law, that there should be five Colonies conducted to the Sea side and there planted: two at the mouth of the Rivers Vulturnus and Liternus, one at * Puteoli, another in the Burrough Town of Salernum, and to make the fift * Buxentum was adjoined to the rest. Into every Colony order was taken, that there should be thirty hou- * Pozzole. * Pisciotta Vi- ce, or Ferolla, Legorio. sholds sent. The three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for the conducting of these Colonies were created; namely, M. Servilius Geminus, Q. Minutius Thermus, and T. Sempronius Longus.
These three had commission to continue in the charge of this office three years. After the muster, G and all other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man, that were by the Consuls to be performed, then they set forward both, into their provinces. Cornelius took his way directly against the Insubrians, who accompanied with the Cenomans, were entred at that time into arms: Q. Minutius in his journey bare on the left hand of Italy toward the nether sea; and conducting his army to Genua, began with the Ligurians to make war. Clastidium and Litubium, Towns both of the Ligurians, likewise two States of the same nation, the Celelats and the Cerdiciats surrendred unto him; insomuch as all the country on this side the Po, were in subjection to the Romans, except the Boians among the Gauls, and the Illuats among the Ligurians. By report H there were fifteen Towns containing twenty thousand men, which yeelded unto them. From thence he led the legions into the territory of the Boians. The army of the Boians had passed over the Po a little before, and joined with the Insubrians and Cænomans: for hearing that the Consuls would war jointly with both their forces, they intended likewise to make themselves more strong, by uniting and bringing their power together. But the bruit being blown abroad, that once of the Consuls invaded and fired the country of the Boians, presently there arose a tumult. For the Boians demanded, that they all in general would help them in their distress. The Insubrians refused and said, That they would not abandon their own confines: by which occasion they distan-ded. The Boians went to the defence of their own country, and the Insubrians with the Cænomans, sat them down upon the banks of the River Mincius. Five miles beneath that place, the Consul I Cornelius also encamped himself neer the said River: from whence he sent certain messengers all about the villages, and to Brixia, the head City of that nation: and being advertised sufficiently that the youth was up in arms, without the warrant and consent of their ancients; and that the Cænomans joined not with the Insubrians in their rebellion by vertue of publick counsel and authority; he sent for the principal persons among them, and began to labour and deal with them, that the Cænomans would forsake the Insubrians, and openly with their ensigns advanced, either to return into their own country, or turn to the Romans. This they could not bring them to: howbeit they assured the Consul, that in the field they would either sit still and do nothing, or else, if any good opportunity was presented unto them, they would aid the Romans. The Insubrians knew nothing of this complot: and yet, some doubt and suspition they had, that their allies halted, and were not K sound of all four: and therefore when there was occasion to lead forth to fight a field, they durst not trust them with either of the two wings and points of the battel, for fear if they retreated like false brethren, they should hazard the main chance: but placed them behind the ensigns in the reergard.

The Consul in the beginning of the battel vowed a Temple to Juno Sospita, in case he discomfited the enemies that day, and put them to the rout. The souldiers set up a shout, and cried aloud that they would bring it to pass that the Consul should have his desire, and therewith charged the enemy right fiercely. The Insubrians could not abide the first shock. Some write, that in the very conflict the Cænomans also suddainly set upon their back, whereby they were distressed and in danger both before and behind; and that there were slain enclosed in the mids five and thirty thousand of the enemies, and seven hundred taken prisoners, and among them Amilcar the General of L the Carthaginians, who was the cause of this war: also that there were a hundred and thirty en-signs carried away, and of chariots above two hundred. All the Towns that followed this revolt, yeelded to the Romans.

Minutius the Consul, at the beginning made excursions into the country of the Boians, wasting and spoiling it all over: but afterwards when they had forsaken the Insubrians, and were retired home to defend and save their own, he kept himself within camp, making full account to trie a set battel with the enemy. Neither would the Boians for their part have been behind, but ready to have answered them, had not the rumor of the Insubrians overthrow, daunted and broken their hearts. Whereupon they forsook their leader, quit the camp, and bestowed themselves in the Towns and Villages to guard every man his own, and quite altered the course of their enemy his M war, and put him besides his account. For the Consul past all hope now to determine the quarrel in one ranged battel, began again to forrage the fields, burn all buildings, and force Towns by assault. Much about the same time Clastidium was set on fire. And from thence the legions were conducted against the Illuats among the Ligurians, who only stood out and would not come in, and yeeld obedience. Which nation likewise hearing that the Insubrians were defeated in a battel, and that the Boians were so feared, that they durst not venture the fortune of a field, submitted themselves. At the same time the letters of the Consuls, containing their happy affairs in France, were brought to Rome. M. Sergius the Pretor of the City first read them in the Senat, and afterwards by the advice of the Senate, rehearsed them in a full audience and assembly of the people. And a procession was decreed for the space of foer dayes. N

Now was winter come, and whiles T. Quintius after the winning of Elatia, wintred his armies in divers harbors within Phocis and Locris, there arose a mutiny in Opus. The one faction sent for the Ætolians their neer neighbours to side with them: and the other for the Romans. The Ætolians came first, but the mightier faction would not suffer them to enter in: for having dispatched a messenger to the Roman General, they held the Town until his coming. The Kings garrison kept the fortress, neither could they be brought to abandon it either with the menaces of the Opuntians, or the authority and countenance of the Roman commander. The only let and stay why it was not immediatly assaulted was this; Because there was come an herald from the King, requesting time and place of a parle, which with much ado was granted to the King: not because Quintius of himself was not desirous and wished that he might be thought to have ended this war, O either by force of arms or conditions of peace; for as yet he knew not whether one of the new Consuls should be sent to succeed him, or his government continued still unto him (according as he had given his friends and kinsfolks in charge to bring that about by all the endeavour and means that he could make:) but he supposed verily, that this parling would be to good purpose for him, if it might be in his liberty to drive matters unto war if he stayed still, or draw to a peace if he departed home. So upon the strand and shore of the gulf Malea, they chose a place neer unto Nicea.

Thither

A Thither came the King by water from Demetrias with five brigantins or pinnaces, and one ſhip of war with a braſs beak-head. There accompanied him the chief LL. of Macedony, and Cycliadas a noble perſonage of great mark among the Achæans, and one that was from thence baniſhed. With the Roman General were King Aminander, Dionyſidorus an Embaſſador of King Attalus, and Ageſimbrotus Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, Phaneas the chief and principal Magiſtrat of the Ætolians, and two Achæans Ariſthenus and Xenophon. The Roman General in the mids of the c, advanced himſelf forward to the edge of the very ſhore, even to the bank ſide, whiles the King came forward to the foredeck of his ſhip ſtanding at anchor: and thus he began and ſaid unto the King; "Sir, you may do better to come aſhore that we may commune and confer together cloſe, "and both ſpeak and hear one another more eaſily. The King refuſed ſo to do: and why ſo? quoth B "Quintius, who is it that you fear, if a man may know? Then with an hauty ſpirit and kinglike: I "fear none (quoth he) but the immortal Gods; but I truſt not the fidelity of all that I ſee here a- "bout you, and namely, the Ætolians leaſt of all other. Why (ſaith Quintius again) this is the "common caſe of all them that come to parly with enemies; namely, to be in danger one of ano- "ther. Yea mary, quoth the King, but by your leave Quintius, the price and recompence of trea- "chery and falſhood (if it ſhould come to that) is not all one for killing Philip and Phaneas: for "the Ætolians ſhould not find it ſo hard a matter to ſubſtitute another Pretor, as the Macedonians "to create another King in my room. This ſaid, there was not a word more to the point: while the Roman General thought it reaſon that he ſhould begin who ſought for a parle; and the King ſuppoſed it meet that it was his part to ſpeak firſt who ſhould give conditions, and not for him C that ſtood at receipt, and was to accept thereof. Then Quintius began and ſaid, that his ſpeech ſhould be plain and ſimple: for he would ſay no more, but propoſe only thoſe points, which if they might not be performed, there would be no peace upon any condition at all. Firſt, that the King muſt withdraw his garriſons out of all the Cities of Greece. Item, That he is to deliver up all the priſoners and fugitive revolts that he hath, unto the allies of the people of Rome. Item, That he reſtore again to the Romans all thoſe pieces in Illyricum, which after the peace concluded in Epirus, he had ſeized upon. Laſt of all, that he ſurrender unto Ptolomeus King of Ægypt, all thoſe Cities which he poſſeſſed himſelf of, after the death of Ptolome Philopator. Theſe (ſaith he) are the conditions, that I and the people of Rome do demand: but meet it is beſides, that you hear the de- D mands alſo of the allies. Then the Embaſſador or agent for King Attalus required, that the ſhips and captives which had been taken in the Sea-fight before Chius, ſhould be rendered, and that Nicephorium and the Temple of Venus, which he had pilled and ſpoiled, ſhould be reſtored as good and entire, as they were before. After him, the Rhodians made claim to Peræa (a country in the continent right over-againſt their Iſle, and an ancient appurtenance of their Seignory) and demanded withal, that the garriſons ſhould quit Iaſſus, Bargylla, and the City of the Euromenſians, and about Helleſpontus, likewiſe the Cities of Seſtos and Abydos. Item, that Panopolis ſhould be reſtored unto the Bizantins, with the ancient charter of their franchiſes and liberties. Finally, that all the Merchant Towns and Ports in Aſia might be freed from paying cuſtome. Then came upon him the Achæi, and challenged Corinth and Argi as their own. After them, when as Phaneas (the Pretor of the Ætolians) had demanded in a manner the ſame that the Romans had before; E namely, that the Kings forces ſhould depart out of Greece, adding moreover, that thoſe Cities ſhould be rendred unto the Ætolians which in times paſt belonged to their dominion and juriſdiction: then one of the heads of the Ætolians named Alexander an eloquent man among them, as any other, preſently inferred and ſaid; "That he had a long time ſitten ſtill, and opened not his "mouth, not becauſe he thought that in all this conference they would grow to any point or con- "cluſion, but for that he would not interrupt any of his allies in their ſpeech. And as for Philip, "quoth he, he dealeth not ſoundly and bona fide in treaties of peace, no more than ever heretofore "he hath managed his wars with vertue and true valour. For in all theſe parles and conferences "he layeth trains, and lieth to catch advantages: in war he never ſtriketh a battail in plain field, "nor cometh to cloſe fight hand to hand; but in his retreats and fights, burneth and ſacketh Ci- F "ties: and thus being himſelf vanquiſhed, ſpoileth and maketh havock of that which by right is "the due reward and recompence of conquerors. But the noble Macedonian Kings in old-time, "took no ſuch courſes. Their manner was to fight it out in open field, and to ſpare Cities and "Towns, all that ever poſſibly they could; to the end that their dominion might be more wealthy "and puiſſant. For what kind of policy is it, for him to ruinate and deſtroy utterly that, about the "poſſeſſion whereof he is in queſtion, and reſerve nothing for himſelf but only war? This Philip "the year paſt hath laid deſolate in Theſſalie more Cities of his allies there, than all the enemies "have done that ever Theſſalie had: and hath taken more from the Ætolians themſelves, while "he was a confederate friend with them, than all the time that he was their profeſsed enemy. He "hath ſeized upon Lyſimachia, expelled their Pretor, and chaſed out the garriſon of the Ætolians. G Chios alſo, a City under his own ſubjection he hath raſed, ſubverted and quite deſtroyed. By ſem- blable falſhood and deceit he is poſſeſſed of * Thebes in Phthia, Echinum, Larriſſa, and Pharſalus. Philip netled and galled at theſe words of Alexander, commanded that his ſhip ſhould approach neerer to the bank, to the end that himſelf might be better heard. And as he began to frame bitter invectives againſt the Ætolians principally, Phaneas cut him off, ſaying, That the quarrel was not to be decided by word, but with the ſword: and either he muſt win it by mere force, or yeeld obedience to the mightier. That is true, quoth Philip, and ſo evident, that a blind man may ſee it; jeſting jesting merily at Phaneas, who was troubled with a pair of bad eies. And given he was by nature H to be pleasantly conceited, yea, and fuller of his frumps, I wot than beseemed the Majesty of a King: so as many times even in treaty of serious matters and of great consequence, he could not forbear but make himself mery and laugh a good while. " Afterwards he fell to a fit of choler and " indignation, that the Ætolians should take upon them like Romans to command him out of " Greece, who if they were put to it, were not able upon their knowledge to set down the bounds " of Greece & limit how far it reached. For asmuch as the Agrei, the Apodeotes and Amphilochi, " which take up a great part of Ætolia, are not within Greece. And what just cause (quoth he) of " complaint have they, in that I have not spared some of their allies? Why? even they themselves

" hold this old custome for a law, namely, to permit their youth to take arms and serve against " their own allies. so they do it without the publick order and warrant from the State: and very I " often a man may see Ætolians in contrary armies, & come to aid as well the one side as the other.
" As for Chius it was not I that forced it; I did no more but aid Prusias my friend and ally, in the " siege and assault thereof. And as touching Lysimachia, I defended it against the Thracians: but " for asmuch as of necessity I was called away from the guard thereof unto this war, the Thraci-
" ans now hold it. Thus much by way of answer to the Ætolians. Now concerning Attalus and " the Rhodians, by right I owe them nothing: for it was not I but they, that began the war.
" Howbeit, for the honor that I bear to the Romans, I will make restitution to the Rhodians of " Peræa, and restore I will to Attalus the ships and the captives as many as are forth coming and " may be found. As for the restitution and making good again of Nicephorium and the Temple of " Venus, what answer should I return to them that demand it, but this, that I will endeavour and K " be at charge of planting new trees (which is the only way and means whereby groves and " woods that are cut down and fallen, may be recovered again) seeing that ye will needs have it,
" that Kings (forsooth) must commune and reason to and fro about such matters as these. In " the last place, he framed his speech to answer the Achæans: wherein, first he began with the " benefits and pleasures that Antigonus had done unto that nation; then, of the favours and good
" turns they had received from his own self; and with all he commanded their decrees and edicts
" to be read, containing all kind of honors as well divine as human: adding moreover the late
" and fresh revolt of their army from him: and albeit he inveighed sharply against their disloy" alty and treachery, yet he promised to render Argos unto them. As for Corinth, he would con" fer and consult with the Roman General, and demand of him, whether he thought it reason L
" that he should depart from those cities which he wan by arms, and held by right of conquest or " dispossels himself of those also, which he received from his progenitors as his lawful inheri" tance? The Acheans and Ætolians addressed themselves to answer those points; but the sun was welneer down: whereupon the conference was adjourned until the morrow. Philip retired to the harbor from whence he came, and the Romans with their allies to their camp. The day following, Quintius at the time appointed was ready before the City of Nicea (for that was thought a convenient place.) But Philip appeared not nor for the space of certain hours came there any at all from him, not so much as a messenger. Now when they were out of all hope of his repair thither, behold of a suddain his ships were descried. For himself he said by way of excuse, that considering how hard, how grievous and intolerable indignities were imposed upon him he had M employed all that day time until then in consultation, and could not resolve. But it was generally thought among them all that he had of purpose prolonged the time, and made it so late even toward evening, because the Achæans and Ætolians should have no leisure to answer unto him.
And this opinion of theirs himself confirmed, in that he requested that he alone might parly with the Roman General himself, and that all others should go aside and absent themselves; to the end they two might spend and lose no more time in debate and wrangling, but go briefly to the point, and make an end one way or other. This petition of his would not at first be accepted by Quintius, pretending that he would not have it seen that the allies were excluded out of the conference. But afterwards upon his importunat suit, by the advise of them all the Roman General together with Ap. Claudius a Colonel, when the rest were voided away, advanced forward N to the bank side: the King with the other two whom he had with him the day before came aland.
There after they had parled in secret together a certain time, they parted. What Philip related unto his company is not certainly known: but Quintius made report unto his allies of their conference in this wise: namely, that Philip was content to quit the whole coast and tract of Illyricum, for the Romans to enter upon. Item, to send back all the traitorous renegats, and as many captives as were to be found. Item, to redeliver unto Attalus the ships and the mariners taken prisoners therein. Item to render unto the Rhodians the country of Peræa: but in no wise to be disseised of Iassus and Bargylia. Item, to deliver unto the Ætolians Pharsalus and Larissa but not Thebes in any case. Last of all, to part not only with Argos but with Corinth also, for the behoof of the Achæans. There was not one of them all well pleased a this limitation and setting out of particular parts, which he would deliver, and which he would not. For in this reckoning & account O they should be more losers than winners. For unless (say they) he remove his forces and garrisons out of all Greece throughout, he will never cease to give or take occasions of quarrel. As they all cried out from the whole assembly to this effect, their high voyce was heard of Philip, albeit he stood aloof. Wherupon he requested Quintius to refer the whole matter once more unto the next day; and then certainly without fail, he would either perswade him and his allies and bring them

A to his mind, or elſe would come off and ſuffer himſelf to be perſwaded and over-ruled by them. The place of meeting was appointed upon the ſtrand near Thronium: and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip firſt and foremoſt, beſought both Quintius and all thoſe that were preſent, not to diſturb the hope of peace, but that it might come to ſome effect: and in concluſion, craved time wherein he might ſend his Embaſſadours unto the Senat of Rome; aſſuring them, that if he could not obtain peace under thoſe articles abovesaid, he would accept of any other conditions, which it ſhould pleaſe the Senat to put upon him. All the reſt miſliked hereof, ſuppoſing that he ſought for nothing elſe but delayes and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintius inferred again, That well it might ſo be and a truth indeed that they alledged, if it were ſummer time and a ſeaſon fit for war and martial exploits: but now, conſider-
B ing winter was at hand, they could loſe nothing by granting him reſpite to addreſs an embaſſage. For neither (qd. he) will any capitulation and compoſition which we ſhould make with Philip ſtand good and firm without the approbation of the Senat: and in this one winter (when of neceſſity we muſt surceaſe from war) it may be known what the Senate by their authority will approve. To this advice the chief of the confederats accorded, and therein reſted. So there was a ceſſation of arms for two moneths granted: in which mean time it was thought good, that each of them likewiſe ſhould diſpatch one Embaſſador to advertiſe the Senate, to take heed they were not over-raught by the ſubtilty and fraud of the King. But provided it was in the covenant of the truce aforeſaid, That incontinently the Kings garriſons ſhould void the territories of Phocis and Locris. Quintius alſo himſelf ſent (together with the Embaſſadors of the allies) Amynander King
C of the Athamans; and to make the embaſſage more honourable, Q. Fabius (his own wives ſiſters ſon) Q. Fulvius and P. Claudius accompanied the King.

When they were arrived at Rome, the Embaſſadours of the allies had audience given them before thoſe that were ſent from King Philip. Moſt of their ſpeeches were ſpent in raiſing againſt the King: but in this one point they moſt of all moved the Senat to give ear unto them, namely, when they deſcribed by demonſtration (as in a map) the ſituation of thoſe countries as well by Land as Sea, that all men might plainly ſee, that if the King might hold in his hands the City Demetrias in Theſſalie, Chalcis in Euboea, and Corinth in Achaia, Greece could not poſſibly be at liberty, conſidering that Philip himſelf was wont to term them (no leſs truly than tauntingly) The ſhackles and fetters of Greece. After them were the Kings Embaſſadors permitted to enter into the Se nat-
D houſe: and having begun to make a long Oration, their ſpeech was cut off with this one brief and ſhort interrogatory, Whether Philip would quit thoſe three Cities aforeſaid, or no? Whereunto they made this anſwer, That they had no expreſs warrant in their commiſſion touching that matter by name. So the Kings Embaſſadors were ſent away without concluſion of any peace: and Quintius had full authority to determine of war or peace at his pleaſure. Who ſeeing plainly by this, that the Senat was not weary of war, and being himſelf more deſirous of victory than peace, he would never after grant Philip any more parlies, but gave him to underſtand, that he would admit no other embaſſage from him, but that which ſhould bring him news of his departure quite out of Greece.

Philip ſeeing no other way now but that he muſt needs fight and trie the iſſue by a main bat-E tail, and that he was to gather his forces together from all parts: being perplexed moſt of all for the Cities of Achaia (a countrey far remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth; he thought it beſt policy to make it over (as it were upon truſt) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, upon condition, That if he obtained the victory, Nabis ſhould deliver it up unto him again; but if ought ſhould come to him but well, then Nabis himſelf to have and hold it as his own. Unto Philocles, Governor of Corinth and Argi he diſpatcheth his letters, That he ſhould himſelf in perſon commune with the tyrant above-named about it. Philocles, beſides that he came now with a preſent, added moreover of his own head (for the better aſſurance and pawn of amity between the tyrant and the King) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Nabis his ſons. The tyrant refuſed at the firſt to accept of that City, F unleſs he were ſent for, by a decree of the Argives themſelves to come for to aid the City. But afterwards when he heard ſay, That in a frequent aſſembly there, they not only rejected him, but alſo deteſted and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an execrable abhomination; ſuppoſing now that he had a good occaſion and quarrel offered to make a ſpoil of them, he willed Philocles to deliver the City unto him when he would. So the tyrant was received into the Town in the night ſeaſon, without the privity and knowledge of any perſon: and by break of day he ſeiſed upon all the higher places. The gates were ſhut, and few of the principal heads in the beginning of the tumult made ſhift to eſcape. Thoſe that were abſent had their houſes ranſacked and their goods pilled: as many as were preſent, had all their gold and ſilver taken from them; beſides, great ſums of money were impoſed upon them to be paid. They that made ſpeed and G were not long about it, but tendred ready coin, were let go without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but ſuch as were ſuſpected either to hide or keep ought back, were mangled and tortured like bondſlaves. After this, he aſſembled the people together and publiſhed two Laws; the one, for croſſing all debt-books and cancelling obligations: the other, for diviſion of Lands among the people by the poll: two fire-brands to ſerve their turn that ſeek for change and alteration in a State; enough to ſet on fire the Commons againſt the Nobles and chief of a City.

When

When the City of Argos was thus brought in ſubjection under Nabis, the tyrant never remembring at whoſe hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, ſent Embaſſadors to Elatia unto Quintius, likewiſe to Attalus wintring then in Ægina, certifying them, That Argos was in his hands and at his devotion; and if Quintius would repair thither to parle with him, he doubted not but they two ſhould agree well enough in every point. Quintius granted to come thither, to the end, that by this means he might diſfurniſh Philip of that garriſon: and he ſent likewiſe to Attalus, willing him, that he would depart from Ægina and meet him at Sicyone: himſelf looſed from Anticyra, and with ten Galeaces called Quinqueremes; which (as hap was) L. Quintius his brother ſome dayes before had put to ſea out of the wintring harbor of Corcyra, croſſed over to Sicyone. Now was Attalus there already, who making remonſtrance unto Quintius, That it became a tyrant to come unto a Roman General, and not a Roman General to go unto a tyrant, induced Quintius to condeſcend unto his opinion, and not to enter the City of Argos. Not far from the City is a place called Mycenica, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quintius came to the place, accompanied with his brother and certain Colonels. Attalus was guarded with his Princely and Royal train. Nicoſtratus the Prætor of the Achæans repaired thither, attended with ſome few auxiliary ſouldiers: and there they found the tyrant expecting their coming with all his forces. And armed as he was, with his guard likewiſe armed he advanced himſelf into the midſt (well neer) of the plain that lay between. Quintius unarmed came forward with his brother and two Colonels. King Attalus likewiſe between the Prætor of the Achæans of the one hand and a courtiour of his on the other, both unarmed. The tyrant began the ſpeech with an excuſe, That being in arms and attended with a guard of armed men, he preſented himſelf to a parle ſeeing the General of the Romans and King Attalus unarmed: and ſaid that he ſtood not in fear of them but of certain exiled perſons of the Argives. After this, when they came to treat as touching the conditions and covenants for the contract of an amity, Quintius the General demanded two things: the one, That Nabis would make an end of warring with the Achæi: the other, That he would ſend with him certain aids againſt Philip. And verily to ſend ſuccour he granted: and in lieu of peace he was content there ſhould be a truce, until the war with Philip was diſpatched. Alſo about Argos King Attalus began to enter into ſome queſtion ſaying: That having the City treacherouſly betrayed unto him by Philocles, he now held it by force of arms: but he anſwered again, That he was ſent for by the Argives themſelves, for to protect them. Then the King required that the Argives might be aſſembled together, that he might know the truth. The tyrant made no denial thereof. The King replied again, that the aſſembly ſhould be free, and at their liberty to ſpeak, and to that effect the garriſons were to be removed out of the City, and no Lacedemonians intermingled among them; to the end that the Argives might frankly ſpeak their mind. But the tyrant flatly denied to withdraw from thence the guards. So this arguing came to no concluſion, and the conference brake up, after that the tyrant had given the Roman General 600 Candiots, and a truce made for the term of four moneths, between Nicoſtratus Prætor of the Achæans, and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. From thence Quintius departed to Corinth, and approached the gate with a Regiment of Cretenſians, that it might appear to Philocles the Kings Captain there that the tyrant was revolted from Philip. Philocles alſo entred into a parle with the Roman General and when he was exhorted by him to depart out of hand and yeeld the City, he returned ſuch an anſwer unto him, that he ſeemed rather to defer, than to deny the thing. From Corinth Quintius croſſed the Sea to Anticyra, from whence he ſent his brother to ſound the nation of the Acarnanians. And Attalus departed directly from Argos to Sicyone. Where the City not only encreaſed the ancient honours of the King, with the addition of new: but alſo the King over and beſides that he had purchaſed for them in time paſt the ſacred land of Apollo, with a great ſum of money, becauſe he would not ſeem now alſo to paſs by this friend City allied unto him, without ſome royal bounty and munificence, he gave freely unto them ſix talents of ſilver, and 10000 Medimns of corn: and ſo returned to his ſhips at Cenchreæ. Nabis alſo having ſtrengthened the garriſon in Argos returned to Lacedæmon: and after himſelf had robbed the men of their mony and goods, he ſent his wife thither to do the like by the women. Who ſending for the honourable & worſhipful dames of the City inviting them one by one to her houſe, and otherwhiles many together at once ſuch as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatning gat from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end ſtript off their apparel alſo, and all the jewels and ornaments that they wore.

adjoyning in thoſe quarters to Acarnania. There was a ſtreight paſs or gullet there, half a mile almoſt in length, but not half a mile in breadth: at the end of this ſtreight ſtandeth the City Leucas planted againſt an hill that turneth to the Eaſt, and looketh toward Acarnania. The baſe Town is built upon a plain, reaching along the ſea that divideth Leucadia from Acarnania. Whereupon the City as well on the land ſide, as by ſea, is eaſie to be forced. For the foords of the water reſemble a ſtanding lake rather than a Sea, and the whole ſoil is a light earth, minable and eaſy to be wrought into, ſo that in many places at once the walls either undermined or ſhaken with the ram, came tumbling down. But as the Town it ſelf was aſſaultable, ſo the hearts of the Townſmen were in-C vincible. For night and day they gave not over, to repair the cracks of the ſhaken wal, to fill up the open breaches and ruins, to make head luſtily, and skirmiſh with the enemy, and rather to defend the walls by force of arms, than to ſave themſelves by ſtrength of their walls. And ſurely a longer ſiege they would have made of it than the Romans hoped, but that certain baniſhed perſons, Italians born, dwelling in Leucas let in and received armed ſouldiers on the Caſtle ſide. Howbeit, the Leucadians embattelling themſelves in their market place, encountred them as they ran down from the higher ground with a great cry and noiſe, and maintained battel with them for a long time. In this mean while, the walls in diverſe places were ſcaled with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heaps of ſtones that lay at the breaches, entred the Town. And now by this time the Lieu-D tenant in perſon, with many companies environed them as they fought: ſome ſlain in the midſt, others flung away their weapons, and yeelded to the conquerour. After few dayes, upon the news of the field fought at Cynocephalæ, all the States of Acarcania came in, and ſubmitted themſelves to the Lientenant.

At the ſame time, whiles fortune turned thus about, and bare down a ſide all at once; the Rhodians alſo ſent out Panſiſtratus their Pretor, with 800 footmen of Achæa & about 1900 ſouldiers well armed, gathered out of all ſorts of auxiliaries, to regain and reconquer from Philip the country of Perea, lying in the main and firm land, which had been held ſometime, and poſſeſſed by their anceſtours. And theſe aids were compounded and mixed of French, Niſuets, Piſuets, Tanians, and Areans of Affrick, and Laodiceans of Aſia. With theſe forces Panſiſtratus encamped in the ter-
E ritory of Stratonicea, and there he ſeized of a commodious place, and very good for his purpoſe, unwares to the Kings company that had holden the ſame. Thither came alſo to aid them in very good time, a Regiment of a 1000 foot and a 100 horſe of Achæans, levied for that purpoſe, and were commanded by Theoxenus. Dinocrates a Captain under the King, willing to recover the ſaid hold again, firſt pitched his tents, hard againſt the enemies camp. But afterwards he removed to another fort in the territory likewiſe of Stratonicea, which they call Aſtragon: and having rallied together all the garriſons diſperſed aſunder in divers places, and ſent for the auxiliary bands alſo of Theſſalians, even from Stratonicea, he took his way and marched toward Alabanda, where the enemies were. The Rhodians likewiſe for their part were ready for battel, and after they were encamped of both ſides neer together, immediatly they entred into the field to fight it out. Dinocrates placed in the right point 500 Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the left, in the main bat-
F tel he beſtowed all thoſe that he had gathered together out of the garriſons belonging to the forts aboveſaid, who for the moſt part were Carians, the points he flanked round about with his corners of Horſe. The Rhodian cohort was marſhalled in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candiots and Thracians kept the right point, the hired ſouldiers (and they were a power of elect footmen) ſtood in the left, in the midſt were the aids (a mixture of many nations:) the Cavalry and all the light armed ſouldiers that were, compaſſed the corners like wings. All that day the two armies ſtood only upon the bank of a brook which ran between them with a ſmall and ſhallow water: and after ſome looſe ſhot diſcharged, they retired into their tents. The next day they were ranged in like order, and ſtruck a battail exceeding the proportion of their number; for on each ſide there were not above three thouſand foot, and upon a hundred horſe: but they were even G matched not in number only and armour, but alſo in equal courage and hope alike. The Achæi firſt paſſed over the ſaid brook, and charged upon the Agrians: afterwards the whole army ran as one would ſay, over the River. The fight continued long doubtful. The Achæi being of themſelves in number a thouſand, diſordred ſome four hundred of the other, and forced them to retreat, and afterwards the entire right point of the battail began to ſhrink and give ground. As for the Macedonians, ſo long as their battaillon called Phalanx, kept their array and ſtood cloſe together, could not poſſibly be ſtirred or removed; but after their left ſide was laid naked, and they began to reach out on an all hands their long pikes against the enemy, charging them across upon H the flank, they were presently troubled: and first they put themselves in disarray, afterwards they turned their backs, and last of all flung their weapons from them, and ran away for life, until they were come to Bargilia. Thither also was Dinocrates fled. The Rhodians having followed the chase as long as they had any day to see, retired into their camp. And for certain it is known, if in this train of victory they had presently made speed to Stratonicea, they might have been masters of the Town, and never drawn sword for it: but whiles they spent time in recovering the burrough Towns and forts of Perœa, they let this opportunity slip out of their hands, and lost it for ever. For in the mean space, they that lay in garrison and held Stratonicea, were encouraged, and took better heart. Dinocrates also anon with those forces of his that remained, put himself within the walls. Then was the Tower besieged and assailed, all in vain, neither could it be forced and won I but by Antiochus, a certain time after. Thus went the affairs in Thessalie, in Achæa, and in Asia, much about one and the self-same time.

Philip being advertised that the Dardanians were entred within the confines of his realm, and wasted the high country of Macedony, albeit he saw that almost in all parts of the world unhappy fortune still followed and coursed both him and his whereseever they were: yet esteeming it more grievous and heavy than death it self to be disseized of the possession of Macedony also, he made a levy in great hast out of all his cities of six thousand foot, and 500 horse; with which power of Macedonians, he suddainly surprised the enemy (unprovided and not aware of his coming) about Stobi in * Pelagonia. Great numbers of men were slain in conflict, but more in the fields, such as were disbanded, and ranged abroad for greedines of booty and pillage. But as many as could K make means to flie more readily and easily away, never stood out the tryal of a battail, but returned home into their own countrey. Having thus put life as it were again into his men by this one expedition and exploit (a matter of no consequence to the total adventure of his whole estate) he retired himself to Thessalonica.

The Punick war was not atchieved and brought to an end so happily and in so good a time for the Romans (who otherwise should have warred at once both against the Carthaginians and Philip) but it fell out as well and in as fit a season, that Philip was now vanquished; just against the time that Antiochus in Syria prepared to levy war against them. For besides that the service was much more easily managed against them single and apart, than it would have been if they had banded both at once, and brought their forces together, it chanced also that Spain about the very L same instant brake out to a tumultuous insurrection.

Antiochus being returned to Antioch there to winter, after he had the summer before brought under his subjection all the Cities belonging to Ptolomæus, within the country of * Cœle-Syria, was yet never the more at quiet, and mindful of peace afterwards. For when he had assembled a puissant power both of Land and also of Sea-forces, and purposed to employ the whole strength of his realm, he sent afore by Land in the beginning of the spring, his two sons Ardues and Mithridates with a mighty army, commanding them to attend him at Sardis: himself in person set forth a Voyage by Sea, with a fleet of a hundred sail of covert ships with decks and hatches, besides two hundred lighter Vessels, as Galions and Brigantins, purposing at one time to assay all the Cities in * Cilicia and Caria, coasting along the Sea side, which were within the Dominion of M Ptolomæus: and withal to aid Philip as well with shipping as souldiers, for as yet Philip was not utterly subdued, nor the war with him brought to a final end. Many brave and worthy exploits enterprised the Rhodians both by Sea and Land, in their loyalty and faithfulnes to the Romans, and for the safeguard and defence of all the Greekish Nation. But no one thing shewed their magnificence more than this, that being nothing terrified at that time with such a World of wars threatned against them, they sent Embassadors to the King, to let him understand, that if he sailed forward and stayed not his Armado, they would encounter him at the Bay of Nephelis (which is a promontory or Cape of Cilicia, renowned for the ancient league of the Athenians.) And this they did, not upon any hatred they bare to his person, but to impeach him only for coming to join with Philip, thereby to hinder the Romans in their good course of setting Greece at liberty. N At the same time Antiochus was busied in the siege and assault of Coracesium, against which he had placed all ordnance and engins of battery: for he was already master of the Cities of * Zephyrium, Soli, * Aphrodisias and * Corycus, and having doubled the point of * Anemurium (a Cape or forland also of Cilicia) he had won likewise the City of * Selinus. All these, and many other forts of that coast being yeelded unto him by composition, either for fear or willingly, without any assault. only Coracesium shut their gates against him, and staid his progres beyond his expectation. There the Embassadors of the Rhodians had audience. And albeit that embassie was such as might have set a King into a fit of choler and chafed his bloud, yet he tempred his anger, and made answer that he would send his Embassadors to Rhodes, and give them in charge to renew the ancient rights and privileges as well of his own as of his ancestours with that City and State, O and to will them not to stand in fear of the Kings coming, for that neither they nor any allies of theirs should sustain harm or damage by him. For it was no part of his meaning to infringe and break the amity which he had with the Romans, as it may appear as well by his late embassie sent unto them, as also by the honorable decrees and answers made by the Senat and sent unto him. For it fortuned that even then the Embassadors of King Antiochus were returned from Rome, having had a friendly audience there, and a gracious dispatch, according as the time required:

* Bocca, or Bocalbalbec.

* Turcomania, and Finichia.

* Scendelovo.
* S. Theodoro.
Curcu, or Chavachisar.
* Stalemura.
* Iſlenos.

A quired: for as yet the iſſue of the war againſt Philip was uncertain. Whiles the Kings Embaſſadors delivered theſe points in the aſſemby of the Rhodians, there arrived a poſt with news, that the war was ended by means of a victory atchieved by the Romans againſt Philip at Cynoſcephale. Theſe tidings being once heard, the Rhodians paſt all fear now of Philip were of advice to meet Antiochus at ſea with their navy. For they had a ſecond care beſides which they neglected not, to maintain the liberty of thoſe allied Cities pertaining to King Ptolomy, againſt which war was menaced from Antiochus. Some they ſuccoured with ſending aide unto them, and others by forecaſt and giving them warning of the deſignments and enterpriſes of their enemies: whereby they were a cauſe, that the Caunii, Myndii, they of Halicarnaſſus and Samos enjoyed ſtill their B entire freedom. But needleſs it is for me, to proſecute all the occurrents and affairs that paſſed in theſe parts, conſidering how I ſhall have enough to do, and hardly be able to ſet down and go through with thoſe that properly concern the Roman war. At the ſame time alſo King Attalus was brought ſick from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this world in the ſeventeenth year of his age, when he had reigned forty four. This man was beholden to fortune for nothing elſe but riches, that might commend him to the hope of a kingdom. He employed the ſame with ſuch wiſdome and magnificence, that firſt in his own conceit, and afterwards in the judgment of others, he was not thought unworthy to be a King. Afterwards when he had vanquiſhed in one battell the Gauls (a nation at that time newly arrived in Aſia, and therefore the more dread and terrible) he took upon him to be ſtiled King, and ever after carried a mind anſwerable to the grandeur and Majeſty of that name. His own ſubjects he governed with ſingular
C juſtice. To his allies he ſhewed himſelf moſt faſt and faithfull. His friends he uſed with all kindneſs and bounty. A wife and four children he had living when himſelf died: and left his kingdom ſo ſure and well ſetled, that the poſſeſſion thereof continued firm to the third diſcent and generation after him.

Whiles things ſtood thus in Aſia, Greece, and Macedony, and the war with Philip ſcarcely ended, or at leaſtwiſe peace not fully concluded, there aroſe a mighty war in the Province of Spain beyond the river Iberus. M. Helvius at that time was governor there, who by his letters adverti-
D ſed the Senat, That Colcas and Luſcinus, two Princes in thoſe parts, were gone out, and had taken arms; that with Colcas there banded ſeventeen towns, and with Luſcinus the ſtrong and puiſſant Cities Cardo and Bardo; that the whole ſea coaſt, which hitherto by open revolt ſhewed not their rebellious heart, would doubtleſs upon the commotion of thoſe their neighbours, make likewiſe an inſurrection together with them. After theſe letters were read by M. Sergius the Prætor, who had the juriſdiction between Citizens and aliens, the LL. of the Senat ordained, that after the election of new Prætors was paſt, he to whoſe lot the government of Spain fell, ſhould propoſe unto the Senat in all convenient ſpeed as touching the war in Spain.

About that very time the Conſuls repaired to Rome, (from their Provinces) who held an aſſemby of the Senat in the Temple of Bellona: and when they demanded triumph in conſideration of their good ſervice, and happy exploits in war atchieved: C. Atinius Labeo and C. Urſanius, Tribunes of the Commons required, That the Conſuls ſhould ſpeak ſeverally by themſelves, con-E cerning triumph: for ſuffer them they would not joyntly to propound that thing in the houſe, to the end, that equall and ſemblable honour ſhould not be conferred upon perſons of unlike quality, worth, and deſert. And when Minutius inferred again and ſaid, That the Province of Italy fell unto them both in one commiſſion, and Cornelius ſeconded him withall, averring, That he and his companion in government had managed all their affairs with one mind by common counſell and advice; that the Boians who paſſed over the river Po againſt him for to ſuccour the Inſubrians, and Cænomans, were forced to turn back again to defend their own, by reaſon that the other Conſul his Collegue made ſuch waſte and pillage in their fields and villages. The Tribunes confeſſed that Cornelius indeed had atchieved ſo worthy exploits in war, that there was no more doubt to be made of his triumph, than of rendring praiſe and thanks to the immortall
F gods: but neither he nor any other Citizen ſtood ever at any time in ſuch grace, favour, and credit, that having obtained the honour of a triumph for himſelf, he ſhould impart that glory unto his Collegue and fellow, if he were ſo ſhameleſs as to crave it. As for Q. Minutius (ſay they) he made ſome ſleight skirmiſhes with the Ligurians not worth the talking of: mary in France he loſt a good number of his ſouldiers. And with that they named T. Juventius and Cneus the brother of Labeo, two Colonels of Tribunes of the camp, who were ſlain in an unfortunate battel, with many a brave and hardy man beſides, as well Citizens as allies. And to conclude, there were G ſome few towns and villages colourably yielded and rendred up for the time, without any aſſurance and ſecurity. Theſe janglings and debates between the Conſuls and the Tribunes continued for two daies: but in the end, the Conſuls being overcome with the importunity of the Tribunes, were content to propoſe the matter diſtinctly by themſelves. And with the generall voice and accord of all, a triumph was decreed for Cn. Cornelius. The Placentins alſo and men of Cremona, were a great cauſe that this Conſul found more favour; by reaſon that they gave thanks, and reported on his behalf, that they were delivered by his good means from the ſiege, yea, and moſt of them recovered from ſervitude out of the hands of their enemies. Q. Minutius having only caſt a proffer and made an aſſay of propoſing his cauſe to the Senat, ſeeing them wholly banded and ſet againſt him, ſaid aloud, That in maintenance of Conſular authority, and by vertue of that place, yea, and according to the good examples of divers noble and renowned perſonages, he would triumph, and aske them no leave, in the mount Alban. But Cn. Cornelius whiles he was ſtill in office, triumphed over the Inſubrians and Cænomans. He carried in pomp before him a number of military enſigns: he cauſed great ſtore of French ſpoil and pillage to paſs in a pageant upon charriots taken from the enemies. Many Noblemen of France were led in a ſhew before his own triumphant chariot: among whom (as ſome write) was Amilcar Generall of the Carthaginians. But above all others, the goodlieſt ſight was, a number of Coloners and inhabitants of Cremona and Placentia, who with * bonets or caps of liberty on their heads followed his chariot. He bare in triumph 237500 Seſterces, 7900 Bigats of ſilver coin. He divided among his horſemen ſeventy Aſſes apeece, to every horſeman he gave double, and to each Centurion trebble ſo much. Q. Minutius likewiſe triumphed in mount Alban over the Ligurians and the Boians in Gaul. The honour of this triumph as it was leſs, in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his acts, as alſo becauſe all men knew full well, that the charges went not out of the common Cheſt or Camber of the City: ſo for number of enſigns, of chariots and ſpoils gained from the enemies, it was in manner equall and comparable to the other. And of money he brought well-near as much as Cornelius: for of braſs coin he had in ſhew 254000 Aſſes, of ſilver coin in Bigat peeces 53200. To common ſouldiers or footmen, to Centurions and horſemen, he gave as much as his Collegue. After this triumph there was a generall aſſembly held for the election of Magiſtrats: wherein were created Conſuls, L. Furius Purpurio, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after theſe Prætors were choſen, Q. Fabius Butco, T. Sempronius Longus, Q. Minutius Thermus, M. Acilius Glabrio, L. Apuſtius Fullo and C. Lælius.

* In token that they were by him freed from captivity.

In the end of that former year, letters came from T. Quintius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battell ranged with King Philip within Theſſaly, where the army of the enemies was defeated and put to rout. Theſe letrers were firſt read in the Senat by Sergius the Prætor, and then by order from the LL. in the publike aſſembly of the people. For this happy ſucceſs, it was ordained, That there ſhould be ſolemn proceſſions for five daies. Shortly after there arrived Embaſſadors both from T. Quintius, and alſo from the King. The Macedonian Embaſſadors were brought without the City to the place or hamlet called Villa publica, where they were appointed their lodging, rich preſents were given them, and allowed they were the charges for themſelves and their train. In the Temple of Bellona the Senat was aſſembled, where there paſſed not many words by reaſon that the Macedonians promiſed, That the King ſhould perform whatſoever the Senat would ſet down. So (according to the ancient cuſtome and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegats, by whore advice and counſell T. Quintius the Generall, was to preſent and tender unto Philip, articles and conditions of peace: provided, that in the ſaid number of Delegats, P. Sulpitius and P. Valerius ſhould be compriſed by name; who when they were Conſuls governed the Province of Macedony. The ſame day, the Coſſans demanded and made ſuit, That the number of their Coloners or inhabitants might be augmented: whereupon an order was granted, That there ſhould be a thouſand new enrolled to the former: with this proviſo, that in this number none of them ſhould be matriculated, who after the Conſulſhip of P. Sulpitius and P. Villius had been enemies to the people of Rome. The Roman games and plaies were that year exhibited as well in the Circus as upon the ſtage in the Theatre, by the Ædiles Curule L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Volſo: which, as they were ſet out with more ſtate and magnificence than ever before, ſo they were beheld with more joy, contentment and pleaſure, in regard that all things fell out ſo fortunatly in the wars: and they were renewed and repreſented all thrice over. As for the plaies called Plebeii, they were ſet forth no leſs than ſeven times one after another. Acilius Glabrio and C. Lælius exhibited thoſe paſtimes: who alſo of their ſilver that aroſe of fines and forfeitures, cauſed three caſt images of braſs to be made, and erected them to the honour of Ceres, Liber, and * Libera.

Now when L. Furius and M. Claudius Marcellus were entred into their Magiſtracy, and after queſtion made concerning their Provinces, the Senat paſſed a decree, That both of them joyntly ſhould govern Italy; they requeſted that they might caſt lots for Macedony and Italy together. Marcellus more deſirous of the twain of the Province of Macedony, alledged, that the peace was not ſound but counterfeit, pretended, and deceitfull; and that the King would take arms and war again, in caſe the army were withdrawn from thence: by which words he put the LL. of the Senat into a deep ſtudy and ſuſpence, what to do, or to think of it. And haply the Conſuls had obtained their requeſt, but that Q. Martius Rex, and C. Atinius Labeo, two Tribunes of the Commons, proteſted, that they would oppoſe themſelves and croſs it by their negative voice, unleſs they might firſt propoſe unto the people to know, Whether their will and pleaſure was to entertain peace with King Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capitoll before the people, was granted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirty, every one gave their affirmative voice, Uti rogaſtis [i.e. So be it as ye demanded.] And to the end, that all men might have more cauſe to rejoyce that peace was confirmed with Macedony, there came heavy news out of Spain, and letters were divulged abroad, containing thus much, That C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Vice-Prætor in the hither Province of Spain, was vanquiſhed in battell, that his army was diſcomfited and put to flight, and divers men of name and mark ſlain. That Tuditanus himſelf was carried forth of the conflict grievouſly wounded, and ſoon after died. The Province of Italy was aſſigned for both the Conſuls with thoſe two legions which the former Conſuls had in charge, and order

A order granted, that they ſhould levy and enroll four new legions, whereof two ſhould be ſent whither it pleaſed the Senat to appoint. And T. Quintius Flamininus was commanded to rule his Province ſtill with the ſame army, and his Commiſſion of longer government was renewed. After this, the Prætors caſt lots for the parting of their Provinces. L. Apuſtius Fullo obtained the juriſdiction of the Citizens of Rome, and M. Acilius Glabreo was L. Chief Juſtice between Citizens and forrainers. Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of the baſe or farther Spain, and Q. Minutius Thermus of the higher or hither Spain. To C. Lælius fell Sicily, and Sardinia to T. Sempronius Longus. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fabius Buteo, and Q. Minutius, to whom the rule of the Provinces in Spain befell, the Conſuls ſhould out of thoſe four legions which they had enrolled, deliver one legion apeece, which they thought good and of allies and of the Latine nation, four B thouſand footmen beſides, and three hundred horſemen to either of them. And theſe Prætors were enjoyned to go to their charges with all ſpeed poſſible.

The war in Spain began afreſh, in the fifth after that the former together with the Punick war was ended. But before that theſe Prætors went forth to this war (which may be counted as it were new, in regard that the Spaniards now firſt, and never before, warred in their own proper name, without either leader or army of Carthage) and before that the Conſuls themſelves departed out of the City, order was given, that according to the old cuſtome they ſhould provide for the prodigious tokens that were reported. L. Julius as he rode on horſeback into the Sabins country, was both himſelf and his horſe under him ſtrucken dead with lightning. The temple of Feronia in the territory of Capena, was likewiſe ſmitten and blaſted from heaven. At the Temple of C Moneta, the Iron heads of two ſpears were ſent to burn on a light fire. A Wolf happned to enter into the City at the gate Eſquilina, and ran through the moſt populous part thereof as far as unto the market place, and ſo forward to the Tuſcan ſtreet, and from thence through the Velium, and paſſed forth again at the gate Capena untouched, and in manner without taking any harm.

Theſe prodigious ſigns were purged by the ſacrifices of greater beaſts. At the ſame time Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who had governed the Province of high Spain before Tuditanus, entred the City by order from the Senat in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pomp 1515 pound weight of gold: of ſilver likewiſe in bullion 20000 pound weight: and in coin 34550 deniers. L. Stertinius from the nether Spain, brought into the treaſury 50000 pound weight of ſilver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtain a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and ſpoiles D won from the enemies, he cauſed two arches to be erected in the beaſt market, even before the Temple of Fortune, and the goddeſs Matuta: and one beſides in the grand Cirque or ſhew-place. And upon theſe arches he ſet up guilded Statues. Theſe were all the affairs, to ſpeak of, that paſſed this winter-ſeaſon.

There wintered at that time in Athens Quintius. And among many other ſuters that came unto him with their petitions, the Bœotians exhibited a requeſt, and obtained the ſame, to wit, that as many of their nation as had ſerved in the wars under Philip, might be reſtored and ſent home again unto them: which was eaſily granted by Quintius, not ſo much, for that he thought them worthy of that favour, but becauſe he was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Roman name, now eſpecially that he had ſome doubt of King Antiochus. They were E not delivered ſo ſoon, but ſeen it was, how little the Bœotians would be beholding to him for it. For they ſent preſently unto Philip, and gave him thanks for the rendring of thoſe men, as if they had been delivered by him, and not by Quintius and the Romans. And in their next aſſembly generall for their ſolemn election, they choſe one Barcillas for their Bœotarches, or Lord governour of Bœotia; for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had been the Colonell of thoſe Bœotians that bare arms for the King: but they paſſed by Zeuſippus, Piſiſtratus, and others, that had perſwaded to make a league with the Romans. This wrought diſcontentment in theſe perſons for the preſent, and fear for the time to come. For thus they reaſoned with themſelves, If they would do thus while the Roman army lay encamped near to their gates, what ſhould become of them when the Romans were departed into Italy, and whiles Philip was ſo near at hand to aſſiſt thoſe F that ſided with him, and to annoy thoſe of the adverſe part and faction? Therefore they complotted and concluded in the end to make away Barcillas, the head of the Kings bend, whiles the Roman forces were at hand. And ſo chuſing a convenient and fit opportunity for their purpoſe, at what time as he returned homeward drunk from a publike ſolemn feaſt, accompanied with certain pleaſant and effeminat perſons, who to make ſport and mirth had been at that great feaſt; he was forelaied and beſet with ſix armed men, whereof three were Italians, and three Ætolians, and ſo murdered. His train that attended him ran away, and raiſed hue and cry, and called for help. Much trouble and hurly-burly there was throughout the City, much running to and fro with torch-light. But they that did the deed were eſcaped out at the next gate. In the morning betimes the people in great number aſſembled in the Theater, being called together by the voice G of the common Beadle, as if the murderers had been detected. Openly it was in every mans mouth, that he was killed by his own retinue, even thoſe filthy wanton perſons that he had about him: but ſecretly in their minds they deemed Zeuſippus the author of the murther. For the preſent it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his train, and that they ſhould be examined. Whiles ſearch was made for them, Zeuſippus came forth into the aſſembly, with the like intent to avert all ſuſpition of crime from himſelf, ſaying, that men were much deceived to think that ſo horrible and ſtrange a murder was committed by ſuch weaklings & perſons as they were.

This he argued and diſcourſed by many likelihoods and probabilities to the ſame effect; by which means ſome were verily perſwaded, that if himſelf had been guilty of the fact, he would never have offered and preſented himſelf in the face of the aſſembly, or broached any words at all of the murder, eſpecially when no man urged him thereto. Others there were again, who made no doubt but by this impudent face, his drift was to prevent an accuſation, and to turn away all ſuſpition from himſelf. The innocent and guiltleſs creatures within a while after being examined upon the rack and tortured, knowing what was the general opinion and conceit of men, made their uſe of the ſame for to bolt out and reveal the fact; and ſo they named Zeuſippus and Piſiſtratus for the principals; without any preſumption or light given how they ſhould ſeem to come to the knowledge of any thing. Howbeit Zeuſippus accompanied with one Stratonidas) fled by night to Tanagra, fearing the remorſe and prick of his own conſcience more than the appeaching and information of thoſe perſons who neither were party nor privy to any thing. But Piſiſtratus making no regard of theſe accuſers, remained ſtill at Thebes. Now had Zeuſippus one bondſlave, (whoſe hand was in all this action, and had been a courrier between) whom Piſiſtratus feared that he would bewray him, and by that very fear cauſed him to open and declare the whole matter. He diſpatched therefore his letters unto Zeuſippus, adviſing him to rid that ſlave out of the way, who was privy to their dealing; advertiſing him, that in his conceit he was not ſo meet to conceal the thing now done, as he was a fit inſtrument at the time to execute the ſame. The bearer of theſe letters he ſtraightly charged to deliver them unto Zeuſippus immediatly with all ſpeed. But he, becauſe he could not ſpy a convenient time to meet with him himſelf, gave the letters to the very ſame ſlave, whom he ſuppoſed to be moſt faſt and truſty to his Maſter: adding moreover, and ſaying, That they came from Piſiſtratus unto Zeuſippus, and imported matter of great conſequence. The bond ſlave promiſed to deliver them incontinently, but being touched in conſcience, he was ſo bold as to break them open; and when he had read them through, he fled back in great fear to Thebes (where he bewrayed Piſiſtratus.) Zeuſippus troubled in ſpirit for the flight of his bondman, retired himſelf to Athens, ſuppoſing it a place of more ſecurity to live in, as a baniſhed man. As for Piſiſtratus, after he had been divers times examined upon the rack, was put to death in the end. This murder wondrouſly eſtranged the Thebans and Bœotians and ſet their hearts againſt the Romans; inſomuch as they hated and deteſted them to death, taking great indignation that Zeuſippus (a principall and chief perſonage of their nation) had committed ſo foul and hainous a fact. To rebell in open terms, they had neither force ſufficient to maintain them, nor a principall head to direct and lead them. Whereupon they fell to that which is next couſin to plain war, even to thieving and robbing by the high waies ſide, in ſuch ſort, as they ſurprized as well ſome ſouldiers who lodged near unto them, and were their gueſts, as others that wandred and ranged abroad from the garriſons in winter time, and travelled about their affairs, who otherwhiles were caught up by the way, and came ſhort home. Some paſſengers were killed in the port-rode-waies, by thoſe that lay in wait for them in notorious thieviſh corners: others were trained and led deceitfully through by-lanes into deſert places, there to take up their innes and lodging, and then were murdred. At length they plaid theſe pranks, not only of malice unto them, but alſo for greedy deſire of booty and ſpoil, by reaſon that commonly theſe waifaring men went about their trade and merchandiſe, and therefore had ſome charge about them, and carried ſilver in their belts. Now when as at firſt there were ſome out of the way, and every day more than other many men miſſing, and no man knew what was become of them, all * Bœotia began to have an ill name, and the ſouldiers were more affraid to travell there, than in the enemies country. Then Quintius ſent certain Embaſſadors to all the Cities for to make complaint of theſe robberies and enormities. Many footmen there were found dead about the mear or lake * Copais, where their carkaſſes were raked forth of the mud and mire, and drawn out of the ſtanding water, tied and faſtned as they were to heavy ſtones or ſome great veſſels, that by their poiſe they might be plunged, and ſink to the bottom. Many ſuch like outrages were found to have been committed at Acraphea and Coronea. Quintius at the firſt demanded to have the offendors delivered unto him, and for five hundred ſouldiers (for ſo many were caught up by the way and murdred) he enjoyned the Bœotians to make payment of five hundred talents of ſilver. But the Cities would do neither the one nor the other: only they paid with bare words, and excuſed themſelves in that nothing had been done by publike warrant or counſell from the State. Whereupon the Embaſſadors were ſent to Athens, and into Achæa, to make proteſtation unto their allies, that they would purſue the Bœotians with open war, upon good ground and juſt cauſe offered. And ſo after he had given commandment unto P. Claudius to go unto Acraphea with one part of his forces, himſelf with the other ſet him down about Coronea, and planted ſiege unto it. But firſt the territory was laid waſte, all the way as the two armies marched from Elatia in divers quarters. The Bœotians plagued with theſe loſſes and calamities, ſeeing nothing but fear and flight in every place, ſent their Embaſſiadors unto him: but when they could not be admitted into the camp, the Achæans and the Athenians were fain to come with them. The Achæans were of greater credit, to entreat in their behalf: for unleſs they might obtain pardon and peace for the Bœotians, they determined alſo to enter into the quarrel, and to make war themſelves. By whoſe mediation the Bœotians had acceſs unto the Roman Generall, and audience granted. Who after they were enjoyned to deliver up the offenders and malefactors to Juſtice, and to pay thirty talents for amends and ſatisfaction, obtained peace: and ſo the ſiege was raiſed.

A After ſome few daies, the ten Delegats or Committees from Rome were arrived, by whoſe advice and counſell peace was articled and capitulated with King Philip, upon theſe conditions: Imprimis, That all the Greek Cities, as well in Europe as in Aſia, ſhould enjoy their liberty, and live under their own laws. Item, That Philip ſhould withdraw his garriſons out of as many of them as had been in ſubjection under him. Item, That he do the like by thoſe which were in Aſia, to wit, Euromos, Pedaſa, Bargylla, Iaſſus, Myrina, Abydus, Thaſſus, and Perinthus: all which, the Romans required to be free. As concerning the liberty and freedom of the Cyani, it was covenanted, That Quintius ſhould write his letters to Prutias the King of Bithynians, giving him to underſtand the advice and pleaſure of the Senat, and the ten Delegats aforeſaid. Item, That Philip render all the priſoners and fugitive traitors to the Romans, and yield up all the covered ſhips with B hatches: and over and beſides, one huge royall Galliace or Argoſey, which by reaſon of the exceeding bigneſs was unweildy and of little uſe, and was directed with ſixteen banks of oars on a ſide. Item, That he ſhould not have above five hundred men in arms, nor one Elephant at all. Item, That he ſhould not war (but by leave and permiſſion of the Senat) without the marches of Macedony. Item, That he pay unto the people of Rome a thouſand talents, the one half in hand, and the other at ten payments, within the term of ten years. Valerius Antias writeth moreover, that there was impoſed upon him a tribute of four thouſand pound weight of ſilver yearly, for ten years: and beſides, twenty thouſand pound weight preſently. The ſame author ſaith, that expreſly it was capitulated, that Philip ſhould not war at all with Eumenes the ſon of Attalus, who was newly come to the crown. For the aſſurance of theſe covenants, there were received hoſtages, and a-C mongſt them Demetrius King Philip his ſon. Valerius Antias hath written moreover, that the Iſland Ægina, and certain Elephants were given in pure gift to Attalus in his abſence: and that upon the Rhodians was beſtowed Stratonicea, a City in Caria, with other Cities alſo which Philip had poſſeſſed. To conclude, that the Athenians received of free gift theſe Iſles following to wit, Paros, Imbros, Delos, and Scyros.

When all the States of Greece approved and thought well of this peace, only the Ætolians ſecretly muttered & found fault with this order ſet down by ten Delegats aboveſaid: giving out, that they were but bare letters and vain words, ſhadowed with a counterfeit apparance of liberty. For to what end, ſay they, ſhould ſome Cities be delivered to the Romans, and thoſe not named? others again be named, and yet order taken, that they without delivery ſhould be free? but only
D for this purpoſe, that thoſe Cities which are in Aſia ſhould be ſet free, becauſe they be far off and therefore in more ſafety; but thoſe that are in Greece, being not preciſely named, ſhould be ſeiſed upon by them: to wit, Corinth, Chalcis, and Oreum, with Eretrias, and Demetrias. And to ſay a truth, this finding fault of theirs was not altogether frivolous, and without occaſion given: for ſome doubt there was of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: becauſe in the order and act of the Senat, by vertue whereof thoſe ten Delegats aforeſaid were ſent from the City, all other Cities of Aſia and of Greece were doubtleſs in plain terms freed: but as touching theſe three before named, the Delegats had in commiſſion to take order, as they ſhould ſee it ſtand with the good of the Common-wealth, according to their own judgment and diſcretion, and the truſt that was committed unto them. For well they wiſt that King Antiochus would paſs over into Europe, ſo E ſoon as ever he could bring his affairs about to his mind, and unwilling they were on any hand, that theſe Cities ſo commodious for his deſigns, ſhould lie open and ready to his hand for to ſeize upon at his pleaſure. So Quintius together with the ten Delegats ſailed from Elatia to Anticyra, and from thence to Corinth, where they held their Councill and conſulted of their affairs. Quintius would very often ſay unto them, That all Greece might be delivered and ſet at liberty, if they could reſtrain the tongues of the Ætolians: if they were willing that their good affection ſhould be deemed ſincere, and the majeſty of the Roman name maintained among all: finally, if they would pretend and make it known abroad, that they were paſſed the ſeas to ſet Greece free, and not after they had ſhaken off the ſeignory of Philip, to tranſlate it unto themſelves. The other again contradicted nothing as touching the liberty of thoſe Cities: howbeit, they made remon-F ſtrance, that it was the ſafer courſe for them, to remain awhile under the protection and ſafegard of the Romans than that inſtead of Philip they ſhould receive Antiochus for their Lord. In concluſion decreed it was, That Corinth ſhould be rendred to the Achæans, but yet ſo, that there ſhould be a Roman garriſon in the higheſt quarter of the City called Acrocorinthus. Item, That Chalcis and Demetrias ſhould be retained ſtill, untill ſuch time as they were no more in fear and doubt of Antiochus.

Now approached the ordinary ſolemnity of the Iſthmian games, unto which at all times uſually there was great recourſe of people, as well in regard of the naturall diſpoſition of that nation (deſirous to ſee ſuch ſports and paſtimes, wherein was repreſented the triall of maſteries in all kind of arts, in all feats either of mere ſtrength, or of agility and nimbleneſs of the body) as alſo
G in reſpect of the commodious ſeat of the place: whereunto from all parts of Greece they repaired thither by two divers and ſundry ſeas. But being amuſed in expectation to know what the eſtate of Greece, and what their own particular condition would be hereafter, divers men not only deviſed ſecretly with themſelves, but alſo gave out and whiſpered in their ſpeech and talk. Well, the Romans were ſet to behold this ſolemnity: and the publike Crier with a trumpetter went forth into the midſt of the Cirque or ſhew-place, from whence the manner was to proclaime the ſports and games aforeſaid in a ſolemn ſet form of words: and after he had by ſound of trumpet made ſilence, he pronounced with a loud vice in this manner, "Be it known unto all men, that the H "Senat of Rome, and T. Quintius the General of their army, having vanquiſhed King Philip and

"the Macedonians, do ordain, that the Corinthians, the Phocenſians, and the Locrenſians, be all
"free, and delivered frow all taxes whatſoever, and to live according to their own laws. Item, That "the Iſle Euloea, the Magneſians, Theſſalians, Perrhæbians, Acheans, and Phthiots do enjoy the "like freedom and immunity. And conſequently he rehearſed all the nations which had been in "ſubjection to Philip. Upon this proclamation of the beadle there was ſuch joy, that men were not able to conceive and comprehend it. Every man could hardly beleeve that he had heard the thing which he ſo wiſhed and deſired afore to hear: one looked upon another wondring at the matter, as if it had been a vain viſion or illuſion of ſome dream: and well they truſted not their own ears in hearing that which particularly concerned every one, but enquired of them that ſtood next I unto them. The Crier was called back again: ſuch a deſire had each one not only to hear the glad tidings, but alſo to behold the happy meſſenger of this their liberty: and no remedy there was, but once again he muſt publiſh and pronounce the ſame. Now when their joy was once confirmed, they ſet up ſuch a ſhout, and followed it ſo with clapping of hands, redoubling the ſame ſo often, as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleaſing and welcome unto a multitude than is liberty. After this, the games were performed in ſuch hatte, that neither the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye buſied to behold the ſight thereof, ſo wholly had that one joy poſſeſſed them and foreſtalled the ſence of all other pleaſures and delights. But when the paſtimes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman Generall, in ſuch ſort, that his perſon was in ſome danger of the multitude, crowding ſo hard upon him alone, for K deſire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to caſt garlands of flowers and labels of ſundry colours upon him: but being a man faſt upon three and thirty years of age, both the vigour of youth, and alſo the joy that he took for the accompliſhment of ſo glorious an act, afforded him ſtrength enough to abide the preſs of the people. This gladneſs of all men ſhewed it ſelf not only for the preſent, but continued alſo for many daies ſpace, entertained not only in thankful minds, but expreſſed alſo in joyful diſcourſes: namely, "That there was one nation yet in "the world, which at their proper coſt and charges, with their own pain and perill made war for "the freedom of others: who afforded this favour and pleaſure not to the neighbours and bor-
"berers only, or to thoſe that were joyned near to them in the continent and firm land, but paſ-
"ſed over the ſeas; to the end, that throughout the whole world there ſhould be no unjuſt and L
"tyrannicall government, but in all places, right, reaſon, and law, might prevail moſt and carry
"greateſt ſway. Lo, how by the only voice of one Beadle all the Cities of Greece and Aſia are ſet
"free. To conceive and enterpriſe ſo great a thing proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart:
"but to effect the ſame is a ſingular vertue and rare felicity.

This done, Quintius and the ten Delegats gave audience to the embaſſages of divers Kings and Princes, Nations and States. And firſt of all others were the Embaſſadors of King Antiochus called in: who uſed the ſame ſpeech in manner that they had at Rome, vanting great words without any ground and ſubſtance of credit. But anſwer was returned unto them, not covertly by way of circumſtance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot and things ſtood doubtfull) but openly in plain terms. Imprimis, That Antiochus muſt quit and abandon all the Cities of Aſia, which belon- M ged at any time either to King Philip or King Ptolomeus. Item, That he meddle not with any free City or State, and eſpecially with thoſe of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to paſs over himſelf, or to ſend any forces into Europe. After the Kings Embaſſadors were licenſed to depart, all the nations and ſtates had a generall ſeſſion and meeting together, which was the ſooner diſpatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegats all the Cities and States were pronounced by name. Unto the Oreſtians (a people in Macedony) for that they revolted firſt from the King, their own lands and priviledges were reſtored. The Magneſians, the Perrhæbians and Dolopians were likewiſe declared free. Unto the people of Theſſaly over and above the grant of their liberty, the Phthiotian Achæans were annexed, excepting the City of Thebes in Phthia and Pharſalus. As for the Ætolians who required, that according to covenant Pharſalus N and Leucas ſhould be rendred unto them, they were put over unto the Senat. But they awarded them the Phocenſes and Locrenſes, with other appurtenances adjoyned before by vertue of the decree. Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea (which alſo is a City of Peloponneſus) were rendred unto the Achæans. Moreover, theſe ten Delegats gave Oreum and Eretria unto Eumenes the ſon of Attalus, but by reaſon that Quintius would not agree thereto, the matter was referred over to the Senat for to be decided: and the Senat granted freedom unto theſe Cities, together with Caryſtus.
* Clavon al. Unto Pleuratus were freely given Lingus and Parthenius, which were two nations in * Illyricum, and had been both ſubject to Philip. It was ordained alſo, that Aminander ſhould hold thoſe Caſtles ſtill, which during the wars he had won from Philip. When the aſſembly was diſſolved, the ten Delegats having divided between themſelves their ſeverall charges, departed every man to O ſet free the Cities of their particular regions and quarters. P. Lentulus to Bargyllæ, L. Stertinius to Hephæſtra, Thaſſus, and other Cities of Thracia; P. Villius and L. Terentius toward King Antiochus; and Cn. Cornelius toward Philip. Unto whom after Cornelius had declared his Commiſſion concerning ſome ſmaller matters, and withall demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to hear counſell not only profitable unto himſelf, but alſo neceſſary? The King made anſwer again and ſaid, That he would not only give him the hearing, but alſo yield him thanks beſides,

A in caſe he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon he perſwaded him earneſtly, that foraſmuch as he had obtained peace already, he ſhould ſend his Embaſſadors to Rome, to crave league alſo and amity: to the end, that if Antiochus began to ſtir, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for ſome occaſions and opportunities to make war. [ This conference and communication with Philip was at Tempe in Theſſaly. ] And when he anſwered, That he would immediatly diſpatch his Embaſſadors Cornelius came to Thermopylæ, where a ſolemn Diet and aſſembly of all Greece is wont to be held upon certain ſet daies, and thither reſort great numbers of people. Which meeting is called Pylaicum: where he adviſed the Ætolians eſpecially to perſever conſtant and faithfull in the amity of the people of Rome. Some of the principall Ætolians ſeemed to complain between whiles, that the Romans were not ſo well affected to their nation after vi-
B ctory, as they were in time of the war: but others, more ſharply blamed and reproached them, yea, and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have been vanquiſhed, no, nor the Romans ever able ſo much as to paſs over into Greece, without the help of the Ætolians. Cornelius forbare to make anſwer again to thoſe points, for fear of farther wrangling and altercation; and promiſed, that if they ſent to Rome they ſhould obtain any thing that was reaſon. Whereupon by his advice and approbation there were deputed Embaſſadors. This was the iſſue and end of the war with Philip.

Whiles theſe affairs thus paſſed in Greece, Macedony, and Aſia, all Tuſcan in manner was gone out and riſen up in arms, by occaſion of a conſpiracy of bondſlaves. For to enquire into theſe troubles and to repreſs the ſame, there was ſent M. Acilius a Prætor (who had the civill juriſdiction C between Citizens and aliens) with one of the two legions of Roman Citizens. Some of them, who were already aſſembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight: of whom many were ſlain, and many taken priſoners. Others he ſcourged and round truſſed up, hanging them on gybbets, even as many as were the principall and chief of the conſpiracy: and others there were whom he ſent home again to their Maſters.

Now the Conſuls were gone into their Provinces. Marcellus ſo ſoon as he was entred into the marches of the Boii, and had over-wearied his ſouldiers with marching all day long, ſate him down upon a certain riſing of a hill, and there as he was encamping himſelf and his men, Corolamus a Prince or great Lord of the Boii, with a mighty power aſſailed and charged him, and ſlew upon three thouſand of his men. In which ſudden and tumultuary skirmiſh, certain brave men D of mark were ſlain; among whom were T. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Junius Syllanus two Colonels of the allies: alſo A. Ogulnius and P. Claudius two Knight Marſhals or Tribunes of the ſecond legion. Howbeit the Romans ſtrongly fortified their tents and defended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their fortunat victory had long aſſailed to no effect. And in the ſame ſtanding camp he continued certain daies, whiles he cured his ſouldiers of their wounds, and recovered their hearts after ſo great a fright. The Boii (as they are a nation that of all things cannot endure any tedious delay of time) diſperſed themſelves into their towns and forts. Then Marcellus preſently croſſed the Po, and led his army into the territory of Comum, where the Inſubrians lay encamped after they had ſollicited and cauſed thoſe of * Comum to take arms. The legions * Comc.
made no more ado, but gave them battell in the very way: and at the firſt encounter the enemies
E charged them ſo hotly, that they forced the forefront of the battell to give ground. Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing leſt being once diſcovered they ſhould be repulſed and diſcomfited, he made a cohort of Marſians to make head; and at once ſet forth all the troops of the Latine Cavalry againſt them. Their firſt and ſecond charge both, mightily impeached and quailed the enemy, advancing forward luſtily and preſſing upon them in great fury: whereby the reſt of the Roman army taking heart again and being encouraged, at the firſt received them manfully and made reſiſtance only, but afterwards followed fiercely upon them: inſomuch as the Gauls were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backs, took them to their heels, and ran away by heaps. Valerius Antias writeth, that in this battell there were forty thouſand men ſlain and above, five hundred and ſeven military enſigns taken, with 432 chariots: beſides many chains
F of gold, whereof Claudius preſented one (very maſſie above the reſt and of great weight) unto Jupiter, which was hung up within the Temple in the Capitoll, as he writeth. The ſame day was the Camp of the Gauls forced and ranſackt, and the town of Comum alſo within few daies taken by aſſault. Upon this there were eight and twenty boroughs or forts that fell away and revolted to the Conſul. But the Hiſtoriographers agree not upon this, Whether the Conſul led his forces againſt the Inſubrians firſt, or the Boians; and whether he raſed out the diſhonour of a former foil and defeat by a fortunate victory in this battell: or contrariwiſe, after a proſperous fight atchieved before Comum, he blotted and defaced the ſame with a ſhamefull overthrow received at the Boians hand.

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Purpurio the other Conſul, marched into G the Boians Country through the tribe Sappinia. And when he was approached near to a Caſtle called * Mutilum, he feared leſt he ſhould be encloſed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligu- * Mutilina.

and forts, and in a manner all the Boians yielded themſelves, ſave only their youth, who were

up in arms to pill and ſpoil, and were at that time retired unto the forreſts and glins out of the H way. After this the army marched toward the Ligurians. The Boians making full account to aſſail the Roman army at unawares, which marched without good regard of themſelves, and not cloſe together (for that their enemies ſeemed to be far off) followed after through the blind and covert forreſts. But when they ſaw that they could not overtake them, they ſuddenly all at once paſſed over the Po in ſmall bothoms and punts, and after they had ſpoiled and pilled the Levians and Libuans, as they returned from thence with a booty raiſed out of the country, they chanced in the utmoſt frontires of Liguria, to light upon the army of the Romans in their march. Sooner and with more eagerneſs fell they to fight, than if they had appointed both time and place, and been prepared aforehand to ſtrike a battell. There it well appeared, of what force anger is to prick on and ſharpen mens ſpirits to conflict. For the Romans more greedy of murder and bloudſhed, I than of victory, fought ſo, as they ſcarce left the enemies one meſſenger to carry the news of their unhappy overthrow. In regard of theſe exploits, upon the Conſuls letters brought to Rome, ordained it was, that there ſhould be a ſolemn proceſſion and thankſgiving to the gods for three daies. Shortly after Marcellus came to Rome, unto whom was granted a triumph with great conſent of the LL. of the Senat; and whiles he was in his Magiſtracy he triumphed over the Inſubrians and Comians, leaving for his Collegue good hope likewiſe of a triumph, becauſe himſelf (to ſay a truth) in that nation fought but unfortunately, whereas his Collegue ſped well enough, and had a lucky hand. Much ſpoil of the enemies was carried in a pomp, upon the Chariots that were taken and won from them. Many enſigns and banners were born in a ſhew, beſides in money, to the value of 320000 aſſes of braſs coin; and 234000 bigate peeces of ſilver. The footmen had 800 aſſes K given them apeece, every horſeman and centurion had thrice as much.

The ſame year King Antiochus, whiles he kept his winter at Epheſus, aſſaied to reduce all the Cities and States of Aſia unto the ancient form of government and ſubjection, aſſuring himſelf, that the reſt would not be hard to be ſubdued and brought under, becauſe the towns were either ſituate upon plains, or nothing well fortified with walls, and not furniſhed with men and munition. As for * Smyrna and * Lampſacus, they ſtood upon their freedom, and challenged it. Doubted it was, and great danger, that if he ſhould let them go clear away ſo, ſome Cities in Æolis and Ionia would take after Smyrna, and others in Helleſpontus follow the example of Lampſacus. Therefore both himſelf ſent from * Epheſus to lay ſiege unto Smyrna, and gave commandment, That the forces which were at Abydus (leaving only a ſmall garriſon behind) ſhould be lead to I the ſiege and aſſault of Lampſacus. And yet he threatned and terrified them not ſo much with forces and violence, but aſſaied them rather by fair means, ſending to them his Embaſſadors, ſo as, partly by flattering and gentle words wherewith he entertained them, and partly by mild reproof for their raſhneſs and obſtinacy, he endeavoured to put them in ſome hope, that ſhortly they ſhould have whatſoever they deſired: and then, both they themſelves, and all others ſhould evidently ſee, that they had obtained their liberty by the eſpeciall grace and favour of the King, and not uſurped and gained it by occaſion of ſome advantage and opportunity. To this they anſwered again, That Antiochus ought neither to marvell, nor be offended and diſpleaſed at them if they could not wel endure the hope which they had of freedom thus to be deferred from time to time. Then he departing from Epheſus in the beginning of the ſpring ſailed unto Helleſpontus with M his fleet. His land forces he tranſported over to * Madytos a City in Cherſoneſus, and joyned them to his ſtrength by ſea. And becauſe they ſhut the gates upon him, he environed the town with armed men, and when he was at the point to give the aſſault, and to bend his engins of battery againſt the walls, it was ſurrendred into his hands. Upon the like fear the Inhabitants alſo of other Cities in Cherſoneſus yielded themſelves. After this he came to * Lyſimachia with his whole power, as well of land-ſouldiers as ſea-ſervitors. And finding it abandoned, ruinat, and lying (as it were) along, (for but few years before the Thracians had forced, ſacked, and burnt it) he had a great deſire to rear and ſet upright again that noble and famous City, ſeated in ſo good and commodious a place. And therefore he took great care, and employed all his endeavour to re-edifie the walls, to re-build the edifices, to redeem and ranſom the Lyſimachians that were in ſlavery, to ſeek out all thoſe that were diſperſed over Helleſpontus and Cherſoneſus, and gather them together, yea, and to enroll new inhabitants upon hope of gain and profit, and by all means poſſible to ſtore and people the City again. And withall, becauſe he would eaſe them of the fear they had of the Thracians, he went in perſon with the one half of his land-forces to waſte and ſpoil the confines of Thrace; the other part with all the ſea-ſouldiers and mariners he left hard at work about the repairing of the City.

About this time as L. Cornelius (being ſent by the Senat to compoſe the controverſies and variance between the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolomeus) abode at Selymbria; ſo of the ten Commiſſioners aboveſaid, P. Lentulus departed from Bargylla, P. Villius and L. Terentius from Thaſſus, and arrived all three at Lyſimachia: where L. Cornelius likewiſe met them from Selymbria; and O a few daies after King Antiochus being newly returned out of Thracia. The firſt meeting and ſalutation between him and the Commiſſioners was friendly and courteous, yea, and there paſſed to and fro afterwards divers amiable kindneſſes and loving entertainments mutually. But when they entred once to parl of their Commiſſion that they had in charge, and of the preſent State of Aſia, then there was fretting and fuming and their bloud up. The Roman Agents ſtuck not to tell him to his face that all that he had done, ſince he took the ſea, and departed with his fleet out of Syria

A was displeasant unto the Senat, saying, "That they thought it meet, that all the Cities should be "restored unto King Ptolomeus, which had been under his dominion. For as touching these "towns, which sometime Philip had been possessed of, and which Antiochus had surprized and "seized upon, taking his time and vantage, when Philip was employed another way in the Ro- "man wars, it was no reason, nor a thing tolerable, that the Romans should so many years "space, by land and sea endure so great toil, and hazard such perils; and suffer Antiochus in the end "to go away with the fruit and reward of all the service. But set the case, that the Romans would "take no knowledge of his coming into Asia, as a matter impertinent unto them: can they dis- "semble also, that now he is come over into Europe with all his forces both by land and sea and "little wanteth of making open war upon the Romans? Marry as for him, he will not stick to deny
B "that he levieth any war, although he were arrived and landed in Italy. Then he challenges the "King made answer, and said, That he saw well enough and knew before that the Romans were "inquisitive and curious enough to search what King Antiochus ought to [illegible] "thought of their own selves, how far forth they should by right proceed, as well by land as by "sea. As for Asia, it appertained not at all to the people of Rome, neither had they reason unto "enquire what Antiochus did in Asia, than Antiochus to search into the [illegible] of "Rome in Italy. As concerning Ptolomeus, from whom they complain that he had taken certain Ci- "ties; he did them to understand that there was amity between him and Ptolomeus and they were "now in terms of knitting themselves shortly in nearer bonds of alliance and affinity. Neither "sought he the spoil of Philip, and to enrich himself by his adversity and misfortune: or passed o-C "ver into Europe against the Romans * * * * But when he was vanquished once, all that e- "ver he had, by right and law of war, became the possessions of Seleucus, and so consequently (as "he took it) appertained unto him. And during the time, that his progenitors and predecessors, "were busied and troubled with other affairs, first Ptolomeus catched at some things, and Philip "after at other, and so between them they usurped and seized upon other mens possessions, and "namely, of certain places near and hard by in Thacia, which without all controversie belonged "unto Lysimachus. For to reduce which into their ancient State, he was thither come, and now "was in hand to re-edifie Lysimachia anew, lately destroyed by the violence of the Thracians, to "the end, that Seleucus his son might hold it as the royall seat of his kingdom. Thus as they con- tinued arguing and debating for certain daies, there ran a rumor, but without any certain author, D that King Ptolomeus was dead: whereupon they could grow to no conclusion of all their parlies: yet they made semblance on both sides, that they heard nothing thereof. And as well L. Cornelius, who was sent in Embassage to both the Kings, Antiochus and Ptolomeus, requested respite of some small time to confer with Ptolomeus, to the end that himself might be arrived in Ægypt before any alteration were made in the new possession of that kingdom: as also Antiochus made reckoning, that Ægypt would be his, if this good occasion then were presented unto him. Therefore having dismissed the Romans, and left his son Seleucus behind him with all the land-forces, for to finish the building again of Lysimachia which he had begun, himself with all his fleet sailed to Ephesus: and having sent his Embassadors to Quintius to treat soberly about a league and amity, he coasted along Asia and so arrived in * Lycia. And when he heard for certain at * Patara that Ptolomeus was E yet living, he gave over his purpose of sailing into Ægypt: yet nevertheless he shaped his course & set sail for Cyprus: and when he had doubled the point of Chelidonium, he staid awhile in * Pamphylia about the river * Eurymedon, by occasion of a mutiny among the mariners & oar-men. From thence he weighed anchor, and when he was sailed as far as a place called [The heads of the river Sarus] there arose a gust and fearful tempest, wherein he had like to have been cast away and drowned with all his fleet. Many of his ships were run aground, & many of them swallowed up of the sea, so as there escaped not one of them by swimming to land. A number of men there perished, not of base mariners only, and unknown common souldiers but also of his near and special friends. Having rallied the dispersed reliques of this shipwrack, seeing he had no means and was not able to reach and gain Cyprus, he returned again to Seleucia, with an army nothing so puissant nor so F well furnished, as when he set out in his voyage. There he commanded his ships to be haled a- land, and laid up in their docks (for winter now approached) & himself took his journey to * Antiochia, there to lye all that winter time. And in these terms stood the affairs of the Kings.

At Rome, there were first instituted in this year three Triumvirs called Epulones, to wit, C. Licinius Lucullus, T. Romuleius (who was the man that put up the bill for their creation) and P. Porcius Lecca. And by a law in that behalf ordained, these Triumvirs were allowed as well as a Bishop, the long embrodered robe of purple. But in this year great debate & variance there was between the Questors or Treasurers of the City Q. Fabius Labeo & L. Aurelius of the one side, and all the Priests on the other side. These treasurers were at some fault for mony, because they were minded and appointed to make the last payment unto certain privat persons, for the loan-silver which G they had disbursed for the wars: these monies the Treasurers demanded of the Augurs and Bi- shops to furnish out the said paiment; for that during the wars, they only had not been contri- buters in any levy. The Priests appealed to the Tribunes, and called for their lawfull favour: but all was in vain, and so they were forced to satisfie all the arrerages for the years past, wherein they had paid nothing. This year there died two Bishops, and new were installed in their rooms. M. Marcellus the Consul entred in place of T. Sempronius Tuditanus, who deceased Prætor in Spain; and L. Valerius instead of M. Cornelius Cethegus. Q. Fabius Maximus also an Augur died a very young young man, before he had born any office of State: but for that year there was not ſubſtituted a new Augur in his room. H

After this, M. Marcellus the Conſul held the ſolemn aſſembly for the election of Conſuls. And Conſuls were created L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Portius Cato. Then were the Prætors choſen, namely, C. Fabricius Luſcinus, Cn. Atinius Labeo, C. Manlius Volſo, Ap. Claudius Nero, P. Manlius, and P. Porcius Lecca. The Ædiles of the chair M. Fulvius Nobilior, and C. Flaminius divided among the people 1000000 Modii of wheat, at two aſſes a Modius. This ſtore of corn had the Sicilians brought to Rome for the honour of C. Flaminius and his father. And Flaminius was content that his companion in office ſhould reap a full part of the thanks for this gratuity. The games called Roman were exhibited in moſt ſumptuous manner, and thrice repreſented all over again. The Ædiles of the Commons Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, and C. Sempronius, who alſo was the high Pariſh-Prieſt, and Superintendent, called Curio Max. called in queſtion many of the City Bailiffs that gathered their rents for paſtures, judicially to anſwer upon their accounts before the people. Three of them were condemned, and of their ſilver raiſed upon their fines, they built the Temple of Faunus in the Iſland. The Plebeian plaies were renewed for two daies, and a ſolemn publike feaſt was celebrated in regard of them. I

The ſame day that L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius entred their office, they propoſed unto the Senat concerning the government of the Provinces. And order was given by the LL. of the Councill, that foraſmuch as the war increaſed ſo in Spain, as required not only a Conſular army, but a Conſul alſo for the Leader; the Conſuls ſhould either agree between themſelves for the government of the two Provinces, to wit, the hither Spain, and Italy, or elſe to caſt lots therefore: K that he whoſe hap it was to rule Spain, ſhould have with him two legions, five thouſand Latine allies, and five hundred horſe; and likewiſe to have the conduct of a fleet of twenty gallies of war: that the other Conſul ſhould levy and enroll two legions; which were thought ſufficient to defend and keep France in obedience, conſidering the courages of the Inſubrians and Boii, were well cooled and abated the laſt year. Cato by lot had the charge of Spain, and Valerius of Italy. Then the Prætors caſt lots for their Provinces. To C. Fabricius Luſcinus fell the juriſdiction over the Citizens of Rome: to C. Atinius Labeo over the ſtrangers. C. Manlius Volſo governed Sicily, and Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spain. M. Porcius Lecca was aſſigned to rule * Piſa, to the end he might be upon the back of the Ligurians, and P. Manlius was appointed as an aſſiſtant and co-adjutor to the Conſul in the higher Spain. As for T. Quintius, his Commiſſion was renewed for L one year longer, in regard that not only Antiochus and the Ætolians, but alſo Nabis the Lacedæmonian Tyrant, were doubted and ſuſpected not to ſtand ſound to the Romans; and for him were ſet out two legions: and if need were of any ſupply to make up the companies thereof, the Conſuls were enjoyned to enroll new ſouldiers, and to ſend them over into Macedony. Alſo Appius Claudius had a warrant to take up 2000 foot, and two hundred horſe, over and above that legion which Q. Fabius had. The like number of freſh horſe and foot was appointed for P. Manlius to be ſent into the higher Spain: and the ſame legion was granted unto him, which was commanded by Minutius the Prætor. Moreover, P. Porcius Lecca was to have the leading of two hundred ſootmen, and fifty horſe, drawn out of the Gauls army, for to lie in Hetruria about Piſa. Laſt of all, in Sardinia P. Sempronius Longus continued ſtill in place of command. Thus the Provinces M being diſtributed, the Conſuls before they departed out of the City, by advice and counſell of the Biſhops performed the ſolemnity of the ſacred Spring which was vowed before by the Prætor C. Cornelius Mammula, according to the mind of the Senat and the good liking of the people, in the year when Cn. Servilius and Cn. Flaminius were Conſuls: and ſo it was celebrated one and twenty years after it was firſt vowed. Much about this time was C. Claudius Pulcher, the ſon of Appius, elected Augur, and inveſted in that Sacerdotall dignity, in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who died the year before.

When as men began now to marvell that there was ſo little account made of the war begun already in Spain, there were letters brought from Q. Minutius with news, That he had fought a fortunate field before the town of Turba, with Budares and Beſaſides, two Spaniſh Generals and great N commanders: that he had ſlain twelve thouſand enemies, taken Budares the Generall himſelf priſoner and that the reſt were diſcomfited and put to flight. Upon the reading of theſe letters, leſs fear there was of Spain, from whence they looked for great wars.

After the return of the ten Delegats or Commiſſioners aboveſaid, all the care was, and no talk elſe but about Antiochus and his affairs. Theſe men, after they had declared firſt how their proceeding went with King Philip, and upon what conditions they had granted peace, informed and gave them to underſtand, "That there was as great a war behind from Antiochus: "that he had paſſed over the ſeas into Europe with a mighty Armado, and as puiſſant an army "for land ſervice; and had not been averted another way by a vain hope to invade and ſeize "upon Ægypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Ptolomy his death, all Greece O "would have been anon on a light fire, and up in arms. For the very Ætolians themſelves, a na- "tion naturally of an unquiet ſpirit, and incenſed beſides againſt the Romans, would not have "ſit ſtill and been in reſt. Moreover, there was another malady and miſchief as dangerous, ſetled "as it were within the ribs & in the very heart of Greece: to wit, Nabis, the tyrant at this preſent "of the Lacedæmonians only, but ſhortly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece; who for avarice "and cruelty is equall to all the famous and noted tyrants that ever were: and if he be ſuffered to

A "poſſeſs himſelf of Argos, and to hold it as a fortreſs to command all Peloponneſus, when the "Roman armies ſhall be once tranſported home again into Italy, in faith, Greece may make "ſmall boaſt of being delivered from Philip: for this they ſhall be ſure of at leaſt, if of nothing "elſe, to have a near-neighbour tyrant, inſtead of a King far off, for to be their Lord and imperi- "ouſly to command them. The ancient Senators, hearing theſe intelligences from grave perſons of good quality, and who made report of all things not by hearſay, but upon their own knowledge, were of advice and reſolved to have a good eye and regard with all ſpeed unto Antiochus, conſidering the King was paſſed already into Syria, whatſoever the occaſion was. But as touching the Tyrant, after they had diſputed and debated the matter long time, Whether they had ſufficient cauſe already to determine upon ſome finall concluſion, or ſhould refer unto the wiſ-
B dome and judgement of T. Quintius the managing of thoſe affairs, therein to proceed and do according as he ſhould deem it good and expedient for the Common-wealth; in fine, they permitted him to uſe his own diſcretion concerning the Lacedæmonian Tyrant: ſuppoſing that the matter was not of ſuch weight and conſequence as to concern the main ſtate of the weal-publike ſo matterially, whether it were haſtened or protracted; but rather it behoved them to be adviſed and conſider well, what Annibal and the Carthaginians would do, if haply the war with Antiochus were begun and once afoot. They [ at Carthage ] that ſided with the adverſe faction of Annibal, had ſent divers and ſundry letters unto the principall LL. at Rome, every one privatly to his friends to this effect, That there paſſed meſſengers and letters from Annibal to Antiochus, and that there were Embaſſadors again that ſecretly came from the King to him. And like C as there be ſome beaſts ſo wild and ſavage as never can be tamed; ſo the courage and ſpirit of that man was ſuch as might not poſſibly be dulced or appeaſed. For he daily complained that the City languiſhed and grew feeble with idleneſs, and by ſitting ſtill and doing nothing, was overgrown as it were with moſs, and unpoſſible it was to raiſe and ſtir it up but with ſound of armour and weapons. Theſe advertiſements carried likelihood of truth and good credit with them, in regard of the late war, ſo freſh in memory, which he alone began firſt, and managed to the laſt. Over and beſides, he had provoked by a late act of his many great and mighty perſonages, who ſet their hearts againſt him. The order and degree of Judges at that time bare chief ſway and ſoveraign authority in Carthage: in this reſpect principally, for that the ſame Judges were perpetuall. The goods, the honour and reputation, yea, and the life of every man lay in their D hands. He that diſpleaſed one of that bench, war ſure to have all the reſt his enemies and to be upon him: and there never wanted one promoter or other to carry tales and give information to theſe judges againſt a man, if they ſaw them ill affected once and bent againſt one. During the time of this imperious and tyrannicall rule of theirs, (for as their power was exceeding all meaſure, ſo they bare themſelves therein as outragiouſly beyond the limits of civility) it was Annibal his hap to be Prætor; and by vertue of his place he ſent for one of the treaſurers, to come before him: but he made no reckoning of his authority, and refuſed to obey: for the ſaid treaſurer was one of the contrary ſide: and becauſe from the degrees of theſe treaſurers they mounted preſently into the higheſt order of the Judges, therefore he carried with him an hauty mind already, in regard of the high room that he was ſhortly to ſtep into. Annibal you may be E ſure took this as a great diſgrace and indignity to his perſon, and therefore he ſent a purſevant or ſerjeant to attach the body of the Treaſurer aforeſaid: and preſently calling the people to a generall aſſembly, he commanded him there to be preſented: where he accuſed and blamed the party himſelf, no more than the whole order and degree of the Judges: through whoſe inſolent pride and exceſſive power, both laws and Magiſtrats were nothing regarded but trodden under foot. And perceiving that theſe words of his tickled the itching ears of the people, conſidering alſo that their proud demeanor prejudiced the liberty of the meaneſt perſons: immediatly he publiſhed a law, and got it enacted, That thoſe Judged ſhould be choſen every year, and that thenceforth one and the ſame man might not be a Judge two years together. But look how much thank he had at the Commons hands for this act, ſo much he offended many of the great F men and principals of the City. Another thing beſides he did, whereby he purchaſed to himſelf the ill will of ſome private perſons, in tendring the common good of the weal-publike. The finances and revenues of the State, partly, through negligence went to decay, and partly, were ſhared out in dividends between ſome certain of the head Citizens and Magiſtrats: and more than that, the money which by way of tribute was to be paid yearly unto the Romans, was too ſhort and not to be found: and it appeared, that a ſore levy would be impoſed upon private perſons ſhortly to make thoſe payments out of their own purſes. Annibal, after he had caſt up the books, and made an eſtimate and juſt abſtract how much the rents and revenues of the City amounted unto as well from cuſtoms by ſea as land, and to what uſes they were employed; and perceiving thereby what was defrayed in the ordinary charges of the State, and what went a wrong way, and G was averred by theſe theeves to their own ſelves, he pronounced aloud in open audience of the whole aſſembly, That the arrerages ſhould be gathered up and brought into the common Cheſt: and ſo privat perſons might be diſcharged and eaſed of their impoſitions of tribute, and the Common-wealth would be rich enough and able to perform and furniſh out the monies due to the people of Rome. And as he thus ſaid, ſo he was as good as his word, and executed it accordingly. Then theſe caterpillers, who for certain yeers lived by robbery of the common treaſure, and fed upon the fruits of the City, fared ſpightfully againſt Annibal, as if he had done them them great wrong in taking their own goods from them, and not proceeded in justice to wreſt H out of their hands their ſtoln ſubſtance: and in great malice and bitterneſs ceaſed not to provoke againſt Annibal the Romans, who were ready enough of themſelves to pick ſome quarrell to him, to ſeek occaſion of hatred, and to find ann hole in his coat. Scipio Africanus for a long time gave the deafear unto them, and miſliked the courſe: for he ſuppoſed it was not for the honour and majeſty of the people of Rome to ſubſcribe unto thoſe imputations charged upon Annibal, to entertain the ſpight and hatred of men, and to intereſs and inſert publike authority within the pri-vat factions of the Carthaginians; and not to be content to have vanquiſhed Annibal in war, unleſs they alſo took upon them the perſons of accuſers, and preferred a ſlanderous libell & bill of inditement, and ware thereto billa vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that I Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent to Carthage, who in the Senat there might charge Annibal categori-cally, with plotting and practiſing with Antiochus for to wage war againſt them. And theſe three were addreſſed to this Embaſſie, C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Culleo; who being arrived there, cauſed it to be given out to as many as ſhould demand the cauſe of their coming, (and all by inſtruction from the adverſaries of Annibal) that their errand was to compoſe and end the debates between Maſaniſſa King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleeved for truth. But Annibal found them ſtraight and ſmelt this jug-ling and was not ignorant that he was the only man that the Romans ſhot at, and howſoever peace was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endleſs and inexpiable war with him alone ſtill. Whereupon he reſolved to frame himſelf to give place to the time and yield unto fortune. And being furniſhed aforehand with all things requiſit to take his flight, when he had of K purpoſe all the day long ſhewed himſelf in the publike place of aſſembly very formally, to turn by all ſuſpition of his intended reſolution, ſo ſoon as it began to be dark night, in his Citizens gown as he went a l day, and attended in the Hall, he gate him forth ſtraight to the City gate, accompanied only with two perſons, and thoſe not privy at all to his purpoſe and deſignment. And having found his horſes ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode apace that night untill he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Vocæ: and by the next morning, he paſſed between Acylla and Thapſus, and recovered a tower or fort of his own; where he was imbarked in a ſhip ready rigged and appointed with ſail and oar to take ſea and away. Thus departed An- nibal out of Affrick, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kinsfolk. And the ſame day he fell with the Iſland Cercina: where the Cartha- L ginians found in the rode certain hulks charged with merchandiſe: and when at his coming a-ſhore out of his ſhip, there came many running toward him for to ſalute and welcome him thither, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they ſhould make anſwer, That he went upon an Embaſſage to Tyrus: but fearing leſt any of their barks ſhould diſanchor that night and make report at Thapſus or Acylla that he was ſeen in Cercina: he cauſed a beaſt to be killed for ſacrifice, and invited the Maſters of the ſhips and all the Merchants to ſupper; and therewith commanded all the ſails and croſs ſail-yards to be had out of the veſſels, to make thereof a large pavilion that they might ſit in the ſhade at their ſupper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midſummer. And as the time and ſuch proviſion as they had, would give leave, he ſet out a feaſt and banket; he ſpared for no wine, and continued the merriment far within night. Then M Annibal, ſo ſoon as he could eſpy his time for to deceive thoſe that were in the harbor, weighed anchor. The reſt were faſt aſleep; and when the next day they awoke and rouzed themſelves, with their drunken and drouzy nols (and far forth day it was, and late ere they aroſe) they were fain to ſpend ſome hours in fitting their oars again in their right places, and the tackling of the ſhips in good order.

In this while, at Carthage the ordinary multitude that uſed to frequent the houſe of Annibal, repaired as their manner was to his gate-houſe: and when it was voiced abroad, that he was not to be found all the company gathered together in the market place, ſeeking and enquiring for the principall and chief perſonage of their City. Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled: other ſaid plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the falſhood and villany of the N Romans; and this they ſticked not to avouch. There might a man have ſeen ſundry and divers countenances (as it fareth commonly in Cities where there is ſiding and parts-taking) as each one is affected to his own party and faction. At laſt, news came that he was ſeen at Cercina. The Roman Embaſſadors having upon audience given, declared in the Senat of Carthage, that the LL. of their Senat had certain intelligence, that both aforetime, King Philip was by Annibal eſpecially ſol-licited and ſet on to make war with the people of Rome; and alſo now there hath been letters and meſſengers with credences from him to King Antiochus; and that he would never reſt untill he had ſet all the world together in arms: and therefore if the Carthaginians were deſirous to content and ſatisfie the Romans, they ſhould not ſuffer theſe parts of his to eſcape unpuniſhed:
then the Carthaginians made anſwer, and ſaid, That nothing of all this paſſed by publike councill O or conſent or allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to do whatſoever the Romans thought to be reaſon.

Annibal this while had a boon voyage, and with a merry gale of wind arrived at Tyrus, where he was received of the Tyrians, the firſt founders of Carthage, as if he had been in another country of his own: received he was, I ſay, and entertained with all kind of honour, beſeeming a man ſo famous and renowned. After he had ſojourned there ſome few daies, he ſailed to Antioch:

A where understanding that the King himself was already departed from thence, he repaired to his son, and conferred with him, as he was setting out an yearly solemnity of games and plaies neer Daphne, and being courteously also by him intreated, he made no stay, but to ship-board and Sea again. And at Ephesus overtook the King, whom he found floating and wavering still in his mind, and unresolved what to do as touching the Roman war. But this coming of Annibal, was no small poise to turn the ballance, and to move him to enter into the enterprise thereof. The Ætolians likewise at the same time were estranged and alienated in affection from the Roman league and society, whose Embassadors demanding to have Pharsalum and Leucas again, with other Cities, according to the tenor and form of the first league, the Senat turned over and referred to Quintius.

beſeeching their favour, to ſtand with them, and forward the cauſe. But as for one of the Conſuls, Marcus Porcius Cato by name, they could not with all their praiers entreat him to enclin unto their ſuit: who in the maintenance of the ſaid law, and that it might not be revoked, ſpake in the frequent aſſembly of the people to this effect. "My Maſters and citizens of Rome, If every "one of us had fully reſolved and purpoſed with himſelf to hold his own, and keep the rightful "authority and preheminence that he hath over his own wife, leſs ado and trouble we ſhould "have had with them all together at this day. Now having given them the head at home ſo "much, that the curſtneſs and ſhrewdneſs of women hath conquered our liberty and freehold "there; behold, here alſo in publick place it is troden down and trampled underfoot: and be- "cauſe we were not able every man to rule his own in ſeveral, now we ſtand in fear and dread "them all in general. Certainly, I my ſelf thought ever until now, that it was but a feined fable I "and deviſed tale that went of a certain * Iſland, wherein by a conſpiracy of women, all the men "were murdered every one, and that ſex utterly made away and rooted out. But well I ſee now, "be they creatures never ſo weak, ſo ſilly and feeble, let them once have their meetings, their con- "venticles and ſecret conſetences, they will work miſchief in the higheſt degree, and be as dan- "gerous as any other. And ſurely for mine own part, I cannot reſolve in mine own conſcience "and determine, whether of the twain be worſe; the thing I mean in it ſelf, or the precedent ex- "ample and conſequence thereof, conſidering the manner how it is handled. Of which two, the "one toucheth us that are Conſuls and the reſt of the magiſtrats, the other concerneth you rather "my maſters and citizens of Rome. As for the matter in queſtion, and propoſed unto you, whe- "ther it be good and expedient for the weal-publick or no, that reſteth in you to determine and K "judge, who are to give your voices and ſuffrages. But this ſeditious inſurrection here, of wo- "men, be it of themſelves, or procured by your motion and inſtigation, M. Fundanius & L. Valeri- "us, no doubt it argueth and implieth a great default in the Magiſtrats, and I wot not whether it "will be a fouler blot and diſhonour to you that are Tribuns, than to us Conſuls. Yours will the "blame be if ye have brought women now to raiſe and ſtir up tribunitious ſeditions; and ours "the ſhame, if we needs muſt admit and accept of laws, whether we will or no for fear of a com- "motion and ſeparation of our women, as ſometimes we were forced to do by the departure and "inſurrection of our Commons. I aſſure you for mine own ſelf, when I paſſed erewhile into this "common-place through the preſs and throng of theſe women, I was abaſhed & could not chuſe "but bluſh. And had I not been more reſpective of the reputation, the honour and reverence of L "ſome in particular, than of them all together, becauſe it ſhould not be thought & ſaid, that they "had been checked and taken up by the Conſul; I would have ſaid unto them, What new faſhion "is this good wives, to run gadding abroad into the open ſtreets, to beſet the paſſages, and to af- "front, yea, and hang upon other womens husbands as ye do? What? could ye not every one at "home have dealt with your own good-men in the cauſe, and craved their help? or can ye ſpeak "fair and flatter better, can ye be more pleaſant and affable abroad in the Town, than within your "houſes? or make love to other men, rather then to your own husbands? And yet to ſpeak up- "rightly, if wives were of that modeſty and womanly carriage, as to keep themſelves within the "compaſs and bounds of their own liberty, and paſs no farther; it were not beſitting you I wot ſo "much as at home to trouble your ſelves about our laws here, nor to buſy your brains, to know "either what new Statuts paſſed, or what old were caſſed. Our anceſtors in old time would not, M "that women in any wiſe ſhould diſpoſe ſo much as of their own privat matters without the ad- "vice and direction of a Governor and Overſeer: and therefore in great wiſedom they ordained, "that they ſhould be ordred and ruled by their parents, by their brethren, by their husbands. But "we (and God will) can abide them to intermeddle in ſtate-matters, to govern the weal-publick, "to converſe with us in the common place, in publick aſſemblies and courts of parliament. For "what elſe do they now in the ſtreets, in the croſs waies & at all Iavenues, but, ſome of them give "their voyces that the bills of the Tribuns may paſs, and others adviſe and be of opinion, that the "law Oppia may be repealed? Let this outrageous & unreaſonable nature of theirs have the head; "let theſe unruly creatures and untamed animals have their wil and bridle them not; ſeethen how N "of themſelves they will keep a mean and meaſure in their licentiouſnes, unleſs you curb them & "hold them in. Tuſh, this is the leaſt matter of all that diſpleaſeth theſe women: there are a 1000 "things beſides that they think hardly of, and are diſconſented to be held unto by old cuſtomes "and poſitive laws. Liberty in all things; nay, to ſpeak more truly, a looſe and diſſolute licentiouſ- "nes, is the very thing they long after and deſire. For go they away cleer with this once, what is "it that they will not attempt and give the venture for? Do but run through and count the laws "provided in this behalf for women, whereby our fore-fathers and predeceſſors have kept down "and reſtained their diſorderly appetites, and with which they have ſought to ſubject them to "their husbands: yet, hardly can ye with the help of them all, keep them in awe and tied faſt, but "break out they will and have their own waies. What then? how and if ye ſuffer them to catch O "this and that, and t'other thing to it: if I ſay, ye let them wreſt from you one thing after another, "until at length they be check-mares with their husbands, think ye that ever you ſhall be able to "ſupport and endure them? Begin they once to be equals they will ſoon be ſuperiours: make them "your fellows, and ſtreight-wayes they will be your maſters. But, alas, we lay too hardly to their "charge. The thing that they ſtand upon is no more but this, That no new Act and ſtatute paſs "againſt them: for no equal and reaſonable thing do they refuſe: their deſire and prayer is only

A "that they might not be wronged. No, no, it is clean contrary: That law which ye have received "and admitted, that which by your ſuffrages you firſt granted, that which by the practiſe and ex"perience of ſo many years you have allowed and approved, they would have you to revoke and "aboliſh: which is as much to ſay, as by anulling that one, to infringe, impair, and diminiſh the "authority and vertue of the reſt. No law is there ſo well deviſed, that is good, commodious and "agreeable unto all. This only is intended principally to be conſidered, that it may be profitable "to the moſt part, and ſerve in general. For if as each perſon ſhall find an act prejudicial, hurtful,
"and offenſive to himſelf, he may be allowed by and by to undo and demoliſh the ſame: to what
"end ſhould all the people aſſemble together to the making of thoſe ſtatutes, which they anon a-"gainſt whom they were enacted, may aboliſh & overthrow? But gladly would I know the great B "occaſion and cauſe, for which our dames in ſuch trouble and uprore run out into the ſtreets, and "have much ado to forbear the common place, and to mount up into the Roſtra to make an ora"tion to this audience? Is it for this, to redeem out of the hands of Annibal, their fathers, their "husbands, their children and brethren, whom he keepeth priſoners? Nay, that calamity is far e"nough off at this day, and far may it ever be I pray God from our City and Common-weal. And "yet when the time was of that hard fortune and calamity, you would not hearken to their pite"ous and kind prayers in that behalf. But it may well be, that it is neither natural love and kind
"affection, nor careful regard of their deer friends, but meer touch of conſcience and ſenſe of reli"gion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation. And ready they are, it may be, to "receive and intertain dame Cybele or Idæa, coming from Peſcinus out of Phrygia. What honeſt C "colour and ſhew, ſo much as in word only can be pretended to bear out and cover this muti"nous ſedition of women? Mary this (ſay they) that we may glitter in our golden jewels, and
"ſhine in purple robes to be ſeen a far off: that as well on work daies as holy-dayes, we may be
"ſet up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the City, as it were in triumph, for the con-
"queſt and victory of a law by us repealed and diſanulled: for winning from you, and wringing out "of your hands, maugre your beards, the liberty of your voices and ſuffrages: to the end that we "might not be ſtinted and gaged in our exceſſive expenſes, in our diſſolute profuſion, in coſtly va"nities and ſuperfluities. Many a time ye have heard me complain of the waſtful and ſumptuous
"bravery of women: and as often have you known me to inveigh againſt the laviſh ſpending of "men, not privat perſons only, but magiſtrats alſo in higher place: and how this City of ours is ſick D "as it were at one time of two contrary diſeaſes and maladies, to wit pinching avarice, and ſuper-
"fluous prodigality, two plagues I ſay, that have been the bane and overthrow of all great Mo"narchies and flouriſhing empires. Theſe peſtilent miſchiefs I dread ſo much the more, as our "ſtate and common-weal encreaſeth to the better; groweth wealthy every day more than other;
"and as our dominion extendeth ſtill farther and farther. And now that we are gotten over into "Greece and Aſia, provinces full of all entiſing pleaſures and alluring delights of the world, now "that we are come to finger and handle the rich treaſures of mighty Monarchs, I fear me that even
"theſe things have rather captivated us, than we them. The goodly images, ſtatues and pictures
"that came from Syracuſa are (truſt me truly) dangerous to this City, and threaten no leſs than ſo
"many enſigns of the field diſplayed againſt it. And I hear ſay already, that there are many, and E "too too many, that praiſe and have in admiration the beautiful ornaments of Corinth & Athens,
"and begin to make a ſcorn and game of the images of the Roman Gods made of potters earth
"only, laughing much at them, where they ſee them ſtanding forth of the walls. Well, for my part
"I had rather have theſe gods ſo propice and favorable to us as they be than ſuch as thoſe: and ſo
"I hope they will ever be, if we can ſuffer them to abide ſtill in their uſual ſhrines and places ac"cuſtomed. No longer ago than in our fathers daies, King Pyrrhus ſent his Embaſſador Cyneas of "purpoſe, and aſſaied by rich and goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but alſo of "our women. There was no law Oppia as then in force to bridle and keep down the coſtly pomp "and bravery of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands. And what think
"ye was the cauſe? even the ſame and no other, for which our anceſtors in times paſt, never ſo F "much as thought upon the providing of any ſuch law. There was no pride then, nor riotous ſu-
"perfluity to reſtrain. And like as the skill and knowledge of diſeaſes, muſt præcede and go afore "their cures and remedies: even ſo evil deſires and enormous luſts had need to bud forth & ſpring
"before the laws, which ſhould repreſs and cut them down. What cauſed the law Licinia to be "made, concerning 500 acres of ground, forbidding that no man ſhould poſſeſs above, but the "exceeding covetouſnes of men, encroaching ſtill and laying land to land? What brought in the "law Cincia, as touching gifts and preſents, but this, that the Commons began already to be vaſſals
"as it were and tributaries to the Senat. No marvail therefore it is, nor ſtrange may it ſeem, that "neither the law Oppia, nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeaſurable expences of "women, was required and thought needful in thoſe daies; when gold, when purple freely tendred G "and offered unto them was refuſed. If now at this day Cyneas were come, and went with ſuch
"gifts round about in the City, he ſhould find receivers enough of women, ſtanding in every ſtreet
"ready for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I can not deviſe what the cauſe and reaſon "ſhould be of many luſtful deſires and appetites that reign in this age. For ſay, that if one of you "were kept ſhort and debarred of that which another might lawfully have: peradventure there "might riſe in your hearts (through infirmity) ſome ſhame and abaſhment in nature, or elſe diſ"pleaſure and diſcontentment in reaſon: ſo being all as ye are brought within one compaſs of fur" niture and apparel, and no ods at all between you, what need any one of you to fear, leſt ſhe H " ſhould be looked into, marked or obſerved, more than another. I muſt needs ſay, the ſhame that " followeth & attendeth either upon nigardiſe or poverty, is worſt of all others: but the law quit-

" teth and freeth you of both, when you want but that only which by law ye may not have, and
" no man wil reproach you therfore. Yes mary, quoth ſome rich and wealthy dame, this ſame e" quality and no diſtinction at al among us, of al things I can not abide: Why may not I according " to my calling, be ſeen araied in purple, and adorned with gold? And why is not the poor eſtate
" of others known, but lieth hidden under this pretext & cloak of a law: ſo as they may be thought
" yet (were it not for the law) that ſuch and ſuch things they would have; where as indeed they " are not able to maintain and bear it out? Would ye (in faith) my maſters and citizens of Rome,
" have your wives to ſtrive thus, that the richer ſort might deſerve to have that, which no other I
" can reach unto: and the poor again, becauſe by that means they would not be deſpiſed, over-
" ſtrein themſelves to go above their calling and ability? Certainly I dare avow, if they begin once
" to ſhame at that which is not ſhame-worthy, they will not abaſh at any thing, be it never ſo " ſhameful. Have it ſhe will out of her own, ſo long as it laſteth: and when all is gone, to her hus" bands purſe ſhe will go. Alas poor man and wo begun is that husband, as wel he that is intrea-
" ted by his wife, to ſtretch his purſe ſtrings, as he that is not, when he ſhal ſee another man to give " her that, which he would not allow himſelf. And even now ye ſee how openly in the ſtreet (un-
" ſhame-faced as they be) they are in hand with other womens husbands, yea, & that which more
" is, they keep an intreating for to caſs the law & for the favour of their voices only. For of ſome
" they have got the good wills no doubt already, whiles themſelves wil not be intreated, but draw K
" miſery upon thee, upon thy ſtate, and upon thy children. Wel, let the law once ceaſe to ſet down
" a gage and proportion of thy wives expences, and never think to have remedy, and to ſtay the " ſame of thy ſelf with all thou canſt do. Be not deceived ſirs, to think that the world will be ever " again at the ſame paſs, as it was before this law took place. And as it is a ſafer courſe and leſſe " dangerous to let a naughty and obſtinat perſon alone, that he be not called into queſtion at all;
" than after he is once accuſed to ſuffer him to be quit and go away unpuniſhed: even ſo this ex-" ceſſive ſuperfluity, would have been more tolerable if it had not been medled & tempered with" al, than it wil be now upon the very binding and curbing thereof: much like a wild and ſavage
" beaſt let looſe after it hath been tyed up a time, and ſo made more fell and angry. To conclude
" therfore, of this opinion am I, that of no hand the law Oppia be repealed: and ſo I pray all the L " Gods to vouchſafe for to bleſs and turn to good, whatſoever you do or go about. When he had
" thus ſaid, thoſe Tribuns alſo of the Commons, who openly promiſed and proteſted to oppoſe
" themſelves, and to croſs the repealing of the law, made ſome brief ſpeeches to the ſame effect.
" Then L. Valerius roſe up to maintain the bill by him propoſed for the revoking of that law, and The Oration of L. Valerius againſt the law Oppia. " ſpake as followeth. " If privat men had ſtepped forth and advanced forward either to approve " and perſwade, or to reject & diſſwade that which by us is propoſed, I my ſelf alſo without open" ing my mouth would have attended your wil & expected the delivery of your ſuffrages, as think" ing it had been ſufficiently debated and diſcourſed already, whatſoever might be ſaid for both " parties. But now ſith that the Conſul M. Porcius Cato, a man of great reputation & gravity, not " only by his countenance and authority, (which alone without any word at all ſpoken had been M
" important enough & effectual) but alſo in a long premeditate Oration framed with much ſtudy
" and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed againſt our propoſed ordinance, I muſt of ne-" ceſſity anſwer him again as briefly as I can. Who nevertheleſs hath ſpent more words in repro-
" ving and chaſtiſing the matrons & dames of the City, than he hath beſtowed reaſon to the pur" poſe in diſſwading our new law: & all verily for this intent, that he might leave it doubtful, whe" ther the women had done that which he blamed them for, as induced by their own motives, or " ſeduced by us and our ſuggeſtions. As for me the protection directly of the cauſe I will take in " hand, and not buſy and trouble my head in defence of our perſons, againſt whom the Conſul
" hath rather glanced and girded at, by way of big words, than charged indeed by ſound reaſons.
" It hath pleaſed him to cal this, An aſſembly and mutinous meeting: yea, and otherwhiles he ter- N
" meth it, An inſurrection and ſeceſſion of women: becauſe the wives in open place intreated you
" to repeal that law, now in time of peace, in the flouriſhing and bleſſed ſtate of the Common" weal, which during thoſe troubleſome daies of war, had been enacted againſt them. I wot full " well that both theſe words and other beſides are very ſignificant, ſought out, and picked for the " purpoſe, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all know, that M. Cato is an Orator not " only grave and earneſt, but otherwhiles alſo fell, ſharp and biter, how ever otherwiſe by natural
" diſpoſition he be of a mild ſpirit and courteous enough. But to the point. What new & ſtrange " thing is this that our wives have done, in coming abroad and aſſembling themſelves in compa" nies, about a matter that ſo much concerneth and importeth themſelves? What were they ne" ver ſeen before now, abroad in open ſtreet? I wil take the pains (Cato) to turn over your own O
" book of Originals againſt your ſelf. Liſten and mark how often they have done the ſemblable, " and alwaies truly for the common good and benefit of the State. And firſt and foremoſt, in the " very beginning and infancy of this City, even in the reign of K. Romulus, when the Capitol was " taken and held by the Sabins; when in the midſt of the Common place, they were ranged in bat-
" tel array and ready to fight a bloudy field, was not the quarrel ended and the conflict ſtayed by " the dames and wives that ran in, & put themſelves between the two armies? After the KK. were driven

A "driven out and expelled, What hapned tho? When as the legions of the Volſcians under the con"duct of C. Martius incamped within 5 miles of Rome, were they not the matrons of the City that "turned back this army, which doubtleſs would have forced our City & put it to ranſack? And "is not this likewiſe as true, that when the Gauls were poſſeſſed of Rome and maſters thereof, the "dames of the City and none but they, even by the conſent of all men, came forth into the open "ſtreets made a contribution, and laid down that gold which paid for the ranſom and redempti"on of the City? No longer ſince than in the laſt Punick war (becauſe I will not ſtand ſo much "upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not only when the City was at a fault for money, the "widows ſtocks ſupplied the want of the common treaſure? but alſo at what time as we were "driven to ſeek for new Gods, and to ſend for them afar off to ſuccour us in our extremities; all B "the wives & matrons of the City went to the Sea ſide for to receive the goddeſs Mother Idea?
"The occaſions (qd. he) are different, and the caſe is not alike. Neither is it my purpoſe or any "part of my meaning to compare cauſes, and to prove they are all one. This only I ſtand upon, and "take it ſufficient to excuſe and cleer the women, for bringing up no ſtrange novelty, in that they "ſhewed themſelves in open place. To proceed therefore: ſeeing that no man made any wonder
"then of that which women did in undertaking the affairs that concerned all alike as well men
"as women: marvail we now that they do the ſemblable, in a cauſe that properly and peculiarly "pertaineth to themſelves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith we are too
"coy and ſqueamiſh of our hearing, and our ears over nice and delicate, if when maſters diſdain
"not to hear the praiers of their ſervants and ſlaves, we ſcorn to give ear to the requeſts of ladies C "and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in queſtion, in regard whereof the Conſul "his Oration conſiſted in two points. For firſt, he took it very ill that any law at all once enacted "ſhould be revoked: and ſecondly he ſtood upon this that above all others the law deviſed and
"made for repreſſing the ſuperfluous ornaments and attire of women ſhould remain in force for "ever. So it ſhould ſeem, that the firſt part (a common defence as it were, of all the laws) was a
"ſpeech befitting the place and perſon of a Conſul: but the other againſt the exceeding pomp of "women, more properly became a man (as himſelf) of moſt ſevere life and preciſe carriage. And "therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, leſt we ſhould ſeduce you into ſome errour, if we "lay not down and ſhew plainly the vanity and defect both in the one and in the other. For as I
"confeſs, that of thoſe laws which are deviſed and eſtabliſhed not for a time and by occaſion of D "ſome particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a City, none ought to be "aboliſhed; unleſs it be ſo that by uſe and experience the ſame be checked and found hurtful, or
"by ſome change of the State become needleſs and ſuperfluous: ſo I ſee evidently, that thoſe ſta-
"tuts and ordinances which are brought in to fit and ſerve ſome ſeaſons, are mortal (if I may ſo "ſay) and mutable with the times. And oftentimes we ſee, that war diſclaimeth thoſe laws which
"peace proclaimeth; and peace pulleth down that which war ſet up: like as in the government "and rule of a ſhip, one thing is requiſit in fair weather and calm Sea, another in foul and trouble-"ſome tempeſts. Theſe things thus being in nature divers and diſtinct, let us conſider I pray you,
"of whether ſort is this law that now we are in hand to revoke. What? is it one of the ancient "and royal laws made by the Kings, and equal in time with the foundation of our City? or (that E "which is the next in time and authority) was it ſet down and written in the twelve Tables by
"the Decemvirs, created of purpoſe to deviſe and make laws? Is it of that nature without the
"which as our anceſtors were of opinion, that the honeſty and honour of matrons could not "be preſerved: ſo we are to fear likewiſe, leſt by the repealing thereof, we overthrow the mode-
"ſty, chaſtity, and integrity of maried women? Why? who knoweth not that this is a new law "of 20 years ſtanding and continuance and no more, made whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius
"were Conſuls? And ſeeing that without it, wives lived ſo many years before in good name and "fame, and in paſſing good order: tell me what danger can enſue, and why we need to fear leſt if "it be anulled, they ſhould break out to al looſenes and diſorder. Mary, if this law had been made
"at firſt, to gage the wantonneſs of women, believe me then it were greatly to be doubted, that F "the putting down thereof would ſtir them up again to their former outrage. But to what end
"it was deviſed, the time it ſelf is able to ſhew and teſtifie. Annibal being in Italy, had won a vi"ctory at Canne: he was now maſter of Tarentum, Lord of Arpi, and poſſeſſed of Capua: every "hour men looked when he would march forward and advance his enſigns againſt Rome: our al"lies were revolted and gone: ſouldiers we had no more of our own to ſupply and make up the "decaied bands: no mariners and Sea ſervitors could we find for the maintenance of our Arma-
"do; all our treaſure in the City Chamber was ſpent and conſumed. Driven we were to this
"exigent, as to take up bondſlaves for to ſerve in wars, and to buy them of their maſters for day, "yea, and to make payment of their price after the war was ended. For want of money alſo the "Publicans and Farmors of our demain and publick profits, undertook to ſerve the army with G "corn, and to furniſh us with all things needful for war at a certain price, and gave us the like day "and time of payment. The Gally ſlaves that ſerved at the oar we found and maintained with "our own proper and private charges; and a rate and proportion was ſet down according to "our revennes and worth in the ſubſidy book, what number every one ſhould be charged with.
"All the gold and ſilver that we had in private we brought forth in common, and the Senators "themſelves led the way firſt, and gave good enſample. The widdows and orphan Children brought in their ſtocks of money to the City Chamber. Streight order was given, that

" we ſhould not have in our houſes either of gold or ſilver, wrought in plate or otherwiſe above H
" ſo much, nor of ſilver and braſs in coin and currant money beyond a certain proportion limit-
" ted. At ſuch a time, our dames (belike) were ſet all upon their braveries, pruning, trimming, and " tricking themſelves, in ſuch ſort, as the law Oppia muſt needs be deviſed, there was no other " remedy to keep down their exceſſive pride and ſuperfluous expence in their attire and orna" ments: even then, I ſay, when by occaſion that the ſolemn feaſt and ſacrifice of Ceres was diſ-
" continued, by reaſon of the general mourning and heavy chear of all the wives of the City, the " Senat was fain to take order, that they ſhould finiſh and end their ſorrowful mourning within " thirty dayes. Who is ſo blind that ſeeth not, how in regard only of the poverty and extream
" calamity of the City, and becauſe all the monies of private perſons ſhould be converted into a " common ſtock, and for a publick uſe, this law was firſt framed, drawn, and ſet down, ſo long I
" only to ſtand in ſtrength and vertue, as the cauſe of penning and writing it ſhould endure and " continue? For otherwiſe, if thoſe acts and decrees of the Senat, if thoſe orders and ordinances
" of the Commons, reſpective unto that preſent time, ſhould be in force, and obſerved for ever;
" Why make we paiment of the loan money unto private men? Why do we ſet and to ferm let " our commodities, our cuſtomes and revenues of the City, unto farmers for ready rent? Why put
" we forth our publick works for preſent money paid down upon the nail? Wherefore buy we " not ſlaves to ſerve in our wars? Laſtly, why are we not put to find mariners and oarmen, at our " own proper charges, as then we did? All other eſtates and degrees, all men elſe, of what calling
" ſoever, feel a great change in the eſtate of the City, from wo to weal, from adverſity to proſperi-
" ty; and ſhall our wives only miſs the good thereof, and not once taſt nor enjoy the fruits of K
" peace, and publick repoſe and tranquillity? Shall we that are men be in purple and ſcarlet? ſhall
" we wear our embrodered gowns and robes when we are Magiſtrats? ſhall we put on our rich
" amyces and copes, when we exerciſe the function and miniſtery of the high Prieſts? ſhall our " children go in their ſide garments, purfled afore with purple? ſhall we permit and priviledge the " head Officers and Magiſtrats in our Colonies and Burrough Towns? nay, ſhall we ſuffer here at " Rome the Maſters and Conſtables of every pariſh, the meaneſt and baſeſt officers of all other to " wear embrodered gowns, & ſtudded with purple? and not only ſo, for to grace and credit them" ſelves, with theſe goodly ornaments and badges of worſhip and honour during their life, but al-
" ſo after their death, the ſame to be burned and buried with them? And ſhall we debar and for" bid our women only to uſe purple and ſcarlet in their apparel? And when you the husband may L " have purple and ſcarlet, carpets, counter-points, and foot-cloths, what reaſon is there to deny " your wife, the miſtreſs of the houſe, a gown or mantle of the ſame? And ſhall your horſe be trap" ped and barbed more richly, and better ſet out with his capariſon, than your wife arraied in her " apparrel? But in truth, for purple and ſcarlet, which are the worſe for the wearing, and waxeth
" bare, me thinks I ſee ſome reaſon, ſuch as it is (although it be very hard) of ſparing and reſtraint:
" mary for gold wherein little or nothing is loſt but the faſhion and workmanſhip, what niggar-
" diſe, what miſery is this, to make ſpare of it, and to deny it them? Nay, I dare avow and abide by
" it there is great benefit and uſe thereof in time of extremity; and it may help at a pinch both in " publick affairs, and in private occaſions, as ye have found by good experience. But Cato ſaid
" moreover, There would be no emulation and envy between this good wife and that, if neither M
" one nor other were allowed that liberty of apparel and ornaments. True it is, but inſtead there-
" of they all are mightily diſcontented and grieved at the heart in the mean while, diſdaining to " ſee the wives of our allies of the Latine name and Nation, permitted to wear thoſe ornaments
" which they are forbidden to have, to ſee them, I ſay, all gorgeouſly ſet out with ſpangles and " jewels of gold, clad in their purple and ſcarlet cloths, riding in their coaches all over their cities,
" whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were " ſeated in their Towns, and not in this their own City of Rome. This indignity were enough to " wound the hearts of men, and make them bleed; what hurt doth it then, think you, to ſilly wo" men, whom ſmall matters, God wot, are wont to trouble? Alas poor ſouls: no magiſtracy and " place of government in State, no ſacerdotal dignities in the Church, no triumphs no ornaments N
" and titles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no ſpoils and prizes gotten in wars, can fall to " their ſhares. Neatneſs and fineneſs, gay garments, trim attire, and gorgeous habiliments, are the " honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they ſet their hearts, of it they " make their joy. And therefore well have our anceſtors called all furniture for the decking of " women [Mundus Muliebris.] What lay they off in time of ſorrow and mourning, but their gold
" and purple? what put they on and reſume again, when their mourning is paſt, but their gold and " purple? what hang they on them beſides in time of publick joy and ſolemn proceſſions but their " better apparel, their richeſt attire & moſt coſtly ornaments? But peradventure, after ye have once " repealed the law Oppia, it will not be in your power to over-rule them, if haply you ſhould for" bid them to wear any thing that now the law reſtraineth them of. And perhaps ſome ſhall have O
" more ado with their daughters, their wives, and ſiſters, and find them leſs tractable and pliable
" unto their minds than now they are. Never fear that: women cannot ſhake off their obedience,
" ſo long as their Governors (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other " things they abhor and cannot brook to be at their own liberty, when it cometh by the death ei" ther of husbands or parents: Widows ſtate and Orphans life, they may not abide. Be ſure therefore, they had rather have their ornaments and attire to be at the diſpoſition of your ſelves than

A "of the law. And therefore, to ſpeak a truth, you muſt in equity and reaſon protect and defend "them in kindneſs, and not oppreſs them with hardneſs and bondage: delight ye muſt to be called "to give them hard words and odious terms, calling this their meeting, A mutiny of women, and

"a very inſurrection and departure of theirs: and danger there is, no doubt, leſt being up once, they "will ſeize upon the mount Sacer, as ſometimes the Commons did in their furious anger, or elſe

"rity ye have over them, the more diſcretion and moderation ye ought to uſe in that ſoveraignty B "of yours. After debate of words paſſed in this wiſe, in favor and diſfavor of the law, the day following the women flocked in greater multitudes into the open ſtreets, and banding themſelves together, as it were, in one troop, they beſet the dores and houſes of the Bruti, who by interpoſing themſelves, had hindred and croſſed the bill preferred by their fellow Tribuns: and never gave they over to keep this ſtir, until thoſe Tribuns ſlaked in their oppoſition, for to inhibit the ſame. Which done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and aboliſh that law. Thus twenty year after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and annulled. The law Oppia repealed.

M. Porcius Cato after the abrogation of the law Oppia, preſently departed with a fleet of five and twenty Gallies, whereof five were ſet out by Allies, and arrived in the Port of * Luna, to which place he commanded his forces to aſſemble: and after by vertue of an edict ſent out along C the Sea coaſt, he had gathered together veſſels of all ſorts as he looſed from Luna; and proclaimed that they ſhould all follow after him to the Port of Pyreneus, from whence he purpoſed to ſet forth againſt the enemy, with an Armado of many ſail, and well appointed. Who having paſſed beyond the mountains of Liguria and the gulf of Gaul, arrived and met all together, at the day and place appointed. From thence they came againſt * Rhoda, where they expelled the Spaniſh garriſon that held the fortreſs. From Rhoda with a good gale of wind, they ſailed to Emporiæ.
Where, all the whole army, excepting the mariners, were ſet a land. At the ſame time Emporiæ were two Towns, ſeparate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by Greeks, who came from Phocæa, from whence the Maſſilians alſo are deſcended: the other was poſſeſſed by Spaniards. But the Greeks Town lieth out into the Sea, ſo as the whole compaſs of D the wall is not half a mile about: but the Spaniſh Town ſeated farther into the Land, and divided from the Sea, is defended with a wall three miles in circuit. A third ſort of Roman inhabitants were joyned unto them by * Cæſar the Emperor of famous memory, after he had vanquiſhed Pompeys children. And at this day, they are confuſed and mingled one with another, and become one entire body, by reaſon that firſt the Spaniards, and afterward the Greeks, were made free denizens of the City of Rome. A man might well marvail, ſeeing how open they lie of the one ſide to the main Sea, how expoſed they are on the other ſide to the danger of the Spaniards, a Nation ſo fierce and warlike, what thing it was that garded and protected them? Diſcipline it was and good government, and nothing elſe, which maintained and preſerved them in that weakenes of theirs; diſcipline I ſay, which is ever beſt intertained of them, who live in fear of the mightier that are E round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is paſſing ſtrong and exceeding well fortified, having but one gate in all that ſide; which ordinarily is alwayes warded by one of the Magiſtrats. In the night, one third part uſually of the citizens kept watch upon the walls. And this watch they mainrained not for cuſtome and faſhion, nor by vertue of any law: but they performed it with as great care, yea, and went the round and ſaw to the ſentinels with as much diligence, as if the enemies were hard at gates. A Spaniard came not within the City; neither went they forth themſelves, unleſs it were upon juſt occaſion. But on the Sea ſide the iſſue was open for any man at his pleaſure. By that gate which turneth toward the Spaniſh Town, they never uſed to go forth but in great number, even a third part welneer of the Townſmen, and thoſe who the night before had watched upon the walls. And this cauſe induced them to go abroad, for that the Spa-F niards being no men at Sea, gladly would traffick and trade with them: willingly buying of them their ſtrange merchandiſe from forein parts brought in by ſhips: and venting unto them again their Land commodities and fruits ariſing of the main. The deſire of this mutual commerce and neceſſary intercourſe was the cauſe, that the Spaniſh Town was open to the Greeks. And in greater ſafety and ſecurity they were alſo, by reaſon that they were ſhadowed under the wing of the Roman amity, which they intertained with as great loyalty as the Maſſilians, although they were nothing ſo mighty and puiſſant. And even at this time they received the Conſul and his army with great courteſie and liberality. Cato ſojourned there ſome few dayes, whiles he was advertiſed by his eſpials where his enemies abode, and what their forces were: and becauſe he would not be idle whiles he ſtayed there, he beſtowed all that time in training and exerciſing his ſouldiers. It G hapned to be that ſeaſon of the year, when the Spaniards had their corn within their granges ready for the thraſhing floor, whereupon he forbad the cornpurveiors to provide grain, and ſent them home to Rome. War, ſaith he, ſhall feed and maintain it ſelf. Being departed from * Emporiæ, he waſted and burnt the territory of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he came, and put them in exceeding fright.

At the ſame time, as M. Helvius departed out of the farther Province of Spain with 6000 garriſon ſouldiers delivered unto him by the Pretor, he was encountred by a great army of the Celtiberians, before the Town Illiturgum. Valerius writeth, that they were 20000 ſtrong: that 12000 of them were ſlain, the Town Illiturgum won again, and all above 14 years of age put to the ſword. From thence Helvius marched to the camp of Cato: and becauſe the countrey was cleer from enemies, he ſent back the garriſon into the nether Spain, and took his journey to Rome, where he entred the City Ovant in pety triumph, for the happy ſucceſs atchieved in his affairs. He brought into the treaſury, of ſilver in bullion or Ingots, 14732 pound weight: of ſilver coin 17023 bigate peeces: and of Oſcane ſilver 120338 pound weight. The cauſe why the Senat denied him full triumph, was this, for that he warred under the conduct and name of another, and not in his own province. But it was two years before he returned, by reaſon that the year between he was ſtayed there, lying ſick of a long and grievous diſeaſe, and put over his government to Q. Minutius his ſucceſſor. Whereupon Helvius likewiſe entred the City of Rome in that manner of triumph, two months only before his ſucceſſor Q. Minutius triumphed. He likewiſe brought into the Chamber of the City 34800 pound weight of ſilver in maſs: of bigats in coin 78000: of Oſcane ſilver 278000 pound.

All this while the Conſul lay encamped in Spain not far from Emporiæ. Thither repaired unto him from Biliſtages a Prince of the Ilergets, three Embaſſadors, whereof his ſon was one: complaining that their forts were aſſailed by force of arms, and they had no other hope to make reſiſtance, unleſs they might have a guard of Roman ſouldiers to defend them, 5000 ſay they will be ſufficient: for never would the enemies abide by it if ſuch a power came againſt them. The Conſul anſwered them and ſaid, that he had a feeling and compaſſion of the peril or fear (whether it was) wherein they ſtood: howbeit, he was not at that time furniſhed with ſuch forces, that he might ſafely ſpare ſo many out of his main army, thereby to diſmember the ſame and to empair his ſtrength, conſidering a mighty hoſt of his enemies was not far off, with whom he looked every day, and he knew not how ſoon, to joyn battail in open field with banner diſplaied. The Embaſſadors hearing this, fell down proſtrate at the Conſuls feet, and ſhed tears, humbly beſeeching him not to forſake them in this piteous plight. "For whither (ſay they) ſhall we go, if we be repul-
"ſed from the Romans? No allies we have beſides, nor other hope in all the world. This danger
"we might have avoided wel enough, if we would have been falſe and diſloyal: if we would have "banded and rebelled with other Spaniards: but no menaces, no terrors preſented unto us, could "drive us to renounce our fealty, hoping alwayes that we ſhould have help and ſuccour enough
"from the Romans: but now if no help, if no relief come from thence; if we be denied at the "Conſuls hand; heaven and earth we call to witnes, that we muſt be forced, full againſt our wills
"and upon mere neceſſity, to revolt from the Romans, for fear we drink of the ſame cup that the "Saguntins have done afore us; and chooſe we will to die with the reſt of the Spaniards for com"pany, rather than periſh alone by our ſelves. So for that day they were diſmiſſed without other anſwer. But all the night following, the Conſul was much diſtracted in mind, and careful in both reſpects. Unwilling he was to caſt off his allies and ſee them deſtitute; and as unwilling again to break his army conſidering that in ſo doing, he might either delay the opportunity of giving battail or endanger himſelf in the very inſtant of conflict. But at length he reſolved in no wiſe to diminiſh his own forces; doubting leſt in the mean while he ſhould receive ſome diſhonor at the enemies hand. As for his aſſociats, he thought it beſt to intertain them with good hopes, for want of better helps; conſidering that oftentimes and eſpecially in war, outward ſemblances and vain ſhews, are held and taken for truth and ſubſtance, and ſerve the turn well enough: and when a man is throughly perſwaded that he hath aid and ſuccour, the very truſt and confidence thereof hath miniſtred heart to give the venture of ſome exploit and preſerved him as well as the thing it ſelf. The next morrow he delivered this anſwer unto the Embaſſadors, That albeit he feared to abate his own ſtrength, in ſerving other mens turn with any part of his forces, yet he had at this preſent more regard of their occaſions and dangerous eſtate than of his own. Whereupon he gave commandment, that a third part of all his bands and companies ſhould have warning to bake and dreſſe viands with all ſpeed, for to beſtow and lay in the ſhips; and ſtreightly he charged, that they ſhould be rigged and ready appointed againſt the third day: and willed withal, two of the Embaſſadors to report ſo much to Biliſtages and the Ilergets. As for the young Prince his ſon, he detained ſtill with him, uſed him graciouſly, and beſtowed favours and rich gifts upon him bounteouſly. The Embaſſadors took not their leave nor departed, before they ſaw the ſouldiers embarked: and thus by making relation hereof as a thing aſſured and paſt all peradventure, they filled the heads not of their own friends only, but alſo of the enemies, with the bruit of Roman aids coming neer at hand. The Conſul now, when he had ſet this countenance of the matter, and made ſufficient ſemblance to ſerve his purpoſe, gave order that the ſouldiers ſhould be disbarked again & ſet a land: and himſelf ſeeing now that the time of the year approached commodious for action and execution of martial affairs, diſlodged and removed his ſtanding winter camp within a mile of Emporiæ. From whence (as any occaſions and opportunities were preſented) he led forth his ſouldiers a foraging and plundering into the enemies land, ſometime one way and ſometime another, leaving alwayes a competent guard to defend the camp. Ordinarily their manner was to ſteal out by night, to the intent that both they might go on ſtil farther from their leaguer, & alſo ſurpriſe the enemies at unawares and unprovided: by which means not only his new & raw ſouldiers were exerciſed, but alſo many of his enemies were caught up and came ſhort home: whereupon they durſt no more peep out of their forts & holds of defence. Now after he had made ſufficient proof

A proof of the hearts as well of his own men as of his enemies, he commanded all the Marſhals, Colonels, Horſemen, and Centurions, to aſſemble before him: and unto them he made this ſpeech. "The time (quoth he) is now come, that you ſo often have wiſhed for; in which you may ſhew "at full your vertue and valour. Your ſervice hitherto hath been more like the manner of for- "ragers than warriors: but now ſhall ye come to a main battail, and as enemies, fight hand to "hand with profeſſed enemies. From henceforth you may if you will, not waſt their fields only "and ſpoil their territory, but ranſack the pillage of rich and wealthy cities. Our fathers before "us and anceſtours in times paſt, when as in Spain there were both Generals and armies of Car- "thaginians, having themſelves no leaders and commanders, no ſouldiers and forces there, yet "would they needs have this article among others capitulated in the accord and compoſition B "with the Spaniards, That the River of Iberus ſhould limit their Seignory and dominion. Now "at this day, when two Pretors and a Conſul, when three entire Roman armies have the go- "vernment and charge of Spain; now, I ſay, after ten years ſpace almoſt, wherein no Carthagi- "nians have ſet foot and been ſeen in all theſe quarters of both provinces, we have loſt our ſeig- "nory on this ſide Iberus. This muſt ye recover and win again by force of arms, by manhood and "valour: ye muſt I ſay, compel this nation, more raſh and inconſiderate in rebelling, than con- "ſtant and reſolute in maintaining war, for to receive once more the yoke of ſubjection, which "they have ſhaken from off their necks. Having exhorted and encouraged them in this manner, he gave them to underſtand, that he would ſet forward in the night and lead againſt the enemies camp. And ſo he let them depart to refreſh their bodies. At midnight, after he had devoutly C taken with him the ſigns and approbations of the birds for his better ſpeed, he put himſelf in his journey: and becauſe he might be ſeized of ſome place to his liking before the enemies ſhould deſcry him, he ſet a compaſs in his march, and led his ſouldiers clean beyond their camp. And having by day light ſet his companies in battel array, he ſent out three cohorts, even cloſe to the rampier and trench of the enemy. The barbarous people wondering to ſee the Romans ſhew themſelves behind at their back, ran to and fro to take arms. Mean while, the Conſul held his men with theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches: "My ſouldiers (quoth he) there is no other hope now "left, but in mere ſtrength and valour, and I of very purpoſe have wrought it ſo. Between us "and our camp the enemies are encamped all: behind at our back we have our enemies Land. "The braveſt courſes are ever ſafeſt, namely, to build and ground our hope ſurely upon vertue. D And herewithal he gave order, that the cohorts aforeſaid ſhould retire of purpoſe to train forth the barbarous people, by making ſemblance of retreat and flight. And ſo fell it out in very deed as he thought and ſuppoſed: for they imagining that the Romans for very fear were retired, iſſued forth by heaps out of the gate, and beſpred with armed men all the ground, that lay between their own camp and the enemies battel. And whiles they made great haſt to embattel themſelves, the Conſul who was already arranged in battel array, and in all reſpects well appointed, charged upon them before they were marſhalled and ſet in order. Firſt he put forth the cornets and wings of horſemen from both points and flanks of the battail: but they of the right ſide were ſtraight- wayes repulſed, and by their haſty and fearful retreating, cauſed the footmen alſo to be mightily affraid. Which the Conſul perceiving, he commanded two elect cohorts of footmen to wheel E about the right flank of the enemies, and to ſhew themſelves at their backs before the other companies of foot encountred and charged one another. This ſuddain terror affrighted the ene- mies, but ſet all upright again and recovered the battail of the Romans, which through the fear of the Cavalry began to ſhrink and go down. Howbeit the horſemen and footmen both of the right point, were ſo troubled and ſo far out of order, that the Conſul was forced to pluck ſome of them back with his own hand, and turn them with their faces affront the enemy. Thus all the while that the ſhot laſted, the skirmiſh was doubtful: ſo as now the Romans in the skirmiſh, had much ado to make head and ſtand to it in the right ſide, whereas the fright and flight firſt began. But on the left and all affront, the barbarous had the worſt, and with great horror they looked behind and ſaw their enemies how they played upon their backs and reſted not. After they had F done with flinging their iron darts and lancing their fiery javelins, they drew their ſwords; and herewith began the conflict afreſh. They were not wounded now from a far off by blind chance and hap-hazard they knew not from whence; but foot to foot they ſtood, and hand to hand they coped and let drive one at another: no hope at all was now but to truſt in pure ſtrength and main force. The Conſul ſeeing his men wearied, encouraged and refreſhed them by ſending for to relieve and maintain the fight, certain cohorts out of the rereward. This new battaillon well in heart, and with freſh weapons, charged the enemies toiled and tired: and being ranged in pointed wiſe like a quoin or wedge at the firſt hot onſet brake their arraies: and being once diſ- ordered, they put them to flight, and in ſcattering wiſe they ran as faſt as their legs would carry them, to their camp. Cato ſeeing them flie on all hands, mounted on horſeback and rode him- G ſelf to the ſecond legion which was in the rereward for ſupply, and commanded to advance the ſtandards and enſigns before him, to march apace, and to approach the camp of the enemies for to give an aſſault. If he eſpied any one to ſtep out of his rank, he would ride before and rap him with his light javelin that he had in his hand; commanding the Marſhals and Captains to cha- ſtice him for it. Now was the enemies camp at the point to be aſſaulted, and the Romans were with ſtones, pikes, perches, and all kind of weapons ſet back and driven from the trench. But when this freſh legion approached neer, then both the aſſailants were more encouraged, and alſo the

the enemies fought more luſtily in defence of their rampier. The Conſul caſt his eye all about him, to ſpie how to break in at ſome place or other where leaſt reſiſtance might be made: and ſeeing the guard thin about the left gate, thither he conducted the Principals and the Haſtati of the ſecond legion: but the corps de guard which warded that gate, was not able to endure their violent charge. The reſt on the other ſide, ſeeing the enemies within the rampier, abandoned the camp, and flung away their enſigns and weapons. The ſouldiers of the ſecond legion followed the chaſe and killed them as they ran away, whiles the other ranſacked and rifled their tents. Valerius Antias writeth, that there were 60000 fell that day upon the edge of the ſword. Cato himſelf (that never loved to make the leaſt of his own praiſe-worthy acts) ſaith, there were many ſlain; but ſetteth not down what number. He is thought to have performed that day three peeces of ſervice worthy of great praiſe and commendation: firſt, in that he fet a compaſs with his army far from his ſhips, far from his camp, and gave battail in the midſt of the enemies, where his men could repoſe no hope at all but in their own vertue and valour: ſecondly, for ſending thoſe cohorts behind the enemies to charge upon their backs: and thirdly, for that he cauſed the ſecond legion to march a great pace under their colours diſplaid, ranged as they were and ordered in battail array, for to approach and aſſail the gates of the enemies camp, whiles all the reſt were disbanded and ſpread all abroad to purſue the enemy in chaſe.

After this victory atchieved, he ſat not ſtill in reſt and repoſe, but having ſounded the retreat and brought his own ſouldiers loden with pillage into the camp, he allowed them ſome few hours for their night ſleep, and led them forth into the territory of the enemy to forrage and ſpoil: which was as effectual to enforce the Spaniſh Emporitans, and all their neighbour borderers to yeeld ſubjection, as the unhappy battel fought the day before. Many alſo of other Cities, which were retired to Emporia for refuge, rendered themſelves to his devotion: whom he entertained all with gracious words, and when he had made them good cheer, beſtowing wine and cates plentifully upon them, he ſent them home to their own houſes. Then immediately he diſlodged and removed his camp. And all the way as he marched with his army there reſorted Embaſſadors from divers States that yeelded themſelves unto him. By that time that he was come as far as Taracon, all Spain on this ſide Iberus, was wholly ſubdued: and the barbarous people brought in as preſents unto the Conſul, all the captives and priſoners, as well Romans as Allies, and namely, Latins, who by many and ſundry chances had been taken in Spain. The bruit went commonly abroad, that the Conſul would lead his power into Turdetania. There was a falſe alarm likewiſe given, and ſpoken it was, That he would viſit the mountainers that lay out of the way. Upon this vain and headleſs rumour, there were ſeven forts belonging to the State of the Bergiſtans that revolted from him: but the Conſul led his army againſt them, and without any memorable battel reduced them under obedience. And the Conſul his back was no ſooner turned, and he gone to Taracon, but they rebelled again, even before he was departed from thence in any other expedition. Subdued they were the ſecond time, but they found not the like favour as before, to have pardon: for they were all ſold like ſlaves in open market, under the garland becauſe they ſhould not thus every while trouble the peace.

In this mean time P. Manlius the Pretor, after he had received the old army at the hands of Q. Mutius whom he ſucceeded, and joined thereto the other army of old ſouldiers belonging to Appius Claudius, and which were come out of the farther Spain, he made an expedition into Turdetania. Now theſe Turdetans of all other Spaniards are counted to be the worſt ſouldiers, howbeit, in confidence of their great numbers and multitudes they came forward and encountred the Roman forces. But the men of arms had no ſooner charged them, but preſently, they were diſarraied. As for the footmen, they fought in manner not at all. The old approved ſouldiers, who knew the enemies very well, and were experienced in feats of arms, made a quick diſpatch of this skirmiſh, and ſoon put all paſt peradventure. Howbeit, the war was not ſo ended, nor determined in one battel. The Turdetans levied and waged 1000 Celtiberians, and ſo maintained war afreſh with forrain mercenary forces.

The Conſul being ſtung already with the Rebellion of the Turdetans, and ſuppoſing that other Cities would do the like, upon any good occaſion and opportunity, diſfurniſhed all the Spaniards on this ſide Iberus of their armor and munition. Which they took for ſuch an indignity, that many of them for very melancholly killed themſelves: a martial and warlike nation, that thought they were as good be out of the world, as turned out of their arms; and reckoned no life, without their weapons. The Conſul having intelligence hereof, commanded the Senators of all thoſe Cities to repair unto him: and when they were aſſembled together, he uſed this ſpeech unto them. "It "concerneth you (qd. he) no leſs than us, to give over this rebelling and warring. For never yet "to this day have ye entred into the action, but with more loſs and damage of Spaniards, than "toil and travel of the Roman army. To prevent this miſchief that it ſhould not happen, I ſup"poſe one good way it is, to contrive and work ſo, that ye might not poſſibly be able to rebel. "Effect this I would fain, by the eaſieſt mean and courſe of all other. Aſſiſt me I pray you herein "with your good counſel: I aſſure you I will not be directed by any adviſe more willingly, than by "that which you your ſelves ſhall give me. When they held their tongues, and would not ſpeak a word, he ſaid unto them again, that he was content they ſhould pauſe upon the matter, and conſult therof a few daies. When they were called again & kept ſilence in this ſecond meeting and conference as wel as in the former; he made no more ado, but in one day raſed the wals of al their Cities: which

A which done, he went forward against those that hitherto were not come in, not yeelded obedience: and into what quarters soever he came, he received all the States one after another, there bordering and adjoining, into his protection; save only Segestica, a wealthy City and of importance, the which he forced with mantelets and rolling pavoises, and such like fabricks. More difficulty in subduing these enemies he found, than others afore him who first came into Spain; in this regard, for that in times past the Spaniards at the beginning revolted unto them, as being weary of the tedious yoke of subjection under the lordly government and tyranny of the Carthaginians. But Cato had more ado with them now, in that out of liberty and freedom, which they had usurped and been used to, he was to ingage them (as it were) bond, and to bring them again to servitude. Besides, he found all out of frame and order, whiles some of them were up in arms, others
B were forced by siege to revolt, as not able to have held out long, unless they had been rescued and succoured in time. But of this nature and courageous mind was the Consul, that he would himself in person be present and manage all affairs, as well those of smallest moment, as also those of greatest weight and consequence: and not only devise and give direction what was best to be done, but would himself set to his hand, and execute most of the exploits and effect them fully. There was not one amongst them all, that he commanded with more severity and rigour, than his own self. In living meerly, in spare feeding, in much watching, in painful travel, he strived to surpass and outgo the meanest common souldiers. And no priviledge challenged he, no advantage sought he to himself in his whole army above others, but only honour and soveraign command.

C whom (as it hath been said before) the enemies had levied and hired with their mony. And therefore the Consul being sent unto by the Pretor his letters, led his legions also thither. Being there arrived, (now the Celtiberians and Turditans were severally encamped apart one from the other) the Romans fell presently to maintain light skirmishes with the Turditans, and ever and anon charged their corps de guard: and how rashly and inconsiderately soever they began the game, yet they ever went away winners. As for the Celtiberians, the Consul sent certain Tribuns or Knight Marshals unto them to emparle, giving them in charge to make them an offer and tender unto them the choice of three conditions. First, if they could be content to arrange themselves to serve under the Romans, and to receive at their hands double wages to that they bargained for with the Turditans. Secondly, whether they would be willing to go their waies home under safe con-D duct and publick security, besides that their siding with the Roman enemies should not be laid to their charge, nor bring them within the compass of any danger. Thirdly, if they had more mind to war, than, that they should set down some time and place, when and where they might come to an issue, and trie it out in a set battail. The Celtiberians required to take a day for to consider better upon these points. So they assembled together in counsel, with great trouble and confusion, by reason that some Turdetans were thrust in among them; upon which occasion, they might worse grow to any conclusion. Now albeit uncertain it was, whether there would be any war or peace with the Celtiberians, yet the Romans gathered their provision out of the territory and borroughs of their enemies, like as in time of peace: yea, and more than that, they entred oftentimes within their fortifications and defences, as if there had been some common traffick
E and commerce agreed between them, by way of private truce. The Consul seeing he could not draw the enemy to a battail, first led certain companies lightly appointed with banners displaied, to raise booties in one quarter of the country, which as yet was free, and not tasted of the wars: but afterwards hearing that all the bag and baggage and other cariage of the Celtiberians was left at Saguntia*, he set forward thither to give an assault to the Town. But seeing that nothing would move and stir them, he paied not only his own souldiers their wages, but also the Pretors army their due, and leaving the main host in the Pretor his camp, himself returned to the River Ebre, accompanied only with seven cohorts. With these forces, as small as they were, he won certain Towns, and there revolted unto him the Sedetans, Ansetans, and Suessetans. The Lacetans (a Nation living out of the way after a savage manner within the wilds and woods) kept F still in arms, not only upon a natural and inbred wildness, but also upon a guilty conscience, in that whiles the Consul and his army was employed in the Turdulois war, they had made suddain rodes and incursions into the Lands of their Allies, and pitifully wasted the same. And therefore the Consul advanced forward to assault their Town, and led against it not only his own cohorts and bands, but also the youth of his Allies, who had good cause to be angry, and to oppose themselves unto them. The Town which they inhabited, lay out in length, but was nothing so wide and large in breadth: and within one half mile or less, he pitched down his ensigns, and planted himself. There he left behind a guard of choise companies, and streightly charged them not to stir out of that place, before he came unto them himself. The rest of his forces he led about unto the farther side beyond the Town. Of all the aid souldiers that he had G about him, the greatest number were the youth of the Suessetans, and those he commanded to approach the wall for to give assault. The Lacetans, when they took knowledge of their armor and colours, calling to mind how often they had overrun them at their pleasure, and wasted their lands without check or empeachment, how many and sundry times they had in ranged battel discomfited & put them to flight, all at once set open the gate, and sallied out upon them. The Suessetans were so little able to sustain the forcible charge of their onset, that they hardly could abide their very shout & first cry. The Co. seeing now, that come to pass indeed which he suspected would be ſo, rode a gallop upon the ſpur to thoſe ſaid cohorts of his own that were left on the other H ſide under the Town, and taking them with him in great haſt, whiles all the Townſmen were ſpread abroad in following the chaſe after the Sneſſetans, he led them into the Town at a place where there was no noiſe, no ſtirring, and not a man to be ſeen; and made himſelf maſter of all, before the Lacetans were returned back: but within a while he received them to mercy upon their ſubmiſſion: who, poor men, had nothing to yeeld and loſe but their bare armor and weapons. Immediatly he followed the train of this victory, and led his forces againſt the hold or ſtrong Town of Vergium. This was a receptacle and place of ſure receit for certain Rovers and Theeves, who from thence uſed to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that Province.

The principal and chief perſon of Vergium quit the place, and betook himſelf unto the Conſul, and began to excuſe as well himſelf as the Townſmen; ſaying, that the government of the Town I and the ſtate thereof lay not in their hands. For why? theſe robbers after they were once received in among them, ſeized themſelves wholly of that ſtrength, and had all at their command. The Conſul willed him to go home again, and to deviſe and forge ſome likely and probable cauſe why he had been abſent and out of the way; with this charge and direction, that when he ſaw him approach under the walls, and the robbers aforeſaid wholly amuſed and occupied in defence thereof, then he ſhould remember to join with the reſt of his part and faction, and be poſſeſſed of the fortreſs and hold of the Town. This put he in practiſe and execution accordingly. So whiles the Romans of one ſide ſcaled the walls, and they on the other ſide had taken the fortreſs, theſe barbarians were ſuddainly at once ſurpriſed with a two-fold fear before and behind. The Conſul when he had gotten the place into his own hands, gave order, that all thoſe who were gotten K into the Caſtle and held it, ſhould remain free, themſelves and all their kinred, and likewiſe enjoy their goods. The reſt of the Vergetans he commanded the Treaſurer to ſell and make mony of them. As for the Rovers, they ſuffred according to their deſerts. After he had ſet the Province in quiet, he laid great tributes and impoſts upon the mines of iron and ſilver: which being once ordained and eſtabliſhed, the whole province grew in wealth and riches, every day more than other. For theſe his exploits atchieved in Spain, the LL. of the Senat decreed, that there ſhould be a ſolemn proceſſion at Rome, to endure for three dayes.

The ſame winter, L. Valerius Flaccus the other Conſul, fought in France a ſet field with the power of the Boians, neer the foreſt of Litania, and wan the victory. And by report, there were eight thouſand Gauls there ſlain: the reſt abandoned the war, and ſlipt every one into their own L Hamlets and Villages. The reſt of the winter the Cof. kept his army at Placentia and Cremona about the Po, and repaired in theſe Cities whatſoever had been decaied and demoliſhed during the wars.

The affairs in Italy and Spain ſtanding in theſe terms: when T. Quintius had ſo paſſed the winter in Greece, the ſetting aſide the Ætolians (who neither had been recompenced according to the hope that they conceived of the victory, nor yet could long time like of repoſe) all Greece throughout in general enjoying the bleſſing of peace and liberty, flouriſhed and mainteined their ſtate exceeding well, admiring no leſs the temperance, juſtice, and moderation of the Roman General after victory, than his valour and proweſs in war: there was an Act of the Senat of Rome brought and preſented unto him, importing thus much, That war was determined againſt Nabis M the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. Which when Quintius had read, he publiſhed and proclaimed a general Diet or Councel at Corinth againſt a certain day, when and where all the States aſſociats ſhould aſſemble by their delegats and Embaſſadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of Princes and great perſonages, in ſuch ſort, that the very Ætolians alſo were not abſent, Quintius uſed unto them this or the like ſpeech. "The Romans & Greeks have
"warred againſt King Philip as ye well know; and as with one mind and common counſel they "have ſo done, ſo either of them had ſeveral quarrels unto him, and privat cauſes and occaſions
"by themſelves to take arms. For Philip had broken the league and amity with us Romans, one
"while by ſending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies: otherwhiles by aſſail- N
"ing our allies in theſe parts: and to you wards he hath ſo demeaned himſelf, that albeit we could "forget and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injuries that ye have re"ceived at his hands, miniſter ſufficient cauſe unto us to war againſt him for your ſake. As for "this dayes conſultation, it reſteth wholly in your ſelves. For, this I propound unto you, Whe"ther your will is to ſuffer Argos (which as ye know your ſelves Nabis the tyrant holdeth) to "remain ſtill under him in obedience: or whether you think it meet and reaſon, that a moſt noble
"and ancient City as it is, ſeated in the very heart of Greece, ſhould be reduced unto liberty, to "enjoy the ſame condition and ſtate wherein other Cities of Peloponneſus and Greece do ſtand.
"This conſultation I ſay, as you well ſee, entirely toucheth you and your good, and concerneth
"us Romans no farther than thus, that by the ſervitude of that one only City, we can not have "the full and entire glory of ſetting Greece wholly in liberty. But if you regard not the ſtate of O
"that City, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for fear the contagion
"of this miſchief ſpred farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in good worth, and will "not ſet you down and teach you what to do. Only I require your advice in this point, mind"ing to reſolve upon that, which the Major part of you ſhall carry by voices. After the Roman General had ended his ſpeech, all the reſt began to deliver their opinions. And when the deputed delegate or agent for the Athenians had magnified and extolled as highly as poſſibly he could, the

A good demerits of the Romans towards Greece, yielding them great thanks, that upon their requeſt they had granted them aid againſt Philip, and without any petition at all, offered their help and ſuccour againſt Nabis the tyrant; and ſeemed therewith to be offended and diſpleaſed at ſome, who nevertheleſs in their talk and ſpeeches found fault and carped at theſe ſo great favours and deſerts; yea, and ſpake badly of future events, whereas it behoved them rather to acknowledge and confeſs how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romans for good turns paſt: it well appeared that he pointed out directly the Ætolians, and girded at them. "Whereupon Alexander, a principall and chief man of their nation, inveighed firſt againſt the Athenians, "who having been in times paſt the head Captains and maintainers of freedom, betraied now the "common cauſe for love of their own privat flatteries. Moreover, he complained that the Achæ-
B "ans, who firſt ſerved Philip in his wars, and at the laſt (when they ſaw him down the wind and "fortune to frown upon him) fell away like diſloyal traitors & poſſeſſed themſelves of Corinth to "their own behoof, practiſing alſo to compaſs and gain unto them the City of Argos. As for the "Ætolians, the firſt and principall enemies of Philip, and alwaies allies and friends to the Ro-"mans, howſoever they had expreſly and preciſely covenanted in the league, to enjoy their towns "and territories, after Philip was vanquiſhed, were notwithſtanding put beſides Echinum and "Pharſalus. He charged the Romans with fraud and deceit, who pretending an outward ſhew, a "vain title and colour of liberty, held the Cities of Chalcis and Demetrias with ſtrong garriſons:
C "and yet when Philip made ſome ſtay and halting to withdraw and void from thence his armed "guards, they were ever wont to object and ſay, that Greece would never be in freedom, ſo long as "Chalcis, Demetrias, and Corinth were in his hand: and finally he alledged againſt them, that un-"der pretence of Argos and Nabis, they ſought occaſion to remain ſtill in Greece and keep their "armies there. Let them (quoth he) tranſport their legions once into Italy, the Ætolians would "then undertake and promiſe, that Nabis ſhould remove his garriſon out of Argos, upon compo-"ſition and with good will, or elſe they would compell him by force and arms, to be over-ruled "by the puiſſance of all Greece united together in one generall conſent. By this vain babble of his, he rouſed Ariſtenus firſt, the Prætor of the Achæans, who ſpake in this wiſe. Never will Jupiter Opt. Max. quoth he, and Queen Juno the Patroneſs of Argos, ſuffer that City to be the recom-pence or prize between the Lacedæmonian Tyrant, and theſe pilling and thieving Ætolians: to D be brought to this hard point and theſe terms of extremity, as to ſuſtain more miſery and calami-ty when it is recovered by us, than when it was won and taken by him. O Quintius, it is not the ſea lying between us and them that can defend us from theſe robbers. What will then become of us, in caſe they ſhould make themſelves a fort and Caſtle of ſtrength in the midſt of Peloponneſus? Nought have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their ſhape and viſage. For look into their manners, their faſhions and behaviour, they are more rude and cruell than any barbarians, nay, they are more ſavage than the moſt wild and ravenous beaſts that be. We beſeech you therefore O Romans, both to recover Argos out of the hands of Nabis, and alſo to eſtabliſh the State of Greece in ſuch ſort, that ye leave theſe parts alſo ſafe and ſecure e-nough from the robberies and theeving hoſtility of theſe Ætolians. The Roman Generall Quin-tius, ſeeing them of all ſides to blame and rebuke the Ætolians, ſaid, that he would have anſwered
E them himſelf, but that he perceived them all ſo hateſully bent againſt them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appeaſed than farther provoked. And therefore holding himſelf ſatisfied and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romans and Ætolians, he ſaid, that he would demand what their pleaſure was to adviſe, concerning the war againſt Nabis, unleſs he rendred Argos to the Achæans? And when they all were of one mind to make war, he exhorted them to ſend aids proportionably to the power and ſtrength of each State and City. To the Æto-lians he ſent an Embaſſador, more to diſcover and lay open their intention (as it fell out accor-dingly) than upon any hope he had to obtain ought at their hands. Unto the Provoſt Marſhals of the camp, he gave commandment to ſend for the army from Elatia.

About this time, when the Embaſſadors of King Antiochus came unto him to treat about F alliance and a league, he anſwered, That he could ſay nothing to them nor determine of that point in the abſence of thoſe Delegats aboveſaid; and therefore they were to repair unto the Se-nat of Rome. Then, himſelf in perſon prepared to make an expedition and voyage againſt Argos, with thoſe forces which were brought from Elatia. And when he was about [illegible] Ariſtænus the Prætor, with 10000 foot of Achæans, and 1000 horſe met him in the way: and not far from thence they joyned both their forces and encamped together. The next day after they came down into the Plain of Argos, and choſe a place to fortifie and lye in leaguer about four miles from Ar-gos. Now was Pythagoras the Captain of the Lacedæmonian garriſon, who had both married the tyrant his daughter, and was his wives brother beſides. This Pythagoras againſt the coming of the Romans, had fortified with ſtrong guards both the Caſtles (for two there are within Argos)
G and other places, which either had eaſie acceſs or were ſuſpected. But as he was employed in theſe proviſions and preparations, he could not diſſemble and hide the fear which this arrivall and ap-proach of the Romans ſtrake into him: and beſide this forrain terrour from without, there hap-ned alſo an inteſtine mutiny within. There was one Damocles an Argive, (a young Gentleman of more ſpirit and courage than wiſdom and diſcretion) who at the firſt by interpoſing a mutuall and reciprocall oath, had conferred with certain perſons of good ſufficiency, about expelling the garriſon: but whiles he ſtudied to ſtrengthen the conſpiracy and his own ſide, he was not well aſſured assured of their fidelity, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. As he talked upon a time with his complices, the Captain of the garrison sent for him by one of his guard; whereupon he perceived that his complot was revealed: he exhorted therefore the conspirators that were in the way to take arms with him, rather than to die by torture upon the rack: and so with some few about him he marched forward into the market-place, crying often aloud, That as many as loved the safety of the Common-weal should follow him as their head and maintainer of their liberty: but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part; for no hope saw they of any succour at all near at hand: so far off were they from making good account of a sure guard of defence. And as he spake those words, the Lacedæmonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellows. After this were others also apprehended; the most part of them were slain, and some few cast into prison. A great number the night following slid down the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romans. These assured the Romans, that if their army had been near the gates, the commotion and conspiracy aforesaid would have taken effect: and in case their camp approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make some insurrection: whereupon Quintius sent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horsemen; who skirmished with the Lacedæmonians about Cylarabis (a publike school and place of exercise about a quarter of a mile out of the City) who were sallied out at the gate, and without any great difficulty chased them within the town: and in that very place where the conflict was, the Roman Generall encamped. One day he spent in escouting an espiall, whether any new trouble and uproars arose among them within the City. But when he perceived once that they were all amort for fear, he assembled a Councill to take advice, Whether he were best to give the assault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece, (except Aristænus) agreed with one accord, that since there was no other cause of war elsewhere, it should begin there especially. Quintius in no case would like of that course, but willingly he gave ear with evident approbation unto Aristænus, as he discoursed and reasoned against the generall opinion and consent of them all: and over and besides added this of himself, That considering the war was enterprised and taken in hand in the behalf of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing less beseeming and more without sence, than to leave the enemy himself, and to assail and batter the poor City of Argos. For his part he would fight at the head, even against the Lacedæmonians and their tyrant, the principall cause of this war. Then having dissolved the Councill, he sent certain cohorts lightly appointed to purvey store of grain. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut, mowed, and reaped down immediatly and laid up: all that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled, that the enemies soon after might have no good thereof. So he dislodged and removed from thence, and having passed over the mountain Parthenius, at three daies end he encamped in the territory of Caryæ near to Tegea. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before he would invade the territory of the enemies. From Philip there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of Thessalians forty horse. The Roman Generall staid not now for succours of men (whereof he had sufficient and plenty) but for his provision of victuals, which he had commanded the towns bordering near hand to furnish him withall. Besides, there came great forces by sea, and met him there: for by this time was Lucius Quintius arrived with forty sail from Leucas: also eighteen covered ships of Rhodes. And now also was Eumenes the King, about the Islands Cyclades, with ten close hatched and decked ships, thirty gallions, with other smaller vessels among, of sundry sorts. Likewise of Lacedæmonians that were exiled and banished persons there were very many; who chased and driven out by the oppression and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Roman Camp, in hope to recover their native country again. Now a great many had been expulsed in divers and sundry ages, since time that the tyrant first usurped rule, and were possessed of Lacedæmon. The chief of these exiled persons was one Agesipolis, a man to whom by right of descent and linage the inheritance of the kingdom of Lacedæmon appertained. He whiles he was but an Infant hapned to be expelled by Lycurgus after the death of Cleomenes, who was the first tyrant at Lacedæmon.

The tyrant beset thus round about with wars threatning both from sea and land, and destitute in manner of all hope, (considering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies:) yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but levied out of Creta one thousand more (even the chosen flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had besides of mercenary souldiers three thousand in arms: also ten thousand of his own subjects and Citizens of Lacedæmon, together with those that he had taken out of the burroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the City with trench and mure. And that there might arise no trouble and stir within the town, he held the spirits of men in awe with fear of sharp and rigorous punishments. And forasmuch as he could not hope nor imagine that they desired and wished his good and safety, for that he held some Citizens in suspition and jealousie: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plain, which they call * Dromos, he commanded the Lacedæmonians to assemble together without any armour and weapons to an audience; and when they were assembled he environed them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble, Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time if he feared every thing, and made all sure as well as he could: considering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world might bring in suspition) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt, rather than be surprized in the midst of their practises and complots, and

A and ſo be puniſhed accordingly: even for this cauſe (quoth he) I will have certain perſons in ſafe cuſtody and durance, untill ſuch time as the tempeſt be overblown which now is coming. And when the enemies be once repulſed, (from whom leſs danger there will be, in caſe domeſticall treaſons may be prevented) then incontinently will I enlarge them and ſet them at liberty. This ſaid, he commanded the names to be called of fourſcore or thereabout of the principall of the youth; and as every one of them anſwered to his name, he clapt him up faſt in priſon: and the next night following, murdered them every one. After this, certain Ilots (theſe were they who ever of old time were the Burghers and Villagers, a kind of peaſants and country kerns) were accuſed to have intended to flie unto the enemy and to band with him: who likewiſe were whipped & ſcourged throughout all the ſtreets, and then put to death. By the fearfull example of this cruelty, the cou-
B rages of the common ſort were well cooled and abated, yea, and ſo aſtonied, that they durſt not once quetch nor give attempt of any new deſignments tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his ſtrength and places of defence, for neither thought he himſelfe ſtrong enough to enter the field and fight a ſet battell, nor durſt abandon the City, ſeeing the minds of men ſo wavering, and their affections ſo unconſtant.

Quintius having made his proviſion and ſet all things in good order, departed from his ſtanding camp, and the ſecond day came to Sellacia upon the river Oenus: in which very place Antigonus ſometime King of the Macedonians ſtruck a battell (men ſay) with Cleomenes the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence he was to mount up an hard aſcent and narrow paſſage, he ſet a ſhort compaſs through the mountains, having ſent before C certain men to levell the ground and make the way even, and ſo got into a large and broad portgate, untill he came to the river Eurotas, which runneth in manner hard under the walls of the City of Sparta: where, as the Romans were pitching their tents, even as Quintius himſelf with the horſemen and light van-courriers gone before, the Auxiliaries of the tyrant charged upon them: who looking for nothing leſs, becauſe no man had encountred them all the way as they marched, but paſſed on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and affrighted herewith. This fear of theirs continued a good time, while the horſemen called upon the footmen, and they again unto the horſemen; and both the one ſort and the other truſted in themſelves but little or nothing at all. At length the ſtandards of the legions with their enſigns came forward; and were within ſight, and ſo ſoon as the companies of the vanguard advanced forth to fight, D they who erewhile terrified others, were driven in fearfull haſte themſelves into the City. The Romans being retired ſo far from the wall, as that they were without dart-ſhot, ſtood a while ranged in battell array. But after that they ſaw none of the enemies come abroad againſt them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quintius took his way and marched with his army in order of battell along the town ſide, near unto the river, hard at the foot of the hill Menalus. The companies of the legionary footmen led the march in the vanguard, the light footmen and the horſemen followed in the rereward, and flanked the reſt. Nabis kept within the walls his mercenary ſouldiers (in whom he repoſed greateſt confidence) arranged under their enſigns, and in readineſs to fight, purpoſing to charge the back of his enemies. And the rereguard of the Romans was not ſo ſoon paſſed by, but they ſallied out of the town at ſundry places at once, with as tumul-
E tuous a noiſe as they made the day before. Appius Claudius had the leading of the rereward, who having prepared beforehand the hearts of his ſouldiers, and advertized them to be preſt and ready for what occurrent ſoever might happen, preſently turned the enſigns, and ſet a compaſs with the whole army to make head againſt the enemies. Whereupon there enſued a hot fight which endured a good time, as if two armies had directly encountred one another. In the end, the ſouldiers of Nabis began to give ground and flie: in which flight of theirs they had made leſs haſt, and better ſaved themſelves, but that the Achæans who were acquainted well with the ground, and knew the coaſts of the country, hotly followed the chaſe: theſe made a foul ſlaughter and butchery among them; and the moſt part, ſuch as were diſperſed here and there in their flight they diſarmed. Then Quintius encamped near unto Amycla, and having harried and waſted all the territory
F round about the City (which places were very well peopled and very pleaſant:) when he ſaw no enemies iſſue out at the City gates, he removed his camp hard to the river Eurotas. From whence he made excurſions, waſted all the vale lying under the hill Taigetus, and the lands butting and adjoyning cloſe to the ſea.

Much about the ſame time L. Quintius made himſelf Maſter of the towns, ſituat on the ſea ſide: ſome yielded willingly, others for fear or perforce. And being afterwards advertiſed, that the town Gythæum ſerved for a place of ſafe retreat and refuge unto the Lacedæmonians in all their exploits and ſervice at ſea, and that the Romans lay encamped not far from the ſea ſide; he reſolved to aſſail it with all forcible means. This town at that time was very ſtrong, well peopled with Citizens and other inhabitants, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all warlike proviſion and munition.
G And in very good time it fell out, that as Quintius was entred into this difficult enterpriſe, King Eumenes and the Rhodian fleet arrived. A mighty number of mariners and ſea-ſervitors, gathered out of three Armadoes, within few daies made and furniſhed all engins and fabricks, which were to aſſault a City ſo wel fortified both by ſea and land. Now was the town-wall broken down with the undermining of the tortures, now was the wall ſhaken by the puſh of the ram, and withall there was one tower that by continuall battery was overthrown, and with the fall thereof all the wall that ſtood of each ſide came tumbling down and lay along. And the Romans endeavoured red at one time to enter the town, both from the haven (where the paſſage was more plain and eaſie) to the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place; and alſo at the breach made in the wall: and they miſſed but very little of entrance there where they intended, but the hope they conceived of yielding the City, which anon was croſſed again, and turned to nothing, ſtaid their violence and heat of aſſault. Dexagoridas and Gorgopas governed the town then in equall authority. Dexagoridas had diſpatched a courrier to the Roman lieutenant, to ſignifie that he would betray the town: and when the time and place of execution of this deſignment was agreed upon between them, the traitor was killed by Gorgopas: by occaſion whereof, the City was the better defended with more carefull heed by him alone; yea, and the aſſault thereof had been more difficult, but that Titus Quintius came to ſuccour and help with four thouſand choſen ſouldiers. He was no ſooner diſcovered with an army arranged in battell array from the brow and top of the hill that is not far diſtant from the town; whiles L. Quintius withall from another ſide followed the aſſault with his ordnance and artillery both by ſea and land, but Gorgopas then began himſelf to deſpair in very deed, and was driven perforce to take that very courſe, which in another he had puniſhed by death: and upon compoſition that he might depart and have away with him thoſe ſouldiers which he had in garriſon, he delivered up the City to Quintius.

Before that Gytheum was rendered, Pythagoras left as Captain at Argos, leaving the guard and defence of the City unto the charge of Timocrates of Pellenæ, came with a thouſand waged ſouldiers, and two thouſand Argives unto Nabis at Lacedæmon. And Nabis like as at the firſt arrivall of the Roman fleet, and the ſurrender withall of the towns ſtanding by the ſea ſide, was much affrighted, ſo he had recovered again ſome little hope and was well quieted in mind, ſo long as Gytheum held out ſtill, & his garriſon within the town kept their own. But after he heard once, that it alſo was yielded unto the Romans, and loſt; ſeeing no hope left by land ſide, which was wholly poſſeſſed by the enemies, and that he was altogether ſhut up from the ſea, he thought it beſt to yield unto fortune. And firſt he ſent an herald into the camp, to know whether the enemies would permit and ſuffer him to ſend his Embaſſadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras repaired unto the Generall with no other charge and commiſſion, but only to requeſt that the tyrant might parl with the Roman Generall. Hereupon the Councill was aſſembled: and generally opined it was that there ſhould be granted unto him a conference; inſomuch, as both time and place was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hils ſtanding in the midſt of that quarter, with ſome ſmall companies of ſouldiers attending on either ſide upon them; they left their cohorts behind them, ſtanding in guard, within the open view and ſight of both parts: and then Nabis came down with a certain choſen guard for his body; and Quintius accompanied with his brother, Eumenes the King, Sobilaus the Rhodian, and Ariſthenus the Prætor of the Achæans, with ſome few Knight Marſhals and Colonels. And then the tyrant being put to his choice, whether he would ſpeak firſt, or hear another, began his ſpeech in this wiſe.

"If I could have bethought my ſelf (O Quintius, and you all that are here preſent) & imagined "what the cauſe ſhould be, that you either proclaimed or made war firſt againſt me, I would have "attended the iſſue of my fortune with ſilence. But now I could not have that Maſtery and com- "mand of my ſelf to forbear, but that before I periſh, I would needs know the reaſon and cauſe "of my ruin and overthrow. Surely, if ye were ſuch men as the Carthaginians are reported to be "(with whom there is no regard of truth, no truſt and ſecurity in covenants of ſociety and alli- "ance) I would not then marvell at all if you made ſmall reckoning, & cared but little what mea- "ſure ye offered unto me. But now, when I behold and adviſe you well, I ſee you are Romans, "whoſe manner is to entertain moſt duly and preciſely the obſervation of holy rites & divine Re- "ligion, and the faithful keeping of human league and alliance. When I conſider and look into my "ſelf, I hope and think verily that I am one, with whom in generall, as well as with the reſt of the "Lacedæmonians ye are linked by vertue of a moſt ancient league: and in particular regard of my "ſelf, a privat amity and ſociety hath been lately renewed by the war with Philip. But peradven- "ture ſome man will ſay, That I have broken and overthrown the ſame firſt, in that I hold the Ci- "ty of the Argives. And how ſhall I be able to anſwer this, and excuſe my ſelf? Shall I plead to the "ſubſtance of the matter, or to the circumſtance of the time? The thing it ſelf preſenteth unto me "a twofold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themſelves of the City, who "offered the town unto me, I received it at their hands, and in no wiſe ſeized upon it by force: I "received it, I ſay, when it ſided and took part with Philip, before it was compriſed within your "league. As for the time, it juſtifieth and cleareth me alſo and my doings. For even then when as I "was poſſeſſed of Argos, I was allied and aſſociat with you in good accord: and in our covenants, "we articled and capitulated to ſend aids unto you for your wars, and not to withdraw the gar- "riſon from Argos. And verily, in this difference and queſtion about Argos, I have the vantage as "well in regard of the equity of the fact (in that I received a City not of yours but of your ene- "mies received it I ſay not ſurpriſed by force, but offred and delivered willingly) as alſo by your "own confeſſion, for that in the conditions of the aſſociation agreed between us, ye left Argos "free unto me. But it may be that the name of tyrant hurteth me: and ſome of mine actions con- "demn me much, and namely, that I ſet ſlaves free, and divide lands to the poor commons. "the liberty of Greece, to conclude amity with a tyrant? and ſuch a tyrant, as of all others that ever red at one time to enter the town, both from the haven (where the passage was more plain and ea- H sie) to the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place; and also at the breach made in the wall: and they missed but very little of entrance there where they intended, but the hope they conceived of yielding the City, which anon was crossed again, and turned to nothing, staid their violence and heat of assault. Dexagoridas and Gorgopas governed the town then in equall authority. Dexagoridas had dispatched a courrier to the Roman lieutenant, to signifie that he would betray the town: and when the time and place of execution of this designment was agreed upon between them, the traitor was killed by Gorgopas: by occasion whereof, the City was the better defended with more carefull heed by him alone; yea, and the assault thereof had been more difficult, but that Titus Quintius came to succour and help with four thousand chosen souldiers. He was no sooner discovered with an army arranged in battell array from the I brow and top of the hill that is not far distant from the town; whiles L. Quintius withall from another side followed the assault with his ordnance and artillery both by sea and land, but Gorgopas then began himself to despair in very deed, and was driven perforce to take that very course, which in another he had punished by death: and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those souldiers which he had in garrison, he delivered up the City to Quintius.

Before that Gytheum was rendered, Pythagoras left as Captain at Argos, leaving the guard and defence of the City unto the charge of Timocrates of Pellenæ, came with a thousand waged souldiers, and two thousand Argives unto Nabis at Lacedæmon. And Nabis like as at the first arrivall of the Roman fleet, and the surrender withall of the towns standing by the sea side, was much affrighted, so he had recovered again some little hope and was well quieted in mind, so long as Gytheum held out still, & his garrison within the town kept their own. But after he heard once, that it also was yielded unto the Romans, and lost; seeing no hope left by land side, which was wholly possessed by the enemies, and that he was altogether shut up from the sea, he thought it best to yield unto fortune. And first he sent an herald into the camp, to know whether the enemies would permit and suffer him to send his Embassadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras repaired unto the Generall with no other charge and commission, but only to requeſt that the tyrant might parl with the Roman Generall. Hereupon the Councill was assembled: and generally opined it was, that there should be granted unto him a conference; insomuch, as both time and place was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hils standing in the midst of that quarter, with some small companies of souldiers attending on either side upon them; L they left their cohorts behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and sight of both parts: and then Nabis came down with a certain chosen guard for his body; and Quintius accompanied with his brother, Eumenes the King, Sobilaus the Rhodian, and Aristhenus the Prætor of the Achæans, with some few Knight Marshals and Colonels. And then the tyrant being put to his choice, whether he would speak first, or hear another, began his speech in this wise.

The Oration of Nabis.

"If I could have bethought my self (O Quintius, and you all that are here present) & imagined
"what the cause should be, that you either proclaimed or made war first against me, I would have "attended the issue of my fortune with silence. But now I could not have that Mastery and com"mand of my self to forbear, but that before I perish, I would needs know the reason and cause "of my ruin and overthrow. Surely, if ye were such men as the Carthaginians are reported to be M "(with whom there is no regard of truth, no trust and security in covenants of society and alli"ance) I would not then marvell at all if you made small reckoning, & cared but little what mea"sure ye offered unto me. But now, when I behold and advise you well, I see you are Romans, "whose manner is to entertain most duly and precisely the observation of holy rites & divine Re"ligion, and the faithful keeping of human league and alliance. When I consider and look into my "self, I hope and think verily that I am one, with whom in generall, as well as with the rest of the "Lacedæmonians ye are linked by vertue of a most ancient league: and in particular regard of my "self, a privat amity and society hath been lately renewed by the war with Philip. But peradven-
"ture some man will say, That I have broken and overthrown the same first, in that I hold the Ci"ty of the Argives. And how shall I be able to answer this, and excuse my self? Shall I plead to the N
"substance of the matter, or to the circumstance of the time? The thing it self presenteth unto me
"a twofold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themselves of the City, who "offered the town unto me, I received it at their hands, and in no wise seized upon it by force: I "received it, I say, when it sided and took part with Philip, before it was compriſed within your "league. As for the time, it justifieth and cleareth me also and my doings. For even then when as I "was possessed of Argos, I was allied and associat with you in good accord: and in our covenants,
"we articled and capitulated to send aids unto you for your wars, and not to withdraw the gar"rison from Argos. And verily, in this difference and question about Argos, I have the vantage as "well in regard of the equity of the fact (in that I received a City not of yours but of your ene"mies received it I say not surprised by force, but offred and delivered willingly) as also by your O
"own confession, for that in the conditions of the association agreed between us, ye left Argos
"free unto me. But it may be that the name of tyrant hurteth me: and some of mine actions con"demn me much, and namely, that I set slaves free, and divide lands to the poor commons. As for "the name, thus much I am able to answer: that, such as I am, better or worse, still I am the very

Nabis, one while admoniſhing and advertiſing him, another while requeſting and entreating him, I now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himſelf and his whole eſtate: he began to diſcourſe unto him of the Tyrants of all the ſtates confining thereabout one after another by name, who when they had reſigned up and laid down their abſolute ſoveraignty of command, and reſtored liberty to their ſubjects, paſſed their old age among their Citizens, not only in re-poſe and ſecurity, but alſo in great honour and reputation. Theſe words uttered & heard between them to and fro, the night drew on apace & parted the conference. The morrow after, Nabis pro-miſed, ſeeing the Romans would have it ſo, to quit the City Argos, to withdraw his garriſon from thence, and to deliver again all the captives and fugitive traitors that were under his hands: and if they demanded any more of him, he requeſted that they would ſet it down in writing, that he might conſult thereof with his friends. So, both the Tyrant had reſpit and time granted to take ad- K vice, and alſo Quintius ſate in Councill with the principall heads of his allies what to do. The moſt part were of opinion to maintain the war ſtill, and to kill the tyrant out of the way; for never would the liberty of Greece be otherwiſe firm and ſure: and better far had it been, never to have entred into arms with him, than being once begun, to give it over. And he will, ſay they, be greater and more ſtrong hereafter, as if his tyrannicall government were approved, and no doubt he would vouch the people of Rome for author of his unjuſt rule and dominion, and will induce and incite by his example many in other free States and Cities, to lie in wait to work means to overthrow the liberty of Citizens, and to bring them into thraldom and bondage. The Generall, of himſelf was more affected and inclined to peace: for he ſaw, " that if the enemy were once dri" ven within the walls, there was no way but to lie in ſiege againſt the City, and that would re- L
" quire long tract of time: foraſmuch as it was not Gytheum (and yet that was betraied and ren-
" dred, and not forced by aſſault) but Lacedæmon, a moſt ſtrong town both for men and munition,
" that they were to lay ſiege unto and aſſault. And whereas the only hope was, that when they " approached with the army, there might ſome diſſention and ſedition have riſen among them-
" ſelves within: now when as they ſaw the enſigns in manner advanced hard to the City gates,
" there was not one that mutined or ſtirred at all. He added moreover and ſaid, That Villius the " Embaſſador newly returned from Antiochus, reported, how all was not ſound there, nor the " peace like to continue: and that he had paſſed over into Europe with far greater forces both for " land and at ſea, than at any time heretofore: and if (quoth he) the army ſhould be wholly em" ployed in the ſiege of Lacedæmon, what other power have we to maintain war withall againſt M " ſo puiſſant and mighty a Prince as is Antiochus? Theſe were the remonſtrances that openly he gave out; but ſecretly he was troubled in mind for fear leſt a new Conſul ſhould come in his place, and have the government of the Province of Greece: and ſo he ſhould leave unto his ſucceſſour, the honour of the victory of a war commenced by him, and in good forwardneſs. But when he perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his waies, notwithſtanding all his contradiction and bending to the contrary, by making ſemblant that he now drew with them and was of their mind, he won them all to approve his deſignment and intention. " Well, God ſpeed our " hand (quoth he:) let us beſiege Lacedæmon ſince ye will needs have it ſo: but conſidering that
" the laying ſiege unto Cities, is a thing as ye well know, that goeth ſo ſlowly forward, and of" tentimes maketh the aſſailants ſooner weary than the defendants: you ought even now to caſt N
" this account preſently with your ſelves, that we muſt lie all winter long about the walls of " Lacedæmon. And were there nothing but travell and perill, that during ſo long time we were " to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to ſuffer and abide the ſame, with ſtout bodies
" and reſolute minds. But beſides all that, we muſt be at great coſt and expences about fabricks, " engins, and inſtruments of artillery, requiſit to the aſſault of ſo great a City: we muſt I ſay be " provided of victuals good ſtore againſt winter, as well to ſerve us as you. Be well adviſed
" therefore (to the end that you ſhould not ſuddenly in haſte huddle up theſe matters, or after ye
" are once entred into the action, give over and abandon it with ſhame) that ye diſpatch
" your letters aforehand every one to the State wherein he liveth, and ſound them to the depth,
" how their hearts ſerve them and what ſtrength and forces they have. Of aids & ſuccours I have O " enough and to ſpare: but the more in number we are, the more maintenance ſhall we need. At " this time the territory of our enemies hath nothing but bare ſoile and naked ground: and " withall, the winter is coming on apace, all which ſeaſon, carriage (eſpecially far off) is cum" brous and hard. This Oration at the firſt cauſed them every one to regard and look homeward to domeſticall difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleneſs, the envy and backbiting of thoſe which tarry at home, againſt them that are employed in warfare: the common liberty

And therefore ſuddenly changing their minds, they put to the diſcretion of the Roman Generall, to do and determine what he thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintius taking the advice only of his own Lieutenants and Provoſt-Marſhals, engroſſed theſe Articles and conditions following, according to which peace ſhould be concluded with the Tyrant. Imprimis, That there be a truce made for the term of ſix months between Nabis and the Romans, King Eumenes and the Rhodians. Item, That both *T. B in the conditions put down in writing ſhould be preſented unto Nabis, the truce aforeſaid ſhould begin. Item, That within ten daies next after enſuing, all the garriſons quit Argos and the reſt of the towns within the territory of the Argives: and then thoſe peeces to be delivered void and free unto the Romans. Item, That no ſlave taken captive in wars, belonging either to the King, or to any publike ſtate, or private perſon, be had away from thoſe towns: and if any before time had been carried forth, they ſhould be reſtored again duly to their right Maſters. Item, That Nabis ſhould deliver again thoſe ſhips that he had gotten from the maritime Cities, and that himſelf have no veſſell at all but only two gallions, and thoſe to have no more than ſix and twenty oars apiece to direct and rule them. Item, That he render all the runagate Traitors and captives unto all the Cities confederate with the people of Rome, as alſo make reſtitution to C the Meſſenians of all their goods again, that either could be found, or the owners know certainly to be theirs. Item, That he reſtore to all the baniſhed Lacedæmonians their wives and children; but of the wives, ſo many only as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them ſhould be compelled againſt their wills to go with any exiled perſon. Item, That to as many mercenary ſouldiers of Nabis, as were either gone from him into their own Cities or to the Romans, all their own goods ſhould be juſtly and truly delivered again. Item, That in the Iſland of Crete he ſhould not be poſſeſſed of any one City: and look what Cities he then held, he yield them to the Romans. Item, That he enter into alliance with no Candiot, nor with any other whatſoever, nor yet make war with them. Item, That he remove all the garriſons out of all the Cities that himſelf had delivered up, and which had ſurrendred themſelves and all they had, under D the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, and not moleſt them neither by himſelf nor any of his. Item, That he build no town nor Caſtle, either in his own land or in any other. Item, That for the more aſſurance of performing theſe covenants, he give five hoſtages, ſuch as it ſhould pleaſe the Roman Generall to chooſe; and namely, his own ſon for one of them. Laſt of all, That he make preſent paiment of one hundred talents of ſilver, and fifty more yearly untill the term of eight years be run out. Theſe Articles engroſſed, were ſent to Lacedæmon, after the Camp was removed nearer to the City. But nothing well pleaſed was the tyrant with any of them. Only he was well apaid, that beyond his hope and expectation, there was no mention at all therein of reducing the exiled perſons home into the City. But that which offended and diſpleaſed him moſt was this, that both ſhipping was taken from him, and alſo the maritime E port towns: for great commodity he gat by the ſea, in ſcouring the coaſt from the cape of Malea with his pyrats and men of war: and beſides, the youth and able men of thoſe Cities, ſerved his turn very well to furniſh and man his ſhips with the very beſt ſouldiers and men of ſervice that were. And albeit he ſcanned and conſidered upon theſe articles in great ſecrecy with his friends, yet were they all of them divulged abroad and current in every mans mouth: ſo vain are theſe courtiers commonly and hardly to be truſted, as in all things elſe, ſo eſpecially in keeping of ſecret counſell. Theſe conditions were controlled and found fault with, not ſo much by all men in generall, as by each one in particular, as they took exceptions againſt thoſe points that touched and concerned themſelves. They that had married the wives of the baniſhed, or were poſſeſſed of any part of their ſubſtance, chafed, and ſtormed thereat, as if they were to loſe and forgo their F own, and not to render and reſtore the goods of others. The ſlaves who had been freed by the tyrants, were now not only to loſe the benefit of that freedom, but alſo to endure harder ſervitude and bondage than aforetime; ſetting before their eyes how they ſhould return again into the houſes and hands of their old Maſters, angry and incenſed now againſt them. The hired ſouldiers were malecontent, for that they ſaw they ſhould loſe their pay after peace concluded: and ſaw full well, that there was no being for them in thoſe States and Cities, who hated the tyrants themſelves no more than their followers and attendants. At firſt they muttered and murmured, whiſpering theſe things among themſelves in their ſecret meetings and conventicles: afterwards they mutined, and on a ſudden ran and took arms. The Tyrant ſeeing the multitude diſquieted enough of themſelves with this tumult, aſſembled the people to-G gether. Where after he had declared the conditions impoſed upon him by the Romans, and in every article had untruly put to ſomewhat of his own deviſing, to aggravate all matters and make them ſeem more grievous and intollerable, at the rehearſing of every particular the whole aſſembly one while cried out, and another while the ſundry parts thereof, ſet up a note of utter diſlike. Then he asked their opinion what anſwer they would have him to return to thoſe Articles, and what to do? They all in manner with one voice accorded and ſaid, that there was no anſwering of the matter, but that he ſhould plainly go to war, and make no more

ado. And that every man for his own part (as the usuall manner is of a multitude, when they are together) should take a good heart, and hope the best, saying, that Fortune favoureth Fortitude. The tyrant incited with these their words, seconded them himself, & assured them that Antiochus and the Ætolians would take their parts and assist them: and if they did not, yet were they strong enough of themselves, and had sufficient means to endure the siege. No more talking now nor thinking of peace, but every man was ready to run in hast to his severall quarter, and stand upon their own guard without any rest or repose from thenceforth. The Romans so soon as they saw some few of them to sally out of the City, and to discharge their darts among them, were soon put out of all doubt, that no other remedy there was, but they must to war again. After this there passed certain light skirmishes four daies together, at first without any assured issue of good speed, either of the one part or the other: but the fift day after one conflict fought in manner almost of a set battell, certain Roman souldiers following the chase upon their enemies, and killing them in their flight, entred the City at certain void places, where the wall was not united: for in that order were the walls built of that town in those daies. Quintius then verily, having well bridled and tamed by this terror his enemies for making any more excursions, and supposing that there remained no more but lustily to go to an assault, sent out certain of purpose for to call the mariners & sea-servitors from Gytheum, whiles himself in person, accompanied with the Provost Marshals, rode about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Sparta in times past stood without murage. And the tyrants of late daies had built walls against the open flats and plain fields. The higher ground and of harder access, they fortified with strong corps de guards of armed souldiers, instead of bulwarks of defence. When Quintius had sufficiently considered every corner, he supposed there was no other way but to invest it round about, and thereupon with all his forces united (which being all together Roman Citizens and Latine allies foot and horse, land-souldiers and sea-servitors one with another, amounted to 50000 fighting men) he compassed and environed the City. Some brought scaling ladders, some fire, every man one thing or other, not only to give an assault, but also to terrifie and amaze them: with direction and expresse commandment with a loud cry and shout at once in all places to approach the walls, & give the venture upon them; to the end that the Lacedæmonians affrighted at one instant on every side, might not know which way to turn them, and be to seek, where first to make head against the enemies, and in what place to come with succours. Having therefore divided the whole power of his army into three parts, he gave the one of them in charge to assail that quarter which was called Phœbeum; a second likewise to set upon that which is named Dictynneum, and the third to force the canton Heptagoniæ; places all lying open and without a wall. The City being thus seized on all sides with so great fear, the tyrant moved and troubled to hear those sudden outcries & fearful news brought unto him by hasty messengers: according as any place stood most in danger, at the first either presented himself in proper person or else sent some to help; but afterwards, seeing the fear so general, and no one place void of danger, he was so astonied, that unable he was either himself to give good direction to others or to hear theirs. So void was he and disfurnished of advice and counsel, yea, and bereft of his right wits and senses. The Lacedæmonians at first hand sustained the furious violence of the Romans in the narrow streights and passages & at one time in divers places, three armies fought on either side: but afterwards, as the heat of the fight encreased, the service was nothing equall of both parties; for the Lacedæmonians discharged shot from which the Roman souldiers easily saved themselves, by means of their large targets, and withall much thereof either fell short and besides, or else so feebly flung from them that little or no harm they could do. For by reason of the streightness of the place, and the multitude so thronged and thrust together, they had not only no space to take their run, when they should lance their darts (the best means of all other to enforce them) but not so much as sure footing, and at ease to drive and levell them with all their strength. Insomuch, as of all the darts and javelins which were directly shot afront them, none at all pierced to their bodies & very few so much as stuck in their bucklers. Mary some happened to be wounded from the higher places by those that stood near unto them, and about their sides. And anon as they advanced forward they chanced to be hurt, not only with arrows & darts from off the houses, but also with tiles and slates whereof they were aware. But afterwards, they covered their heads with their targets, which they set so close united together one under the other, featherwise, that not only there was no place nor entrance for the darts thrown and cast at random afar, no, nor so much as any room for a weapon to get between, levelled though it were, and aimed near at hand; so as under this target-ten they approached nearer and nearer in safety. At the first the narrow and straight passages filled with the throng both of themselves and also of the enemies so thrust and crouded together, did them for a while; but afterwards, when they had by little and little gathered upon the enemies, and put them back, and were come into a larger and more spacious street of the City, then their force and violence could not possibly be endured any longer. Now when the Lacedæmonians turned their backs, and fled apace to gain the higher places for their vantage, Nabis verily for his part trembling and quaking, as if the City had been quite lost, looked about him on every side, which way himself might escape and save his life. But Pythagoras as in all things else he performed the devoir and part of a couragious Captain, so he was the only cause that the town was not lost: for he commanded to set fire on the houses standing next to the wall, which in the minute of an hour burned out on a light flame, as being set forward by the help of those, who otherwise were wont to quench the like fires:

A whereupon the houſes came ratling and tumbling down upon the Romans heads, and not only the tileſhards, but alſo the timber pieces half burnt fell upon the armed ſouldiers, the flame ſpread ſtill far and near, and the ſmothering ſmoak put them in fear of more danger than was. And therefore, as well thoſe Romans who were without the City in the hotteſt of their aſſault, retreated from the walls, as alſo thoſe that were entred already, for fear leſt by the fire behind them they ſhould be ſeparated from their fellows, retired themſelves. Quintius alſo ſeeing how the caſe ſtood, cauſed to ſound the retreat, and ſo being recalled, they returned out of the City which they had as good as won, into the camp. And Quintius conceiving more hope by the fear of the enemies, than of the thing it ſelf and the ſervice done, never gave over for three daies to terrifie them partly by skirmiſhing, and partly by intrenching and ſtopping up certain quarters, that they might have no B paſſage at all to fly and ſhift for themſelves. The tyrant conſtrained at length with theſe dangers menaced, ſent Pythagoras again as an Orator unto Quintius. But he at firſt rejected him, and commanded him to avant out of the camp: yet in the end, after he had made moſt humble ſupplication, and caſt himſelf proſtrate at his feet, he gave him audience. The beginning of his ſpeech was this, that he yielded all to the diſcretion and former award of the Romans. But ſeeing that he gained nothing thereby, and that his words took no effect, they grew at length to this point, That upon the ſame capitulations which few daies before were exhibited up in writing, a truce ſhould be made, and hereupon was both the money and alſo the hoſtages received.

Whiles the tyrant was beſieged and aſſailed, there came poſt upon poſt to Argos, that Lacedæmon was at the point of being loſt: whereupon the Argives took ſuch heart and courage unto C them (by reaſon that Pythagoras with the beſt part of the garriſon ſouldiers was departed before out of their town) that contemning the ſmall number which remained in their fortreſs, under the leading of one Archippus, they expelled the reſt of the garriſon. As for Timocrates of Pellene their Captain, becauſe he had behaved himſelf in his charge and government gently and mildly, they ſent him away alive with ſafe conduct. At the very inſtant of this joyfull occurrent, T. Quintius arrived, after he had granted peace to the tyrant, and ſent away from Lacedæmon, Eumenes and the Rhodians, together with L. Quintius his brother to the fleet. The City of Argos in great joy proclaimed the celebration of their moſt ſolemn feaſt, and thoſe ſo famous and renowned games and paſtimes called Nemea, againſt the coming of the Roman army and their Generall, which they had forelet upon the ordinary time and day, by occaſion of the troubles of war. And for the D honour of Quintius, they ordained him to be the overſeer of theſe ſolemnities. Many things there were to redouble and increaſe this their joy and ſolace to the full. The Citizens were reduced from Lacedæmon whom Pythagoras of late and Nabis aforetime had carried away. They alſo were returned home again who had fled and eſcaped, after the conſpiracy of Pythagoras was detected, and the maſſacre begun. Now they ſaw their liberty again, whereof they had loſt the ſight a long time: now they beheld the Romans the authors thereof, and who for their ſakes were induced to take arms and enterpriſe the war with the tyrant. Alſo, upon the very day of the Nemean games, the liberty of the Argives was publiſhed and proclaimed by the voice of the publike beadle and crier of the City. But look how much joy and hearts content the Achæans conceived in their common and generall Councill of all Achæi, for the reſtoring of Argos into E their ancient freedom, ſo much troubled they were again, in regard that Lacedæmon was left ſtill in ſervitude, and the tyrant ſo near unto them ready ever to prick their ſides, whereby their joy was not ſo ſound and entire. But the Ætolians in all their Diets inveighed mightily againſt this, ſaying, That the Romans never gave over the war with Philip before he had abandoned all the Cities of Greece: as for Lacedæmon, it was left ſtill under a tyrant and in the mean while the lawfull and naturall King who had been in the Roman camp, and all the reſt of the nobleſt Citizens ſhould live in exile. For now the people of Rome was become a penſioner to guard the body of tyrannizing Nabis. Then Quintius brought back his army from Argos to Elatia, from whence he departed to the Spartan war. Some write, that the tyrant when he fought with the Romans, came not immediatly out of the City; but that he was lodged without by himſelf full oppoſite to the F Roman camp: and that after he had made good a long time, expecting the aid of the Ætolians, he was driven in the end to a battell, by occaſion that the Romans charged upon the forragers and purveyors of his camp: in which battell he was vanquiſhed and beaten out of the field, and craved peace, after that fifteen thouſand of his men were ſlain, and four thouſand taken priſoners, and above.

At one and the ſame time in a manner were letters brought both from T. Quintius touching the affairs atchieved at Lacedæmon, and alſo from M. Porcius the Conſul out of Spain. And by order from the State, there was granted in the name of either of them a ſolemn proceſſion to continue three daies. L. Valerius the Conſul, after he had governed his Province in quietneſs upon the defeat of the Boians about the forreſt of Litana, returned to Rome againſt the generall G aſſembly for election of Magiſtrates, and created Conſuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the ſecond time, and T. Sempronius Longus: whoſe fathers had been Conſuls in the firſt year of the ſecond Punick war. Then the Aſſembly was holden for the election of Prætors, wherein were choſen P. Cornelius Scipio, and the two Cneii Cornelii, the one Merenda, and the other Blaſio: Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, Sextus Digitius, and T. Juventius Talva. When theſe elections were finiſhed, the Conſul returned again into his Province. That year the Ferentinats aſſaied to obtain a new privilege: to wit, That as many Latines as were enrolled in any Roman Colony, ſhould be Citizens of Rome. But they of Puteoli, Salernum, and Buxentum, who were Coloners and had their names entred there, and by that means carrying themselves as Roman Citizens, were adjudged by the Senat to be no Citizens of Rome.

In the beginning of this year, wherein P. Scipio Africanus was Consul the second time, with T. Sempronius Longus, two Embassadors of Nabis the tyrant, arrived at Rome. For to give them audience, the Senat assembled together without the City in the Temple of Apollo. Their petition was, That the peace agreed upon with Quintius might be ratified: and their suit was granted. When it was moved, as touching the government of the Provinces; the Senat (assembled in great frequency) were all of this opinion. That forasmuch as in Spain and Macedony the war was ended, both Consuls should have the government of Italy. Scipio was of advice, That one Consul was sufficient for Italy, and that the other should be employed in Macedony. And why? there was cruell war menaced from King Antiochus: himself already was passed over into Europe: And what think ye, quoth he, will he then do, when the Ætolians (who doubtless are enemies) of one side shall sollicit and call upon him for to war, and Annibal, a warriour and commander so renowned for the defeats and overthrows of the Romans, shall prick him forward of the other? Whiles they debated thus about the Provinces of the Consuls, the Prætors cast lots for their severall governments. The City jurisdiction fell to Cn. Domitius, the forrain to T. Juventius. To P. Cornelius the farther Spain was allotted, and the hither to Sex. Digitius. Cn. Cornelius Blasio had Sicily assigned unto him, and Merenda was charged with Sardinia. It was not thought good that a new army should be transported over into Macedony. But concluded it was, that the army there should be brought back by Quintius into Italy, & discharged. Item, That that the army likewise should be cassed, which had served under M. Portius Cato in Spain. Item, That both Consuls should govern Italy, and levy two legions of Citizens to go thither, that when those forces were dismissed and licensed to go home, which it pleased the Senat to set at liberty, there should be eight Roman legions in all, and no more in pay.

In the former year, when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Consuls, there had been held a solemnity of a sacred Spring. But when P. Licinius the high Pontifees made report first to the Colledge of the Priests, and by the advice and authority of that Colledge, unto the LL. of the Councill, That there was some errour committed, and that it was not performed accordingly: the Senators ordained, that it should be done again anew, according to the discretion and direction of the Pontifees aforesaid. Also that the great Roman Plaies, which together with that Spring were vowed, should be exhibited with the accustomed cost and expences: And that all young cattell that fell between the Calends of March, and the last day of April, in that year wherein P. Cornel. Scipio and T. Sempronius Longus were Consuls, should be accounted as consecrated for that sacred Spring above-named. After this, there was an assembly held for the choosing of Censors, wherein were created Sex. Ælius Pætus, and C. Cornelius Cethegus: who elected P. Scipio the Consul, President of the Senat, like as the Censors before them had done. In the survey and review of the whole Senat, they left out and discarded three only, and none of them who had born office of State, and sat in the Ivory chair. Great love these Censors won amongst them of that calling and equality, in giving commandment to the Ædiles curule, that at the Roman games and plaies they should set out places apart from the rest of the people for the Senators to behold the said disports. For aforetime they beheld the sports and pastimes all together, without regard and distinction. Few also of the Gentlemen or Knights of Rome had their horses of service taken from them: and rigorously dealt they with no estate and degree. The porch of Liberty, and the hamlet called Villa publica, were by them repaired and enlarged. The sacred Spring was celebrate; and the games vowed by Ser. Sulpitius the Consul, were by them exhibited. And whiles all men were amused and their minds occupied thereupon, Q. Pleminius who had been cast in prison for divers and sundry outrages committed at Locris, to the great offence of God and man, had procured certain persons, who in the night season at one instant should set on fire many places of the City, to the end that whiles all the people were affrighted in this night-tumult, he might break prison and escape. This complot was discovered and reported to the Senat by some of them that were privy and accessary thereunto. And Pleminius was let down into a lower dungeon and there killed.

That year were certain Colonies of Roman Citizens conducted to Puteoli, Vulturnum, and Liternum, and three hundred men planted in each of them. Likewise Coloners of Roman Citizens were brought to Salernum and Buxentum. The Triumvirs who had the placing of them were T. Sempronius Longus, Consul for the time being; M. Servilius and Q. Minutius Thermus. The territory of the Campans was divided among them. Three other also deputed for the like purpose, D. Junius Brutus, M. Babius Tamphilus, and M. Helvius. placed a Colony of Roman Citizens in Sipontum to enjoy the lands of the Arpins. Likewise other Colonies of Roman Citizens were planted in Tempsa and Crotone. The lands belonging to Tempsa were won from the Brutii, who had expelled the Greeks: and the Greeks remained in Crotone. The Triumvirs for Crotone were Cn. Octavius, L. Æmylius Paulus, and C. Pletorius: and for Tempsa L. Cornel. Merula, and C. Salonius. Also that year were seen at Rome divers wonders and prodigious sights: and some were reported from other parts. In the common place place, in the publike Hall, Comitium, and Capitol, were seen certain drops of bloud. And ostentimes it rained earth. The head of Vulcan was on fire. News came that at Interamna there ran a stream of milk. Also that at Ariminum there were

A were two Infants both of free condition, born without eyes and noſe, and another in the Picene country handleſs and footleſs. Theſe ſtrange tokens were by order given from the chief Pontifees, looked unto and expiated, and a Novendiall ſacrifice continued for nine daies, becauſe the Adrians brought word, that in their territory it rained ſtones.

In Gaul near to Mediolanum, L. Valerius Flaccus the Pro-Conſul, fought a ſet field with the French Inſubrians and Boians. Which Boians under the conduct of Dorulacus paſſed over the river Padus, for to ſollicit and raiſe the Inſubrians. In which conflict were ſlain ten thouſand enemies. About the ſame time his Collegue in government M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. In this triumph he carried in pomp and ſhew 25000 pound weight of ſilver in bullion, and in coin 123000 Bigat pieces: of Oſcan ſilver 540 pound weight, and of gold 400000 pound weight. Of B the booty won from the enemies he dealt among his ſouldiers that were footmen 270 aſſes apiece, and trebble ſo much to every man of arms.

T. Sempronius the Conſul having put himſelf in his journey toward his Province, led firſt his legions into the Boians country. Boiorix at that time their Prince with his two brethren, having raiſed the whole nation to rebellion, encamped in certain commodious places: ſo as it appeared that if the enemy entred their confines, they were ready to give him battell. The Conſul perceiving how ſtrong and confident the enemies were, diſpatched a courrier to his Collegue, to make haſt if he thought ſo good and come unto him: for untill his coming he would fall off, ſeem to retire and not fight. But the ſame cauſe that moved the Conſul to ſtay, gave occaſion to the Gauls to make more haſte: for beſides that the delaying & lingring of the Conſul, encouraged the C enemies, they were deſirous to have the triall of a battell before the forces of both Conſuls were joyned together. Howbeit, for two daies ſpace they did nothing but ſtand ready ranged for fight, if any ſhould come forth to brave and dare them. On the third day they approached the trench and rumpier of the Conſuls Camp, and on every ſide at once gave the aſſault. The Conſul immediatly commanded the ſouldiers to arm. And when they were armed, he kept them in awhile, with intent to encreaſe the fooliſh confidence in the enemies, and to diſpoſe of his own forces, and give direction, what companies ſhould ſally out at every gate. The two legions he commanded to iſſue forth under their colours at the two ſide gates called Principales: but in the very paſſage without the Gauls ſtood thick and made head again, ſo that the way was ſtopped up. A long time they fought in thoſe very ſtraights. And they beſtirred themſelves no more D with their hands and ſwords, than they preſſed one upon another with their bodies and targets: whiles the Romans ſtrived to advance their enſigns out of the gates, and the Gauls endeavoured no leſs, either to enter themſelves within the camp, or elſe to impeach the Romans for going forth. But in this conflict there was nothing between them either won or loſt, no ground gained the one of the other, before that Q. Victorius a principall Centurion of the Pilani in the ſecond legion, and C. Atinius, a Tribune or Marſhall of the fourth, caught the banners from the enſign-bearers (a thing often practiſed in time of extremity) and flung them among the enemies. For whiles theſe laboured and ſtrained themſelves to recover each one a banner, they of the ſecond legion firſt brake through and got forth of the gate: ſo as now, they maintained skirmiſh without the trench, and the fourth legion ſtuck ſtill in the gap. By which time there E aroſe another tumult and noiſe in the contrary ſide of the camp: for the Gauls were broken in at the Quæſtors gate (or the gate againſt the * Quæſtorium) and ſlain thoſe that valiantly made head and held them play; to wit, Lucius Poſthumius a treaſurer ſurnamed Tympanus, Marcus Atinius and Publius Sempronius two Colonels of the allies, and well near two hundred ſouldiers beſides. Thus the camp on that part was won, untill ſuch time as one extraordinary cohort was ſent from the Conſul to defend the Quæſtors gate aforeſaid: which either ſlew thoſe that were within the rampier, or elſe drave them forth, and ſo withſtood thoſe that would have ruſhed in. And much about that very time the fourth legion alſo with two extraordinary ſquadrons brake forth at the gate. Thus at once there were three ſeverall battels in ſundry places about the camp: and the diſſonant cries and noiſes (according to the divers occaſions of each party miniſtred by their fellows) turned and withdrew the minds and ſpirits of thoſe that were in fight, from the preſent skirmiſh before them. In this manner maintained they the fight till noon: equally matched in ſtrength and number, and little or no odds between them for hope of victory: but tedious travell and extremity of heat compelled the Gauls (whoſe bodies are ſoft and open, and ſoon running to ſweat, and who of all other things can leaſt away with thirſt) to abandon the battell: and thoſe few that remained behind, the Romans ran upon, ruffled their colours, and chaſed them into their own hold. Then the Conſul ſounded the retreat: at which ſignall given the moſt part retired themſelves; but a ſort of them, upon a hot deſire of fight, and good hope to be Maſters of their camp, perſiſted ſtill, cloſe to their trench. The Gauls diſdaining their ſmall number iſſued all forth out of their Camp: and then the Romans being diſcomfited, were glad now of themſelves for fear and fright to trudge unto the ſtrength of their own hold, which they would not retire unto at the commandment of the Conſul. Thus on both ſides there was one while victory, and another while fearfull flight: howbeit, when all cards were told and the reckoning made, the Gauls had the worſt of the game: for of them were ſlain eleven thouſand, whereas of Romans there died but five thouſand. Then the Gauls retired themſelves into the moſt inward parts of their country, and the Conſul marched with his legions to Placentia. Some write, that Scipio and his Collegue with their this joynt forces, invaded and ſpoiled the countries of the Boians and Ligurians, ſo far forth H as they could paſs for woods and bogs: others again record, that he, having done no memorable exploit at all, returned to Rome about the aſſembly for election of Conſuls.

The ſame year T. Quintius ſpent the whole winter ſeaſon at Elatia (whither he had retired his forces for winter harbour) in hearing mens cauſes and miniſtring juſtice to every one; alſo in reforming and redreſſing all ſuch diſorders as had paſſed in the States and Cities, through the licentious government and juriſdiction either of Philip himſelf or his Captains, whiles he advanced thoſe favourits of his own faction, and put down the right and liberty of others. In the beginning of the ſpring he came to Corinth, where he had given ſummons, that there ſhould be holden a general Diet of the States. There in the aſſembly of all the Embaſſadors and agents from the Cities, gathered about him as it were to hear an Oration, he made a ſpeech unto them; beginning I firſt with the amity contracted between the Romans and Greece: and proceeding to the acts atchieved in Spain by the Generals afore him, and thoſe alſo of his own. All that he ſpake was heard and received with great applauſe, untill he touched the point concerning Nabis: for it was generally thought unfitting, that he undertaking to ſet all Greece at liberty, had left a tyrant (not only a grievous oppreſſour of his own ſubjects, but alſo dangerous to all the Cities about him) to remain ſtill as a tearfull malady ſetled in the very bowels and heart of a moſt noble and renowned State. Quintius, not ignorant of their affections and diſpoſitions, confeſſed, that he ſhould not indeed have any ear at all to the motion or mention of peace with the tyrant, in caſe that Lacedæmon could have ſtood in ſafety without ſo doing: but now ſince that Nabis might not poſſibly be confounded and overthrown, without the preſent ruin and fearfull downfall of the City, he K "thought it a better courſe in policy to leave the tyrant enfeebled and diſfurniſhed of all means "to offend and hurt any man, than to ſuffer ſo goodly a City to die in the cure, and under the "hand as it were of the Phyſician, amidſt thoſe quick and ſharp remedies which it were never a- "ble to endure: and ſo in ſeeking to recover liberty, to periſh and die for ever. And after he had "diſcourſed of things paſt, he inferred, that his purpoſe and intent was, to go into Italy, and to "have away with him his whole army: alſo that within ten daies they ſhould hear news how all "the garriſons had quit Demetrias and Chalcis: and that he would deliver out of hand unto the "Achæans in their very ſight, the fortreſs of Corinth: that all the world may know, whether it be "the Romans guiſe, or the faſhion of the Ætolians, to over-reach and lie; who in their common "talk have not let to diſcourſe, to ſow ſurmiſes, and to buzze into mens heads that it was dan- L "gerous for Greece to put their liberty into the Romans hands: & that they had but made an ex- "change of their lordly rulers, admitting the Romans in lieu of the Macedonians. But as for them "(quoth he) their tongue is no ſlander, being ſuch perſons as never took heed and made regard "what either they did or ſaid. But the other Cities he advertiſed to weigh their friends by deeds "and not by words: to be wiſe and well adviſed whom they are to truſt, and whom they are to "beware of: to uſe their liberty in meaſure and moderation; which if it be well tempered and "qualified, is good and wholſome to particular perſons and generall States: but exceſſive if it be, "it would not only be grievous and unſupportable to others, but alſo unruly, dangerous, and per- "nicious to themſelves that have it. He gave them counſell, that the Princes and States in each "City ſhould maintain concord not only among themſelves, but alſo with all other in one com- M "munity: for ſo long as they accord and agree together, no King nor tyrant ſhould be ſtrong e- "nough for them: whereas diſcord and ſedition maketh overture and openeth eaſie way to ene- "mies that lie in wait for the vantage; conſidering, that the ſide which in civill contention is the "weaker and goeth to the walls, will band rather with a forrainer, than give place and ſtoop to a "Citizen. In concluſion, he adviſed them, to keep and preſerve by their carefull regard, this their "liberty purchaſed for them by forrain forces, and delivered unto them with faithfull ſecurity of "ſtrangers and aliens; that the people of Rome might ſee, that they have given freedom to well "deſerving people: and this their great benefit hath been well beſtowed upon worthy perſons. Whiles they hearkned to theſe ſage admonitions, as uttered out of the mouth of a very father, the tears guſhed plenteouſly out of their eyes for kind heart and joy; inſomuch as they troubled him in the delivery of the reſt of his ſpeech. For a while there was a plauſible noiſe heard among N them as they approved his words, and adviſed one another to ponder theſe ſage ſayings, and to imprint them deeply in their hearts, proceeding as it were from divine oracle. After ſilence made, he requeſted them to ſeek up all thoſe Roman Citizens (if haply there were any) who lived in ſervitude and ſlavery among them, and within two months to ſend them unto him into Theſſaly: for it were a great ignominy and ſhame even for them, that in their countries there ſhould remain in bondage any of thoſe, by whoſe means they themſelves were ſet free and delivered out of bondage. With that, they all cried aloud with one voice, That for this above all the reſt they rendred thanks unto him, in that they were admoniſhed and warned by him, to perform their devoir and duty, ſo honeſt ſo religious, and ſo neceſſary. Now a mighty number there was of captives in O the Punick war; ſuch as Annibal (when their friends redeemed them not by ranſome) had ſold in open market. And how great the multitude of them was, this may prove and teſtifie which Polybius writeth; to wit, that this coſt the Achæans for their part * one hundred talents: and yet they ordained and ſet down, that there ſhould but 500 Denarii be repaid unto their Maſters for the redemption of every poll: for by this account Achæa had 1200 of them. Add now unto them as many as all Greece was like to have by that proportion [and ſee what number may ariſe.]

* By this account of Livy, a talent in this place amounteth to 187 li. 10 ſh ſterl.

A The aſſembly was not broken up and diſmiſſed, before they might ſee the garriſon deſcending from the fortreſs of Corinth, who marched directly to the gate and went their waies. The General preſently followed after, and being accompanied with them all, who called him with a loud voice, Their Saviour and Redeemer; he took his leave and bad them farewel: and ſo returned the ſame way he came to Elatia. From thence he ſent his Lieutenant Ap. Claudius with al the forces, commanding him to conduct the army to Oricum by the way of Theſſalie and Epirus, and there to expect and wait his coming: for he purpoſed there to take Sea and ſet over his army into Italy. He wrote alſo to L. Quintius his brother and Lieutenant, and Admiral likewiſe of the fleet, to gather all the ſhips of burden from along the Sea coaſt of Greece into that place. Himſelf went to Chalcis, and having withdrawn the garriſons not only from thence but alſo from Oreum and Ere-
B tria, he held a general Councel there of all the cities of Eubœa: and after he had made remonſtrance unto them in what caſe he found them, and in what eſtate he left them, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly. From thence he departed to Demetrias, where alſo he removed the garriſon, and being attended with a train of all the citizens, like as at Corinth and Chalcis before, he took his journey into Theſſalie: where the cities were not only to be ſet free, but alſo to be reformed, and from a general diſorder and confuſion wherein they ſtood, to be reduced and framed into ſome tolerable order and form of government. For they were not only tainted and infected with the corruption of the times, and the violent current of licentious outrage, which had taken head under the government of the King; but alſo of an inbred troubleſome ſpirit and humor of their own, wher-C by, ſince their firſt beginning and upriſing, even unto our daies they never held Parliaments, Elections, Diets, Councels or any other aſſemblies whatſoever, without much trouble and ſedition. He choſe the Senate and Judges there in regard eſpecially of their wealth, and in all Cities he made that part more mighty, unto which it was more expedient and beneficial to have all quiet and in peace. Thus having viſited Theſſalie, and taken a general review thereof, he came by the way of Epirus to Oricum, from whence he minded to croſs the ſeas. From Oricum all his forces were tranſported to Brunduſium, and ſo they paſſed forward throughout Italy to the City of Rome, in manner of triumph, ſending before them as great a train of prizes by them taken, as they made themſelves in their march. After they were come to Rome, the Senat aſſembled without the City for Quintius, where he had audience to declare and diſcourſe of his worthy exploits: and willing they were to grant him triumph, according to his deſerts. Three daies together he rode in D triumph. The firſt day he made a ſhew of all the armour, as wel defenſive as offenſive, alſo of braſen and marble images, of which he had taken more from King Philip, than he found in the ſaccage of the cities. The ſecond day there was carried in pomp, the gold and ſilver both unwrought and wrought into plate, yea, and caſt into coin. Of ſilver unwrought there was 18000 pound weight: of wrought, 270 pound weight. Many veſſels of plate of all ſorts, and moſt engraven, ſome of right curious and exquiſit workmanſhip. Likewiſe braſen veſſels, cunningly and artificially made: and beſides, ten ſhields of ſilver, and in coin eighty four thouſand Attick peeces of ſilver, which they call Tetradrachma, weighing almoſt four Roman deniers apeece: of gold there was three thouſand ſeven hundred and fourteen pound weight, and one ſhield full and whole of beaten gold, and of Philip golden peeces in coin, fourteen thouſand five hundred and fourteen. The third E day were born in view for a pageant, a hundred and fourteen coronets of gold, which were the preſents of Cities given unto him. Moreover, there were led that day the beaſts for ſacrifice: and before his chariot went many noble priſoners and hoſtages, and among them, Demetrius, King Philip his ſon, and Armenes the ſon of Nabis the tyrant, a Lacedæmonian born. Then rode Quintius himſelf in a chariot into the City, and a great number of ſouldiers followed after, by reaſon that his whole army was retired with him out of his province. To every footman he gave two hundred and fifty Aſſes, duple as much to a centurion, and triple to an horſeman. Thoſe who were redeemed out of captivity, followed his chariot with their heads ſhaven, and much beautified the glory of the triumph.

In the end of this year, Q. Ælius Tubero a Tribun of the Commons, preſented a requeſt or bill F unto the people, and they granted and enacted it, to wit, that two Colonies of Latins ſhould be conducted, the one into the Brutians countrey, and the other into the territory of Thurium. For the conduct and planting whereof, there were ordained three Deputies called Triumvirs, whoſe commiſſion was in force for three years, namely, Q. Nevius, M. Minutius Rufus, and M. Furius Craſſipes for the Brutians: and for Thurium, A. Manlius, P. Ælius, and L. Apuſtius. For the chuſing of theſe officers, Cn. Domitius the Pretor in the City, called two ſeveral aſſemblies in the Capitol. In that year were certain Temples dedicated, one of Iuno Soſpita in the herb-market, which had been vowed and ſet out to building four years before, by C. Cornelius the Conſul, during the war with the French: and he in his Cenſorſhip dedicated it. Another Temple of Faunus: the Ædiles C. Scribonius and Cn. Domitius, had likewiſe bargained for the building thereof two years
G before, and laid by the money therefore; and this Cn. Domitius being now Pretor of the City dedicated it. Alſo Q. Minutius Rufus, dedicated a Temple to Fortuna Primigenia upon the hill Quirinalis, having been created Duumvir himſelf for that purpoſe. Sempronius Sophus had vowed the ſame ten years before in the time of the Punick war, and agreed for a certain price to have it built. Alſo C. Servilius the other Duumvir conſecrated the Temple of Iupiter within the iſland. Vowed it was ſix years before in the Gauls war by L. Furius Purpurio Pretor, and by him afterwards (when he was Conſul) order was given for the edifying thereof. And theſe were the affairs which paſſed that year.

P. Scipio returned out of his Province and government of Gaul for the election of new Consuls, and to that purpose was the general assembly summoned; wherein were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next morrow after were created Pretors, L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Messala, L. Porcius Licinius, and C. Flaminius. C. Attilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, Ædiles of the chair, were the first that exhibited the Stage-plaies called Megalesia. And the Roman plaies or games represented and set out by these Ædiles, the Senat now first and never before beheld apart from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministred much talk: whiles some gave their opinion and said, That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long ago was due; others again construed thus, and gave out, "That whatsoever was added to the Majesty of "the Senators and Nobles, was derogatory from the dignity of the people: and that all such kind "of distinctions, whereby estates and degrees are severed one from another, are prejudicial as wel "to common peace as publick liberty. For these five hundred and eighty years say they, these "plaies and games have been beheld and looked upon in common, without any such precise dif- "ference. What new accident is suddainly befaln, why the Nobles should not be willing to let "the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should disdain "his poor neighbour to sit by him? This is a new appetite and strange longing of theirs indeed, "full of pride and arrogancy, a thing never desired nor taken up and practised by the Senat of any "nation whatsoever. So as in the end even Africanus beshrewed himself (men say) and repented thereof, for that he in his Consulship moved and perswaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked of. And men are ever more willing to keep them to ancient customes, unless they be such, as practise and experience do evidently check and condemn.

In the beginning of the year, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minutius were Consuls, news came so thick of many earth-quakes, that men were not only weary of the thing it self, but also of the holy-dayes and solemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Consuls could not intend either to assemble the Senate and sit in Councel, or manage the affairs of the Common-weal, for being wholly employed about sacrificing and appeasing the wrath of the gods. In conclusion, the Decemvirs were commanded to peruse the books of Sibylla, and according to their answer and direction, a procession and supplication was for three daies solemnised. And before the Altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses, they made their praiers with garlands and coronets on their heads: yea, and commandment was given, that every houshold and family by it self should fall to their praiers and devotions. Also the Consuls by order from the Senat made proclamation, That upon what day a feast or solemnity was ordained by occasion of one earthquake, no man the same day should bring news of another. Then the Consuls cast lots for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretors did the like. Unto Cornelius befell Gaul, and to Minutius the Ligurians; C. Sempronius had the charge of the civil jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the forrain; L. Cornelius governed Sicily, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius high Spain, and L. Fulvius the lower. The Consuls looked for no war that year: but even then at that instant were letters brought from M. Cincius Lord President of Pisa, which gave notice, that twenty thousand Ligurians were up in arms, having conspired together in all market Towns and places of resort throughout the whole nation, and that they had already wasted the territory of Luna, and having invaded and passed through the Pisan Land, had over-run also the Sea coasts. Wherefore Minutius the Consul, unto whom the government of Liguria was allotted, by the advice of the LL. of the Senat mounted up into the pulpit Rostra, and published an act, That those two legions of Roman citizens, which the former year had been enrolled, should within ten daies present themselves at Aretium, in lieu whereof he would levy two other legions out of the City. Also he commanded the allies and Magistrats of the Latin nation, and their Embassadors leagers, who owed knight-service, and were bound to find souldiers to come before him into the Capitol. And from among them he enrolled fifteen thousand foot and five hundred horse, according to the number of young and serviceable men that were to be found in each State: which done, he commanded them forthwith, to go directly from the Capitol to the gate of the City, and presently to take musters that all might be done with greater expedition. Unto Fulvius and Flaminius were appointed three thousand Roman footmen and two hundred horsemen apeece, for to supply and strengthen their forces: also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latin nation, with two hundred horse. Moreover the Pretors were charged to dismiss and cass the old souldiers, so soon as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when as the souldiers who were enrolled in the City-legions, resorted thick unto the Tribuns of the Commons, that they shou'd take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warfare, for that they either had served out their full time by law appointed, or were sickly and diseased: behold the letters of Sempronius dashed all this, and cleered every difficulty and scrupulosity: wherein it was written, that fifteen thousand Ligurians were entred the territory of Placentia, and had made great wast and saccage therein putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as far as to the very walls of the Colony it self, and the banks of * Padus. Also that the nation of the Boii made countenance and gave suspicion of rebellion. In which regards seeing there was a tumultuous and suddain war toward, the Senat passed a decree, wherein they signified that it was not their pleasure that the Tribuns should accept any excuses pretended by the souldiers, but that they should all meet

A meet and assemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latin nation, who had served in the armies of P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius, and were discharged from souldiery by them being Consuls, should now be ready to shew themselves, against that day which L. Cornelius the Consul should appoint, and at what place soever of Hetruria he should command by way of proclamation: Also that the said L. Cornelius the Consul in his march and journey toward the Province, might take up, enrol, and arme, what souldiers he thought good, out of all the burroughs and villages in his way, and have them with him whither soever he would, yea, and have commission to dismiss whom of them he thought good, and when soever he listed at his good pleasure.

After that the Consuls had taken musters, and were gone into their Provinces, then T. Quin-
B tius demanded to have a day of audience in the Senate concerning those affairs that he had concluded with the assistance of the ten Delegats above said: and that it would please them to confirm and establish the same by vertue of their assent and authority. Which they might do with more ease, in case they would hear the Embassadors themselves speak, who were come out of all Greece, a great part of Asia, and from the Kings. These embassies were admitted into the Senat by C. Scribonius the Pretor for the City, and all dispatched with a gratious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus reqnired long time of debate, therefore it was referred and put over to the ten Delegats, of whom some had been in Asia, or at Lysimachia with the King. And Quintius was commanded, that together with those said Delegats he should hear what the King his Embassadors could say, and so return unto them such an answer, as might stand with the honor and C welfare of the people of Rome. The chief of this embassage from the King were Menippus and Hegesianax. Then Menippus began and said, "That he knew no such perplexed difficulty in their "embassage, considering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contract a league and al-"liance. For, saith he, there are three sorts of confederacies and associations, whereby States and "KK. ordinarily conclude league and amity one with another. The first, when they that are van-"quished in war, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yeelded into "the hands of him that is the mightier and more puissant, then it is in his power and at his dis-"cretion and will, to give unto the conquered party what he list, or to take from him as he "pleaseth. The second is, when they that are equal in warlike forces give over on even hand, and "be content to make peace and amity, upon indifferent and equal conditions, one with the other:
D "in which case, demand and claim is made, restitution and amends performed according to the "accord and agreement: and if in time of the wars, any have been molested and troubled in their "possession, they fall to composition either by the form and tenor of ancient law, or respective "to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meet "and confer together about concluding some friendship, by way of solemn alliance and society, "who neither give nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerors, and "those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is compriſed in this last kind, I marvail "(qd. he) that the Romans should think or say, It is reasonable to tender articles unto him, or "to prescribe and set down, what Cities of Asia they would have to be free and exempt, and "which they would have to be tributary: and into what Cities they would expressly forbid the E "King his garrisons, or the King himself to enter and set foot. For in this wise ought they to "make peace with Philip their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amity and asso-"ciation with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this Oration Quintius shaped his answer in "this sort. "For asmuch as it pleaseth you to make your speech thus distinctly by way of divisi-"on, and severally to reherse all kinds of confederacies and accords, I also will set down as metho-"dically in order two conditions, without which, you may let the King your master to understand, "that he must not look to entertain any friendship with the people of Rome. The one is this, "that if he would debar us to intermeddle with the Cities of Asia: he likewise himself have no-"thing to do with all Europe. The other, that if he cannot contain himself within the compass of F "Asia, but will needs encroach upon it the Romans likewise may have liberty and power both to "maintain those amities which they have already, and also to entertain new with the States of "Asia. Hereat Hegesianax inferred and said, "That this was an indignity intolerable, and which "he could not abide to hear, namely that Antiochus should be dissaized of those Cities of Thrace "and Chersonesus, which Seleucus his great grand-father had conquered with singular honor from "King Lysimachus, whom he vanquished in war and slew in field, and setled the same in him as "his rightful inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Antiochus himself with "as great praise and glory hath partly by force of arms regained out of their hands, and partly re-"peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and desolat, "and namely, Lysimachia it self, as all the world seeth: and more than that, hath re-edified to his "exceeding charge and expense, those that lay along in their ruins, and were consumed with fire.
G "What likenes then is there between these two demands: namely, that Antiochus should quit the "possession of that which either he acquired or recovered in that sort: and that the Romans "should abstain and forbear Asia, which never appertained unto them? To conclude, Antiochus "saith he) is desirous of the Roman friendship, but in such terms as may stand with his honor, & "not purchase himself shame and reproach. Then Quintius rejoyned again in this manner: "For "asmuch as, qd. he, we balance and weigh things according to honesty (as in truth it is befitting the "chief and principal state of the world, and so great and mighty a King to prize that only or at "leastwise principally above all other regards) I would gladly know of you. Whether ye think it H

"more honeſt of the twain, either to will and wiſh that all the Cities of Greece whatſoever and "whereſoever ſhould enjoy liberty: or to make them homagers and tributary? If Antiochus
"thinketh it be an honorable thing for him to reduce into ſervitude and bondage as his own,
"thoſe Cities which his great grand-father held by right of arms, and whereof neither his father "nor grand-father afore him were in poſſeſſion: the people of Rome likewiſe eſteemeth it a mate"rial point that toucheth their faithfulneſs and conſtancy, not to forſake the Greeks, whoſe pro"tection and defence they have enterpriſed and taken in hand. And like as they have freed Greece
"out of the hands of Philip, ſo they intend to deliver thoſe Cities of Aſia which are of Greekiſh "race and deſcent, from the ſubjection of Antiochus. For the Greek Colonies were not ſent into I
"Æolis and Ionia, to live in ſervitude under the King, but to increaſe and multiply, that a moſt "ancient nation might ſpread over the face of the whole earth. Now when as Hegeſianax knew not how to ſhift and turn himſelf, and could not deny but that the cauſe of liberty which the Romans pretended in the title of their quarrel, was of more honeſty and credit, than that other of ſlavery: Let's lay away all theſe circumſtances of words (quoth P. Sulpitius, the ancienteſt perſon of all the ten Delegats) and chooſe ye one of the two conditions which even now were expreſly offered unto you by Quintius, or elſe make no more talk about amity with the Romans. Then quoth Menippus, As for us, we may in no caſe, neither will we capitulate and covenant any thing prejudicial to the Kingdom and royal ſtate of King Antiochus. The morrow after Quintius when he had brought all the Embaſſies of Greece and Aſia into the Senat, that they might know what affection the people of Rome carried, and what mind Antiochus bare to the Cities of Greece, he K declared before them all as well his own demands, as thoſe of the Kings part: willing them to make report unto their own Cities, and aſſure them, that the people of Rome would maintain them a-gainſt Antiochus (unleſs he departed out of Europe) with the ſame vertue, valour, and fidelity wherewith he had defended their liberty againſt Philip. Then Menippus was earneſt with Quintius and the LL. of the Senat, beſeeching them inſtantly not to proceed in haſt to a decree whereby they ſhould ſet all the world in trouble and uprore; but both take leiſure themſelves and give reſpite unto the King to deliberat farther of the matter: for no doubt, upon the relating of the conditions, he would conſider upon them, and either obtain ſomewhat at their hands, or for peace ſake yeeld his conſent to all. Thus was the matter wholly and entirely deferred: and agreed it was, that the ſame Embaſſadors ſhould be addreſſed unto the King, who had been with him at L Lyſimachia, to wit, P. Sulpitius P. Villius, and P. Ælius.

Scarcely were they gone from the City and entred upon their journey, but Embaſſadors arrived from Carthage, who reported, that without all doubt Antiochus made preparation for war, and therein uſed the hand and miniſtery of Annibal: in ſo much, as it was feared alſo that a third Punick war would break out withal. Annibal, as we ſaid before, having fled his native countrey, repaired unto Antiochus, and was in great account and eſtimation with the King, for no other cauſe and policy in the world, but that the King who projected and plotted long time in his ſpirit to levy war upon the Romans, could find no man more fit than Annibal to break his mind unto, and with whom to diſcourſe upon a matter of ſuch conſequence. Annibal his ſong and reſolution was ever one and the ſame ſtill, namely, To make war within Italy: and that Italy was M able to furniſh a forrain enemy, with men, munition, and victuals. For this he caſt with himſelf and conſidered, that if all were quiet there and no troubles ſet a foot, but that the people of Rome might with the forces and riches of Italy, furniſh themſelves to make war without Italy, there was no Monarch nor nation under the ſun able to make head againſt the Romans. He demanded therefore to have the command of 100 cloſe ſhips with hatch and deck, 16000 foot, and 1000 horſe: and with the ſaid fleet he would firſt ſail into Affrick, where he aſſured himſelf that he ſhould be able to ſollicit and induce the Carthaginians to rebellion: but if they held off and made it goodly and ſtrange, yet would he ſettle in ſome part of Italy and levy war againſt the Romans.
His advice and counſel furthermore was, that the King ſhould with all his other forces paſs into Europe, and in ſome one part of Greece keep his power together, and not to take the Sea, but to be N ready ever to croſs over; which would be ſufficient to make a ſhew and raiſe a bruit all abroad of war. When he had perſwaded the King to this deſignment and reſolution, ſuppoſing that he was likewiſe to ſound and prepare the hearts afore-hand of his own countrymen to this purpoſe: he durſt not diſpatch any letters unto them, for fear they might chance to be intercepted by the way, and ſo diſcover the whole plot. He hapned at Epheſus upon a Tyrian one Ariſton, a man whoſe induſtry and dexterity he had tried in ſome ſmall ſervices wherein he had imployed him. Him he plyed with gifts in hand, but fed him more with large promiſes of great rewards, which King An-tiochus alſo himſelf ſeemed to make good and give his word for; and ſo ſent him to Carthage with credence and inſtructions. He acquainted him with the names of all thoſe perſons with whom he was to talk and confer: he furniſheth him with ſecret tokens, whereby they might O aſſuredly know that he was no counterfeit, but came with a meſſage from him. Now whiles this Ariſton converſed in Carthage, the friends of Annibal knew no ſooner about what errand he came, than his very enemies. At the firſt, much talk and diſcourſe there was in every corner of the City where they met, and at their feaſts and merriments, of this matter. Afterwards at their councel table ſome ſtuck not to ſay, that the exile of Annibal was to little or no purpoſe, if whiles he was abſent he could contrive and compaſs new plots, and by ſolliciting and tempering mens minds, diſquiet

A diſquiet and trouble the ſtate of the City. There is a ſtranger, ſay they, one Ariſton a Tyrian, hither come with inſtructions from Annibal and King Antiochus: certain men there are, that daily have privy conference with him, and deviſe in ſecret of that, which anon will break out to the utter ruin and overthrow of all. "Whereupon they all cried with one voyce to convent Ariſton pe-"remptorily before them, and to examine him about what buſineſs he was thither arrived; and un-"leſs he would bewray & declare the matter, to ſend him with Embaſſadors of purpoſe, to Rome: "For why? we have (ſay they) felt the ſmart enough, and paid ſufficiently for the folly and raſh "head of one harebrained man already. Let privat perſons bear their own load hereafter, and at "their own peril commit a treſpaſs: provided alwayes, that the Common-weal be preſerved clear "not only from all fault, but alſo from all apparance and bruit of any ſuch intent. Ariſton being B called before them, ſtood ſtifly upon his integrity and excuſed himſelf, and evermore uſed this for his beſt and ſureſt defence, That he had brought no letters at all to any perſon: howbeit he could not render a ready & ſound reaſon of his coming thither: but eſpecially he was ſhrewdly troubled and put to his trumps when they charged him, That he had talk and communication with thoſe only of the Barchine faction. Hereupon aroſe ſome debate and altercation in the houſe; whiles ſome were of opinion that he ſhould be apprehended for a ſpie, and clapt up faſt in ward: others again were of mind that there was no cauſe to make ſuch a ſtir and tumult; for it was an evil preſident to be given, that ſtrangers coming to their City, ſhould be troubled and hardly intreated: and the like meaſure no doubt would be offered to the Carthaginians in Tyrus & in other Towns of marchandiſe, whereunto they uſe to have reſort for exchange and traffique. So for that day the C matter was put off. Ariſton framing himſelf to play the crafty Carthaginian among theſe Carthaginians, wrote a certain bill: and in the ſhutting in of the evening, hung it up in the moſt conſpicuous and publick place of all the City, even over the ſeat where the head Magiſtrate uſeth daily to ſit: and himſelf about the third watch gat to ſhipboord and eſcaped. The morrow after, when the Suffetes were ſet on the bench, to miniſter law; the bill aforeſaid was ſeen, taken down, and read: wherein to this effect was written. That Ariſton was not come with a meſſage to any perſon in particular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in general (for ſo they call the Senat.) After that the thing was by this means made a publick matter, and the whole ſtate of the Senators reputed culpable they were not ſo earneſt to ſearch into privat perſons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent to Rome to give information hereof to the Conſuls and the Se-

Maſaniſſa underſtanding that the Carthaginians were ſuſpected and in ſome ill name among the Romans, and alſo at jar and variance within themſelves; and namely, that the great and principal men were had in jealouſy by the Senat for their conferences with Ariſton; and their Senate likewiſe ſuſpected by the people, by reaſon of that writing above-named of the ſaid Ariſton: taking this for a good advantage and opportunity to do them ſome injury, not only invaded their maritime parts and made ſpoil, but alſo forced certain tributary Cities to the Carthaginians for to pay himſelf tribute. That quarter of the countrey they call Emporia. It is the Sea coaſt of the leſſer Syrtis, and the country is exceeding fertile: there is in it one only City named Leptis, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute, a talent every day. All this region Maſaniſſa then had plagued ſore, E yea, and for one part thereof he made ſome claim, as being litigious whether it pertained to his Kingdom, or the Seignory of the Carthaginians: and becauſe he knew for truth, that the Carthaginian Embaſſadors were about to go to Rome, as well to purge themſelves of ſome crimes wherewith they were charged, as to complain of him; therefore himſelf alſo addreſſed his Embaſſadors to Rome, who ſhould lay open more matter againſt them of deeper ſuſpition, and debate withal as touching the right of thoſe tributes. The Carthaginians were no ſooner heard ſpeak concerning that Tyrian ſtranger, but the LL. of the Senat grew into ſome doubt leſt they ſhould wage war with Antiochus and the Carthaginians both together. And this preſumption of all the reſt made the ſuſpicion moſt pregnant, becauſe when they had the party among them and were purpoſed to ſend him to Rome, they neither made the man himſelf ſure, nor the bark wherein he arrived. After this,
F they fell to debate and argue with the Kings Embaſſadors, about the territory and land in controverſy. "The Carthaginians pleaded for themſelves, and ſtood much upon their bounds and li-"mits, for that the land in ſuit lay within that precinct, by which P. Scipio the Conqueror limited "out that territory which pertained to the ſeignory of the Carthaginians. Alſo they alledged the "confeſſion of the King himſelf, who at what time as he purſued Apheres, that fled out of his own "realm, and with a company of Numidians ranged abroad about Cyrene, made requeſt unto them "to give him leave to paſs through this very ground, as if (without all queſtion) it belonged to "the Carthaginians. The Numidians anſwered again to theſe points & ſaid plainly to their faces, "that they lied in their throats, as touching that ſuppoſed limitation and bounding by Scipio: "and moreover, if we would go (ſay they) and ſearch the very original indeed of the law, what G "land at all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meer "ſtrangers, they had after much praier and entreaty, as much ground allowed them and no more, "to build them a City in, as they could compaſs with thongs cut out of one bull hide. And look "whatſoever they had encroached upon; without that neſt and ſeat of theirs in Byrſa they gat and "held it by force and violence. And as for the land now in ſtrife, they are not able to prove, that "they alwaies held the ſame in poſſeſſion, no, nor that they kept it any long time together. But as "occaſion and opportunies ſerved of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian

" Kings made reentry and enjoied it, and evermore he went away with the poſſeſſion thereof H
" that was the ſtronger, and had the keener ſword. In theſe conſiderations they requeſted the Ro" mans to leave the thing in that ſtate and condition, wherein it ſtood before that the Carthagi" nians were enemies, or King Maſaniſſa friend and allie to the Romans: and not to intermeddle " between, nor take a part, but let the winner wear it, and him have it that can hold it. In concluſion it was thought good, that to the Embaſſadors of both parties this anſwer ſhould be returned, namely; That they would ſend certain Commiſſioners into Affrick, to decide this controverſy about the land in queſtion, between the people of Carthage and the King. So there were ſent of purpoſe, P. Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rufus. Who having heard what could be ſaid, and ſeen the thing, left all hanging ſtill in ſuſpence and undecided without adjudging it by their definitive ſentence to the one or the other. But whether they ſo did, on their I own head and ſelf-accord, or by direction from the Senat, is not ſo certain as it ſeemeth agreeable unto that preſent time in policy, to leave them as they found them, and the controverſie ſtill depending. For unleſs it were ſo, Scipio himſelf alone, in regard of the knowledge that he had of the thing, and of his authority with the perſons (ſo much bound they were unto him on both ſides) might with a word of his mouth, or a nod of his head, have ended all this matter.

N

IN the beginning of that year wherein theſe affairs thus paſſed. Sext. Digitius Pretor in high Spain, fought battels (rather ordinary, and for number many, than otherwiſe memorable and worth the ſpeaking) againſt thoſe States, whereof after the departure of Cato a great part had rebelled. And thoſe battels for the moſt part were ſo unfortunate that hardly he could deliver up to his ſucceſſor the one half of thoſe ſouldiers which he had received. And doubtleſs all Spain would have taken heart again, if the other Pretor P. Cornelius Scipio, the ſon of Cneius, had not ſped better in many of his conflicts beyond Iberus. Upon which terrour no fewer than fifty good Towns revolted unto him. And theſe exploits performed Scipio as Pretor. Who alſo in quality of Propretor, encountred the Luſitans upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with a mighty great booty raiſed out of the baſe Spain, which they had utterly pilled and ſpoiled: where O
* After Sunring. he fought from the third hour of the * day unto the eight, with doubtful event. For number of ſouldiers he was inferiour to his enemies, but for all things elſe he had the vantage and went beyond them. For his bataillons were well appointed and cloſe compacted of armed men, and ſo he charged upon the enemies marching in a long train, and the ſame encumbred with a deal of cattel: beſides, his ſouldiers were freſh and in heart, whereas the other were wearied with long travel.

A vel. For the enemies ſet forth at the third watch, and beſides their night journey, they had marched three hours alſo of the day, and without any repoſe or reſt at all, they came to a conflict preſently upon their travel on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battel, ſo long as they were in any heart, and their ſtrength ſerved, they troubled and diſordered the Romans with the firſt charge they gave: but afterwards for a while they came to be equal in fight. In which hazard of doubtful iſſue the Propretor vowed to ſet forth certain ſolemn games to the honour of Jupiter, in caſe he might diſcomfit the enemies, and kill them in chaſe. At the length the Romans advanced forward more hotly, and the Luſitans retreated, yea, and anon turned their backs quite. And when as in this train of victory the Romans purſued them hard in the rout, there were of the enemies ſlain upon 12000, 500 and forty taken priſoners, all in manner horſemen; and of military B enſigns they carried away one hundred thirty and four. Of the Roman army ſeventy and three only were loſt. This battel was fought not far from the City Ilipa. And thither brought P. Cornelius his victorious army, enriched with prey and pillage. Which was laid all abroad before the Town, and every man had leave given to challenge and claim his own. All the reſt was given to the Treaſurer for to be ſold: and the mony raiſed thereof, was parted among the ſouldiers.

Now had not C. Flaminius the Pretor as yet taken his leave of Rome, when theſe things fell out in Spain, and therefore both he and his friends talked and diſcourſed much upon theſe occurrents both good and bad: and foraſmuch as a great war in his Province was broken out to a light fire, and himſelf was to receive from Sext. Digitius but a ſmall remnant of an army, and the ſame timorous ſtill and full of fright, as not well recovered of their former flight, he had aſſaied to bring
C about, that the Senat would aſſign unto him one of the City-legions; to the end that when he had joined thereto thoſe ſouldiers which himſelf had enrolled according to an order ſet down by the Senat, he might out of all that number chuſe forth ſix thouſand and five hundred footmen, and three hundred horſemen. With which legion (for in the army of Sext. Digitius he repoſed ſmall confidence) he minded to make war. The ancient Senators denied and ſaid, That acts of the Senat were not to be made upon every flying tale and report ſet abroad and blazed by ſome particular perſons in favor of Magiſtrats. Neither would they hold any thing for certain, but that which either the Pretors themſelves wrote out of the Provinces, or Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe, related. And if there were any ſuch commotion and trouble in Spain, they were of advice that the Pretor ſhould levy in haſt without Italy, ſuch tumultuary ſouldiers, as in that caſe were uſually taken up.
D The intent and mind of the Senat was, that ſouldiers ſhould in that ſort be preſt out in Spain. Valerius Antias writeth that C. Flaminius both ſailed into Sicily to levy and muſter men, and alſo as he made ſail from Sicily toward Spain, was by wind and tempeſt put with the ſhore of Africk: where he found certain ſouldiers diſperſed over the countrey, remaining of the army of P. Africanus: of whom he took a military oath to ſerve him in his wars: and that to theſe levies raiſed in two Provinces he joyned alſo a third in Spain.

The war of the Ligurians likewiſe grew as faſt: for they had already beſieged and inveſted Piſa with forty thouſand men: and thither reſorted and flocked dayly unto them great multitudes as well for hope of pillage, as upon the bruit and rumor that went of the war. Minutius the Conſul came at the day appointed to Aretium, which was the Rendezvous where he had commanded all E his ſouldiers to meet him: from whence he marched with a fourſquare Battailon toward Piſa. And when the enemies had removed their camp a mile from the City on the other ſide of the River, the Conſul entred the Town, which no doubt by his coming he preſerved. The next day himſelf alſo encamped on the other ſide of the River, almoſt half a mile from the enemies, from which place he made light skirmiſhes with them and ſaved the territory of his allies from the excurſions and robberies of the enemies. He durſt not as yet try a battail in pitched field, as having but raw and new ſouldiers, and thoſe gathered out of many kinds of men, and not ſo well known among themſelves, that one might ſurely truſt another. The Ligurians bearing themſelves bold of their numbers, not only came forth into the field ready to bid battail, and hazard all upon a throw: but having multitudes at commandment and to ſpare, ſent out into all parts ſundry com-
F panies to ſpoil and raiſe booties as far as to the marches and frontiers of the countrey. And when they had gathered together much cattail and great ſtore of pillage, they had a ſtrong place of defence ready at hand, well manned and guarded, by means whereof all was convoyed into their burroughs and Towns.

Thus while the Ligurians war was ſettled about Piſa, the other Conſul L. Cornelius Merula entred with his army by the utmoſt confines of the Ligurians into the territory of the Boians: where the war was managed far otherwiſe than with the Ligurians. For the Conſul entred the field in battail arrai, but the enemies fell off, and would not fight. In ſo much as the Romans ſeeing none to come forth and preſent themſelves, ran abroad into all parts to ſpeed their hands with G pillage. And the Boians choſe rather to ſuffer their goods to be ranſacked making no reſiſtance, than to ſave the ſame with the hazard of a battail. The Conſul when he had wrought his pleaſure and conſumed all with fire and ſword departed out of the territory of the enemies, and marched toward * Mutina ſecurely without any regard of himſelf, as through a peaceable country of his friends. The Boii perceiving one that they were gone out of their limits, followed after with a ſtill and ſilent march, ſeeking ſome convenient place for to lay an ambuſh. And having in the night ſeaſon paſſed beyond the Roman camp they ſeiſed themſelves of a ſtreight paſſage within a faſtneſs, through which of neceſſity the Romans muſt paſs, and there they forlayed them.

* Modena.

This

This was not ſo cloſely carried, but the Conſul had an inkling thereof: and therefore where as H his manner was to ſet out in his march early in the morning, long before day light, now for fear leſt the darkneſs of the night ſhould increaſe the terror of a tumultuary skirmiſh, he waited for the day. And albeit the ſun was up before he removed and ſet forward, yet he ſent out a Troop of horſemen to ſcour and diſcover the quarters. And after he was advertiſed by theſe eſpials what number there was of enemies, and in what place they were, he commanded that all the baggage and carriage of the whole army ſhould be beſtowed in the mids, and that the Triarii ſhould ſtake and pale it all about, whiles he with the reſt of his forces marched in order of battail, and approached the enemy. The like alſo did the French, after they once ſaw that their ambuſh and trains were detected, and that they muſt of neceſſity fight a ſet pitched battail, where down right blows, clean ſtrength, and pure valour, was to carry away the victory. Thus about I the ſecond hour of the day they affronted one another. The left wing of the horſemen of the allies and the extraordinaries fought in the vanguard, under the conduct of two Lieutenants that had been Conſuls, to wit, M. Marcellus, and T. Sempronius, Conſul the year before. The new Conſul one while was in the front of the battail, another while at the tail to keep in the legions, leſt for eager deſire of fight they ſhould advance forward to the conflict before that the ſignal was given. As for the men of arms belonging to the legions, he commanded Quintius and P. Minutius, Marſhals or Colonels, to bring them forth, and conduct them without the battail into a large plain, from whence out of the open ground they ſhould on a ſuddain charge the enemies, when he gave them a ſignal by ſound of Trumpet. Thus as he was marſhalling and directing his men, there came a meſſenger from T. Sempronius Longus with a report, that the looſe Extraordinary K ſouldiers aforeſaid were not able to abide the violence of the Gauls: that very many of them were ſlain, and thoſe that remained, partly for wearineſs of travail, and partly for fearful cowardice began to quail their heat of fight: and therefore if he thought ſo good, he ſhould ſend one of the two legions to ſuccour, before they had received farther diſhonor. Whereupon the ſecond legion was ſent, and the Extraordinaries retired themſelves out of the battail. Then began the conflict anew, by reaſon that the ſouldiers came in freſh and in heart, and the legion beſides was compleat and fully furniſhed with all her companies: the left wing of horſemen aforeſaid was retired out of the battail, and in lieu thereof, the right wing advanced into the fore-front. By this time the ſun with extreme ſcorching heat roſted and fried the bodies of the Frenchmen, which of all things can leaſt abide heat: howbeit, ſtanding with their ranks thick and cloſe together, one while they L leaned one upon another: other whiles they reſted and bare themſelves upon their targets, and ſuſtained the violence of the Romans. Which when the Conſul perceived, he commanded C. Livius Salinator who had the conduct of the light horſe in the wings, to ſend in the quickeſt horſe in all his company, with ful carrier to break their ranks: and gave charge that the legionary horſemen ſhould abide behind in the reregard. This tempeſt and ſtorm of Cavalry firſt ſhuffled and put in diſaray the battail of the Gauls, and afterwards brake their ranks and files clean, yet not ſo, that they turned their backs: for why, their Captains and Leaders would not ſuffer them, laying about with their truncheons upon the backs of them that ſo trembled for fear, and forced them again into their ranks: but the light horſemen aforeſaid riding among them would not permit them to ſtand to it, and keep their place. The Conſul for his part encouraged and exhorted his M ſouldiers to ſtick to it awhile, for the victory was in their hands; and to charge ſtill upon them ſo long as they ſaw them diſordred and affrighted: for if they ſuffered their ranks to cloſe again they ſhould abide another conflict, and the ſame perhaps doubtful and dangerous. The Enſign-bearers he commanded to advance their banners: and thus at length with putting all their power and good will together, they diſcomfited the enemy, and put him to flight. After they ſhewed their backs once and took them to their heels, running away on all ſides, then the legionary horſemen were ſent out after to follow the chaſe: fourteen thouſand Boians that day were ſlain, a thouſand and nine hundred taken priſoners alive: 221 horſemen, three of their Leaders, and of Enſigns were won 212, and chariots 63. The Romans likewiſe won not this victory ſo cleer, but it coſt them ſome bloud. For of their own ſouldiers and allies together, there died above five thouſand, N 23 Centurions, beſides four Colonels of Allies, and two Marſhals of the ſecond legion, to wit, M. Genutius, and M. Martius.

At one and the ſelf ſame time in manner, both the Conſuls letters were brought to Rome. Cornelius his letters, touching the battail fought at Mutina with the Boians: but the other of Q. Minutius from Piſæ were written to this effect, That whereas by lot it belonged to him to hold the aſſembly for the election of new Magiſtrats, yet conſidering in how doubtful terms of hazard his affairs ſtood in Liguria, that he might not poſſibly depart from thence without the utter ruin of the allies, and hinderance of the weal publick: therefore if it might ſeem ſo good unto the LL. of the Senat, he would adviſe them to ſend unto his brother Conſul, That he, who had finiſhed his war, might return to Rome for to hold the foreſaid general aſſembly for the election: but incaſe O he ſhould think much thereof, becauſe this charge properly appertaineth not to him; he promiſed them, that himſelf would do whatſoever the Senate ſhould think good. But he requeſted them to conſider and be well adviſed, Whether it were not more expedient for the commonweal to proceed rather to an interreign, than that he ſhould leave the Province in that ſtate of jeopardy. The Senat hereupon gave in charge to C. Scribonius for to ſend two Embaſſadors both of Senators calling, unto L. Cornelius the Conſul, who ſhould carry alſo with them unto him

A the letters of his colleague written and ſent unto the Senat: and withal, to let him underſtand, that unleſs he would come himſelf to Rome for the election of new Magiſtrats to ſucceed, the Senat would ſuffer an interreign rather than call away Q. Minutius from the war unfiniſhed, and wherein he was wholly employed. The Embaſſadors that were ſent, brought word back, That L. Cornelius would repair to Rome himſelf for the chuſing of new Magiſtrats. As touching the letters of L. Cornelius, wherein he gave them to underſtand, what happy iſſue & ſucceſs he had in the battail with the Boians; there was ſome reaſoning and debate in the Senat-houſe: for M. Claudius his Lieutenant had written other letters privately to moſt of the Senators, to this effect; That they were much beholden and bound to give thanks unto the good fortune of the people of Rome, and the valour of the ſouldiers, in that they ſped ſo well as they did: for by means of the Con-
B ſul, not only there were a good number of men loſt, but alſo the army of the enemies was eſcaped out of their hands, when they had fit opportunity preſented unto them, of a final defeat and overthrow thereof: and that by this occaſion there was a greater number of the ſouldiers miſcarried; for that they who ſhould have reſcued and ſuccoured thoſe that were diſtreſſed, came too late out of the reregard: and the reaſon why the enemies got away and eſcaped was this, becauſe the legionary horſemen had not the ſignal ſoon enough ſounded unto them, and could not poſſibly purſue them in the chaſe. Therefore as concerning that point, they would not determine any thing raſhly and hand over head, but the matter was referred and put over to a more frequent aſſembly of Senators.

A greater object there was to trouble their heads; for the City was much oppreſſed with uſu-
C ry: and albeit the avarice and covetouſneſs of men had been well gaged and bridled by many laws concerning uſury, yet there was a cautelous device and ſhift found out, to avoid all ſtatutes in that behalf: to wit, that all obligations ſhould paſs in the names of allies, and be ſealed unto them, who were not tied and bound to obſerve the laws aforeſaid. By which means the creditors enwrapped their debtors in what bonds they liſt, and forced them to pay extream intereſt as they would themſelves, without ſtint. For to ſee into this diſorder and enormity, and to redreſs the ſame it was thought good and order taken, to ſet down and limit a certain day, namely, upon which the uſurers were laſt reſtrained. From which day all thoſe allies ſhould come in and declare and profeſs, what mony they had put forth upon uſury to any citizens of Rome; and that the creditour ſhould have right to recover thoſe monies put forth from that time, according to ſuch
D conditions as the debtor would himſelf. Hereupon, after there were diſcovered great ſums of money and debts contracted by this fraudulent practiſe, M. Sempronius a Tribun of the Commons, by advice of the Senat propounded a law, and the Commons allowed it, That the ſame courſe of putting out money practiſed between citizen and citizen of Rome, ſhould likewiſe be in force among the allies of the Latin Nation. In this ſort went matters in Italy, both within the City of Rome, and alſo in the wars abroad.

In Spain the war was nothing ſo much as the bruit that ran thereof. C. Flaminius in high Spain, wan Ilucia, a Town in the Oretans countrey: after which exploit, he laid up his ſouldiers in their winter harbour. And in winter time there paſſed certain light skirmiſhes (not worth the naming) againſt the excurſions of brigands and theeves, I may rather ſay, than enemies: and E yet the fortune was variable, and not without ſome loſs of men. As for M. Fulvius he atchieved great matters: for he fought in a ranged battail with banner diſplaied againſt the Vacceans, the Vectones, and the Celtiberians, before the Town Toletum; where he diſcomfited and put to flight the army of thoſe nations, and took priſoner alive, their King Hilernus.

Whiles theſe things thus paſſed in Spain, the day drew neer, of the ſolemn election of Magiſtrats at Rome: and therefore L. Cornelius the Conſul having left M. Claudius Lieutenant in the army, came to Rome: who, after he had diſcourſed in the Senat-houſe of his own exploits, and in what eſtate the province ſtood, he complained to the LL. of the Senat, that conſidering ſo great a war was brought to an end, by one battail ſo fortunatly and happily fought, there was no ſolemnity to the honour of the Gods, performed in that behalf. Over and beſides, he demanded, That F they would decree a proceſſion and triumph withal. But before the Senators were to deliver their opinions to this demand, Q. Metellus, who had been Conſul and Dictator, roſe up and ſaid, "That there had been letters brought at one and the ſame time; both from the Conſul Cornelius "to the Senat, and alſo from M. Marcellus to a great many of the Senators, and thoſe letters impor-"ting contrarieties: whereupon the conſultation of that matter had been deferred and put off, to "the end that it might be argued and debated in the preſence of them both, who wrote the let-"ters: and therefore I ever looked (quoth he) that the Conſul (knowing eſpecially that his Lieu-"tenant had written and informed ſomewhat againſt him, and conſidering that himſelf was to re-"pair to Rome) would have brought him alſo with him: ſeeing that it had been more meet and "befitting him to have delivered the army to T. Sempronius, one that was in the commiſſion and G had a command, than to a Lieutenant. But it ſhould ſeem now, that he was left behind far enough off of very purpoſe, for fear he would avow and juſtifie perſonally his hand-writing, and charge him face to face: and that if the Conſul ſhould make report of any untruth, he might be challenged therefore, and the thing ſifted and canvaſed, until the truth appeared clearly and came to light: and therefore my opinion is (quoth he) that nothing be determined at this preſent, as touching the demands of the Conſul. But when as he perſiſted notwithſtanding, and followed the ſuit ſtill, namely, that they would ordain a ſolemn proceſſion, and that himſelf might enter the City, riding in triumph: then Marcus and C. Titinius, both Tribuns of the Commons, protested, H that they would interpose their negative, and cancel the order of the Senat in that behalf.

The Censors for that time, were Sex. Ælius Patus and C. Cornelius Cethegus, created the year before. Cornelius took a review of the City and numbred the people; and there were accounted by his survey 143704 polls of Citizens. Great flouds arose that year, and Tyber overflowed all the flats and plain places of the City: and about the gate Flumentana certain houses and buildings were overthrown withal, and laid along. The gate Calimontana besides, was stricken with lightning, and the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Aricia, Lanuvium, and in mount Aventin, it rained stones. And reported it was from Capua, that a great swarm of Wasps came flying into the market place, and setled upon the Temple of Mars; which being with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterward consumed with fire. In regard of these prodigious tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the books of Sibylla; whereupon a novendial sacrifice (to continue nine dayes) was appointed, a publick procession solemnized, and the City was cleansed and hallowed. About the same time M. Porcius Cato, dedicated the Chappel of Virgin Victory, neer to the Temple of the Goddess Victory, two years after that he had vowed it. In that year also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Volso, L. Apustius Fullo, and P. Ælius Tubero, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colony) had commission granted, to conduct a Colony of Latins into the countrey of Thurium: and thither went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen; a small number in comparison of the largeness and quantity of the territory. There might well have been set out thirty acres for every footman, and threescore for an horseman: but by the motion and advice of Apustius, one K third part of the Lands was excepted and reserved, to the end, that afterwards in time, they might enrol new Coloners if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twenty acres, and the horsemen forty apeece.

Now approached the end of the year, and more ambition there was, and hotter suit for place of dignity in the election of Consuls, than ever had been known any time before. Many mighty men, as well of the Patritii and nobles, as the Commoners, stood and laboured hard for the Consulship, to wit, P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneus, who lately was departed out of Spain after he had atchieved many worthy deeds. L. Quintius Flaminius who had been Admiral of the navy in Greece, and Cn. Manlius Volso, all of the Nobility. But of the Commons were C. Lælius, Cn. Domitius, C. Livius Salinator, and M. Acilius. But all mens eyes were fixed upon Quintius and Cornelius: For they desired one place, being both of them nobly descended, and their fresh glory for feats of war, recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethren of these competitors, two most renowned warriors of their time, set the debate on a light fire. The glory of Scipio, as it was the greater of the twain, so it was more subject to envy. The honour of Quintius was more fresh, as who that yeer had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had been now almost ten years continually conversant in the eyes of men (a thing that maketh great men not so highly regarded, by reason that they are grown stale, and the world is full already of them) also he had been twice Consul, and Censor since he vanquished Annibal. But in Quintius all was fresh and new, to win the good grace and favor of men. And more than that, he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor, to say a truth, requested any M thing. He alledged, that he made suit for his own natural and whole brother by both sides, and not for a Cousin German; in the behalf of a very companion and partaker with him in the managing of the war (for as himself served by Land, so his brother performed many exploits by sea.) So he obtained, that Quintius should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanus and his brother [Asiaticus] brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelii seemed to countenance, even then when a Cornelius, Consul, was president of the election, and held the assembly; whom the Senat had given so grave a testimony of, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the City, and thought most worthy to receive the goddess dame Idæa, coming from Pessinus to the City of Rome. Thus were L. Quintius, and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus created Consuls, in such sort, that Africanus was of no credit, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be sure) in the election of N a Consul out of the third estate of Commons, albeit he employed himself, and did his best for C. Lælius. The next day after were the Pretors elected namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Centimalus, A. Attilius Serranus, M. Babius Tamphilus, L. Valerius Tappus, and Q. Salonius Sarra. In this year M. Æmylius Læpidus and L. Æmylius Paulus, the Censors, bare themselves so in their office, as they made their year to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned and fined many of the City graziers or farmers of the common pastures: and of that money which arose of their amercements, were certain gilded shields made, which were set up on the finial or lantern of Jupiters Temple. They made one terrace or gallery without the gate Trigemina, with a marchants Hall or Burse adjoined thereto, neer Tyber: and another from the gate Fontinalis they built in length as far as to the Altar of Mars, leading to Mars field. O

For a long time nothing was done in Liguria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the year twice were the Romans in great jeopardy: for both the camp of the Consul was assailed and hardly defended, and also not long after, as the Roman host marched through a streight pass, the army of the Ligurians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Consul seeing he could not make way through, turned his ensigns, and began to retire the same way he came: but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the back part of the pass, insomuch as the

A lamentable remembrance of the Caudine overthrow, not only preſented it ſelf to their ſpirit and mind, but alſo was in manner an object to their eye. Now had he amongſt his auxiliary or aid-forces, to the number almoſt of eight hundred horſe. Whoſe Captain promiſed the Conſul, that he and his would break through whither way he would, let him only but tell him which of the two quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the firſt thing that he did, he would fire their Villages and houſes; to the end, that the fear and fright thereof might force the Ligurians to depart out of the chaſe which they held and beſet, and run to ſuccour their own neighbours. The Conſul commended him highly, and fed him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horſeback, and began to ride about the corps de guard of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the firſt, a man that had ſeen them, would have B thought nothing more contemptible, being both men and horſe, little, ſpare and gaunt. The horſeman unarmed and without weapon, ſave that he carrieth about him ſome light darts: the horſes without bridles; and as they ran ſhutting out their ſtiff necks, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, they made a very ill favoured ſight. And the riders, for to make themſelves more deſpiſed, would on purpoſe ſeem to take fals from their horſes, and made their enemies good ſport. Whereupon they (who if at firſt they had been aſſailed, would have been heedful & ready to have received the charge) now ſat ſtill (many of them unarmed) to behold this pleaſant paſtime. The Numidians would gallop toward them, and preſently ride back again, but ſo, as by little and little they gained ground, and advanced neerer to the paſs, yet making ſemblance, as if they had had no rule of their horſes, but were carried thither againſt their wils. At the laſt, they C ſet ſpurs to their horſes indeed, and brake through the mids of the enemies guards: and ſo ſoon as they had recovered the open ground, they ſet on fire all the houſes neer the high way ſide, and ſo forward they burnt the next village they came unto, and deſtroied all afore them with fire and ſword. Firſt, the ſmoak that was deſcried, afterwards the outcry heard of them that were affrighted in the villages, and laſt of all, the children and old folk that fled to ſave themſelves, made a trouble and hurlyburly in the camp: inſomuch, as every man of himſelf without advice, without warrant or direction, made what haſt he could to run and ſave his own. Thus in the turning of an hand, the camp was abandoned, and the Conſul delivered from ſiege, arrived thither where he intended.

But neither Boians nor Spaniards (with whom that year the Romans made war) were ſo
D ſpiteſully and maliciouſly bent againſt them, as the whole nation of the Ætolians. They at the very firſt were in very good hope, that preſently upon the remove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Europe, and ſeized upon the vacant poſſeſſion thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabis would be in reſt and do nothing. But ſeeing them not to ſtir in any place, they thought it high time to make ſome trouble and confuſion themſelves, for fear leſt by delayes and lingring, all their deſignments would turn to nothing: and therefore they publiſhed a Diet or Councel to be holden at Naupactum. In which aſſembly Thoas their Pretor, after he had made grievous complaint of the wrongs received by the Romans, moving and ſolliciting the ſtate of Ætolia (for that they of all other nations and Cities of Greece, were leaſt honoured and ſet by after that victory, whereof they had been the cauſe) gave his advice, That there ſhould be Embaſſadors E ſent to all the neighbour Kings, not only to ſound their minds and affections, but alſo to incite and prick them every one forward to enter into arms againſt the Romans. So Damocritus was addreſſed to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicæarchus the brother of the Pretor unto Antiochus. Damocritus had in commiſſion to ſignify unto the tyrant of Lacedæmon, "That by the loſs of his "maritime Cities, the very ſtrings and ſinews of his tyranny and Kingdom were cut in ſunder; "For from thence was he furniſhed with ſouldiers, from thence had he his ſhips and ſervitors at "Sea: whereas now, he might ſee the Achæans LL. and rulers of Peloponneſus whiles himſelf was "pinned up and encloſed within his wals, and never ſhould he have opportunity to recover him-F "ſelf, if he let paſs this that preſently was offered unto him. No Roman army was now in Greece: "and never would the Romans think it ſufficient cauſe, to paſs over the Seas with their legions "into Greece, for any occaſion of Gytheum or other Laconians inhabiting the Sea-coaſts. Theſe reaſons were laid forth to incenſe the courage of the tyrant, to the end, that when Antiochus was once paſſed over into Greece, he being touched in conſcience, that he had broken the Roman league, by committing outrage upon their allies, might of neceſſity join and band with Antiochus. "Semblable remonſtrances and reaſons uſed Nicander for to provoke and perſwade Philip: and "much more matter he had to enforce that point, as the King was depoſed from much higher de"gree of eſtate than the tyrant had been, and alſo had ſuſtained far greater loſſes. To this, he "alledged the ancient name and renown of the KK. of Macedony; and how that nation had over"run the whole world and filled all places with their noble conqueſts & victories. Moreover he "ſaid, That he adviſed him to take a courſe, which was ſafe both to be enterpriſed, and alſo eaſy to "be executed. For he gave not Philip counſel to ſtir, before that Antiochus were paſſed over with G "an army into Greece: and conſidering that he without the aid of Antiochus had maintained war "ſo long againſt the Romans and Ætolians, what poſſible means had the Romans to withſtand "him aſſiſted with Antiochus & the Ætolians his allies, who even then were fiercer enemies than "the Romans? Over and beſides, he inferred this reaſon alſo, what a brave and doughty Captain "Annibal was, a man even born to be an enemy to the Romans, and who had ſlain already more "leaders and ſouldiers of theirs than were left behind. Theſe were the allegations of Nicander to "Philip. As for Dicæarchus, he had other motives to perſwade with Antiochus. Firſt, and principally pally above all others, he affirmed, "That howſoever the prize and booty of Philip fell to the H

"Romans, the victory was gained and atchieved by the Ætolians, and none but they either "gave the Romans entrance and paſſage into Greece, or furniſhed them with forces for the per"formance and accompliſhment of the victory. Then he ſhewed and made promiſe what power
"as well of foot as horſe they would preſent unto Antiochus toward his wars, what places they "would give him for his land-forces, and what havens and harbours for his ſtrength and army at "Sea. After all this he ſtuck not (to ſerve his own turn) for to over-reach and tell a loud lie as "touching Philip and Nabis, in giving out confidently that they were both of them ready and at "the point to renue war: and would take the vantage of the very firſt opportunity and occaſion "that could be preſented, to recover thoſe things which by war they had loſt. Thus the Ætolians laboured to ſet all the world at once upon the top of the Romans. Howbeit, the KK. were either I not moved at all with their ſolliciting, or beſtirred them more ſlowly than they looked for. But as for Nabis, he ſent immediatly about all the Towns by the Sea ſide, certain perſons of purpoſe to ſow diſcord and kindle ſeditions among them: and ſome of their principal citizens he won by gifts and preſents to his own purpoſe and deſignments: but ſuch as ſtifly continued faſt and firm in alliance and allegeance with the Romans, thoſe he made away and murdred. Now had *T.
Quintius* given in charge and commiſſion to the Achæans, for to guard all the Laconians that dwelt upon the Sea-coaſts: and therefore preſently they both diſpatched their Embaſſadors unto the Tyrant, to put him in mind of the confederacy and aſſociation with the Romans, and to warn him and give him advertiſement, that in no wiſe he would trouble that peace, which he had ſo earneſtly craved and ſought for: and alſo ſent aid unto Gytthenm, which now the tyrant began to J aſſault; yea, and addreſſed other Embaſſadors alſo to Rome to give intelligence of theſe occur-rents.

Antiochus the King after he had that winter time given his daughter in marriage to Ptolomæus the King of Ægypt at Rhaphia a City in Phœnicia, retired to Antiochia; and in the very end of the ſame winter, paſſed through Cilicia over the mountain Taurus, and came to Epheſus. And from thence in the beginning of the Spring, after he had ſent his ſon Antiochus into * Syria for to defend and keep in obedience the utmoſt frontiers of his Kingdom, leſt in his abſence there might ariſe ſome troubles behind his back, he marched with all his Land-forces againſt the Piſidians, who in- habit about * Selga.

At the ſame time the Romans Embaſſadors P. Sulpitius and P. Villius, who as we ſaid before L had been ſent unto Antiochus with direction firſt to viſit K. Eumenes, arrived at * Elæa, and from thence went up to * Pergamus, where Eumenes kept his royal court. Eumenes was deſirous in his heart that Antiochus ſhould be warred upon: ſuppoſing verily, that if he were at peace, being a Prince ſo much mightier than himſelf, he would be but an ill and dangerous neighbour ſo neer unto him: but if war were once afoot, that he would be no moreable to beard and match the Romans than Philip had been: and that either he ſhould wholly be overthrown and come to utter ruin; or if, being vanquiſhed he had peace given unto him by the Romans; then, as he loſt much thereby and would be weaker, ſo himſelf ſhould gain by the bargain, and grow mightier, that afterwards he might be able eaſily of himſelf to make his part good, and hold his own againſt him, without the help and aid of the Romans: or if any misfortune ſhould happen unto him, he were M better by far, to hazard any fortune whatſoever in the Roman ſociety, than either alone to endure the Lordly dominion of Antiochus and be ſubject, or in refuſing to obey, be compelled thereto by force and arms. For theſe cauſes he employed all the credit and authority he had, yea, and addreſſed all counſel that he could deviſe for to prick on and ſet forward the Romans in this war. Sulpitius remained behind ſick at Pergamus. But Villius advertiſed that the King was occupied and buſied in the Piſidian war, went to Epheſus: and whiles he abode there ſome few dayes, he endevoured and made means to have conference oftentimes with Annibal, who haply at that time ſojourned there, both to ſound his mind if poſſibly he could, and alſo to ſecure him of all fear from the Romans. In theſe meetings and communications, no other thing paſſed nor was done between them. But ſee what enſued hereupon of it ſelf, as if it had been a thing wrought and compaſſed of meer N pollicy. Annibal by this means was leſs ſet by and in ſmaller credit with the King, yea, and in all matters began to be more and more ſuſpected and had in jelouſie. Claudius (the Hiſtorian) who followeth the Greek books of Acilius, writeth that P. Africanus was joyned in that embaſſage, and that he talked and deviſed with Annibal at Epheſus: and namely, maketh report of one conference and ſpeech between them twain: and that is this. Africanus demanded of Annibal, whom in his judgment, he took to have been the greateſt commander for feats of arms, that ever was: to which he made anſwer, that he judged Alexander the King of the Macedonians was ſimply the moſt excellent warrior; in this regard, that he with a ſmall power had defeated innumerable armies: and beſides had paſſed as far as to the utmoſt bounds of the whole earth, even to thoſe lands, that a man would think incredible for any one to reach unto. And when he asked again whom O he deemed worthy to ſtand in the ſecond place: he anſwered, that Pyrrhus was the man; for that he firſt taught how to pitch a camp and above all other points of military skill no man knew better to chooſe out commodious ground and places of advantage, or more cunningly to plant and diſpoſe garriſons: beſides, he had ſuch a ſleight and dexterity to draw and win men unto him, that the Italian nations had rather have been ſubject to him a forein Prince, than to live under the people of Rome, notwithſtanding they had of long time the Seignory and rule of thoſe parts. A when he proceeded ſtill to know whom he reputed for the third, he made no ſticking at the matter, but named himſelf. Whereupon Scipio took up a laughter and replied again: What would you ſay then, if your hap had been to have ſubdued me? Mary then, quoth he, I would think I were worthy to be ſet before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, yea, and before all other martial men and commanders in the whole world. At this anſwer, Scipio took delight and pleaſure, to ſee how ſubtilly and cautelouſly he had like a curning Carthaginian, couched his words in a certain kind of flattery, as if he had ſequeſtred him from out of the range and rank of all other Captains as being by many degrees incomparable, and far above all others. Then Villius went forward from Epheſus to Apamea: and thither Antiochus alſo repaired for to meet him, hearing of the coming of Roman legats. In this communication and conference at Apamea, the matter was debated much after the B ſame ſort, as it had been at Rome between Quintius and the Kings Embaſſadors. But the news of Antiochus the Kings ſon his death (whom I ſaid a little before to have been ſent into Syria) brake off the peace. Great mourning and ſorrow there was in the Kings Court, and much was that young Prince miſſed and moaned, for, that good proof he had given of himſelf, that if he had lived any long time, he would have proved by all likelyhood of his towardneſs, a great, a mighty, and a righteous King. The deerer and better beloved he was of all men, the more ſuſpicious was his death: and namely, that his father doubting that he would preſs forward and be inſtant to ſucceed him in his old age, took order by the miniſtery of certain Eunuchs or guelded men (perſons greatly accepted with Kings for ſuch ſervices) to have him poiſoned. And they ſay, that another cauſe alſo ſet him forward to commit this ſecret act, becauſe having given the City Lyſimachia to his C ſon Seleucus, he had no ſuch place to beſtow upon Antiochus his ſon, for to keep his reſidence in, whereunto he might have removed him farther off from his own perſon, under colour of doing him honor. Howbeit great ſemblance and ſhew there was of much mourning and lamentation all over the court for certain dayes: inſomuch as the Roman Embaſſador retired himſelf to Pergamus, becauſe he was loth to converſe there uncivilly, at ſo unſeaſonable a time. The King returned to Epheſus, and gave over the war that he had enterprized. Where, the court gates being ſhut by occaſion of the mourning time, he deviſed and conſulted in great ſecret with one Minio an inward friend unto him, and whom of all other he loved beſt, and truſted moſt. This Minio, a meer ſtranger and altogether ignorant in forein affairs and forces, meaſuring and eſteeming the power and greatnes of the King by his exploits done in Syria or in Aſia, deemed verily, that Antiochus had D not only the better cauſe, in that the Romans demanded unreaſonable conditions; but alſo ſhould have the upper hand in the tryal thereof by war. When as now the King refuſed to have any conference and diſpute with the Embaſſadors, either for that he knew by good experience that it would be bootleſs for him ſo to do, or becauſe he was troubled in ſpirit upon this late and freſh object of grief and ſorrow: Minio undertook the buſineſs, and profeſſed that he would ſpeak to the point of the matter and to good purpoſe: and ſo perſwaded the King to ſend for the Embaſſadors from Pergamus. By this time Sulpitius was recovered of his ſickneſs, and therefore both of them repaired to Epheſus; where Minio excuſed the King, and in his abſence they began to treat about their affairs. Then Minio with a premeditate oration began in this wiſe. "I ſee well (qd. he) The Oration of Mimo. "that you Romans pretend unto the world a goodly title of ſetting free the Cities of Greece, but E "your deeds are not anſwerable to your words: and ye have ſet down unto Antiochus one man- "ner of law to be tied unto, and practiſe your ſelves another. For how cometh it about that the "Smyrneans and Lampſacens ſhould be Greeks, more than the Neapolitans, the Rhegins, and "Tarentins, of whom you exact tribute and require ſhips by vertue of the accord and covenants "between you? Why ſend you yearly to Syracuſe and other Greek Cities of Sicily, a Pretor in "ſoveraign authority, with his rods and axes? Certainly, ye have nothing elſe to ſay, but that ye "have ſubdued them in war, and by right of conqueſt have impoſed theſe conditions upon them. "The like, yea, and the ſame cauſe know ye that Antiochus alledgeth as concerning Smyrna, Lamp- "ſacus, and other Cities and ſtates of Ionia and Æolis. For having been conquered in war by his "anceſtors and progenitors, having I ſay been made tributary and liable to impoſitions, he chal- F "lengeth of them the ancient rights and duties due from them, and to him belonging. And there- "fore if ye will debate and treat the queſtion according to equity and reaſon and not rather pick "quarrels and ſeek occaſions of war. I would gladly know what ye wil anſwer to him in this point? "To this Sulpitius made anſwer in this wiſe. "Antiochus (qd. he) hath done very well, and with "good regard of modeſty, in that having no other matters to plead unto for his defence and the "maintenance of his cauſe, he hath made choice of any other rather than himſelf to be the ſpeak- "er. For what one thing is there alike in thoſe cities which you have named and put in compa- "riſon? Of the Rhegins, Neapolitans and Tarentins, we demand that which is our due according "to the deeds of covenants indented, and hath ever been ſince time that firſt they were in ſubje- "ction under us; that I ſay which we have challenged and enjoyed by vertue of one continued G "courſe and tenor of right, by us ever practiſed without any intermiſſion or interruption. And "are you able to avouch, that as thoſe nations neither by themſelves nor by any other, have alte- "red and changed the accord between us and them; ſo the Cities of Aſia, when they once became "ſubject to the anceſtors of Antiochus, remained alwayes in the perpetual poſſeſſion of your "Kingdom? And not rather, that ſome of them have been under the obeiſance of Philip & others "obedient to Ptolomæe? Yea, and divers of them for many years have been free & uſed their own "liberties without contradiction, and no words or doubt made thereof? For admit this once, that

" that (becauſe theſe Cities ſomtime were in bondage through the iniquity of thoſe times where- H " in they were oppreſſed) there ſhall be a right pretended, and the ſame be effectual to reduce
" them again after ſo many ages into ſervitude? What wanteth it but ye may as well ſay, that we " have done juſt nothing, in delivering Greece out of the hands of Philip? and that his ſucceſſors
" and poſterity, may claim again and lay title to Corinth, Chalcis, Demetrias, and the whole Theſſa-" lian nation? But what mean I to maintain the cauſe of the Cities of Greece, whom it were more
" meet and reaſonable, that both we and the King himſelf would give audience unto, and let them " plead what they can for their own ſelves? With that he commanded the embaſſages of the Cities to be called in, which were prepared and inſtructed aforehand by Eumenes, who made this reckoning, that whatſoever ſtrength went from Antiochus, ſhould accrue and come unto him and his Kingdom. Many were admitted to ſpeak: and whiles every one ſet forward his own cauſe, I ſome by way of complaint, others in manner of demand, each one putting in for himſelf without regard of right or wrong, ſo he ſerved his own turn, they fell at length from reaſoning to warbling and wrangling: in ſo much, as the Embaſſadors returned to Rome as uncertain and doubtful in all matters as they were when they came, without releaſing or obtaining any one thing at all.

When they were diſmiſſed and gone, the King held a Councel as touching the Roman war. In which aſſembly, ſome delivered their opinion more freely and ſtoutly than others: but generally the more bitter ſpeech that any one uſed againſt the Romans, the greater hope he had to enter into eſpecial grace and favour with the King. One above the reſt, inveighed much and ſpake againſt thoſe proud and inſolent demands of the Romans, who impoſed hard laws and conditions upon Antiochus, the mightieſt King of all Aſia as if he had been no better than Nabis, whom they had K conquered and ſubdued. And yet (ſaith he) they left unto Nabis ſome ſeignory and dominion in his own countrey and City of Lacedæmon: whereas if Lampſacum and Smyrna ſhould be at the command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignity. Others opined and ſaid, " that thoſe two Cities were but ſmall cauſes, and not worth the naming, for ſo puiſſant
" a Prince to ſtand upon and to war for. But alwayes (ſay they) men begin with juſt and reaſona-
" ble demands, to make an overture and way to compaſs and obtain that which is unjuſt. Unleſs
" one would believe, that when the Perſians requeſted of the Lacedæmonians, water and earth,
" they ſtood in need of a clot & turf of ground, or a draught of water. In like ſort for all the world
" the Romans do but ſound and try the King, in their demands touching theſe two Cities. For o" ther Cities likewiſe, ſo ſoon as they ſhall perceive that thoſe two have ſhaken off the yoke of L
" obedience, will ſoon revolt and turn to that people which is their deliverer, and at whoſe hands
" they hope for liberty. And ſay, that freedom were not to them more dear and pretious than " bondage yet it is the nature of every man to feed and pleaſe himſelf with a bare hope of a change " and new world, much more than with the aſſured hold of any preſent ſtate whatſoever. There was in place at this councel, Alexander of Acarnania, one who ſomtime had friended Philip; but of late dayes was faln from him and followed the court of Antiochus, a more wealthy and magnificent Prince: and being taken for a politician who had a ſpecial inſight into the ſtate of Greece, & was not ignorant of the affairs of Rome, had wound himſelf into high favour and inward friendſhip with the King, that he was taken in to be one of his privy councel, and acquainted with all his ſecrets. This man, as if the queſtion in hand had been, not, Whether war ſhould be levied or M no; but, Where, and by What means, and How it ſhould be managed, ſpake aloud & ſaid, " That " he made full reckoning and account in his very ſpirit and heart of the victory, in caſe the King
" would paſs the Seas over into Europe, to plant & ſettle himſelf in ſome part of Greece, and there
" wage war: for at his very firſt coming he ſhould ſee in arms already the Ætolians, that inhabit
" the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only Captains and port-enſigns to march
" before them, ready to venture and enter upon the moſt difficult and dangerous enterpriſes of " war. Again, in the two cantons and angles as it were thereof, he ſhould find Nabis of the one
" ſide from Peloponneſus, at hand to riſe and raiſe thoſe quarters, with intent to regain the City of " the Argives, to win again the maritime Cities, which the Romans have diſſeized & diſpoſſeſſed
" him of, and have mued and ſhut him within the walls of Lacedæmon. On the other ſide from N
" Macedony, Philip would no doubt take arms, ſo ſoon as he ſhall hear the firſt alarm and ſound of " trumpet. Full well (qd. he) know I his courage, and of what ſpirit and ſtomack he is: right well I
" wot that he hath foſtered in that breſt of his for a long time, anger and deſpite: like to theſe wild
" and ſavage beaſts, which either are kept within iron gates, or faſt tyed and bound: and as well I " remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the Gods,
" to vouchſafe for to give him Antiochus for his helper and aſſiſtant: and if now he might enjoy
" his wiſh, and have the thing ſo long deſired and praied for he would without any delay enter in-

" is to be ſent into Affrick, whereby the Romans may be diſtracted, and compelled to turn them-
" ſelves ſundry wayes. Annibal only was not called to this councel; for by reaſon of the foreſaid conferences with Villius, the King had him in ſome jealouſy, and therefore he was out of favour, and of no credit and account with him. At the firſt, he put up this diſgrace and made no words, but afterwards he thought it a better courſe, both to demand the cauſe of ſo ſuddain ſtrangeneſs and alienation of his, and alſo to take ſome good time to excuſe and purge himſelf. And therefore upon

A upon a day having ſimply asked of the King, and heard the cauſe of his anger toward him. "My "father Amilcar (qd. he) O Antiochus, when upon a time he ſacrificed unto the Gods, cauſed me
"(a very little one) to be brought and preſented before the Altar, where he forced me to touch the "ſame with my hand, and to take an oath, Never to be friend unto the people of Rome. To accom-
"pliſh and fulfill this oath, I maintained the wars for the ſpace of ſix and thirty years; by vertue of "this oath, in time of peace I was driven out of my native country; and being fled from thence,
"this oath brought me into your court: and by the guidance and direction of this oath, if you
"ſhould diſappoint me of my hope, yet whatſoever I know there are forces, whereſoever I hear
"there is any ſtirring and ruſtling of arms, I ſhall ſeek all the world over, until I find ſome Roman "enemies. And therefore if there be any of your Courtiers that have a mind and deſire to advance B "themſelves in your good grace, and would grow by carrying tales and accuſing me unto you, let "them find ſome other ſubject and matter to do this by me: for I hate the Romans, and am like-"wiſe hated of them. That this is truth which I ſay, my father Amilcar and the Gods in heaven,
"can teſtify. Wherefore, whenſoever you ſhall think to make war with the Romans, ſee you enter-
"rain Annibal for one of your greateſt and moſt aſſured friends: but if any occurrent ſhall force
"you to peace, ſeek ſome other councellor and not me, to conſult withal about that point. This ſpeech was ſo effectual, that not only it prevailed with the King, but alſo reconciled Annibal unto his grace. And ſo they departed out of the councel with a full reſolution to make war.

At Rome it was commonly talked and diſcourſed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no proviſion and preparation there was for war, but only whetting the edge of their ſtomacks. For both
C Conſuls had no other Province but Italy aſſigned unto them to govern. And they were either to agree between themſelves, or elſe to caſt lots, whether of the twain ſhould hold the general aſſembly and be preſident of the election for that year. And he whoſe hap was not to be charged with that buſineſs, was to be in readineſs to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italy, as need ſhould require. And to this Conſul it was permitted to enrol two new legions of Citizens, and beſides of allies and Latins 20000 foot, and 800 horſe. To the other Conſul were appointed thoſe two legions, which L. Cornelius the Conſul of the former year had under his governance: alſo of allies and Latins 15000 footmen out of the ſame army, and 500 horſe. As for Q. Minutius, his commiſſion was continued ſtill for the conduct of that army which he had in Liguria. And for to ſupply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enrol 4000 Roman footmen, D and 150 horſe, and likewiſe to levy of the aliies 5000 foot, and 250 horſe for that ſervice. To Cn. Domitius it fell by lot, that he ſhould go with a power out of Italy, whither ſoever the Senate gave order; and unto Quintius to govern Gaul. Then the Pretors election followed, who likewiſe caſt lots for their Provinces. M. Fulvius Centimalus had the civil juriſdiction, and L. Scribonius Libo the forrain, L. Valerius Tappus governed Sicily, Q. Salonius Sarra, Sardinia: M. Bœbius Tamphilus high Spain, and A. Attilius Serranus the baſe. But theſe two changed their Provinces, firſt by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act alſo of the Commons. For to Attilius Macedony was aſſigned and the navy, and to Bœbius the countrey of the Brutii. Flaminius and Fulvius continued in the government and command of Spain, and to Bœbius Tamphilus for the rule of the Brutii, were thoſe two legions appointed which the year before lay in the City, E with commiſſion to take up and levy of allies fifteen thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe to go thither. Aulus Attilius had in charge to cauſe thirty galleaces to be made with five banks of oars on a ſide, and to take out of the harbors and docks as many old veſſels as were fit for ſervice, and to enrol mariners and rowers. The Conſuls alſo were enjoyned to deliver unto him two thouſand allies of the Latin nation, and a thouſand Roman footmen. It was commonly voyced, that theſe two Pretors with two armies both by Land and at Sea, were prepared againſt Nabis, who openly now aſſailed the confederats of the people of Rome. But ſtill the Embaſſadors were looked for, who had been ſent unto King Antiochus, and the Senat commanded the Conſul Domitius not to depart from the City before their return. The Pretors, Fulvius and Scribonius, whoſe charge it was to miniſter law and execute juſtice in Rome, had commiſſion to provide a hundred F galeaces, beſides that fleet which Attilius was to command. But before that either Conſuls or Pretors went forth into their Provinces, there was a proceſſion holden, in regard of the prodigies and fearful ſights that were reported. For word was brought out of Picenum, that a ſheegoat had yeaned ſix kids at once, and that it rained earth at Amiternum: and at Formiæ, that a gate and wall of the City were ſmitten with lightning; and (that which moſt of all troubled and frighted the Conſul Domitius) that an Ox ſpake theſe words, Rome, take heed to thy ſelf. In regard of the other prodigious tokens, there was a ſupplication holden: but as for the Ox, the Soothſayers and bowel-priers gave commandment, that he ſhould with great care be kept and nouriſhed. The Tyber alſo with more violence overflowed into the City than in the former year, and overthrew two bridges and many buildings, eſpecially about the gate Flumentana. Moreover, a mighty G huge ſtone ſhaken out of the Capitol cliff, fell from thence into the ſtreet called Iugarium, either by the force and violence of rain, or ſome earthquake (which if there were any, was ſo little, that it could not be perceived) and that ſtone killed many a man. In the countrey alſo, by reaſon of this deluge, much cattel was carried away with the floud, and many farm houſes and granges were born down and laid along.

Before that L. Quintius the Conſul was arrived into his Province, Q. Minutius fought a battel with the Ligurians in the territory of Piſæ, and ſlue nine thouſand enemies; the reſt he diſ-comfited, put to flight and chaſed into their camp; which being aſſailed, was defended manfully with much fighting until dark night: and then the Ligurians ſlipt away in the night ſeaſon ſecretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romans entred and ſeiſed thereof when it was empty of the enemies. Leſs pillage was there found, for that ever and anon what booties ſoever they gat in the countrey they ſent home to their houſes. Minutius notwithſtanding gave the enemies no repoſe from that time forward. For being departed out of the territory of Piſæ he came into Liguria, where he deſtroyed their borroughs and Caſtles, and put all to fire and ſword. There the Roman ſouldiers filled their hands with the Tuſcan prizes, ſent thither by the forragers and robbers. H

Much about this time the Embaſſadors returned to Rome, from the KK. who brought word and made relation of nothing that was ſufficient to enforce them to proceed in any haſt to war, I but only againſt the Lacedæmonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achæan Embaſſadors alſo gave intelligence) the Sea coaſts of Laconia were wronged and aſſailed, againſt the covenants of the league. Whereupon Attilius the Pretor was ſent with a fleet to defend the aſſociats. And for aſmuch as there was no imminent peril from Antiochus, it was thought good, that both the Conſuls ſhould go into their Provinces. Domitius took his journey, and went the neereſt way by Ariminum, and Quintius came into the Boians countrey by the way of Liguria. And theſe two Conſuls armies in divers quarters, waſted all abroad the enemies countrey. At the firſt ſome few of their Gentlemen and Horſemen, together with their Captains; afterwards, all thoſe of Senators calling; and laſt of all, as many as were of any repute, worth and worſhip, to the number of fifteen hundred fled to the Conſul.

Likewiſe in both Spains that year the affairs went proſperouſly: for not only C. Flaminius won by force of mantelets and engins of battery the rich and ſtrong Town Litabrum, and took priſoner alive their Lord Corribilo a noble Prince, but alſo M. Fulvius the Pro-conſul fought with two armies of the enemies twice, and put them to the worſe; and won by aſſault two Towns of the Spaniards Veſcelia and Holone, with many other fortreſſes: the reſt of themſelves revolted unto him. After this he made a journey into the Oretans countrey, & there having gotten two towns, * Nolibla and Cuſibi, he ſet forward and marched to the river Tagus. In that quarter there ſtood * Toletum a ſmall City but ſtrongly ſeated: whiles he aſſaulted it, there came a mighty army of the Vectons to aid the Toletans, with whom he fought a ſet field, and won the day, and having defeated the Vectons, he forced the Toletans with engins of battery, and won the Town. But all the wars which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL. of the Senate ſo much as the expectation of the war which Antiochus had not yet begun and enterpriſed. For albeit they had ever and anon certain advertiſements and intelligences of all things by their Embaſſadors, yet many flying tales and headleſs bruits there went without any certain Authors, reporting lies as well as truths. And among the reſt there ran a rumor, that Antiochus, ſo ſoon as he was come into Ætolia, would preſently put over a fleet into Sicily. Whereupon the Senate, notwithſtanding they had ſent Attilius the Pretor with a fleet into Greece yet foraſmuch as there was need not of forces only but alſo of authority to entertain the hearts and affections of their allies, they ſent over T. Quintius, Cn. Octavius, Cn. Servilius, and P. Villius, as Embaſſadors into Greece, and gave order that M. Fabius ſhould advance his legions out of the countrey of the Brutians, toward Tarentum and Brunduſium, that from thence if need required, he might ſail over into Macedonia. Moreover, That M. Fulvius the Pretor ſhould put out a fleet of thirty ſail, for the defence of the coaſt of Sicily and that the Admiral thereof ſhould have full commiſſion there to command (now L. Oppius Salinator, who the former year had been one of the Ædiles of the Commons, had the conduct of thoſe ſhips.) Alſo, that the ſame Pretor ſhould addreſs his letters unto L. Valerius his Colleague, and advertiſed him that it was to be feared, that the armado of King Antiochus would croſs over out of Ætolia into Sicily; and therefore it was the will and pleaſure of the Senate that he ſhould take up and enrol into that army which he had already, of tumultuary ſouldiers 12000 footmen, and 400 horſe, by whoſe means he might defend that coaſt of the Province which looketh toward Greece. For the levy of theſe forces, the Pretor took muſters not only in Sicily but alſo in the Iſles adjacent and lying thereabout, and fortified with good garriſons all the Towns upon the Sea ſide which lie toward Greece. Thoſe rumours aforeſaid were fed ſtill and maintained by the coming of Attalus the brother of Eumenes, who reported that King Antiochus was paſſed over Hellespontus with an army: and that the Ætolians were in that forwardneſs, that they would be preſt and ready in arms againſt his arrival. Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his abſence, as to Attalus there preſent in place. Alſo order was taken, that he ſhould have a lodging allowed him at his pleaſure, and his charges born for his diet and houſe-keeping. Moreover, there were given him as preſents, two great horſes of ſervice, two pair of horſemens armors, as much ſilver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight; and of gold plate, as much as weighed 20 pound. M N O

And for aſmuch as meſſengers one after another advertiſed and gave warning, that war was at hand it was thought requiſite and expedient that the new Conſuls ſhould be choſen in all convenient ſpeed: whereupon a decree paſſed from the Senat, that M. Fulvius the Pretor ſhould forthwith diſpatch his letters unto the Conſul, to certifie him of the Senats pleaſure, namely, that he ſhould commit the government of his Province and the army unto his Lieutenants, and return himſelf unto Rome, and in his way ſend out his writs aforehand for the publiſhing of an aſſembly general

A general for the election of Consuls. The Consul obeied these letters, directed forth his summons in manner aforesaid, and came to Rome. In this year also great ambition there was, and much suit for the dignity of government. For that three noblemen stood for one place, namely, P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneus, who the former year had the repulse, L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Volso. The Consulship was conferred upon P. Scipio, so as it might appear to the whole world, that this honour was deferred only, and not fully denied to so worthy a personage. His adjunct companion in government was M. Acilius Glabrio, a man by calling a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit, L. Æmylius Paulus, M. Æmilius Lepidus, M. Junius Brutus, A. Cornel. Mammula, C. Livius, & L. Oppius, both surnamed Salinator. This Oppius was he that had the conduct into Sicily of a fleet of thirty sail. Mean while that these new Magistrats cast lots for the B government of their Provinces, M. Bœbius was commanded to pass over with all his power from Brundusium into Epirus, and to keep his forces about Apollonia. And M. Fulvius the Pretor of the City had in charge to build fifty new Galeaces called Quinqueremes, of five banks of oars on either side. And thus verily the people of Rome was provided against all enterprises and attempts of King Antiochus whatsoever.

Neither was Nabis behind for his part in levying war; but assaulted with great force the Town of Gytheum; and of a mischievous and malicious mind against the Achæans, for sending a garrison to aid the besieged Townsmen, he forraged and wasted their country. The Achæans durst not go in hand with war, before their Embassadors were returned from Rome, and until they might know the pleasure and will of the Senat: but after the return of those Embassadors, they both published C a Diet and general Councel at Sicyone, and also sent their Embassadors to Quintius for his advice and counsel. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make war out of hand: only the letters of T. Quintius made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advised them to expect the Pretor and navy of the Romans. Now when the States there assembled in councel were distracted, some persisting still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advice of him unto whom they had sent for counsel: the multitude at length looked what Philopœmenes would say in that behalf. The Pretor he was for the time, and in those dayes surpassed all other in wisedome and authority. Then he rose up and used this preface and said, "That it was a good
"custome among the Ætolians, and well ordained and provided, that the Pretor himself in all "consultations of war should not deliver his own opinion; and therefore willed them of their D "selves to resolve and determine with all speed possible what they pleased. As for the Pretor, "saith he, he will be ready to execute with fidelity and careful diligence their decrees accordingly: yea, and indevor, so far forth as mans policy may reach unto, that they shal not repent of their "resolution, be it war or peace. This briefspeech of his was more forcible and effectual to incite them to take arms, than any perswasive Oration, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the wars. And therefore with exceeding accord of all in general they agreed upon war. As for the time and means of managing the same, it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretor, to use his own liberty and pleasure. Philopœmenes, besides that Quintius so advised, was also himself minded to wait for the Roman fleet which on the Sea side might defend Gytheum: but E fearing again that their present necessity could abide no delaies, and left not only Gytheum should be lost, but the garrison also miscary, which was sent to the defence of the war, he set aflote and put to the Sea the Achæans shipping. The Tyrant likewise had rigged and dressed a small fleet to empeach any aid and succours that haply might be sent to the besieged by Sea, to wit, three covered ships with hatch and deck, three Brigantins or Pinnaces, and as many Gallions. For the old ships were by composition and covenant delivered up to the Romans. And to make proof and tryal of these new vessels how swift and nimble they were, and withal to see how all things else were well fitted for a battail, if need were; he made every day certain shews and representations of fight at Sea, and exercised both mariners and souldiers by such kind of false alarms: supposing that herein principally consisted the hope of his siege, in case he could cut off all their aid from the Sea side.
F Now the Pretor of the Achæans as he was equal to any of the best and most renowned commanders and Captains of that time in Land service, either for experience and practise, or wit and policy: so at Sea he was but a novice and a learner, as being an Arcadian born, an Inlander far within the main, and ignorant besides of all forein forces, but that he had born arms and served a little in Candy, whiles he had the leading there, of some auxiliaries. One old Gally there was a Quadrireme, taken at Sea 80 years before, at what time as she caried Nicæa the wife of Craterus from Naupactum to Corinth. And having heard much talk of this ship (for indeed she had been sometime of great name in the Kings royal fleet) he commanded her, all rotten as she was now, and G ready to fall in pieces, to be shot into the Sea from out of the Bay of Argium. This ship as admiral, made way before the rest, wherein Tiso of Patra, a Captain General of a fleet was aboord; and encountred the ships of the Laconians, making sail from Gytheum. And at the first she chanced to affront and run against a new strong ship, and being old of her self, leaking and taking water at every joynt, she was rent asunder and fell apieces. All within her were taken prisoners. The rest of the fleet having lost their captaines fled as fast as possibly their oars could make speed and away. Philopœmenes himself was in a light foist frigot or pink, and fled amain, and never staied until he was arrived at Patræ. This mishap nothing discouraged and abated the heart of this marrial warrior, who had run through many and sundry adventures: but contrary-wise wrought this effect, that he assured himself and said, That if he were overtaken and put to the worse in service at Sea, wherein he had no skill, he would ſo much the rather quit himſelf ſo upon the Land (where he had ſuch H experience and was ſo ready) as that the Tyrant ſhould not long joy and make boaſt of his winnings. Nabis puffed up with pride of his fortunat victory, and perſwading himſelf aſſuredly that he had no cauſe to fear any more danger from the Sea, purpoſed likewiſe to ſtop up all the avenues and paſſages by Land; and therefore beſet all the wayes betimes with ſtrong guards, which he beſtowed in convenient places. And retiring with a third part of his forces from the ſiege of Gythæum, he encamped before Pleia. This is a place that overlooketh and commandeth Leuca and Acra, by which wayes it ſeemed that the enemies would make their approach with their army. Whiles he kept a ſtanding camp there, and few of his ſouldiers were provided of tents and pavilions, and the reſt of the common ſort had made them cabins of reeds, wound and interlaced one within another, and the ſame covered with leaves only to give them ſome ſhade; Philopœmenes I deviſed, before that he were diſcovered and came in ſight of the enemies, to aſſail them at unwares and not looking for his coming, after a new faſhion of war that they little doubted. Certain ſmall craies or boats he got together into a ſecret blind bay, lying within the territory of Argos: in which he beſtowed certain ſouldiers nimbly appointed, moſt of them having round bucklers, with ſlings, darts, and ſuch like offenſive light weapons. From thence he coaſted along the River neer the ſhore, until he was come to the promontory or cape adjoyning cloſe to the enemies camp: then he went aland, and by known wayes he came by night unto Pleia: and whiles the watch was faſt aſleep, as miſtruſting no ſuch fear neer hand, he ſet fire upon the cabins aforeſaid in every quarter of the camp. Many men were conſumed with the fire before they wiſt that the enemy was come: and they that were ware of them, had no means to help and ſave their fel- K lows: ſo with fire and ſword all went to wrack. Some very few eſcaped out of this extremity of danger, and fled to the main camp before Gythæum. Thus Philopœmenes having diſcomfited and frighted his enemies, led his army forthwith to waſt Tripolis in the territory of Laconia, bounding faſt upon the confines of the Megalopolitans: and having driven from thence great prizes of men and cattel, he departed before that the Tyrant could ſend any guards from thence for the defence of the Countrey. And when he had gathered and aſſembled his army at Tegea, and publiſhed and made known unto the Achæi and other Allies, a Diet or general councel to be holden there, whereat alſo were the chief States of the Epirots and Acarnanians: he determined (for aſmuch as both the hearts of his own people were ſufficiently recovered after the diſgrace and ſhameful diſhonor received at Sea; and alſo the courages of his enemies well cooled and they affrighted) L to lead his forces againſt Lacedæmon: ſuppoſing that, that only means to draw the enemy away from the ſiege of Gythæum. And firſt he encamped before Caria within the enemies ground. But that very day was Gythæum forced by the enemies and won. Philopœmenes nothing ware thereof, ſet forward, and encamped neer Barboſthenes, a mountain ten miles from Lacedæmon. Nabis alſo, having gained Gythæum, departed from thence with his army lightly appointed; and marching apace beyond Lacedæmon, ſeized upon a place, called, The Camp of Pyrrhus: which he made no doubt but that the enemies intended to be poſſeſſed of. And then from thence he went to meet them. Now by reaſon of the narrow way, they took up in their march almoſt five miles of ground in length. At the tail of the army were the horſemen, and eſpecially where the Auxiliaries marched: becauſe Philopœmenes thought, that the tyrant would M charge his men behind with his mercenary ſouldiers, in whom he repoſed his greateſt truſt. Two things fell out contrary to his expectation at once, which troubled him much: the one was, that the place was gotten by the enemies before, which he intended to have ſeized upon for his own advantage: the other was, for that he ſaw the enemy affront his vanguard in a place ſo rough and rugged, that without the guard of his light-armed ſouldiers, he could not poſſibly march forward and advance his Enſigns. Now Philopœmenes had a ſingular dexterity and skill, yea, and great experience in leading an army, and in making choice of his ground either to pitch or fight: and not only in time of war, but alſo in peace, he buſied his head and employed himſelf principally therein. His manner was, when he rode forth any whither and was come to a ſtreight paſſage hard to paſs through, to look every way, and diligently to view and conſider N the ſituation and poſture of the place on all ſides: and if he were alone, to caſt about and adviſe with himſelf; but if there were any in his company, to aſke their advice in this wiſe: What if the enemy appeared and ſhewed himſelf in that place; How if he came affront or aſſank on this or that ſide; nay, How if he ſhould charge upon our back, what were beſt to be done? It may be the enemies will encounter us directly ranged in battail array; it may be they march diſorderly and looſly, minding nothing elſe but their way, and to travail on. Thus I ſay, would he either deviſe with himſelf or ſeek advice of other, what place he were beſt to ſeize for his own purpoſe and commodity: alſo what number of armed men he ſhould need to employ; or what kind of armour and weapons were needful to uſe (for therein alſo lay no ſmall importance.) Moreover, where he ſhould beſtow his carriages? where he ſhould lay his baggage? and O where he ſhould place and diſpoſe of the multitude that were not meet to bear arms? what ſtrength and what manner of guard was needful for their defence? and whether it were more expedient to go forward ſtill the way that he was entred into, or better to go back again as he came? likewiſe, what ground was meet to be choſen for to pitch his camp upon? what compaſs and ſpace were neceſſary to be taken up for the fortification of the place? from whence he might have convenient watering? from what quarter he might be beſt provided of fodder and fewel?

Finally,

A Finally, against the morrow, which way were safest to remove the camp? and what form and manner of march were best? In these courses and discourses, he had from his childhood so inured and exercised his spirits, that he was never to seek what to do upon any such suddain occasion or occurrent presented unto him. And now at this present, seeing his enemies so neer, first and formost he made a stand with his vanguard; then he sent out toward the formost ensigns, his auxiliary Candiots that came to aid him, and those horsemen which they call Tarentin, whose manner is to have with them, two horses apiece; and then commanding his own men of arms to follow after, he possessed himself of a rock standing over a brook or running rill, from whence they might water commodiously: into that place he gathered together all his bag and baggage; there he bestowed all the pages and horse-boyes, and followers of the camp, whom he environed also with armed men: and as the nature of the place would give him leave, he fortified his B camp. But to pitch pavilions in a craggie, rugged, and uneven ground he found much ado. Now were the emenies about half a mile off: and at one and the same rivulet they watered both, with the guard of their light armed souldiers: but before that they could scuffle and skirmish together (as commonly they do when the camps stand so neer one to another) the night overtook them. It appeared plainly there would be some fighting the next day about the brook for water: and therefore in the night season he bestowed close in a valley, farthest out of sight from the enemies, as many of his targeteers s apossibly the place would contain and hide. When day-light was come, the light armed Candiots and those Tarentin horsemen (of both sides) entred into skirmish upon the very banks of the brook. Letemnastus the Candiot had the leading C of his country-men; Lycortas the Megapolitan commanded the light horse. The Candiots, who likewise were auxiaries and aid-souldiers to the enemies, and the same sort also of the Tarentin horsemen, guarded those that came to water for them. Doubtful was the skirmish for a good while (as being managed and maintained of the one side and the other by men of one Nation, and those furnished with the same kind of weapons) but those that were for the Tyrant, were more in number than the other. And by reason that Philopœmenes had given charge and direction to the Captains, after they had held skirmish a while, to seem to retreat and flie, thereby to train the enemy into the aforesaid place of ambush, they followed hard in chase upon them as they fled along within the valley, and most of them were either slain or wounded before they saw the enemies hidden there within. Now those targeteers aforesaid, were set in that D order (so far forth as the breadth of the valley would permit) that they might easily receive their fellows as they fled, within the spaces between their ranks and files. Then at once they arose, fresh in heart, and ordred in good array, and charged upon the enemies, disordered, disbanded, loose, scattered, weary with travel, and faint of their wounds. Then was it out of doubt and past all peradventure where the victory went: for presently the Tyrant souldiers turned their backs, fled a good deal faster than they made pursuit before, and were beaten into their camp: many were either killed or taken prisoners as they fled; and they had been put in affright also within the camp, but that Philopœmenes commanded to sound the retreat, fearing more the rugged and broken ground, and the disadvantage and difficulties thereof, in case he had rashly ventured forward any farther, than he did the enemy. Then he, taking his conjecture by the issue of the E fight, and guessing by the nature of Nabis the General, in what fear and fright he might be, sent unto him one of his auxiliaries that were strangers, counterfeiting himself to be a renegate revolt, to inform him assuredly, that the Achæans determined the next day to march as far as to the river Eurotas, which runneth hard by the walls of Lacedæmon, for to stop the passage, that neither the Tyrant might retire himself into the City when he would, nor any munition or victuals be caried from thence into the camp: moreover, that they would give the attempt, and assay if they could sollicite any of the citizens to revolt from the Tyrant. This counterfeit carried himself so in this errand, that the Tyrant believed not so much his words, as took hold thereby of a good pretence and honest occasion for to quit and abandon the camp: and therefore the next morrow, he commanded Pythagoras, with the auxiliary souldiers and the horsemen, to keep a good guard about F the trench and enclosure of the camp: himself in person with the strength of his army, marched as it were to a battail, and commanded to advance forward the ensigns in all hast toward the City. * Philopœmenes perceiving that the army marched so fast through the narrow passage down the hill, put forth all his own horsemen and the auxiliary Candiots, against the guards of the enemies that warded before the camp. They, seeing the enemies to approach and themselves forsaken of their own fellows, at first went about to retire within their hold: but afterwards when they perceived the whole army of the Achæans advancing against them in order of battail, fearing that they and their tents should be at once surprised, made apace after their own host which was gone a good way before. With that, the targetiers of the Achæans assailed the camp, entred upon it, and ransacked the tents, whiles the rest went forward and pursued the enemies. The way was G such, as that an army at liberty and free from fear of enemies, might hardly and with much ado rid any ground and march without encumbrance: but so soon as the skirmish began in the tail of the rereward, and the noise and cry of them affrighted behind was heard in the vanguard: every man made shift for one, flung away weapons, and fled into the woods on either side of the way; and ere one could turn about, all the wayes were strewd and choaked up with armour and weapons, and especially with darts or javelins, which lighting for the most part with one end full against the enemies, were in stead of a staked or empalled palaissade to hinder their passage.

Philo-

Philopœmenes having given commandment to his light armed aid-ſouldiers to preſſe forward ſtill, H and to follow the chaſe as faſt as they could (knowing well that the horſemen would have much ado and trouble in their flight) conducted himſelf the main army and heavily charged by a more open way to the River Eurotas: where he encamped himſelf a little before the going down of the ſun, and there he ſtaied for his light appointed ſouldiers, whom he had ſent to follow after the enemies. Who being come about the time of the firſt watch, brought word, that the Tyrant with ſome few was entred into the City, but the unarmed multitude were diſperſed, and wandred all about the forreſt and the woods. Then he willed them to repoſe and refreſh their bodies: which being done, himſelf choſe out of all the ſouldiers beſides (who becauſe they were come faſt into the camp, had well heartned themſelves with taking their refection and ſome ſmall ſleep) certain elect and ſpecial men, and took them forth immediatly with him, having about them nothing but I their ſwords, and ſet them in good order to keep two port-waies, by which men go to Phara and Barboſthenes, where he preſumed that the enemies would take their way and retire themſelves upon their flight: and nothing was he deceived. For the Lacedæmonians, ſo long as the day light laſted, had withdrawn themſelves to the middle of the forreſt, through by-lanes and blind paths; but when the night was once come, and that they deſcried lights within their enemies camp, they kept themſelves aloof over-againſt them within cloſe and ſecret lanes; and when they were once paſſed beyond, and thought all to be in ſafety and ſecurity, they came down into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that forlaied them in ambuſh: ſo they were every where by numbers either killed or taken priſoners; inſomuch as ſcarce one fourth part of their whole army eſcaped. Philopœmenes having ſhut up the tyrant cloſe within K the City, ſpent almoſt thirty daies conſequently enſuing, in waſting and ſpoiling the territory of the Laconians: and when he had thus weakned and in manner broken the back of his enemy, he returned home, and the Achæans held him a paragon, and equal to the Roman General for glorious deeds of arms, nay, in the ſervice of the Laconian war they preferred him before the other.

During the war between the Achæans and the tyrant, the Roman Embaſſadors, who carefully and diligently viſited the Cities of the Allies, for fear leſt the Ætolians had alienated any of their affections from them to King Antiochus travelled but little in going about to the Achæans, whom by reaſon of the hatred they bare to Nabis, they hoped verily to be faſt and faithful enough unto them in all other things. And firſt they came to Athens, from thence to Chalcis, and ſo into Theſſaly: and after they had conferred with the Theſſalians in a frequent councel of theirs, they L turned their way to Demetrias, where there was publiſhed a ſolemn Diet to be holden by the Magnetes. Where they were to frame their ſpeech more curiouſly than in other places, becauſe certain of their great men and Potentats were eſtranged from the Romans, and altogether made for Antiochus and the Ætolians. The reaſon was this; becauſe when news came that Philip his ſon, who was left hoſtage with the Romans, ſhould be rendred again unto him, and likewiſe the tribut remitted which had been impoſed upon him, among other falſe tales and untruths it was reported, That the Romans would redeliver Demetrias alſo into his hands. And rather than that ſhould come to paſs, Eurylochus (a principal and chief man among the Magneſians) and ſome others of that faction, deſired to have a new world and an alteration, by the coming of the Ætolians and Antiochus. To theſe Magneſians, they were to couch and place their words to, in ridding M them of that fooliſh vain fear which they had conceived, that thereby they did not put Philip clean beſide his hope, and ſo give him occaſion to be ill affected unto the Romans; conſidering that he alone was to them of far greater importance in all reſpects, than were the Magneſians, put all together. Thus much only they ſaid by way of advertiſement, That as all Greece generally was much beholden and bound unto the Romans for the benefit of Liberty, which they by their means enjoyed, ſo that City and State eſpecially above all others was obliged unto them. For there, not only a garriſon of Macedonians had been maintained to keep them in awe, but alſo the King had built him a royal palace, to ſeat himſelf there, to the end, that they might evermore have in their eye, their Lord to command them. But in vain, and to no purpoſe was all this, in caſe the Ætolians brought Antiochus in his ſtead to make his reſiance in the houſe and palace of N Philip; and would needs entertain a new and unknown King in lieu of the old, ſo long a time and ſo well known. The ſoveraign Magiſtrat of that City, they call Magnetarches; and for that time Eurylochus was the man: who bearing himſelf big and ſtout of his high place, ſaid plainly, That he knew no cauſe, why either he or the Magneſians ſhould ſuppreſs and ſmother the rumour that ran ſo rife touching the delivery of Demetrias into Philip his hands. For rather than to ſuffer that, the Magneſians were to oppoſe themſelves, yea, to do and dare any action whatſoever. And in the vehement heat of ſpeech he went ſo far, that inconſideratly he caſt out one word and ſaid, That Demetrias ſeemed free in outward ſhew and appearance, but in very truth was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every beck of the Romans. At this ſpeech there aroſe a diſſonant bruit and murmuring of the aſſembly, which jarred and varied one from another, O whiles ſome ſoothed him up, others were offended, and took it in great deſpight, that he ſhould preſume to utter and ſpeak ſo much. And Quintius was in ſuch an heat of choler therewith, that ſtretching forth his hands to Heaven, he called the Gods to witneſs this ingratitude and diſloialty of the Magneſians. At whoſe words they were all greatly terrified. Then Zeno one of the chief, a man at that time of great authority and reputation, as well in regard of the honourable port that he ever caried in the whole courſe of his life, as alſo for that he alwayes ſtood firm and ſure

A "to the Roman ſide, beſought Quintius and the reſt of the Embaſſadors with tears, Not to im-
"pute the folly of one man to the whole City, for every man is to bear his own burden, and as he "hath brued, ſo to drink, and abide the ſmart of his own ſcratching. As for the Magneſians "(ſaith he) they acknowledge to owe unto T. Quintius and the people of Rome, not only their "freedom, but all other things elſe that are moſt deer and precious unto men. Neither could a "man pray or wiſh at the hands of the immortal Gods for any thing, which the Magneſians had "not received by their means: and ſooner would they like frantick perſons pluck the very heart
"out of their own bellies, yea, and tear themſelves in peeces, before they would violate and break
"the amity which they had with the Romans. This ſpeech of his was followed and ſeconded with the humble prayers of the multitude. Eurylochus departed out of the aſſembly, and through by-B wayes and blind lanes recovered the gates, and from thence fled ſtreight into Ætolia. For now by this time, and every day more than other, the Ætolians diſcovered and ſhewed themſelves how they were affected to revolt. And happily at the ſame time, Thoas, a principal perſonage of that Nation, whom they had ſent as Embaſſador to King Antiochus, was newly returned, and brought with him Menippus the Kings Embaſſador. Who, before they had audience given them in a councel aſſembled for them, had filled every mans ears and blabbed forth, what forces were prepared both for Land and Sea, what a mighty power was coming both of foot and horſe, how Elephants were ſent for out of India and above all (wherewith they thought the minds of the people would be moſt moved) That there was ſuch a maſs of gold brought, as would buy all the Romans out and out. It was eaſy to ſee what trouble and broil ſuch language might make in the general diet C and aſſembly. For the Roman Embaſſadors had intelligence, both of their coming, and of all that ever they did. And albeit there was little hope or none at all to do any good, yet Quintius thought it not amiſs, that ſome Embaſſadors from the allies and aſſociate Cities ſhould be preſent at that Councel, ſuch as might admoniſh and put the Ætolians in mind of the Roman alliance and ſociety, and not ſtick to ſpeak their minds franckly, yea, and thwart the King his Embaſſador.
The Athenians of all other were thought the meeteſt men for that purpoſe, both in regard of the authority and reputation of their City, and alſo for the ancient league between them and the Ætolians. So Quintius requeſted them to ſend their Embaſſadors to the Panætolian Parliament.
When the aſſembly was met, and the Councel ſet, Thoas firſt declared his embaſſage: and after him was Menippus called in, who being entred in place, ſpake in this manner: "It had been (qd.
D "he) the beſt courſe for all them that inhabit both Greece and Aſia, that Antiochus had intermed-
"led in theſe affairs, during the upright fortune and entire ſtate of Philip: then, every man had "enjoyed his own, and all had not been reduced to the appetite and devotion, nor brought under "ſubjection of the Romans. And even yet (quoth he) in caſe ye perſiſt ſtill in the ſame mind, and "purpoſe reſolutely to accompliſh and finiſh theſe your deſigns and commenced enterpriſes, poſ-
"ſible it is by the favor and help of the Gods, and by the means of the Ætolian aſſociation that "Antiochus may recover the State of Greece, craſed as it is, and much broken and bring it again to "her firſt freſh hue, to her lively and lightſome luſtre, which conſiſteth in true liberty, even that "which is able to ſtand alone and maintain it ſelf, and dependeth not upon the will and pleaſure
"of others. The Athenians, who firſt (after the Kings embaſſage was delivered) had audience given E them and liberty to ſpeak their mind, without making any mention at all of the King, "Ad-erti-
"ſed the Ætolians of the Roman ſociety, and put them in mind of the favors and good turns done
"by Quintius to all Greece in general: adviſing them to take heed, that without diſcretion they "overthrew not the welfare thereof, by running raſhly and too ſoon into a new world of ſtrange "courſes and fine devices: for hot, haſty, and heady counſels are at the firſt ſight and entertain"ment pleaſant and amiable; in the handling and managing, hard and difficult; in the end and "iſſue, heavy and dangerous. Conſider how the Roman Embaſſadors, and namely, Quintius a"mong them, are not far off: and whiles things ſtand in good terms of integrity, it were better to "treat and debate of matters in queſtion and doubt by words and reaſons, than to ſet all Aſia and "Europe together to take arms and to make lamentable and deadly war one upon another. The F multitude deſirous of a change enclined altogether, and were wholly devote to Antiochus, being of opinion, that the Roman Embaſſadors were not to be admitted into the Councel: but the more grave and ancient perſons of the nobility and ſtates-men, obtained thus much by vertue of their authority, That they ſhould have audience granted unto them. And when the Athenians had made relation of this decree and concluſion paſſed, Quintius was of mind to go into Ætolia: for this accompt he made, either to obtain ſomewhat that he came for, or elſe to have all Gods and men to bear him witneſs, that the Romans would enter into the action of war juſtly and in manner upon conſtraint and neceſſity. "Quintius being thither come, began at firſt to diſcourſe be"fore the whole aſſembly, as touching the ſociety of the Ætolians with the Romans, and how "often they had broken for their parts the faithful accord between them: and when he had ſo G "ſaid, he uſed a brief ſpeech concerning the right of thoſe Cities that were in queſtion. And if they "thought that they had any law and reaſon of their ſide, how much better (quoth he) were it to
"ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, either to argue and expoſtulate the matter with them, or to demand
"their advice (whether they would themſelves) than to cauſe the people of Rome to make war
"with Antiochus & the Ætolians together, not without great trouble of the whole world & cer"tain ruin of all Greece? For none ſhould feel the ſmart & calamity of this war ſooner than they
"that are the very cauſes therof & began firſt. Thus ſpake the Roman Embaſſ. by way of propheſy, but

but in vain and to no effect. After him Thoas and the reſt of that faction, were heard with the H general applauſe of all: and they effected ſo much, that without any farther proroguing of the Diet, and referring the matter to another day, yea, and without ſtaying ſo long until the Romans were out of the place and abſent, they concluded to make a decree, by vertue whereof Antiochus, ſhould be ſent for to affranchiſe Greece, and to decide the quarrel between the Romans and the Ætolians. This decree was not ſo proud and inſolent, but Damocritus their Pretor accompanied it with as arrogant and reproachful a frump of his own. For when Quintius required of him to ſee the ſaid decree, he without any reſpect of the honorable perſonage of the man, made anſwer, That for the preſent time he had ſomwhat elſe to do of greater importance; but he would give him the decree and an anſwer withal ſhortly, and that within Italy, encamped upon the bank of Tyberis. So great a ſpirit of ſenſeleſs folly in thoſe dayes had poſſeſſed the nation of the Ætolians, I and their chief Magiſtrats! Then Quintius and the delegats returned to Corinth.

After the Romans were diſmiſſed, the Ætolians held no more general councel of the whole Nation, becauſe they would make ſemblance and ſeem to do nothing of themſelves as touching the cauſe and queſtion of Antiochus, but ſit ſtill and expect the coming of the King. Mary, they treated and debated the matter by their Apocleti (for ſo they call their ſpecial and privy Councel which conſiſteth of certain elect choſen perſons) by what means there might be an alteration and change in the affairs of Greece. This was held of all men for certain, that in every City and State, the chief and the beſt men generally were for the aſſociation of the Romans, and content-ted themſelves with the preſent condition wherein they ſtood: but the multitude and thoſe who had not all things to fall out to their own good liking, were deſirous of a change. And one day K above the reſt, the Ætolians entred into a deſignment and plot, which was not only out of all meaſure audacious, but alſo moſt ſhameleſs, namely, to ſurpriſe and poſſeſs themſelves of Demetrias, Chalcis and Lacedæmon. And to each of theſe Cities there was ſent one of their principal perſonages, namely, Thoas to Chalcis; Alexamenus to Lacedæmon, and Diocles to Demetrias. This Diocles had the help and aſſiſtance of Eurylochus a baniſhed man (of whoſe flying away, and the occaſion thereof we have ſpoken before) who otherwiſe had no hope at all to return again into his native countrey. The kinſfolk and friends of Eurylochus and the reſt of that faction, upon in-ſtructions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children to preſent themſelves in the frequent aſſembly of the citizens in habit of mourners, in poor array, and vailed after the manner of humble ſuppliants, there to beſeech them all and ſome, not to ſuffer him a guiltleſs perſon, neither L convicted nor condemned, to wax old and pine away in exile. All that were plain and ſimple men ſeemed to be touched with pity and commiſeration. The wicked and ſeditious perſons conceived ſome hope to make a confuſion in the State by theſe Ætolian troubles: in ſo much as every one was of opinion and gave his voice, that he ſhould be reſtored and ſent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horſemen (for then was he the Captain of the Cavalry) took his journey, under a colour and pretence to reduce and bring home this ba-niſhed perſon his hoſt and good friend; and in one day and night travelled a mighty great journey, and came within ſix miles of the City. And betimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troops he marched forward, commanding the reſt of the horſemen to follow after. When he approached the gate, he cauſed them all to alight on foot and to lead their M horſes in their hands by the reins of their bridles, and to go without order, reſembling travailers and waifaring men, ſo as they ſeemed more like to the ordinary train of Captain Diocles, than to the men of arms and warriors under his charge: and leaving one of his troops at the gate, for fear leſt the horſemen behind might be ſhut out, he led Eurylochus by the hand, and brought him through the mids of the City and the market place home to his houſe: and all the way he was met with many of his lovers and friends that welcomed him, and joyed for his return. Anon the whole City was full of horſemen, and all places of opportunity and advantage were ſeized and poſſeſſed by them. Which done, divers were ſent to maſſacre the chief of the adverſe part in their houſes. Thus the Ætolians became maſters of Demetrias.

As for Lacedæmon, they deviſed in no hand to force the City, but by ſome wile to entrap and N ſurpriſe the tyrant. For ſeeing the Romans had deſpoiled him of all his Sea coaſt Towns: and the Achæans driven him within the walls of Lacedæmon, there was no doubt, but who ſo ever could firſt take his life from him, ſhould cary away all the thanks, and curry eſpecial favor with the Lacedæmonians. Good occaſion and pretence they had to ſend unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for ſome aids, conſidering that by their advice and perſwaſion he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexamenus a thouſand footmen, and thirty elect horſemen, drawn out of all the flour of the City. Damocritus the Pretor delivered unto them from the privy councel of that nation (of which we have before ſpoken) "That they
"ſhould not believe that they were to be employed in war againſt the Achæans, or in any other
"ſervice, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his own head: but he charged O
"them to be ready to perform and execute obediently whatſoever ſuddain deſignment Alexame-
"nus upon the preſent occaſion ſhould happen to attempt, were it never ſo unlooked for, ſtrange, "inconſiderate, and audacious: and to reſt upon this, That they were ſent with him to accom"pliſh that, and for no other purpoſe. Thus Alexamenus with the conduct of theſe men thus prepared to his hand came unto the Tyrant: and no ſooner was he arrived, but he poſſeſſed him preſently with a world of hopes: giving to underſtand, "That Antiochus was already paſſed over

"into

A "into Europe: that ſhortly he would be in Greece, and over-ſpred all ſeas and lands with his ar"mies and armados; that the Romans ſhould full well know and find, that they have not now to "deal with ſuch an one as Philip; that the numbers of his foot and horſes by land can not be "counted, nor his ſhips at Sea numbred; that the battail of his Elephants at the very fight will "decide the matter and finiſh the war. Moreover, that the Ætolians with all their forces, were "ready and preſt to come to Lacedæmon, (as need required) at any time: but indeed, deſirous
"they were to ſhew and muſter before the King at his arrival, a goodly number of armed ſoul-
"diers. Nabis therefore himſelf ſhould do very well, not to ſuffer thoſe forces which he had, to "decay with long repoſe and idleneſs, but bring them forth and train them abroad, make them
"to run in their armour, thereby both to whet and ſharpen their courages, and alſo to exerciſe and B "inure their bodies: for by uſe and cuſtome, the labour will be lighter; and by the courteſy and "graciouſnes of their General, not without delight and pleaſure. Hereupon, they began to iſſue out of the City, and oftentimes went into the plain lying hand by the River Eurotas. They of the tyrants guard kept commonly in the battail or middle ward: and himſelf with three horſemen at the utmoſt (with whom Alexamenus for the moſt part was) uſed ordinarily to ride before the en-ſigns, taking ſurvey and viewing the utmoſt points and wings of the army. The Ætolians were placed in the right wing, as well thoſe that came before to aid the tyrant, as thoſe thouſand that were newly arrived with Alexamenus. Now had Alexamenus taken a cuſtome, one while to tourney as it were amongſt the ranks before in the company of the tyrant, and to inſtruct him in ſome matters ſounding to his commodity: otherwhiles, to ride to his own men into the right wing, and C ſoon again to return to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of ſomewhat neceſſary to be done. But upon that day which was appointed for to do the feat and murder the tyrant, after he had ridden forth with the tyrant to the uſual place, and kept him company a while; he took occa-ſion (as his manner was) to make a ſtep aſide to his own ſouldiers; and then he went in hand with thoſe horſemen which were ſent with him from out of Ætolia, and ſaid thus unto them:
"Now ſirs, you muſt adventure and execute that luſtily and without delay which you were com"manded to perform by my direction and leading. Be ready with heart and hand, and be not ſlack
"and idle to exploit that, which ye ſhall ſee me to undertake and enterpriſe. And look whoſoever
"he be that either ſtandeth ſtill, or wil ſeem to argue and interpoſe his own wit and advice to croſs "mine, let him make account, he ſhall never go home again to his own countrey. With that he D ſet them all a quaking, for well they remembred what their charge was when they came forth from home. Now was the Tyrant a coming on horſeback from the left wing: Then Alexamenus commanded his horſemen to couch their lances down, and to have their eye upon him. He alſo ſetled himſelf to take a good heart unto him, which was not a little daunted at firſt with the cogitation of ſo great a deſignment that he had projected. When he was now approached and come neer the Tyrant, he ran with full carrier at him, gored his horſe, and overthrew himſelf to the ground. He was not ſo ſoon unhorſed and laid along, but the horſemen ſtabbed him with many a thruſt; whereof the moſt part did no harm, conſidering they were driven againſt his corſlet: but in the end they found where his body was naked and unarmed, ſo he gave his laſt gaſp before he could be reſcued by his guard in the main battail aforeſaid. Then Alexamenus taking with him E all the Ætolians, made all the haſt he could to poſſeſs himſelf of the royal place. The Penſioners and Squires of the body, ſeeing this murder done before their eyes were at firſt mightily affrightted: but afterwards perceiving the army of the Ætolians to go their wayes and depart, they ran to the breathleſs carkaſe left among them and of men that ſhould have guarded his body and revenged his death, they became a ſort of idle gazers and lookers on. And ſurely there would not a man have once ſtirred, in caſe the multitude had immediatly been called to an aſſembly; and if after arms laid down, they had been entertained by him with ſome Oration or Remonſtrances framed according to the time. The Ætolians were kept many together, in arms ſtill, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one perſon. But all things that they did, haſtened the ſpeedy ruin and deſtruction of thoſe that had committed this fact: as it could not otherwiſe be in F all reaſon, but they ſhould ſo be ſerved, who had plaid ſo lewd and treacherous a part. The Captain and Ring-leader of all this miſchief kept himſelf cloſe ſhut within the royal palace, ſpending both night and day in rifling and ſearching the Tyrants coffers and his treaſury. And the Ætoli-ans for their part alſo fell to ranſacking, as if they had won that City by aſſault, which they made countenance and ſemblance to ſet free. The indignity of theſe their pranks, the contempt withal and ſmall regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedemonians to gather together and conſult of the matter. Some were of opinion and ſaid, That the Ætolians were to be thruſt out by the head and ſhoulders, and to be ſent away with a miſchief, and their own liberty to be recovered, which under a colour of being reſtored, was intercepted and taken from them:
others adviſed and ſaid, that for faſhion at leaſtwiſe, ſome one of royal blood ſhould be ſet up G for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and ſtem one Laconicus a young Child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant: him they mounted upon horſeback, and then they took arms with all ſpeed, and as many Ætolians as they could light upon, wandring here and there in the ſtreets, they ran upon and hewed in peeces. Then they aſſaulted the palace, where they alſo murdered Alexamenus, albeit with ſome few about him he made reſiſtance and defended himſelf. The reſt of the Ætolians gathered together about Chalciœcos (which is a Chappel of Diana made of braſs) and there likewiſe they were maſſacred. A few of them

flang away their weapons and fled, ſome eſcaped to Tegea, and others to * Megalopolis: where being apprehended by the Magiſtrats, they were ſold in port-ſale, to them that would offer moſt. Philopœmenes hearing of the Tyrants death, went to Lacedæmon, where he found all things out of order and in confuſion by reaſon of fear. And having called forth the principal & chief citizens, he uſed unto them ſuch a ſpeech, as indeed Alexamenus ſhould have made, and thereby knit the Lacedæmonians in league and alliance with the Achæans: which he effected the ſooner, becauſe it chanced even then, that Attilius was come before * Gythæum with four and twenty galleaces of five banks of oars on a ſide.

* Leontario, or Londtario.

* Cabo de Pazu, or Palcopoli.

About the ſame time, Thoas had not ſo good ſpeed before Chalcis; by means of Euthymidas, a great and chief man of the City (one, who by the might and ſtronger hand of thoſe that ſided with the Romans, had been expelled the City after the coming of T. Quintius and the Embaſſadors or Delegats) and alſo of Herodotus of Canus, a Merchant and a man that in regard of his wealth and riches bare a great ſide in Chalcis: Thoas, I ſay, ſped not ſo well by their means, notwithſtanding that the ſuppoſts and part-takers of Euthymidas were well diſpoſed to betray the Town; as Eurylochus did in the ſurpriſing and ſeizing of Demetrias. This Euthymidas from Athens (for there he had made choice to dwell) firſt came to Thebes, and ſo from thence went forward to Salganea. Herodotus abode at Thronium, and not far from thence within the gulf of Malea, he had 2000 footmen, and Thoas two hundred horſemen, and about thirty light Caravels. Which Herodotus was commanded to ſet over into the Iſland Atalanta with ſix hundred footmen, that from thence, when he perceived once the Land-forces to approach Aulis and Euripus, he might cut over to Chalcis. As for themſelves, they conducted the reſt of the forces in all the haſt they could, and moſt by night journies marched unto Chalcis. Miſchio and Xenoclides (who had the manging of the affairs in Chalcis, and might do all in all there, now that Euthymidas was baniſhed) remained in Chalcis, and whether they miſtruſted ſomewhat themſelves, or had ſome inkling and intelligence of the matter, I wot not, but affraid they were at firſt, and had no other hope at all but by flight to ſave themſelves: howbeit afterwards when their fear was well allaied and ſetled, ſeeing evidently, that not only their own countrey was betraied, but alſo the Roman ſociety abandoned, they plotted in this wiſe, and entred into a courſe as followeth.

It fortuned at the very ſame time, that a ſolemn anniverſary ſacrifice was celebrated at Eretria to the honour of Diana Amarynthis: to which ſolemnity there reſorted not only the inhabitants of thoſe places neer at hand, but alſo a number of Caryſtians. Thither they ſent certain Orators, to requeſt and entreat the Eretrians and Caryſtians, both to take ſome pity of their eſtate, conſidering they were born in the ſame Iſland, and alſo to have ſome regard to the alliance of the Romans, and not ſuffer Chalcis to fall into the hands of the Ætolians: who no doubt, if they might get Chalcis, would not be long ere they had Eubœa too. Sirly Lords (ſay they) were the Macedonians, and rigorous, but the Ætolians would be much more unſupportable. Theſe Cities were principally reſpective to the Romans, whoſe vertue and proweſs in war, whoſe juſtice and bounty in victory they had lately experience of, and therefore both States armed the flower and manhood of all their youth and ſent them. The Townſmen of Chalcis having committed the guard of their walls to theſe, went forth themſelves with all their forces paſſed over Euripus, and encamped neer Salganea. From which place they ſent firſt an herald, and after him Embaſſadors to the Ætolians, to demand of them, Wherein they had ſo offended either in word or deed, that their allies and friends ſhould come to moleſt and aſſail them ſo by way of hoſtility? To whom Thoas the General of the Ætolians made this anſwer, That they were not come to annoy and trouble, but to deliver and free them from their ſervitude under the Romans. For bound they were and tied now with a brighter and more glittering chain indeed, but far heavier, than at what time as they had the garriſon of the Macedonians within their Caſtle. The Chalcidians replied again and inferred, that they neither were in bondage, nor needed at all the garriſon of any. And thus the Embaſſadors departed from the parly, and returned to their own people. Thoas and the Ætolians, whoſe whole and only hope was to come upon them on a ſuddain and ſurpriſe them at unawares returned home again as they came, being not able to maintain open war, nor to aſſail a City ſo well fortified both by ſea and land. Euthymidas being advertiſed that his country-men lay in camp at Salganea and that the Ætolians were diſlodged and gone, retired himſelf alſo from Thebes to Athens. And Herodotus likewiſe, after he had wiſtly and with great longing, expected from * Atalanta certain daies together, to ſee ſome ſignal (but in vain) ſent out a pinnace or brigantine, to know what the cauſe might be of ſuch ſtay: and underſtanding that the enterpriſe was given over by his complices and fellows in the complot, he returned to Thronium from whence he came.

Quintius likewiſe having intelligence of theſe occurrents, as he ſailed with his fleet from Corinth, encountred Eumenes in Euripus neer Chalcis. And thought good it was between them that Eumenes the King ſhould leave at Chalcis five hundred ſouldiers in garriſon, and himſelf go directly to Athens: and Quintius kept on his way to * Demetrias whither he intended, ſuppoſing that the deliverance of Chalcis would make ſomewhat to induce the Magneſians to embrace again the ſociety of the Romans. And to the end that thoſe perſons in Demetrias who ſided with him might have ſome forces for their defence, he wrote unto Eunemus the Pretor of the Theſſalians, to put the youth in arms: and he ſent Villius before unto Demetrias to ſound their affections, not minding otherwiſe to give the attempt, unleſs ſome part of them enclined to reſpect the ancient ſociety. Villius entred the mouth of the haven with a five banked Galleace. Thither ran

A the whole multitude flocking unto him. And Villius demanded of them whither they had rather that he came to them as to friends or enemies? Unto whom Enrylochus the Magnetarches, answered, that he was come unto his friends: but he willed to him forbear the haven, and suffer the Magnesians to be at peace and liberty, and to beware that under a pretence of parle, he did not solicit and disquiet the multitude. After this there was no farther talk and speech between them but plain debate and altercation: whiles Villius the Roman blamed and challenged the Magnesians, as unthankfull persons, and forewarned them of the miseries and calamities that hung over their heads; and again the multitude cried out aloud, and accused as well the Senat as Quintius. Thus Villius without doing any good, returned to Quintius. But Quintius having dispatched a messenger to the Pretor, that he should reduce home his forces, retired himself again by sea to Corinth.

B The affairs of Greece thus interlaced and blended with the Roman, have carried me away as it were out of my lists: not for that they were so necessary and important to be written, but only because they were materiall to the cause of the war against Antiochus. After the Consuls were elect (for there I began my digression) L. Quintius and Cn. Domitius, the Consuls went into their severall provinces, Quintius in Liguria, and Domitius against the Boii. As for the Boii, they held themselves quiet, yea, and the whole body of their Senat with their children, their captains also with their Cavalry, to the number in all of fifteen hundred, yeelded themselves to the Consul. But the territory of the Ligurians was overrun and wasted, and some fortresses won: whereby not only there were prizes got of all sorts, and prisoners taken, but also diverse captives, as well citizens as allies were recovered out of the enemies hand. This very year a Colony was planted at Vibo,

C by an act of Senat and Commons: and there went thither three thousand and seven hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. The Triumvirs, who had the placing of them, were Q. Nevius, M. Minutius, and M. Furius Craſſipes. Every footman was endued with fifteen acres of land, and the horsemen with twice as much. It was a territory held last in the tenure of the Brutians, and they had conquered it first from the Greeks.

About the same time, there hapned at Rome two most fearfull accidents; the one of them continued long, but was not altogether so vehement and terrible: for there was an earthquake endured eight and thirty daies. All which time, the lawsteed or vacation from all courts of law and civill causes, continued in great fear and pensiveness: in regard whereof, a supplication was holden for three daies. As for the other, it was not a vain fear, but a very loss indeed that touched ma-

D ny men: for there began a scarfire in the beast Market, and continued a day and a night, burning many houses standing on the Tyber side; and all the shops and ware-houses, with merchandise of great price, were consumed. Now was the year well drawing to an end, and daily more and more the bruit and rumor of the war with Antiochus encreased: and likewise the care that the LL. of the Senat had therof. And therefore they began to treat as concerning the Provinces of the Magistrats elect, to the end, that all of them might be more circumspect and intentive to their charges. So a decree passed, that the Consuls should have the governance of Italy, by name, and also to go whithersoever the Senat should please to dispose of them: and all men knew wel enough, that the war against Antiochus was upon the point. Also ordained it was, that he whose lot it was to manage

E that war, should have the conduct of four thousand footmen of Roman Citizens, and three hundred horsemen; besides six thousand allies of the Latine nation, and four hundred horsemen. L. Quintius the Consul was appointed to take musters for those souldiers, that there should be no stay, but that the new Consul might immediatly put himself in his journey, to what expedition soever the Senat thought good. Item, It was decreed as concerning the Provinces of the Pretors, in this manner: namely, That the first lot should assign the double jurisdiction, civill and forreign, as well among Citizens as strangers: the second should concern the Brutians: the third, the navy, and the same to sail whithersoever the Senat would appoint: the fourth for Sicily: the fift for Sardinia: the sixt for the nether Spain. Over and besides L. Quintius the Consul was commanded to enroll two new legions of Roman Citizens, besides twenty thousand foot and eight

F hundred horsemen of allies of the Latine nation: and this army they set out for the Pretor, who was to govern the Brutii. Two chappels that year were dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus: the one of them L. Furius, Purpureo vowed in the Gauls war, as Pretor; the other when he was Consul: and Q. Martius Ralla the Daumvir, dedicated them. This year there passed many sharp and grievous sentences and judgements upon usurers: against whom (being privat men) M. Tuccius and P. Iunius Brutus the two Ædiles of the chair, commenced action. Of that silver wherein they were fined, was made a chariot with four wheels, guilded; and set up it was in the Capitoll in the cabinet of Jupiter above the top of his shrine: likewise twelve bucklets guilded. The same Ædiles also, caused the porch or gallery to be made without the gate Tergemina, among the carpenters.

G As the Romans were wholly amused upon preparation for this new war, so Antiochus for his part sat not still: three Cities there were which kept him back and checked his progresse, to wit. Smyrna, Alexandria in Troas, and Lampsacus; the which they never could to that day force by assault, or draw into amity with any condition whatsoever; and to leave them behind in those terms, when he should in proper person passe over into Europe, he was not willing. Somewhat also he was stopped by a consultation as touching Annibal. For as first he was staid and hindered by occasion of the open ships which he intended to send with him into Affrick. And afterwards this was into his head by Thoas the Ætolian especially, and question moved, whether it was good ſimply to ſend him thither at all, or no? This Thoas, when Greece was all in an hurry and full of troubles, bare them in hand, that Demetrias would be in their power and at their devotion. And like as with his leaſings touching the King, in multiplying and magnifying his forces; he had brought many of the Greeks into a fools paradiſe, even ſo alſo after the ſame maner he ceaſed not to feed the King with lies, and fill him with hopes, making him beleeve as all men wiſhed for him with all their hearts, and would run by heaps to the ſea ſtrand, to meet him ſo ſoon as they could ken his fleet under ſail. This ſelf-ſame man was ſo bold alſo as to alter the Kings mind "as touching Annibal, which ſeemed before reſolved and ſetled. For he perſwaded him that the "Kings navy was not to be diſmembred, and part therefore to be ſent away; and if he were to "make out any of the ſhips from the reſt, yet Annibal of all other was not to have the conduct "thereof, a baniſhed perſon and a Carthaginian; who was like enough to be of many minds, & "to change a thouſand times in a day, ſuch was his preſent condition and fortune & ſuch was his "nature and diſpoſition. And as for that glorious name for martiall proweſſe (which is the cauſe "that Annibal is ſo much ſet by, and which recommendeth him as a ſpeciall and ſingular gift to "the world) it is too much, and far unfitting for any one captain under a King: and more meet it "were that the King himſelf ſhould be regarded and ſeen above all other, that the King, I ſay and "none but the King ſhould be the leader, conducter and commander of all. Again, if Annibal "chanced to miſcary with a fleet, or to have his forces defeated, the loſſe would be accounted no "more then if any other meaner captain had done it: but if the affairs ſhould proſper and ſpeed "well, Annibal ſhould go away with the honour, and not Antiochus. Moreover, ſay that fortune "were ſo kind as to give Antiochus the upper hand of the Romans, and the entire victory over "them for ever, what hope or likelihood is there that Annibal would be content to live under the "King and ſubject to him alone, who hardly could brook and endure the command and ſoveraign-"ty of the whole ſtate wherein he was born? He hath not carried himſelf ſo, ever ſince his firſt "youth, bearing amind to compaſſe the dominion of the whole world, as that now in his old age "he can not abide to have a lord and a ſuperior over him. To conclude: the King (quoth he) "hath no ſuch need of Annibal in this war, as to make him a commander: well may he uſe him for "a counſeller, and ſo forth have him in his train and company; for ſome mean fruit and uſe of ſuch "a nature, cannot be cumberſome, hurtfull, and dangerous: but if high and great matters be reach-"ed at, ſoon they may bear down and overcharge both the giver, and alſo the receiver. And no "ſpirits are ſo ready to envy and malice others, as they whoſe birth and parentage, whoſe degree "and eſtate is not anſwerable to their hauty minds: and ſuch commonly, as they hate the vertue, "ſo they depreſſe the good of another. Hereupon their courſe of ſending Annibal into Africk, "was forthwith laid aſide and clean caſt behind, which was ſo well deviſed in the beginning of "the war.

Antiochus bearing himſelf aloft now, principally for that Demetrias was revolted from the Romans unto the Ætolians, determined no longer to delay the matter, but preſently to take a voiage into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the ſea, he went up to Ilium from the ſea ſide for to ſacrifice to Minerva; and when he was returned to his fleet, he made ſail with 40 cloſe covered and hatched ſhips, and 60 uncovered and undecked, and after thoſe followed 200 veſſels of burden, charged and fraught with victuals, munition, and warlike furniture of all ſorts. And firſt he fell with the Iland * Imbros: and from thence he cut over to Scyathos, where after he had rallied his ſhips which had been ſcattered one from another in the wide and deep ſea, he arrived at Pteleum, the firſt town of the main and continent. Where Eurylochus the Magnetarches, [i.the ſoveraign of Magneſia] and the principall citizens of the State, who were come from Demetrias, met him and joyned with him; who rejoycing exceedingly to ſee ſo goodly a company of them in his train, the next day put into the haven of the City of Demetrias: and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to ten thouſand foot, five hundred horſe, and ſix Elephants: a ſmall power (God wot) and unfficient to ſeize upon Greece, all naked and alone, far ſhorter then to hold and maintain war with the Romans. After it was reported that Antiochus was come to Demetrias, the Ætolians proclaimed a councell, wherein they made a decree to ſend for Antiochus. For now the King knowing that they would paſſe ſuch an Act, was departed from Demetrias, and had withdrawn himſelf to Phalera within the gulph of Malea. And after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Lamia, where he was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of hands, ſhouts, acclamations, and others ſigns, whereby the multitude uſed to ſhew & teſtifie their great joy. When they were aſſembled together and ſet in Councell, Phaneas the Pretor and other chief citizens brought him ſolemnly in: where Ojez made, thus the King began his ſpeech, firſt excuſing himſelf, in that he was come with a far ſmaller power then all men hoped or looked for. "And e-"ven this (quoth he) may ſerve in ſtead of the greateſt argument that may be of my exceeding "love and affection toward you, in that being ſo unprovided and unfurniſhed of all things, and "at a time ſo unſeaſonable for to ſail, as too early to take the ſea, I have not thought much but "am willingly come at the call of their Embaſſadors: being thus aſſuredly perſwaded, that the Æ-"tolians ſeeing me once, will ſuppoſe that in me alone conſiſted all their hope and defence "whatſoever. And yet I would accompliſh I aſſure you, and ſatisfie to the full even your content-"ment alſo, whoſe expectation for the preſent may ſeem to have been diſappointed: for ſoon as the

A "time of the year will ſerve, and the ſpring is once come, that the ſeas are navigable, I will o-
"verſpread all Greece with men, horſe, and munition; I will take up all the ſea coaſts with fleets,
"I will ſpare for no coſt, no pain, no perill, untill I have taken from their necks the heavy yoke of "the Roman empire, ſet Greece free indeed, and the made the Ætolians the chief commanders "therein. Nay, with mine armies beſides ſhall come all kind of proviſion and furniture out of A*ſia*. But for the preſent (ſaith he) the Ætolians muſt ſee & take order, that my people may be ſerved with corn and other victuals at a reaſonable rate. To this effect when the King had ſpoken with the great aſſent of all men, he departed. After the Kings departure, there roſe ſome contention between two great men of the Ætolians, to wit, Phaneas and Thoas. Phaneas was of opinion, that it was better policy to uſe Antiochus for a mediator and reconciler of peace, or to be an umpire or B arbitrator to decide the controverſies between them & the Romans, rather then to be the General of the war. For his very coming and majeſty would be more effectuall then all his forces, to ſtrike ſome reverence in the Romans, and cauſe them to be reſpective unto him. For men oftentimes yeeld and remit many things of themſelves willingly, to avoid war, which they cannot be forced unto by war and by arms, when they are once entred into action. Thoas inferred again and ſaid, that Phaneas ſpake not this for any deſire & love to peace, but his meaning was to ſcatter and diſpatch this furniture and preparation of war, for this intent, That by this tedious lingring, the Kings courage might abate, and the Romans gain time to make themſelves ready. For, that there was no reaſon poſſibly to be gotten at the Romans hand, they had tried ſufficiently by good experience, in ſending ſo many embaſſages to Rome, and in debating the matter ſo often with Quintius: neither would they ever have ſought unto Antiochus and craved his aid, if all their hope otherwiſe C had not been cut off and clean failed. And now ſince his helping hand is preſented unto them ſooner then all men thought or looked for, they were not now to begin to faint and give over, but rather to requeſt and intreat the King, that ſince he was come himſelf in perſon (which was the greateſt matter of all) to ſet free and maintain Greece, he would ſend for forces both at ſea and land. For the King in arms, might peradventure obtein ſomething: but diſarmed if he were, little or no reckning would the Romans make of him in the quarrell and queſtion of the Ætoli-ans, no, nor in his own affairs whenſoever he ſhould reaſon and debate thereof. And here went the hare away. They all opened ſtreightwaies to ſtile the King with the name of Imperator [i. Emperour:] and they choſe thirty of the chief perſonages to aſſiſt him in councell for all things requiſit. Thus the Diet was diſſolved, and every man ſlipt away and retired to his own City.
D The next day the King ſat in a conſultation with their Apocletes, in what place they ſhould begin the war. And it was thought beſt, firſt to aſſail the City of Chalcis, which lately the Ætolians had aſſaied in vain. And for to effect this ſervice, there was more expedition and ſpeed required then any other great forces and preparations. Hereppon the King ſet forward with 1000 footmen which followed him from Demetrias, and made by the way of Phocis: The Captains of the alſo of the Ætolians, having levied ſome few companies of their youth took another way, and met with him at Chæronea, and followed with ten covered ſhips. The King encamped neer Salganea, and himſelf in perſon with the chief of the Ætolians croſſed the Euripus: and when he was landed and not far gone from the haven, the Magiſtrats and chief men of Chalcis came forth without E their gates, and ſome few of both ſides met together for to parle. The Ætolians were earneſt to perſwade with them, "That ſo far forth as they might without impeaching the Roman amity
"they would aſſume the King to be their allie and friend, for aſmuch as he was paſſed into Europe
"not to make war, but to deliver Greece, and ſet it free in very deed, and not in word only and "falſe ſemblance, as the Romans had done. And nothing was there more for the good and benefit "of the Cities in Greece, then to entertain the ſociety and fellowſhip of them both. For under the
"the defence and ſafegard of the one, they might be ſure to guard themſelves from the violence "and outrage of the other. But if they accepted not of the King, they were beſt to take heed
"and ſee what danger they preſently incurred: conſidering the ſuccours of the Romans to relieve "them were ſo far off, and the forces of Antiochus their enemy to annoy them, ſo neer even at F "their gates, whom of themſelves with their own power they were not able to withſtand. To this, Miccio one of their chief men made this anſwer: I marvell much (ſaith he) who they be, that
"Antiochus for to deliver and ſet free, hath taken the pains to leave his own Kingdome, and to "paſs over into Europe. For mine own part, I know no City in Greece, that either hath Roman
"garriſon, or payeth any tribute unto them, or is bound to unjuſt and unreaſonable covenant, or "endureth any hards laws and conditions againſt their wils: and therefore the Chalcidians have "need of no perſon to reſtore them to freedome, ſince they be free already; nor yet of a gar-
"riſon for their defence, conſidering that by the grace and favour of the ſame people of Rome, they "enjoy peace and liberty already. As for the King, we refuſe not his amity, nor yet reject
"we the friendſhip of the Ætolians. And we will take it for a ſpeciall point of friendſhip that G "they ſhall do us, if they gently will depart out of our Iland and be gone: For, as for us, we are re-
"ſolute in this, not to receive them within our wals, no, nor to contract with them any ſociety, "without the advice and conſent of the Romans. When theſe matters were related to the King, who ſtayed behind with the ſhips, he determined preſently to return to Demetrias for that he was not come with ſuch a power as to attempt any thing by force: where, ſeeing his firſt enterpriſe came to nothing, he conferred with the Ætolians what was to be done next: & cõcluded it was, to found the Achæans & Aminander the King of the Athamans. They ſuppoſed that the nation of the Bœotians was clean eſtranged and badly affected to the Romans ever ſince the death of Barcillas and thoſe troubles that enſued thereupon. They were perſwaded alſo that Philopœmenes a great potentat, and principal leader of the Achæans, was both malicious and odious unto Quintius for emulation and jelouſie of honour in the Laconian war. Aminander had eſpouſed and taken to wife Apamea the daughter of one Alexander a Megapolitan, who vaunted himſelf to be deſcended from Alexander the Great, named his two ſons Philip and Alexander, and his daughter Apamea; whom being thus advanced by marriage with a King, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Athamania. This Philip a vain-headed young man, the Ætolians and Antiochus had induced into a fooliſh hope (conſidering that for certain he was of the royall blood) to obtain the Kingdome of Macedony, if haply he could bring about to joyn Aminander and the Athamanians to Antiochus. And theſe vain conceits of great beheſt wrought mightily not with Philip only, but alſo with Aminander.

Now in Achæa there was a councell holden at Ægium, and audience given there to the Embaſſadors of Antiochus and the Ætolians, before T. Quintius. Where the King his Embaſſador ſpake firſt, and being, (as all thoſe commonly are, that have interteinment and maintenance of Kings) full of fooliſh babble, & making ſea and land reſound again with his vain pratling and ſenſleſſe words; ſet tale an end, and told them, what an infinit number on horſemen were paſſing over by Helleſpont into Europe: whereof ſome of them were in compleat harneſs, armed at all peeces, whom they call Cataphracti: others were archers, and ſhot of horſeback, againſt whom there was nothing cloſe, nothing ſure enough, who when their backs are turned, and their horſes run away, ſhoot ſo much the more ſurely, and even point-plank. And albeit theſe forces of horſe by his report, were ſufficient of themſelves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put together, yet he addedbeſides a mighty number, I wot not how many of footmen: and terrified them with namely a ſort of ſtrange nations, that ſcarcely had been heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Ælymæans and Caduſians. But for his forces at ſea, there was no bayes, "harbors, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them. The Sydonians and Tyrians (ſay they) "hold the right ſide, the Aradians, and the Sidets out of Pamphylia keep the left; nations for ſkill and valour at ſea incomparable. As for money and other proviſion and furniture for the wars, "it were needleſſe to diſcourſe of, ſince they themſelves knew well enough, that the realms of "Aſia have alwaies flowed with gold, as their proper wealth. So as the Romans now were not "to deal with Philip nor with Annibal, the one a chief perſon among many others of a City; "and the other limited within the confines only of the kingdom of Macedony, but with the great "Monarch of all Aſia, yea, and of ſome part of Europe. And yet he, as mighty a potentat as he is "(notwithſtanding he is come to the utmoſt coaſts and bounds of the Levant ſea, to deliver and "and enfranchiſe Greece) demandeth nothing of the Achæans prejudiciall to their fealty and allegeance to the Romans their firſt allies and aſſociats: for he required not them to take arms with "him againſt them, but only not to intermeddle and take part: his ſeeking is, that (as behoveth "good friends and mediators between both parties) they would all well and peace among them, "and not interpoſe themſelves in a quarrel of war. Archidamus likewiſe the Embaſſador for the "Ætolians, requeſted in maner the ſame, that they would hold themſelves quiet and in repoſe (a "thing moſt eaſie and ſafe for them) and being but lookers on the war, wait and attend the iſſue "of others mens fortunes, without the hazard of their own; yet heſtaied not ſo, but proceeded ſo "far and overſhot himſelf ſo much in words, that he brake forth at length in ill language, one "while railing againſt the Romans in general, another while againſt Quintius in particular; cal-"ing them ungratefull and unthankfull perſons, reproaching, upbraiding, and hitting them in the "teeth, how not only they had got the victory of Philip, but alſo ſaved themſelves by the vertue "and valour of the Ætolians: and as for Quintius, he was to thank them and their means, as much "as his own life came to & the preſervation of his army. For wherin at any time (qd. he) perform-"ed he the duty and devoir of General in the field? Seen him indeed I have in the time of battell "and in the camp, take the flight of birds, kill ſacrifices, and make vows very devoutly, like ſome "holy pariſh-prieſt or divining Prophet, whiles I my ſelf was fain in his defence to expoſe and "preſent my body to lances and darts of the enemies. To theſe challenges Quintius made anſwer "in this wiſe, ſaying that Archidamus had more regard in whoſe preſence he ſpake, then to whom "he directed all his ſpeech: for the Achæans know very well, that all the valour of the Ætolians, "ſtandeth in bragging words and not in martiall deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diets and "aſſemblies rather then ſeen in the field and battell; and therefore no marvell if he made ſo ſmal "reckning to ſpeak unto the Achæans, conſidering that he knew, how well acquainted they were "with the maners and faſhions of the Ætolians. But he hath beſides vaunted and made great brags "before the King Embaſſadors, and in their perſon, before the King himſelf in abſence. And if a "man had not known before, what it was, and had ſo knit and united Antiochus and the Ætolians "together, he might perceive it evidently by the ſpeeches of the Embaſſadors: for by exchanging "lies reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and "puffed up one another with vain hopes, whiles they tell and would make them beleeve, That "Philip by them was vanquiſhed, That the Romans by their valour were protected; and other gay matters, which erewhile ye heard: building caſtles in the air, to the end, that you & other ſtates "and nations would ſide with them and take their parts: the King again (by his Embaſſadours) overſpreadeth all with clouds of horſmen and footmen, and covereth whole ſeas with fleets

A "and armados. Now in faith this is mine hoſt of Chalcis up and down, a friendly man I aſſure
"you, and a good fellow in his houſe, and one that knoweth how to entertain his gueſts and bid
"them welcome. And verily I can liken this maner of dealing to nothing better then to a ſupper
"of his: We went upon a time to make merry with him, and I remember well it was not mid-
"ſummer (when the daies are longeſt and the ſun at the hotteſt) where he made us paſſing good "cheer. And as we wondred how at ſuch a ſeaſon of the year he met with that plenty of veniſon
"and ſuch variety withall; the man (nothing ſo vainglorious as theſe fellows here) ſmiled plea-
"ſantly upon us and ſaid, we were welcome to a feaſt of a tame ſwine and no better: but well

"ther while to Chalcis: you ſhould ſee in the Kings camp hardly two prety legionets, & thoſe but
"lame ones neither and not well accompliſhed: you ſhould ſee the King ſometime as good as beg-

"Aulis and Euripus, returning fair into Ætolia. Antiochus (you ſee) hath yeelded but ſmall belief "to the Ætolians, and the Ætolians have as litle truſted & relyed upon the vanity of the King. And "therefore the leſſe ſhould you be deceived by them, but rather repoſe your ſelves aſſuredly in,
"the fidelity of the Romans ſo often tried, ſo often known and approved. For whereas they ſay
"It is your beſt courſe not to be embarked and intereſſed in this war, I aſſure you, there is nothing "more vain then this, nay, nothing ſo hurtfull unto your eſtate. For you ſhall be a prize and prey to the victor, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quintius was thought by the Achæans to have ſpoken not impertinently, but to have anſwered them both, fully:
D and an eaſie matter it was to approve his ſpeech unto thoſe, that were well enough enclined to have given him gentle hearing: for that it was no queſtion nor doubt at all, but that every man would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Achæan nation, whom the Romans held for theirs: yea, and would conclude in the end of an act, to denounce war both againſt Antiochus & the Ætolians. Moreover, according as Quintius thought good, they ſent preſently an aid of 500 ſouldiers to Chalcis, and of as many to Pyræum. For at Athens there had like to have been a ſedition and mutiny, whiles ſome drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and ſold for mony) to take part with Antiochus upon hope of large rewards and great bounties, untill ſuch time as Quintius was ſent for by them that took part with the Romans: in ſo much as Apollodorus (who gave counſell and perſwaded to revolt) was accuſed by one Leon, and being condemned, was E baniſhed. Thus verily the embaſſage returned from the Achæans to the King with preſent anſwer.
The Bœotians delivered no certainty: this only was their anſwer, That when Antiochus himſelf was come in Bœotia, then they would conſider and conſult what they were beſt to do.

Antiochus being advertiſed, that both the Achæans and King Eumenes alſo had ſent men for the defence of Chalcis, thought good to make haſt, that his forces might not only prevent them, but alſo if it were poſſible receive them and cut them ſhort as they came. And for this intent, he ſent Menippus with three thouſand ſouldiers or thereabout, and Polyxenidas with his whole fleet.
Himſelf a few daies after marched with ſix thouſand of his own ſouldiers; and of that levy, which on a ſuddain might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Ætolians. Thoſe five hundred Achæans aforeſaid, and the ſmall aid that King Eumenes ſent under the conduct of Xenoclides the F Chalcidian, having ſafely paſſed Euripus before that the waies and paſſages were beſet, arrived at Chalcis. The Romans alſo who were upon five hundred, at what time as Menippus encamped before Salganea, came to Hermeum, where is the paſſage out of Bœotia into the Iland of Eubœa.
In their company was Miction ſent as Embaſſador from Chalcis to Quintius, for to crave ſome ſuccour: who perceiving that the waies were laid and the ſtreights kept by the enemies, leaving his intended journey by the way of Aulis, turned to Delium, minding from thence to cut over into Eubœa. This Delium is a temple of Apollo ſituat upon the ſea ſtrand, and five miles diſtant from Tanagra, from whence there is a ſhort cut (little more then a league) over an arm of the ſea unto the next parts of Eubœa. In this Temple and ſacred grove about it, ſo religious, ſo privileged and ſecured (as are thoſe franchiſed houſes and ſanctuaries which the Greeks call Aſyla) and G at that time, when neither war was proclaimed, or at leaſtwiſe not ſo far proceeded, as that in the hearing and knowledge of any man there had been ſword drawn, or blood ſhed in any place:
In this place, and at this time, I ſay, whiles the ſouldiers wandred at their leiſure and plea-ſure, ſome gone to ſee the temple aboveſaid and the grove, others walking upon the ſtrand unarmed, and a great ſort alſo of them ſcattered over the fields (ſuch as were gone for forrage, and fewell) all on a ſuddain Menippus finding them looſe and disbanded, charged upon them and ſlew them, and to the number of fifty he took alive: very few eſcaped, among whom was Micio who got into a smal vessel of merchandise. This occurent, as it troubled and disquieted Quintius and the Romans, for the losse of their souldiers, so it seemed much to encrease the right of their just quarell to make war upon Antiochus, Antiochus having advanced his army, and approached Aulis, after he had once again addressed Orators, partly of his own subjects, and partly Ætolians to Chalcis, for to follow those causes which of late he had commenced, but in more minatory terms, now prevailed easily, notwithstanding Micio and Xenoclides laboured to the contrary, that the gates should be set open unto him. All those that were for the Romans abandoned the City a little before the Kings coming. The souldiers of Achæa and King Eumenes, kept Salganea The Rom. souldiers also (who were but few) fortified and made a sconce upon the water of Euripus, to be a defence for the passage. Menippus began to assail Salganea, and the King himself to set upon the fort of Euripus aforesaid. The Achæans and souldiers of Eumenes first grew to composition, and having capitulated to depart without any harm, quit their place of garrison. The Romans held out longer, and stoutly defended the hold of Euripus: but even they also being so streightly invested both by land & water, and seeing now the ordnance and engins of battery, brought and ready to be planted against them, would no longer endure the siege. When as now the King had possessed himself of the City of Eubœa, all the other Cities of that Island, refused not to submit and come under his subjection. And he thought he had made a good beginning and entrance in this war, in that so great an Island, and so many Cities commodiously seated, and of such importance, were reduced under his obeisance.

The six and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

SO soon as P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneus, and M. Acilius Glabrio, the two Consuls were entred into their magistracy the LL. of the Senat enjoined them (before any speech & question moved as touching the provinces) to sacrifice greater beasts in all those temples, wherein the custom was for the more part of the year to celebrat the solemnity of Lectisterns, and to make their praiers in this maner, That whereas the Senat intended a new war, the gods would vouchsafe to blesse and happily conduct the same to the good and publick weal of the Senat and people of Rome. All those sacrifices proved good and as they ought to be: even the very first beasts that were slain, prognosticated fortunat successe, and shewed apparent signs that the gods were pacified and well pleased. And thus the soothsaiers and bowel-priers, out of their learning, answered, It was evident, that by this war the bounds and limits of the Roman empire should be extended, and that both victory and triumph was foresignified. These answers being reported, and mens minds setled, and their consciences resolved of all scruples as concerning the gods, then the LL. of the Senat granted out an order, that a bill should be preferred solemnly unto the people in this form; Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war should be enterprized against Antiochus, and all that take his part? And if this bill passe and be granted, are ye pleased, that the Consuls, if they think so good, refer the whole matter unto the Senat to take order for the managing thereof accordingly? P. Cornelius propounded this bill, and the people accepted therof. Whereupon the Senat set down a decree that the Consuls should cast lots for the government of Italy and Greece: and that he whose hap it was to govern Greece, should (over and above that number of souldiers, which L. Quintius by authority and commission from the Senat had for that province either enrolled or levied) receive that army also which M. Bœbius the Pretor caused to passe over the year before into Macedony, by vertue of an order from the Senat, in that behalf enacted. And license he had, if need so required, to take up aid-souldiers from among the allies without Italy, so as he exceeded not the number af five thousand. Also agreed it was, that L. Quintius the Consul of the year before, should be deputed lord-General for that war. As for the other Consul, unto whom had been allotted the charge of Italy, he was commanded to levy war against the

A Boians and to their choice, whether army he had rather have of those two which the former Consuls conducted: and when he had received one, to send the other to Rome, that those legions of Citizens should be in readiness for to be sent whither it pleased the Senat. This order being taken in the Senat, as touching the appointment and assignation of those provinces, then it was thought good that the new Consuls shall cast lots for their governments. To Acilius befel Greece, and Italy to Cornelius. After this by a speciall lot there passed an act of the Senat, That whereas the people of Rome had ordeined to wage war at that time against King Antiochus, and those that were under his dominion, the Consuls should cause a procession to be solemnized. Also that the Consul M. Acilius should conceive and make a vow to Jupiter, for to celebrat the great Games in his honour, and to bring offerings to every altar. This vow was by him pronounced in this form B of words, according as P. Licinius the Arch-Priest endited and prompted unto him. If that war which the people hath determined to be enterprised and made against King Antiochus, shall be performed according to the mind and contentment of the Senat and people of Rome, then shall the people of Rome celebrate unto thy honour, O Jupiter, the great Games for the space of ten daies together, and oblations shall be brought to every Altar, of that price and amounting to that sum which the Senat shall ordain and set down. And what Magistrats soever shall exhibit those Games, or in what place, yea, and at what time soever they shall be represented, the same Games shall be held for good, and reputed as well done, yea, and the offrings accepted as rightly presented. After this, there was published and proclaimed by both Coss. a supplication for the space of 2 daies. When the Coss. had cast lots for the parting of their governments, the Pretors likewise went presently about the same for their provinces. To M. Junius Brutus fell both the jurisdictions, as well of C Citizens as aliens. A. Cornel. Mammula had the charge of the Brutii, M. Æmylius Lepidus of Sicily, and L. Oppius Salinator of Sardinia. C. Levius Salinator was L. Admiral of the navy, and L. Æmylius Paulus governor of the nether Spain. And in this manner following, were the armies and forces distributed and appointed. Unto A. Cornelius were assigned the new souldiers which the former year L. Quintius the Consul, by vertue of an Act of the Senat, had enrolled. And his commission was to defend and keep in order all that tract and coast about Tarentum and Brundusium. As for L. Æmylius Paulus, who was to take a voiage into the farther Spain, he was allowed (besides the army which he was to receive of M. Fulvius the Pro-Pretor) to have the conduct of three thousand new souldiers footmen, and three hundred horse: so that of them, two third parts D should consist of allies of the Latin nation, and one third of Roman Citizens. The supply was sent unto C. Flaminius into the higher Spain, whose commission was renewed for to have the command there still. M. Æmylius Lepidus had commandment to receive the government of the province, and withall, the conduct of the army, at the hands of L. Valerius, whom he was to succeed; and if he thought so good, to keep with him in the Province L. Valerius, in quality and and place of a Vice-Pretor: and so to divide the province, that the one part should reach from Agrigentum to Pachinus: the other half from Pachinus to Tyndarium: also, that L. Valerius should defend the sea-coasts and the river with a fleet of twenty Gallies. The same Pretor aforesaid was to levy and gather a double tenth of corn, and to take order for the convoy thereof to the sea, and so to be embarked and transported into Greece. The like commission had L. Opimius, to exact E and take another tenth in Sardinia: but that grain was to be brought to Rome, and not to be carried over into Greece. C. Livius the Pretor and Admiral of the navy, was appointed with 300 sail ready rigged and trimmed, to sail into Greece with all speed, and to receive the ships that Acilius had: likewise to repair, rigge and furnish the old vessels that rid in the habors, or lay at one side up in docks. M. Junius the Pretor his charge was, to levy marriners and rowers from among the libertins, for to serve that Armado. And there were sent Embassadors into Africk to Carthage, and into Numidia, three into either part, for to seek and purvey corn to be sent into Greece, for which the people of Rome would make present payment. And so wholly imployed was the City to prepare and take order for this war, that P. Cornelius the Consul published an Edict, that no Senators, or any that had authority to give their opinion in the Senat, neither any inferior Magi-F strats, should take any journey out of the City, farther then they might have return again the same day: Item, that there should not be five Senators absent at once from Rome.

C. Livius the Pretor, whiles he used all diligence and care to prepare and provide his fleet, was empeached and hindred a time, by occasion of a debate and contention that arose between him and the Coloners of the sea-side. For when they should be gathered and sent to sea, they appealed to the Tribunes of the Com. from whom they were put over and referred to the Senat: and the Senat with one voice and accord pronounced and determined, that these Coloners were not exempted from sea-service. The Colonies that contended with the Pretor about their immunity were these, Hostia, Fregena, Castrum novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Minturnæ and Sinuessa.

G This done, the Consul Acilius by order from the Senat, consulted with the colledg of the Feciales or Heralds at arms, and demanded their advice, Whether the war should be proclaimed and defiance given to Antiochus himself in person; or it were sufficient, to intimat and denounce the same to some one of his garrisons? Also whether they would advise to proclaim war against the Ætolians apart by themselves: or whether it were not meet and convenient first to disclaim and renounce their society and friendship, and then to proclaim and denounce hostility? The Fecials answered, that heretofore they had determined and cleered this point, at what time as their opinon was touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter, H whether the defiance were given him to his face, or only intimated to some garrisons of his.

And as for the Ætolians, this was their mind, that they had quit already their amity, and abandoned all society, in that when our Embassadors so oftentimes had redemanded amends for wrongs done, they never thought good to make restitution or satisfaction. Moreover, the Ætolians had themselves sent defiance first and proclaimed war against the Romans, when as by force they seized Demetrias a City of our allies, and advanced before Chalcis, to assail it both by land and sea; and lastly, in that they had sollicited King Antiochus and brought him into Europe, for to levy war against the Romans. All things now being sufficiently provided, M. Acilius the Consul published an edict and proclaimed, That all those souldiers whom L. Quintius had enrolled, likewise all those whom he had levied of the allies of the Latine nation, who were to go with him into his I province, likewise all the Colonels and Marshals of the second and third legion, should render themselves, and be ready altogether at Brundusium upon the * Ides of May following. Himself upon the * fifth day before the Nones of the same month departed forth of the City clad in his rich coat of arms. And at the same time the Pretors also took their journies into their severall provinces.

* 15 May.
* 3 May.

Much about that time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from two Kings, to wit, Philip of Macedony, and Ptolomæe King of Ægypt; promising their aid of men, money, and corn for that war. And besides from Ptolomæus there was brought * 1000 pound weight in gold, and the weight of * 2000 pound of silver: howbeit nothing was received, but much thanks rendred to both the Kings. And whereas both of them offred to come with all their power into Ætolia, and to be there in person, Ptolomæe was discharged of that offer of his, but the Embassadors of K
Philip received this answer, That he should highly please and content the people of Rome, in case he would not fail the Consul M. Acilius. In like manner there came Embassadors from the Carthaginians and Masanissa. The Carthagiuians made promise of * a thousand Modii of Wheat, and of Barley five hundred thousand for the army, and likewise to bring half so much to Rome; praying the Romans to accept the same at their hands as a free gift and gratuity: adding moreover, that they would man out a fleet at their own charges, and were ready also to make one entire payment of their tribute behind, which they were of duty to pay by sundry terms of many years. The Embassadors of Masanissa, promised in the behalf of their King, to send five hundred thousand Modii of wheat, 300000 of barley into Greece to the army, besides 500 men of arms and twenty Elephants, unto M. Acilius the Cos. As touching the corn, this answer was returned L unto them, that they were content to accept thereof, so that they would take money therefore to the worth. As to the fleet aforesaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them clean, save as many ships as they were to find and provide according to the tenor of the accord and composition between them. Last of all, concerning the tribut mony, none would they receive before the day.

* I suppose that here wanteth the multiplicant number, viz. 100 For it is not answerable to the proportion of the rest that followeth, nor to the magnificence of so great estate, to send some thirty quarters of wheat, who heretofore allowed a hundred times as much, and yet the same proportion of barley which now at this present is set down.

Whiles the affairs passed thus at Rome, Antiochus being at Chalcis, because he would not sit still and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himself sollicited (by sending Embassadors) the minds of the States, and partly also there came unto him Embassadors from thence of their own accord: and namely, among others, the Epirots presented themselves by the common consent of their whole nation, and the Eleans also came out of Peloponnesus. They of Elis craved aid against the M Achæans, who (they verily thought) would take arms against their City, because war was denounced against Antiochus nothing to their will and good liking. Unto them were sent 1000 footmen under the leading of Euphanes the Cretensian. The embassage of the Epirots, plaid with both hands, meaning to deal roundly and simply with no side, but to go between the bark and the tree. Gladly they would make court to the King and curry favour with him, but so, as they stood "in good terms still with the Romans, whom they were loth to offend. For their request to him "was, that he would not draw them without great and important cause into the quarrell, consi- "dering that they for the defence of all Greece lay open and exposed to Italy, and were sure before "others to feel the Romans fingers, and receive their first assaults. But in case he were able of "himself with his forces by land and sea to defend Epirus, and furnish it with garrisons sufficient, N
"they would with heart and good will accept of him and his into their Cities & port-towns: but "if so be he could not effect that, they besought him not to offer them, naked and unarmed men, "to the violence of the Roman wars. Their drift was in that embassie (as it appeared) that if the King and his forces came not into Epirus (as they rather thought nay then yea) they might reserve themselves and all they had, safe, entire, and at their own liberty for the Roman armies, and win withall the Kings good grace in that they seemed to make an offer to deceive him: or if any came indeed, yet they might conceive good hope to find favours, and have pardon at the Romans hands, in that they had not expected their succours being so far off, but rather yeelded to the forces of Antiochus being present there in person. In such sort they carried themselves in their embassage so perplexed and intricat, that the King knew not well how to answer them readily: but said, that O he would send his own Embassadors unto them for to parle and treat of all affairs perteining in common as well to them as to him. Then went he himself into Bœotia, which countrey in colour and shew pretended these causes of anger and spight against the Romans, that before I have mentioned, to wit, the murder of Barcillas, and the armies by Quintius levied against Coronea, occasioned by a massacre commited upon Roman souldiers: but in very truth this was the reason, The singular discipline and order of that nation in old time, was going downward and endlong

A which cannot possibly continue long without some change and alteration of State. Well, to Thebes he came, where all the principal and chief Stats of Bœotia came flocking from all parts to meet him: Where in the General Diet and Councell of that Nation (notwithstanding he had sounded the battell, and began the fray already by giving the first blow, in that he had forced the Roman garrison neer Delium and Chalcis, which were no small signs nor doubtfull overtures of war, yet he began with the same kind of speech he first used in the parle and conference at Chalcis, and which his Embassadors had followed in the general assembly of the Achæans, namely, demanding that they would enter into amity with him, without professing themselves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hostility against them. But there was no man there but soon found him and saw him well enough: howbeit there passed an act and decree in favour of the King against the B Romans, under a vain and slight pretext and colourable shew of words. Having gained this nation also, he returned to Chalcis, from thence he sent out his letters before unto the States of the Ætolians, that they should meet him in Demetrias, where he would confer and consult with them of all their affairs to be managed; and thither came he by sea at the day appointed. Aminander also was sent for out of Athamania to this consultation, yea, and Annibal the Carthaginian (whose counsel was not required a long time) was present at this frequent Diet and Assembly. Much parle and great opening there was as touching the nation of the Thessalians; and all there in place were of opinion, that they should be sounded how they stood affected: but about the maner and some circumstance thereof, they were of divers minds, while some advised it to be done and executed out of hand: others thought good to put it off from winter season (considering now they were in C the mids thereof) unto the prime and beginning of spring: others again said, that Embassadors only should be sent: and some hot-spurs there were, that gave counsell to go against them with all their forces, yea, and to fright and terrifie them if they made slow halt. Now when all the knot and difficulty of this deliberation consisteth in one point, Annibal was requested by name to deliver his mind and speak to the cause in question: who turned the King and all that were present from other wandring cogitations, and induced them to the entire consideration of the total war; and to this effect framed his speech in this wise. "If since the time that we passed over "into Greece, my hap had been to be called to any councell, when as some question was touching "Eubœa, the Achæans and the Bœotians, I had delivered that advice then, which now I purpose to utter this day in the question concerning the Thessalians. Above all things my counsell is, "that Philip and the Macedonians may by all means possible be wrought to this our association
D "in the war. For as touching Eubœa, the Bœotians and the Thessalians, who doubteth, but that "they (as nations that stand upon their own bottoms and are of no force by themselves) will al- "waies flatter them that are present in place, and be ready to crave pardon upon the same fear "that they ever shew when they are to take counsell and resolve? who doubteth (I say) but so "soon as they shal see the Roman army in Greece, they will to turn to their accustomed obedience, "and that it will be imputed to them no fault at all, that when the Romans were so far off, they "were not willing to try the force of you (a puissant Prince in person among them) or of your ar- "mies? How much rather ought we then, nay, how much better and more important would it "be, to joyn Philip unto us then these? For if he once enter into the cause and be seen in action, he "can not possibly start from us nor draw his head out of the collar: and moreover, he bringeth
E "that power with him, which is not to be held for a simple succour & addition to mend our forces, "but such as lately of it self without the help of others, was able to make head against the Roman "puissance. Let me have this prince on my side, and (be it spoken without offence of any man here) "what need I doubt of the sequel & issue? especially when those, by whose means & assistance the "Romans prevailed against Philip, I see now ready to enter the field against them? The Ætolians "(I say) who as all the world knoweth vanquished Philip, shall now together with Philip, enter "into arms and fight against them. Over and besides, Aminander and the whole nation of the A- "thamans (whose service in the war, next to the Ætolians, stood the Romans in best stead) shall "be on our side, Philip at that time (O King Antiochus) susteined the fight and burden of the whole "war, when you sat still and stirred not: now both of you together, two most mighty monarchs, F "with the puissance of all Asia and Europe, shall wage war against one City and people, which (to "speak nothing of mine own fortune good or bad) certainly in our fathers daies was not able to "make their part good with one only King of the Epirots; how hardy soever they will be when "they shal be matched with you both together. But what moved me to think, yea, and assured me, "that Philip may be won unto us to joyn in this action? One thing is this, a common good and be- "nefit even the greatest bond that is of society: and yet there is anothers besides it, namely, an "inducement proceeding from you that be here of Ætolia: for Thoas your Embassador (who "is present in place) among other matters that he was wont to alledg for to animat & move G "Antiochus to come into Greece, evermore assured him of this principally, and vowed that Philip "grumbled, bit the lip and freted, that under the colour and shew of peace, there were imposed upon him hard conditions of servitude and slavery. And he verily, I mean Thoas, set out the fell an- "ger of the King, and with all his words compared it to the wood rage of a wild beast bound with "chains, or being enclosed in some cage, would willingly break the gates and bars thereof. Now, if "he be disposed thus, and of that courage, let us burst his bonds asunder, let us (I say) force open "his iron cage, that his rage pent up so long may now break out upon the common enemies. And

* Lombardy. "the coast of the Ligurians and of the * Cisalpine Gauls was up in arms and on a light fire of war; I "and (which would have feared and frighted them most) that Annibal was in Italy. And (now "things standing as they do) my advice is, that you send for all your forces both by land and sea.
"Let your carriks and hulks with victuals and provision follow after your armado & ships of war.
"For in this place, like as we are too few to perform any martiall exploits, so we are too many,
"considering our smal store of victuals. And when you rallied and united all your force together,
"divide your navy in two parts: the one you shall keep in the rode of Corcyra, to impeach the Ro"mans, that they shall not passe in safety and security, the other you shall cause to sail unto that "coast of Italy which looketh toward Sardinia and Africk. Your self in proper person, with all "your land army shall march onward into the territory of the Bylliones: thence shall ye have good
"means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romans beleeve, that your are upon the point K
"to pass the seas, yea, and being ready indeed to crosse over if need should require. This gene"rally is my counsell; mine, I say, who as I will not take upon me a singular skill in all kinds of war,
"so me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby,
"as well to my cost as advantage, and as much with my good as harm, & look whatsoever design-
"ment I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithfull and forward in "the execution thereof: and the gods approve and blesse that course, which your self shall think "the best. To this effect, in a manner, was the oration of Annibal directed; which all that were in place and heard it, rather praised for the present, then put in practise and effected afterwards, For no one thing was done of all that he had said, save only Antiochus sent Polyxenidas for a navy and army out of Asia; yes, there were Embassadors also dispatched to the General Diets of the L Thessalians. And a day was appointed for the Ætolians and Aminander to meet the army at Phe-ræ, whither King Antiochus came streight after with his power. And whiles he staied there, expecting Aminander and the Ætolians, he sent out one Philip a Megapolitan, with two thousand men to gather out the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cynoscephalæ, where the war with Philip was determined, and the quarrel decided by a famous battell: were it that therein he followed his own head and took a conceit, thereby to wind himself into grace and favour with the Macedonian Nation, and to bring the King into obloquie and disgrace, because he left his souldiers unburied: or that, as it is the vein (or vanity rather) engraffed in Kings by kind, he set his mind and busied his spirits in matters, for apparence gay and goodly, but in effect fond & fooliſh. There he made a mount (as it were) of a number of bones gathered together into one place, that lay scat- M tering and strewed here and there: a thing no doubt) that the Macedonians conned him no thank for, and which Philip (you may be sure) took in foul scorn and malicious disdain. And therfore Philip, who at that time minded to take counsell of Fortune, and to be directed by her, as she enclined now, sent to Marcus Bœbius the Vice-Pretor, and advertised him, how Antiochus invaded Thessalie, and if it pleased him to stir out of his winter habour, he would meet him, that they might confer both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Phera, where Aminander and the Ætolians had joyned with him, there came Embassadors from Larissa, expostulating, Wherein the Thessalians had so offended either by deed or word, that he would molest and trouble them with war? and N withall beseeching him to retire & withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought against them) by his Embassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in armes, well appointed, under the governance of Hippolochus, to lie there in garison, who because they could not pass thither, by reason that all the avenues were seized and kept by the Kings forces, returned to Scotussa. As for the Embassadors of the Larissæans, the King made them a gracious answer, and said, That he was entred into Thessaly, not by way of hostility to distresse them, but in friendly manner to maintain and establish the freedome of the Thessalians. Likewise he sent an Embassador to Phera, to signifie so much to them and in the same terms. But the Pheræans giving him no answer again, dispatched unto the King an Embassador of their own, one Pausanias, a principal man of their City. Who after he had pleaded the semblable remonstrances to those, that had been O in the like case alledged and laid forth in the behalf and name of the Chalcidians, in that Coun-cell holden neer the streights of Euripus, and besides, uttered something else with more boldnesse and courage; the King dismissed him, after he had willed them to consider more of the matter, and be well advised, that they took not that counsell which anon they would repent, whiles they sought to be too wary, provident, and forcasting the future time. When this em-bassage was related at Phera, the Citizens took no long time to deliberat, but soon resolved in the maintenance of their faith and loialty to the Romans for to undergo whatsoever hazard

A the fortune of war ſhould preſent unto them. Whereupon both they addreſſed themſelves to defend the City with all their might, and alſo the King began to aſſault and batter the wals on all parts at once. And knowing well enough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the iſſue of the ſiege of that City which he firſt enterpriſed, lay the whole importance and conſequence of all, either to make him deſpiſed ever after, or feared and dread of the Theſſalians, therefore he terrified the beſieged inhabitants, on every ſide, and by all means poſſible that he could deviſe. The firſt aſſault they ſuſtained ſtoutly and manfully; but afterwards ſeeing many of the defendants were either overturned and ſlain, or grievouſly hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quail: yet reclaimed by the rebukes and chaſtiſements of their captains and leaders, and animated by their effectuall exhortations, to perſiſt ſtill in their purpoſe and reſolution, they quit the utmoſt compaſs
B of their wall (ſeeing a what default they were for want of men) and retired themſelves more inward into the City, into one part thereof, which was ſtrongly fortified with a mure and leſs circuit and compaſs then the other. At the length, overcome with travell and calamities, and fearing that if they were forced and taken by aſſault, they ſhould find no mercy nor pardon with the conqueror, they yeelded themſelves. The King following the train of victory, delaied no time, but whiles the fright was freſh, ſent four thouſand armed men preſently to Scotuſa, where the townſmen made no ſtay, but rendred the town and themſelves incontinently, having before their eies the freſh bleeding example of the Pheræans, who tamed by mere force and wofull miſeries, were compelled to do that at laſt which they obſtinatly refuſed at the firſt. Together with the City it ſelf was ſurrendred alſo Hippolochus and the Lariſsæan garriſon under his hand. All of C them the King ſent away without any hurt or violence offred unto their perſons: for he thought therby to win the hearts and love of the Lariſsæans. Having accompliſhed theſe exploits within ten daies after his firſt coming to Pheræ, he marched towards Crano with all his army, and at his firſt coming won it. Then he regained and ſeized Cyphera and Metropolis, and the borroughs & forts about them: ſo as now all thoſe quarters were ſubdued and put under his ſubjection, except Atrax and Gyrto. Then he determined to aſſail Lariſſa, ſuppoſing, that either upon the fearfull terrour of other Cities forced, or in regard of his demerit in diſmiſſing the garriſon ſo courteouſly, or by the preſent example of ſo many Cities yeelded unto him, they would not long perſiſt in D their obſtinacy. And for to terrifie them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in the forefront of the vanguard, and approached himſelf in a ſquare battell, with four ſides, in ſuch ſort as the hearts of many of the Lariſsæans waved in doubtfull ſuſpence, between forced fear of preſent enemies, and kind regard of abſent friends.

In this time Aminander, with the whole youth and manhood of the Athamans, became maſter of Pelinæum. Menippus alſo with three thouſand Ætolian footmen and two hundred horſe went to Perrhæbia, won Mallæa and Cyretiæ by aſſault, and waſted the territory of Tripolis. Having performed theſe exploits with great expedition, and celerity, they returned to Lariſſa unto the King, and arrived even then when as the King was in conſultation what to do with Lariſſa: for the councell was divided into diverſe opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly, and not to defer and aſſail the Cities wals with fabricks and engins of battery on all ſides at once: alledging that the town being ſituated in a plain towards the champain field ſide, might be ap-E proached unto with eaſe and inveſted every way. Others again inferred one while, that there was no compariſon between the ſtrength of this City and of Pheræ: otherwhile that it was now winter time, and a ſeaſon of the year far unfit for warlike executions, and moſt of all other for the ſiege and aſſault of Cities. As the King thus hung in the equall ballance of hope and deſpair, the Embaſſadors of Pharſalus arrived, who, as good hap was, being come to ſurrender up their town, revived his ſpirits and mightily comforted his heart.

M. Bœbius in this mean while having parlied and conferred with Philip in the Daſſaretians countrey, ſent Appius Claudius by the common advice of them both, to the ſuccour and defence of Lariſſa; who paſſed through Macedony, and by long journies came to the top of thoſe hills that command Gonni. Now this Gonni is a town twenty miles diſtant from Lariſſa, ſeated juſt
F in the very ſtreights of that forreſt and paſſe called Tempe; who having taken up a larger circuit of ground to encamp in, then was proportionable to his number, and made more fires in ſhew then need was for that company, gave ſemblance unto the enemie (which was the thing he aimed at) that all the Roman forces were there, together with King Philip. King Antiochus therefore pretending unto his army, that the unſeaſonable winter that approached, after he had ſtayed one only day before Lariſſa, diſlodged, and thence departed, and ſo returned to Demetrias. The Ætolians likewiſe and Athamanians repaired to their own countries.

Appius, albeit he ſaw that the ſiege was levied (which was the only cauſe of his coming) yet down he went to Lariſſa to encourage and confirm the hearts of the allies againſt the time to come. And a two-fold joy there was, both becauſe the enemies were gone and had quit their coun-G try, and alſo for that they ſaw the Roman garriſon within their wals. King Antiochus departed from Demetrias to Chalcis, where he fell in fancy and love with a damſell of that City, daughter of Cleoptolemus a Chalcidian. Now after he made means to the maidens father firſt by interceſſion of meſſengers and mediators, and after by importuning him in his own perſon with earneſt requeſts by word of mouth (who was very loth and unwilling to entangle & tie himſelf, in matching her ſo high above his own calling) at length ſo overcame the man, that he obteined his deſire: and as if it had been a time of ſetled and confirmed peace, he proceeded to conſummate and celebrat brat the marriage. And forgetting clean, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two affairs ſo important, to wit, the war with the Romans, and the deliverance of Greece, he paſſed away the reſt of the winter in feaſts and bankets, and in thoſe delights and pleaſures, which ordinarily (you wot well) follow upon the liberall drinking of wine; yea, and when he had thereby rather wearied his body then fulfilled his appetite, he gave himſelf to ſleep without compaſſe. The like riot and looſe life took hold of the reſt of the Kings captains, by example in all places, but in Bœotia eſpecially, ſuch as commanded the garriſons. Nay, the very ſouldiers were let looſe and given over to take voluptuous waies, and not one of them would put on armor, keep the watch, attend the guard, or do any thing pertaining to the duty and charge of a ſouldier. And therefore at the beginning of the ſpring, when he was come by Phocis and Cheronea to the Rendez-vous, where he had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, he ſoon perceived that the ſouldiers had ſpent the winter as licentiouſly as their leaders, and kept no better order and ſtreighter diſcipline. Then he commanded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the army to Stratus, a town in Ætolia. Himſelf having done ſacrifice at Delphi to the honour of Apollo went forward to Naupactum. And after the Diet holden of all the States of Ætolia, in the way which leadeth to Stratus, along by Chalcis and Lyſimachia, he encountred his own forces aforeſaid, that came by the gulf of Malea. Where Mneſilochus, a Principal Acarnanian, but wrought and bought with many gifts and preſents, not only himſelf won that nation to take part, & to ſide with the King, but alſo had drawn to his own mind and affection Clitus their Pretor, who at that time had the ſoveraign rule there, and might do all in all. He ſeeing that the Leucadians (who are the chief of all the Acarnanians) could not be eaſily induced nor brought to revolt, for the awe wherein they ſtood of the Roman fleet, which either was with Attilius, or about Cephalenia, went cunningly to work with them. For having delivered his opinion in their generall Councell, that the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended; and that as many as were able to bear arms ſhould go forth to Medio and Tyrrheum, for fear thoſe places ſhould be ſeized by Antiochus and the Ætolians: there were again ſome who made anſwer and ſaid, how there was no ſuch need that all ſhould be raiſed and levied ſo tumultuouſly in haſt; for a garriſon of five hundred men was ſufficient. And when he had obteined that number of young & able men, he placed three hundred of them in garriſon at Medio, and two hundred at Tyrrheum: his reach and drift was to have them put into the Kings hands for hoſtages. And even at that time arrived the Kings Embaſſadors at Medio, whoſe embaſſage being heard, they laid their heads together and conſulted in the publick aſſembly what anſwer to return unto the King. Some were of opinion to continue ſtill in the Roman ſociety: others were of advice again, that the Kings offer of amity was not to be rejected. The counſell of Clytus was mean and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted, to wit, that they ſhould addreſſe the Embaſſadors to the King, to intreat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of ſuch conſequence in a full Diet of the Acarnanians. In this Embaſſage Mneſilochus, and thoſe of his faction were employed of ſet purpoſe: who having diſpatched meſſengers covertly to King, to advertiſe him to approach the town with his forces, triſled out the time themſelves, and made no haſt to ſet forward in their embaſſie. Whereupon theſe Embaſſadors were ſcarcely gone forth of the City, when Antiochus was entred the borders, and anon ſhewed himſelf hard at the gates. And whiles they that wiſt nothing of this treaſon were affrighted, and in great trouble and turmoil, called the youth haſtily to arm, he was by Clytus and Mneſilochus let into the City. Some willingly of themſelves came running about the King: thoſe alſo that were of the adverſe part, for very fear joyned with him. Whom he ſeeing to be afraid and terrified, he entertained with gracious words, and ſo gently handled them, that in hope of his clemency ſo much divulged and ſpoken of abroad, certain States of Acarnania revolted and turned unto him. Then from Medio he went to Tyrrheum, unto which place he had ſent Mneſilochus and his Embaſſadors aforehand. But the treachery and deceit at Medio being diſcovered, made the Tyrrheans more wary and carefull then otherwiſe fearfull, who made him this plain direct anſwer without any double ambiguity, that they would admit of no new alliance, without the advice and authority of the Roman Generals: ſo they ſhut their gates, and diſpoſed armed men upon their wals. Now it fell out very fitly and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarnanians, that Cn. Octavius ſent by Quintius, having received a garriſon and ſome few ſhips of A. Poſthumius, who by Attilius the Lieutenant had been appointed Governour of Cephalenia, was come to Leucas, and and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope, who alſo gave them to underſtand, that M. Acilius the Conſul had already paſſed the ſeas with his legions, and the Romans were encamped in Theſſaly. And for as much as this bruit carried a great likelihood of truth, by reaſon that the ſeaſon of the year ſerved now for navigation, the King after he had planted a garriſon at Medio and in other towns of Acarnania, departed from Tyrrheum, and paſſing through the Cities of Ætolia and Phocis, returned to Chalcis.

Much about the time M. Bœvius and King Philip, who had communed and deviſed together before (during the winter) in the Daſſaretians country, having ſent Appius Claudius into Theſſaly, for to raiſe the ſiege before Lariſſa: and becauſe the ſeaſon then was unmeet and too ſoon for execution of any exploit, were retired to their wintring harbours, now in the beginning of the Spring joyned all their forces together and came down into Theſſaly. (Now at that time was Antiochus in Acarnania.) And at their firſt coming, Philip began to lay ſiege unto

A Mallæa, and Bœbius to Phacium: which when he had forced in manner at the firſt aſſault, he won Pheſtius alſo with like expedition. From whence having retired himſelf to Atrax, he took Chyretias, and ſo conſequently ſurpriſed Eritium, and after he had planted garriſons in theſe towns that he had thus recovered, he joyned with Philip again lying in nege before Mallæa. Upon the very coming of the Roman army, when the townſmen had yielded themſelves either for fear of forces, or for hope of pardon, they marched joyntly together with one army to recover thoſe towns whereof the Athamans were ſeized: to wit, Ægitium, Ericinium, Gomphi, Silane, Tricca, Melibœa, and Pholoria: After this, they inveſted Pelinæum, where Philip the Megapolitan lay in garriſon with five hundred foot and forty horſe: but before they gave the aſſault, they ſent a trumpet to Philip to give him warning, that he ſhould not adventure to try the utmoſt hazard. But he re-
B turned this anſwer again right ſtoutly unto them, that he would be content to commit himſelf to the Romans or the Theſſalians, he paſſed not whether, but put his life and eſtate into the hands of King Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and for that it ſeemed that Limnæa alſo at the ſame time might be aſſaulted, it was thought expedient that the King ſhould go to Limnæa, and Bœbius ſtaid ſtill to batter and force the town of Pellineum.

It fortuned at the ſame time that M. Acilius the Cof. having paſſed the ſeas with a power of 10000 foot, and 2000 horſe and fifteen Elephants, commanded certain choſen Colonels of foot-
C men to conduct all the Infantry to Lariſſa, whiles himſelf with the Cavalry came to King Philip before Limnæa. At the coming of the Conſul the town was yielded incontinently: the Kings garriſon was delivered, and the Athamanians withall. Then the Conſul went from Limnæa to Pellinæum, where the Athamans yielded firſt: and afterwards Philip alſo the Megapolitan rendred himſelf. And as he came down from the fort, Philip the King chanced to meet with him, and in ſcorn and deriſion commanded his men to ſalute him with the ſtile of King, and himſelf alſo by way of mockage came cloſe unto him, and greeting him by the name of brother Philip, ſcoffing and jeſting in broad terms, far unfitting, I wot, his royall Majeſty. Then was he brought before the Cof. and put in ward, and not long after ſent bound to Rome. All the multitude beſides of the Athamanians, as alſo of King Antiochus his ſouldiers, which were within the garriſons of thoſe towns
D that were ſurrendred about that time were delivered unto Philip, who amounted to the number of 3000. The Conſul departed to Lariſſa to conſult and take advice for the generall courſe of the whole war. And in his way there met him Embaſſadors from Pieria and Metropolis, for to render their Cities. Philip having courteouſly and lovingly intreated above all other the priſoners of the Athamanians, that by their means he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceived ſome hope to conquer Athamania, led his army thither, and ſent his captives aforehand into their ſeverall Cities. Now they were of great account and reputation among their countrimen, and withall made report of the King his clemency toward them, and how liberally and bountifully beſides he uſed them: And Aminander verily, whoſe preſence and majeſty had kept ſome of them in allegeance, fearing leſt he ſhould be delivered into the hands of Philip (who long time had been his mortall enemy;) and unto the Romans, whom he knew to have juſt cauſe at that time
E to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his own Realm with his wife and children, and retired himſelf to Ambracia. Thus all Athamania became ſubject to King Philip, and at his pleaſure.

The Conſul ſojourned certain daies at Lariſſa, eſpecially for to refreſh his beaſts, which firſt had been ſea-ſick, and afterwards were tired with long travel; and thus when he had renewed, as it were, and repaired his army with a little reſt and repoſe, he marched to Crato. At his coming thither, theſe towns, to wit, Pharſalus, Scotuſſa, and Phera, together with King Antiochus his garriſons that lay there, were yielded up unto him. And having put unto their choice, either to be F gone or tarry ſtill with him: as many of them as he ſaw willing (and thoſe were about a thouſand) he delivered unto King Philip; the reſt he ſent back diſarmed to Demetrias. Then he regained Proerna and the fortreſſes and piles there about it. Then began he to conduct forward his army toward the gulph of Malea: and when he approached the ſtraights upon which the town Thaumaci is ſituate, all the flower of the youth in their armour quit the City, and put themſelves in ambuſh about the woods and paſſages, and from the higher ground charged upon the Romans in their march. The Conſul at the firſt ſent certain unto them, to parl near at hand with them, and to ſee if they could ſcare them from ſuch deſperate outrage: but perceiving that they perſiſted ſtill as they began, he commanded a Colonel with two enſigns of ſouldiers to fetch a compaſs about, in ſuch ſort, that he got between thoſe armed men and the town, and kept them from entrance; whereby he poſſeſſed himſelf of the City, being void of defendants. They they that lay in the for-
G reſt in ambuſh, hearing an outcry behind their backs of the town taken, fled backward out of all parts of the wood, and fell upon the ſword. The Conſul then departed from Thaumaci, and the ſecond day came as far as the river Sperchius, and ſo forward unto the territory of the Hypataans, which he ſpoiled.

During the time of theſe occurrents, Antiochus lay at Chalcis, who by this time ſeeing that he had gotten in Greece, but the pleaſure of one wintring, ſpent ſo deliciouſly in Chalcis, and a diſhonourable marriage; began to blame the Ætolians for their vain promiſes, and eſpecially Thoas; but Annibal he had in great admiration, reputing him not only for a ſage and prudent man, but alſo for a true Propher, who foretold him of all things that then were come to paſs: howbeit for ſear that his cold ſlackneſs might not overthrow that quite, which his raſh ſolly had begun and enterpriſed, he ſent out his courriers into Ætolia, to give them warning to levy all their youth and aſſemble them together; and himſelf for his own part had brought thither almoſt 10000 footmen, who were made up full and furniſhed by them that after came out of Aſia, and 500 horſemen beſides. To this place perceiving that there repaired ſmaller numbers by many degrees than ever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles only and ſome few of their vaſſalls, who proteſted, that they had done their endeavor to levy out of their Cities as many as poſſibly they could: but neither by authority, nor for love and favour, nor yet with abſolute command were they able to prevail or do any good with them that refuſed warfare:) and ſeeing himſelf thus forſaken on all ſides, as well of his own ſubjects who dragged behind in Aſia, as of his allies who performed not thoſe matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to aſſiſt them, I he withdrew himſelf within the ſtraights of Thermopylæ.

This mountain divideth Greece in the very middle, like as Italy is parted in twain by the ridge of the Appennine. On the fore-part of this ſtraight and forreſt of Thermopylæ toward the North lyeth Epirus and Perrhæbia, Magneſia and Theſſaly, alſo the Phthiotæ of Achæa, and the gulph Malea: but more ſouthward is diſcovered the greateſt part of Ætolia and Acarnania, Phocis, Locris, and Baotia, together with the Iſland Eubœa joyning cloſe thereto: behind it is ſituate the country of Attica running into the ſea like a promontory, and beſides it Peloponneſus. This mountain taking his beginning at Leucas and the Ponant or Weſtern ſea, reacheth through Ætolia to the Levant or Eaſterly Ocean, and is ſo full of rocks and rough crags betwen, that no whole armies, no, nor ſo much as ſingle travellers lightly appointed, can find but hardly and with much ado K the waies and paths to paſs through: the utmoſt brows and the hils of this mountain bending toward the eaſt they call Oeta; and the higheſt pitch and knop thereof, is called Callidromos; at the foot whereof lyeth the valley leading toward the gulph of Malea, wherein the plain is not above threeſcore paces broad. And this is the only high and port-way by which an army may march, if it be not otherwiſe empeached. And hereupon it is, that the paſſage is called * Pylæ: and of ſome (becauſe there are found therein certain natural hot waters or bains) Thermopylæ: even that very place which is ſo famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Lacedæmonians, more than for any worthy battell againſt the Perſians. Here lay encamped Antiochus at this preſent (carrying nothing that mind nor reſolution as thoſe Lacedæmonians did) within the gates as it were of the ſtraights, where he encloſed and ſtopped the paſſage beſides, with ſtrong defences: And L when he had caſt a double rampire and trench, yea and raiſed a mure and wall where need was (which to do the place afforded him great plenty of ſtone lying every where) and had made all ſure: preſuming confidently that the Roman army would never venture nor be able to break through thoſe barricadoes that way: he ſent of thoſe 4000 Ætolians (for ſo many were met together) ſome to keep a garriſon in Heraclea, ſituate even before the very gullet and ſtreight; and others to Hypata: for that he made no doubt but the Conſul would aſſail Heraclea, and many poſts brought word, that all about Hypata was already waſted.

Now the Conſul having ſpoiled the territory of Hypata firſt, and then of Heraclea, (where the Ætolians aids did no good and ſerved to no purpoſe in the one place or the other) pitched his camp over-againſt the King, even in the very mouth of the gullet, near the fountains of the hot M waters aforeſaid: both thoſe regiments above-named of the Ætolians were got within the town Heraclea, and there kept themſelves ſure. Antiochus, who before he ſaw his enemies, thought all was faſt enough and ſufficiently fenced, began then to fear leſt the Roman ſouldiers would find out ſome privy paths and waies, thereby they might paſs and get over thoſe high hils that commanded his camp: for a rumour ran, that the Lacedæmonians in times paſt were ſo encloſed by the Perſians, and of late daies alſo King Philip was likewiſe compaſſed and environed by theſe very ſame Romans. Whereupon he diſpatched a meſſenger to the Ætolians in Heraclea, willing them to do him thus much ſervice yet in theſe his wars, as to ſeize the tops of thoſe hils and to keep them that the Romans might have no paſſage that way. Upon this meſſage received there aroſe ſome diſſention among the Ætolians. Some were of mind to obey the King his will and N commandment and to go accordingly; but others thought better to tarry ſtill at Heraclea, to attend upon fortune and ſee what would happen: to the end, that if the King ſhould chance to be vanquiſhed by the Conſul, they might have in readineſs their forces freſh and in heart, to ſuccour and aid their own Cities near at hand; or if his luck were to defeat the Conſul then they might follow the Romans in chaſe, when they were disbanded and ſcattered aſunder. Both parts, thus divided as they were, not only perſiſted ſtill in their ſeverall deſignments, but alſo put the ſame in execution by themſelves. For two thouſand of them remained at Heraclea; the other two thouſand parted themſelves three waies, namely, to Callidromos, to Rhoduntia, and Tichius, (theſe are the names of three principall high hills;) and each company took and held one. The Conſul when he ſaw that the Ætolians were poſſeſſed of theſe higher places, ſent M. Porcius Cato and O L. Valerius Flaccus, two of his Lieutenants (who both had been Conſuls) with two thouſand choſen men againſt theſe holds of the Ætolians, to wit, Flaccus againſt Rhoduntia and Tichius, and Cato againſt Callidromos: himſelf before that he advanced his battell againſt his enemies, made a brief ſpeech unto his ſouldiers in this manner: "My ſouldiers, I ſee that the moſt part "of you even of every quality and degree, are they that in this very Province ſometime ſerved "under the conduct, charge, and government of T. Quintius in the Macedonian war. The ſtraights

A "of that passage then, near the river Aous, were far more difficult to gain and get over, than this "is; for here are very gates, yea, and one natural way (as it were) to pass through, as if all else "were stopped up between two seas. There were more stronger defences and sconces against them "at that time, and those planted in places more convenient and commodious. The army of the e-"nemies then, was both for number greater & for men & souldiers much better; for therein were "the Macedonians the Thracians, and the Illyrians, all most fierce and warlike nations: in this are "Syrians and Asiatick Greeks, or half Asians, the vainest kind of people of all others, and born to "serve. The King there, namely Philip a most noble warrior exercised and inured ever from his "youth in the neighbour-wars of the Thracians and Illyrians, & all the nations bordering upon "him: but this Antiochus (to say nothing of all his life besides) is he, who being come out of Asia B "into Europe, for to make war upon the people of Rome, hath done all the long winter time no-"thing more memorable than this, That for to please his wanton lust he hath taken to wife the "daughter of a privat person; a man (I say) of low degree and base quality among other Citizens: "& this new married man, fed fat and franked (as I may so say) with dainty suppers & delicat bride-"bankets, is come forth (forsooth) to fight a battell. His whole strength and all his hope hath been "in the Ætolians, a people of all others most vain, unconstant, and unthankfull, as ye have tried "heretofore, and Antiochus findeth true at this present. For neither assembled they in great num-"ber, nor possible was it to keep them together in the camp: nay, which more is, they mutine a-"mong themselves, and having demanded and required the guard of Hypata and Heraclea, they "have defended neither the one nor the other. Some of them are fled to the tops of the moun-C "tains; others have shut themselves within Heraclea. The King himself hath confessed plainly, "that he was never so hardy as to meet in plain field and affront the enemy, no, nor so much as to "pitch his camp in open ground; in that abandoning all that country before him which he vaun-"ted and bragged that he had taken from us and Philip, he hath hidden himself among the rocks. "He hath not encamped before the entrance of the gullet and straights (as the fame goeth of the "Lacedæmonians in times past) but pitched his tents far within. And to bewray his cowardly "fear, What difference is there between so doing, and hoising himself within the walls of some "City for to be beseged? But neither shall those narrow straights save him no more than those "steep hills defend the Ætolians, which they have seized. This one thing hath been forecast and "provided for on all sides, that ye shall have nothing to make head against, but your enemies, D "Now must ye resolve upon this point, That ye fight not only for the liberty of Greece (and "yet even this also were a brave and honourable title, to be said for to deliver the same now out "of the hands of Antiochus and the Ætolians, which before you freed from King Philip) nor "that ye shall have no other reward and recompence for your pains, but that which we shall find "now in the Kings camp, but also that the great provision and furniture which daily is expected "from Ephesus, shall be your prize and booty, and that ye shall hereafter make a way for the Ro-"man Empire into Asia, Syria, and all those most wealthy and rich Realms, even as far as to the "Levant sun. And what shall let us then, but that from Gades to the red sea we bound and limit
"our state and Dominion, even with the very Ocean that environeth and compasseth the round "globe of the earth? What shall hinder us, I say, but that all the nations of the world shall ho-E "nour and worship the Roman name next unto the immortall gods? Prepare your hearts there-"fore and courages answerable to so high rewards, that with the leave and help of the gods we "may to morrow fight a field. After this speech the assembly brake up, and the souldiers being dismissed, made ready their armor and weapons, before they took repast or repose. And in the morning, by dawning of the day, the Consul put out the signall of battell, and set his army in array, with a narrow and pointed front, according to the nature and straightness of the place. The King seeing the ensigns of his enemies, led forth his forces likewise. Part of his light armours he planted before the rampier and trench in the forefront, then he placed the flower and strength of the Macedonians, whom they call Sarissophori, i.e. Pikemen, for the surety and safeguard of his defences and fortifications. And to flank these on the left side, he put the archers, the flingers of darts, F and slingers of stones, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might assail and pelt the naked sides of the enemies. On the right flank of these Macedonians at the very edge and point of the mures and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the sea, and are unpassable by reason of the bogs, muddy marshes, quagmires, and quicksands, he set the Elephants with their ordinary and usuall guard. After them his horsemen and men of arms. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he ranged the rest of his forces in the second ward or middle battaillon. The Macedonians who were bestowed before the camp and the trench, at the first sustained the Romans easily enough (who assaied on every side to make an entry) for much help they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets out of their slings, as thick as an hail storm, who lanched darts also, and shot arrows besides. But G when as afterwards greater numbers of enemies pressed upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, keeping yet their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (as it were) another pallisado with their long pikes that they held out afore them. Now the height of their camp-mure was so reasonable, that as it afforded some rise and vantage of ground for their own men to fight upon it, so by reason of the length of their spears, they might reach the enemy under them. Insomuch as many of the Romans approaching rashly, and venturing to clamber up, were run clean through: and either they had given over and done nothing, or elſe more of them H had died for it, but that M. Porcius Cato having beaten from the top of Callidromus the Ætolians, and ſlain a great part of them (for he ſurpriſed them ſuddenly at unawares, and moſt of them faſt aſleep) appeared upon the hill that commandeth the camp. Flaccus ſped not ſo well at Tichius and Rhodiuntia, who laboured to get up thoſe cliffs and holds, but to no purpoſe. The Macedonians and the reſt that were in the Kings hoſt and camp, at firſt, when they deſcried afar off nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Ætolians, who having diſcovered the battell and fight a good way off were coming to aid them. But ſo ſoon as they beheld and diſcerned near at hand the enſignes and armour of the Romans, they took themſelves in their own errour, and were upon a ſudden ſtrucken with ſuch fear, that they all flung their weapons away, and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way, & alſo the narrow- I neſs of the vale through which they were to be purſued, hindred the Romans in following the chaſe. And the Elephants above all which were in the rereward took up the ground ſo, as that the footmen could hardly paſs by them, and the horſemen by no means poſſible; ſo affrighted were the horſes, and cauſed more trouble and diſorder among themſelves, than they did during the battell. Beſides the Romans ſtaid ſometime behind, whiles they rifled and ranſacked the camp. Howbeit, they had the enemy in chaſe that day as far as Lylæum, killing and taking in the very way, not only many horſes and men, but alſo ſlaying the Elephants which they could not take alive; which done, they returned to their own camp, which that day had been aſſailed by the Ætolians, who were of the garriſon of Heraclea; but that enterpriſe, as it was exceeding bold and audacious, ſo it took no effect at all. The Conſul having at the reliefe of the third watch the night K enſuing ſent before his Cavalry to purſue the enemy, advanced likewiſe the enſigns of his legions forward by break of day. The King by this time had won ſome ground, and got a good way before; for he never gave over galloping with bridle in horſe neck, untill he had recovered Elatia. Where firſt he gathered together the broken ends of his army thus diſperſed in flight, and ſo having rallied a ſmall and poor troop of ſouldiers, and the ſame armed by the halfs, he retired to Chalcis. The Roman Cavalry was not able to overtake the King himſelf at Elatia, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his army, which either for wearineſs reſted themſelves dragging behind, or elſe were ſcattered one from the other, as miſſing their way in thoſe unknown quarters, going as they did without their guids: and ſetting aſide five hundred which kept about the King, there was not one that eſcaped of the whole army. Which was but a ſmall number in proportion L of 10000, (if they were no more) for ſo many (according to Polybius) we have written that the King conducted over with him for his part into Greece. What were they then to that great power, which (if we beleeve Valerius Antias) came with the King, for he writeth that he had in his hoſt threeſcore thouſand, and that forty thouſand were ſlain of them, and above five thouſand taken priſoners, with the loſs of military enſigns two hundred and thirty. Of Romans there died in all a hundred and fifty.

As the Conſul marched with his army through Phocis and Bœotia, the States and Cities which were privy to the revolt, and partly culpable, ſtood without their gates with their inſules and veils in token of peace, and craved mercy, fearing they ſhould have been pilled and ranſacked as enemies. But his hoſt journeyed every day as in a peaceable and friend-country, doing no hurt or M wrong to any earthly creature, untill they were come into the territory of Corona: where the Statue or Image of Antiochus erected in the Temple of Minerva Ionea kindled their choler, and the ſouldiers were permitted to ſpoil the country lying about that Temple. But bethinking themſelves that (conſidering the ſaid Statue was ſet up with the publike conſent of all Bœotia) it was an indignity to deal ſo hardly with that territory only of Corona, the ſouldiers were immediatly called in and reclaimed, and ſo they ceaſed the waſting and ſpoiling thereof. The Bœotians only had a check and rebuke by words for carrying ſo unthankfull hearts to the Romans, of whom they had ſo lately received ſuch high favours and benefits.

At the very time of the battell aforeſaid, there rode at anchor ten ſhips of the Kings, in the gulph of Malea near to Thronium, under the charge and conduct of Iſidorus. To which place Alexander the Acarnanian, being fled from the conflict, freſh bleeding and full of grievous wounds, brought news of the unfortunat fight. Wherupon the ſhips in great fear for this late terrour, made haſte and away to Ceneum in Eubœa, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other ſhips which were come out of Aſia, and lay in the ſame rode, upon the news of the defeat of the army returned to Epheſus. And Iſidorus croſſed the ſeas from Ceneum to Demetrias, if peradventure the King were fled thither. About that very time, A. Attilius the Admiral of the Roman navy intercepted and ſurpriſed great ſtore of the Kings proviſions, which had paſſed already the ſtraights near the Iſland Andros. Some ſhips he ſunk, others he boorded and took: as for thoſe that came hindmoſt in the rereward, they turned ſail, and ſhaped their courſe into Aſia. Attilius being returned to Pyræum (from whence he came) with a fleet of ſhips taken from the enemies, divided great O ſtore of corn both among the Athenians, and other allies alſo of that country.

Antiochus ſomewhat before the Conſul his coming, looſed from Chalcis, and firſt fell with the Iſland Tenus, and afterwards ſailed to Epheſus. Againſt the Conſul his arrivall at Chalcis the gates were ſet open for him, and Ariſtotle the Captain there for the King, quit the place upon the approachment of the Conſul. In like manner other Cities in Eubœa yielded without reſiſtance. And ſo within few dates (when all troubles were appeaſed and ſet in quiet order without the hurt and

A damage of any one City) the army was brought back to Thermopylæ, and wan much more honour and commendation for the modesty used after victory, than for the victory it self.

From thence the Consul dispatched M. Cato to Rome, by whose certain and sure relation the Senat and people might have full knowledge of all the affairs that had passed. Who taking sea at Creusa (a port town of Merchandise standing within the inmost gulph of Corinth) arrived at Patræ, a City in Achæa. From Patræ, he coasted along the rivers of Ætolia and Acarnania, as far as Corphu, and so cut over to * Hydruntum in Italy, from whence he travelled by land, and in exceeding great haste within five daies came to Rome. Early in the morning before day light he entred the City, and from the gate rode directly to M. Junius the Prætor, who assembled the Senat betimes by the break of day: and thither, L. Cornelius Scipio (who some daies before had been dismissed B and sent away from the camp by the Consul) hearing at his first coming that Cato was got before him, and in the Senat repaired, even as he was relating the news. Then these two Lieutenants by the commandment of the Senat were presented in the generall assembly of the people, where they declared the same which they had done before in the Senat house, as touching the deeds atchieved in Ætolia. And ordained it was, that a solemn procession for three daies should be holden, and that the Prætor should sacrifice forty head of greater beasts, in the honour of what gods he would himself.

And at the same time M. Fulvius Nobilior, who two yers before went as Prætor into the farther Spain, entred the City in pomp of an Ovation, or petty triumph. He caused to be born before him of silver bigats 130000. And besides that, silver in coin and ready money, 12000 pound C weight. Also in gold the weight of 127 pound. Acilius the Consul sent certain messengers from Thermopylæ to the Ætolians at Heraclea, to advertise them that before he came they would now at last be wiser, and bethink themselves (after such experience of the King his vanity and insufficiency) for to deliver up Heraclea, and crave pardon of the Senat, either for their wilfull folly, or their blind errour. Who used these and such like motives and inducements unto them, namely, That other Cities likewise of Greece (during this war) abandoned the Romans and revolted from them, at whose hands they had received so many benefits: yet because that after the King was fled (upon whose assurance they had disloyally broken their allegeance) they stood not out still, nor persisted obstinatly in their fault and folly, were received to mercy and protection. The Ætolians likewise albeit they followed not the King, but sent for him, and were rather conducters and D leaders, than companions and associats in this war, yet if they could take up in time and repent, they might be pardoned and saved. But no answer returned they tending to peace: nay, it appeared, that the matter would come to a triall by arms, and for all the King was vanquished, yet the Ætolian war was behind as wholly and entire as before time. Whereupon the Consul dislodged from Thermopylæ, and marched directly against Heraclea: yea, and the very same day he rode on horseback all about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Heraclea is seated at the foot of the mountain Oeta: & though the town it self standeth in a plain, yet a fortress it hath built upon an high ground, which as it overlooketh the City, so it is so steep on every side, that it is altogether inaccessible. After he had diligently beheld all things that were to be marked and known, he determined to assault the town in four places at once. Unto L. Valerius he gave in charge to E plant his platforms and to batter that side where the river Asopus runneth, and where the publike place of exercise is built. T. Sempronius Longus had commission to assail the Castle, without the walls indeed, but yet better inhabited and more peopled (as a man would say) then the town it self. On that side which standeth toward the gulph of Malea, which part yielded the hardest access, he appointed M. Bœbius. And from another prety river which they call * Melas, he set Appius Claudius opposite against the Temple of Diana. Through the great industry and earnest labour of these four gallants, striving who could perform the best service, the work went so well forward, that within few daies the frames and platforms, the Rams and all other engins of battery meet for the assault of Cities were finished. For besides that the territory about Heraclea, being a moory ground and full of tall trees, afforded them plenty enough of timber to frame and per- F form all sorts of fabricks: the houses also in the entry of the City without in the Suburbs standing void, by reason that the Ætolians had put themselves within the walls, yielded unto them not only posts, beams, joysts, planks, and boords, but brick, and tile, plaster, morter, and stone of all sizes for divers and sundry uses. So, the Romans assaulted the town rather with fabricks, ordnance, and artillery, than by force of arms: but the Ætolians contrariwise defended themselves by main strength and their weapons. For when as the walls should be shaken with the Rams, they caught not hold of them as the manner is with cords, and by plucking them aside, avoided their force; but armed in great number, they carried fire with they to fling upon the terraces and the fabricks. They had besides divers vaults and arches in the walls at which they could readily and fitly sally out: and ever as themselves closed up the breaches of their walls, or made G new for the ruinat, they would remember to make more of those vaults still, that in many places at once they might break forth upon their enemies. Thus for the first daies, whiles they were fresh in heart, they issued forth oftentimes and many together, and quit themselves right lustily: but afterwards in fewer numbers, and more slackly every day than other. For being evermore employed about many things at once, nothing so much tamed and wearied then, as watching. For whereas the Romans had a great number of souldiers, and one guarded after another successively by turns; the Ætolians being so few, were constrained without any change, to continue in uncesſant labour night and day. Thus for the ſpace of twenty four daies they had no reſt nor reſpit but H day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight ſtill, and labouring without intermiſſion againſt the enemies that aſſailed the City in all four quarters at once. When the Conſul knew once that the Ætolians were wearied and overtoiled (partly by counting the time, and partly by that which he had learned of certain fugitives) he uſed this policy and ſtratagem. About midnight he ſounded the retreat, and having drawn all his ſouldiers at once from the aſſault, held them quiet in the camp untill the third hour of the day. After that, he began to give a freſh charge, and continued it unto midnight following, and ſo gave over again untill the ſame hour before noon. The Ætolians ſuppoſing verily that the cauſe why they ſurceaſed the aſſault, was for very wearineſs (like as themſelves were tired out) ſo ſoon as the Romans had the retreat ſounded unto them, departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they alſo by the ſame ſignall were called away, I and ſhewed not themſelves in armor upon the walls before the third hour of the next day. The * Three of the clock in the morning. Conſul having at one time given over the battery aforeſaid at midnight, began at the * fourth watch a freſh aſſault again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one ſide, he gave commandment to T. Sempronius to keep his men together, and intentively to obſerve and wait for the ſignall: aſſuring himſelf that in the alarm by night, the enemies would run to thoſe places from whence they heard the noiſe. The Ætolians, many of them being found aſleep, had much to do to rouſe themſelves, and were loath to riſe up from their ſweet ſleep, their bodies being ſo weary with toiling, moiling, and watching before. Some of them who were yet awake ran in the dark to the place where the aſſailants made a noiſe. Their enemies laboured to get into the town, ſome by mounting over the ruins and breaches of the broken wall, others by ſcaling and climbing with K ladders. And againſt them the Ætolians ran from all parts, ready to ſuccour and help. One quarter, whereas there ſtood houſes without the City, was neither defended nor aſſailed: but as there were ſome ready and waited for the ſignal to give the aſſault, ſo there was not one of the other part for to reſiſt and defend. Now began the day to peep, when as the Conſul put forth the ſignal, and the ſouldiers began to mount over into the City, and found none to withſtand them: ſome entred at the wals half broken down, others ſcaled them with ladders where they ſtood whole and ſound.

And the cry was not ſo ſoon heard that the City was taken, but the Ætolians left their guards on all ſides, and fled into the Caſtle. The ſouldiers that had won the town were permitted by the Coſ. to rifle and ranſack it: which was not done ſo much upon anger and deſpite, as in this regard, that the ſouldiers who had been kept ſhort & faſting thus long (notwithſtanding ſo many towns L recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in ſome one place taſte the fruit of victory. The Coſ. having called from thence about noon, the ſouldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commanded the one to caſt about the foot of the hils unto a rock or cliff, which being in height equal to the Caſtle aforeſaid, was notwithſtanding divided from it by a valley between, ſeeming as if it had been ſometime a part thereof and cut from it. Now theſe two points of the hils ſhot up ſo near together in the head, that from the top of the one, a man might lance a dart into the Caſtle or fortreſs. The Coſ. with the other half of the ſouldiers ſtaid beneath, expecting a ſign and token from them that were to get up the cliff behind, ready thereupon to mount up from the town ſide into the fort. The Ætolians that were within the Caſtle could neither abide at the firſt the ſhout of thoſe that had ſeized the cliff, nor afterwards the aſſault of the M Romans from the City, both for that their hearts failed them and were danted already, and alſo becauſe they were unprovided of all neceſſaries for to endure any long ſiege and aſſault: conſide-ring that women and children and all the other impotent multitude unmeet to bear arms, were got thither in ſo great numbers, that the place was hardly able to receive and contain, much leſs to keep and maintain them: and therefore at the firſt aſſault, they caſt down their weapons and yielded. Among other principal perſonages of the Ætolians, Damocritus alſo was delivered; he, who in the beginning of the war when T. Quintius deſired to ſee a copy of the Decree of the Ætolians for the ſending for Antiochus, anſwered, That he would ſhew it him in Italy, when the Ætolians lay there encamped. For this proud ſpeech of his, the Romans now conquerors, were the gladder that they had got him into their hands. N

During the time that the Romans aſſailed Heraclea, Philip alſo beſieged and battered Lamia, according as it was before agreed between them: for near unto Thermopylæ, at what time as the Coſ. returned out of Bœotia, he met with him, of purpoſe to ſignifie his joy in the behalf of him and the people of Rome for their atchieved victory; and alſo to excuſe himſelf by occaſion of ſickneſs, that he was not preſent with him in perſon in the managing of the wars. From thence they parted aſunder, and took divers waies, for to aſſault theſe two Cities (as I ſaid) both at once: and diſtant they were one from the other near ſeven miles. And foraſmuch as Lamia was ſeated upon an hill therefore the town diſcovered and overlooked all the country about, but eſpecially on that ſide toward Heraclea, where, by reaſon that it ſeemeth a leſs compaſs, it repreſenteth a full pro-ſpect to the eye. When as the Romans and Macedonians labouring and ſtriving who could do O better, were day and night emploied either about their fabricks and pioners work, or elſe in skir-miſh and fight: the Macedonians found more difficulty than they, in this reſpect, that the Romans were buſied in platforms, mantlets, and works all above ground; but the Macedonians were put to undermine: and oftentimes (as it falleth out in ſuch ſtony and craggy ground) they met with hard flints and rags not minable, and ſuch as no iron or ſteel-tool was able to touch and pierce. The King ſeeing little good done by this means, and his enterpriſe going but ſlowly forward,

A ward, began to ſound the townſmen, and to tempt them to render the City, uſing the mediation therein of their chief Citizens whom he parled withall: for this reckoning he made, that if Heraclea were forced before it, they within the City would ſooner yield unto the Romans than to him, and ſo the Conſul ſhould win all the thank to himſelf for levying the ſiege. And nothing was he ſhort of his count; for immediatly upon the winning of Heraclea, a meſſenger came unto him from the Conſul, willing him to ſurceaſe the aſſault and the ſiege; alledging, it was more reaſon, that the Roman ſouldiers who had fought in ranged battell with the Ætolians, ſhould have the reward and recompence of the victory. By this means Lamia was abandoned, and by the ruin of Heraclea her neighbour City avoided and eſcaped the like calamity of her own.

Some few daies before that Heraclea was won, the Ætolians having aſſembled a Diet at Hypa- B ta, addreſſed Embaſſadors unto Antiochus, and Thoas among the reſt even he, who aforetime had been ſent unto him. His commiſſion and charge was, firſt, To requeſt the King that once again he would rally his forces as well by land as at ſea, and in perſon paſs over into Greece: ſecondly, If any other important affairs hindred him, yet that he would ſend unto them both men and money. For as it touched his Highneſs in honour, reputation, and credit not to ſee his allies abandoned; ſo it made for the ſafegard and ſecurity of his own Realm and royall eſtate, not to ſuffer the Romans (after they had once defeated the Ætolians) to ſail over into Aſia at their eaſe and pleaſure, with all their forces. Theſe were no fained devices, but true remonſtrances indeed; and therefore prevailed the more with the King. Whereupon he delivered money preſently to the Embaſſadors, ſufficient to defray the charges of the war, and promiſed certainly to ſend men to C ſerve both by land and ſea. Thoas alone of all the Embaſſadors he kept ſtill with him, who was not himſelf unwilling to ſtay behind, becauſe he might be ever at hand to call upon the King for to perform his word and beheſt. But the winning of Heraclea killed the heats clean of the Ætolians in the end: and within few daies after that they had diſpatched their Embaſſadors into Aſia, about the renewing of the war and ſending for the King, they laid apart all deſignments of arms, and addreſſed their Orators unto the Romans to crave peace. Who, as they began to make ſome ſpeech, the Conſul cut them off, and ſaid, he had other matters of greater importance to think upon and to diſpatch; and commanded them to content themſelves with a truce for ten daies, and to return to Hypata; and with them he ſent L. Valerius Flaccus, unto whom they D ſhould declare thoſe things that they were about to deliver unto him, and whatſoever elſe they had to ſay. When they were arrived at Hypata, the chief and principall Ætolians aſſembled themſelves in the lodging of Flaccus, conſulting with him what courſe they were to take in their treaty with the Conſul. And when they went in hand to alledge the ancient rights of the leagues, and to lay abroad their good demerits, and what they had done for the Romans: "Flaccus bad "them lay a ſtraw there, and ſpeak no more of the priviledge of thoſe covenants and accords "which they themſelves had broken; ſhewing unto them, that they ſhould ſpeed better and "gain more by a ſimple confeſſion of their treſpaſs, and in recourſe only to prayer and humble "ſupplication; foraſmuch as all the hope they might have of ſafety, reſted not in their own de-"ſert and goodneſs of their cauſe, but in the meer clemency and mercy of the people of Rome; "promiſing for his part to aſſiſt them and ſecond their petitions as well to the Conſul as the Se-E "nat of Rome, ſince that thither alſo they muſt of neceſſity ſend an Embaſſage. This way ſeemed to them all, the beſt ſimply for their ſafety, namely, to put themſelves to the diſpoſition and devotion of the Romans: for they ſuppoſed by this means to drive the Romans for very ſhame to have regard of them & not to offer hurt or violent outrage to them, coming in the habit of poor ſuppliants: and yet withall, if any opportunity of better fortune ſhould in the mean time offer it ſelf unto them, to be their own Maſters nevertheleſs and at their choice. When they were come before the Coſ. Phaneas the chief of that embaſſie, made a long Oration, couching and framing his words ſundry waies right artificially, to mitigate and aſſwage the wrath of the conqueror, which he knit up and concluded with this ſpeech, ſaying, That the Ætolians committed themſelves and all that they had to the mercy and protection of the people of Rome. When the Coſ.
F heard thoſe words: See you do ſo then indeed (qd. he) O ye Ætolians, and take heed I adviſe you that you deal herein bona fide. Then Phaneas brought forth and ſhewed a fair inſtrument of a Decree, wherein the ſame was engroſſed in plain terms. Since that (qd. he again) you mean good earneſt, and are at our diſpoſition I demand that ye deliver unto me out of hand Dicæarchus a ſtateſman of yours, and Menætus of Epirus, (who being entred into Naupactum with a garriſon, had compelled the City to revolt) alſo Aminander and all the Nobles of the Athamans, by whoſe counſell and ſuggeſtions ye fell from us and rebelled. Phaneas interrupted the Coſ. before he had well made an end of his ſpeech, We yield not our ſelves (qd. he) to be your villains and ſlaves, but as allies to be protected by you: and I am verily perſwaded you know not what you do, to impoſe thoſe things upon us againſt all the manner and cuſtome of the Greeks. The Coſ. replied again;
G In good faith, I paſs not (qd. he) greatly what the Ætolians deem well or ill done according to the faſhions of the Greeks; all the whiles that I, after the cuſtome of the Romans, have that power and command over them, who erewhile by vertue of their own decree yielded unto us. And heretofore by force of our arms have been vanquiſhed and ſubdued by us. And therefore, unleſs that be executed which I command, yea, and with ſpeed, my will is, that preſently here you be bound hand and foot: and with that he commanded chains and gyves to be brought forth, and the Lictors to come about them for to lay hold upon them. Then the ſtout courage both of

Phaneas and the reſt of the Ætolians, was well cooled & abated; and ſo at length they ſaw in what H poor plight they were. And Phaneas made anſwer, That both himſelf and the Ætolians there preſent in place, knew well, that thoſe things were to be performed which were impoſed upon them, but (quoth he) there needs a Councill of the Ætolians for to enact a decree thereof, and therefore he requeſted the Conſul to allow a ſurceaſe of arms only for ten daies. Then Flaccus began to ſpeak for the Ætolians, and at his requeſt the ſaid abſtinence was granted, and ſo they returned to Hypata. When Phaneas had related in the privy Councill of thoſe elect peers of that nation called Apocleti, as well the demands that were commanded, as what had like to have faln upon themſelves in perſon, the peers ſighed deeply and groaned again, to ſee their miſerable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victor muſt of neceſſity be obeyed. and a generall Parliament aſſembled of the Ætolian Burgeſſes out of all their towns and Cities. When I all that multitude was gathered together, and heard the ſame related again, their hearts ſo fretted within them at the cruelty and indignity of thoſe Lordly commands, that if they had been well ſetled in peace, yet ſuch a fit of anger had been enough to have put them into arms. And to ſtir the fume and choler the more, the difficulty of effecting the things demanded, helped well: for how poſſibly could they compaſs to deliver Aminander, being as he was an abſolute King? But even then there was preſented unto them by chance a new hope, For Nicander at that very time, coming from King Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vain expectation, namely, that the King made wondrous proviſion for war, as well by ſea as land. This Nicander having accompliſhed his Embaſſage, and made return again into Ætolia, within the compaſs of twelve daies, after he was embarked, arrived at Phalera in the gulph of Malea: from whence K having brought the monies which he had, down to Lamia, whiles himſelf with certain nimble men and light appointed, travelled toward Hypata in the evening, between the Roman and Ætolian camp, through paths that he well knew; he chanced to ſtumble, ere he was aware, upon the corps de guard of the Macedonians, and was brought to the King before ſupper was done, the table taken up, and the King riſen. When Philip was advertiſed thereof, he ſhewed no other countenance, than if a friend or gueſt, and not an enemy was come; he bad him ſit down at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards he kept him there with him ſtill in the room, and voided all the reſt, willing him in no caſe to be afraid. "He blamed greatly the bad courſes and deſign-
"ments of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted upon their own pates) who firſt had brought "the Romans, and then Antiochus into Greece. But for my part (quoth he) ſince things done and L
"paſt, may ſooner be blamed than amended, I am content to forget and put all under my foot,
"and will never be the man that will ſeem to inſult over them in their diſtreſs and adverſity.
"And ſo ſhould the Ætolians likewiſe take up in time, and lay aſide all their rancor and malice
"to me: and Nicander eſpecially ought to remember this day, on which by me his life was pre-
"ſerved. With that he ſent him away with a good convoy, untill he was paſt all danger; and this Nicander, as is beforeſaid, came to Hypata, even as the Ætolians were in deep conſultation about peace with the Romans.

M. Acilius having either ſold outright, or given away to the ſouldiers the booty of the country about Heraclea, and hearing that the Councill at Hypata nothing tended to peace, and that the Ætolians were run together to Naupactum, for to abide in that place the whole violence of the war; N ſent App. Claudius afore with 4000 ſouldiers to ſeize the tops of the mountains, where as the paſſages were difficult; and himſelf aſcended up to the hill Oeta, and ſacrificed to Hercules in that very place which they call Pyra, by occaſion that the mortall body of that god was there conſumed with fire: from whence he departed with his whole army & performed the reſt of his journey well and marched with eaſe. Being come to Corax (an exceeding high mountain between Calipolis and Naupactum) he loſt there many of his labouring beaſts and ſumpter horſes, which together with their loads and fardels, as they went, tumbled down headlong from the mountain, and his men alſo were much troubled and encumbred. Whereby it was ſoon ſeen, with how lazy and idle an enemy he had to deal, who had not beſet and kept with a guard that difficult paſſage, to empeach and ſhut up the thorow-fare from the enemies. Howbeit, as much toiled and troubled N as his army was, he deſcended to Naupactum. And having erected one Fort againſt the Caſtle, he inveſted all the other parts of the City, and divided his forces according to the ſituation of the walls. This ſiege he found as toilſome and painful, as that at Heraclea.

At the ſame time began the Achæans to lay ſiege to Meſſene alſo in Peloponneſus, for that it refuſed to be of their Councill and aſſociation. For theſe two Cities, Meſſene and Elis, were exempt from the Achæan Diet and accorded with the Ætolians. Howbeit, the Elians, after that Antiochus was chaſed out of Greece, gave the Embaſſadors of Achæa a more mild anſwer, to wit, That when they had diſcharged and ſent away the Kings garriſon, they would conſider of the matter what to do. But the Meſſenians having without any anſwer at all ſent the Embaſſadors away, had levied war; and fearing much their own eſtate, ſeeing their territory overſpread with an army, O and every where burned, yea, and their enemies encamped near unto their City, addreſſed unto Chalcis their embaſſadors to T. Quintius (the very man who before had ſet them at liberty) to ſignifie unto him, That the Meſſenians were ready both to open their gates & alſo to ſurrender their City unto the Romans & not to the Achæans. Quintius ſo ſoon as he had heard their embaſſage, ſent a meſſenger incontinently to Megalopolis, unto Diophanes, the Prætor there of the Achæans, to command him preſently to retire his hoſt from Meſſene, and to repair unto him. Diophanes obeyed

A obeyed his commandment, and having raised his siege, marched himself lightly appointed for speed before the rest of his army, and about Andania, a small town between Megalopolis and Messene, encountred Quintius. Unto whom after he had shewed the causes of the siege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuke only, for that he had enterprised a matter of so great consequence without his authority; with an expres commandment also to cass and discharge his army, and not to disturb and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Messenians likewise he charged to call home their banished persons into their City, and to joyn with the Achæans in their generall Diet and Assembly. And if they either had any matters to refuse, or would willingly provide for themselves against the future time, he willed them to make their repair unto him at Corinth, and enjoyned Diophanes immediatly to summon the Diet of the Achæans for him, where B personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacynthus, that by fraud and treachery they had come by and kept, he required that it should be restored to the Romans. Now this Isle had sometime appertained to Philip the King of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aminander, in consideration, that he might conduct his army into the higher parts of Ætolia, through Athamania: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Ætolians hearts were so abated and quailed, that they were constrained to seek peace. Aminander made first Philip the Megapolitan governour of this Island; but afterwards, in time of that war wherein he banded with Antiochus against the Romans, he called him away from thence to imploy him in martiall affairs, and sent Hierocles the Agrigentin to succeed him in his place. This Hierocles, after the defeat and flight of Antiochus from Thermopylæ, and the expulsion of Aminander out of C Athamania by King Philip, dispatched of his own motion certain messengers unto Diophanes, the Prætor of the Achæans, and for a sum of money agreed upon between them, betraied the Island to the Achæans. The Romans thought it great reason that this Island should be theirs, in recompence for the wars which they had maintained; forasmuch as M. Acilius the Consul, and the Roman legions fought not at Thermopylæ for Diophanes nor yet for the Achæans. Diophanes to these challenges and demands sometime excused himself and the whole nation, otherwhiles stood to it, and avowed the action, and maintained the cause by a plea of right. Some there were of the Achæans there, that both protested, how from the beginning they utterly misliked the course, and also at this present much blamed the Prætor for his wilfull obstinacy. And by their advice and authority an act was set down, that the whole matter should be referred and put to Quintius, to D determin what he pleased. Now had Quintius this nature, if a man crossed and thwarted him, he was fierce and fell; if one yielded and gave place he was gentle again, and pliable. And therefore, without shewing any sign of debate, either in language or countenance, thus he spake. "If I "thought (qd. he) and were perswaded in my heart, that it were good and commodious for the "Achæans to hold and possess this Island in question, I would advise the Senat & people of Rome "to let you enjoy it. But like as a Tortoise, so long as she keepeth her self close within her shell (I "see) is sure and safe enough, against all blows and offence whatsoever; but when she once put-"teth forth any parts, look whatsoever is discovered and naked, the same is weak and subject to "injury: even so you Achæans, being enclosed round about with the sea, are able easily to adjoyn "unto your selves whatsoever lyeth within the præcinct of Peloponesus, and to keep the same also E "when you have laid it to you: but so soon as for a greedy desire of having more and encroaching "further, you go beyond those bonds, you lie open without, and are exposed to all hurt and da-"mage. Thus Zacynthus was delivered to the Romans with the assent of all the Councill there assembled, and Diophanes durst not say a word more to the contrary.

At the same time King Philip asked the Consul as he marched to Naupactum, Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the mean while should recover and regain those Cities which were revolted from the association of the Romans? And having a grant and warrant from him, he led his forces against Demetrias, knowing well enough in what terms of troubles that City then stood. For being forlorn and in utter despair, seeing Antiochus had forsaken them and no hope at all remaining in the Ætolians: they looked every day and night either for the coming of Philip their F heavy friend; or else even the Romans themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A confused and disordered sort there were of King Antiochus his souldiers, who being but a few at first left there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more, and most of them unarmed; such as after the field was lost [at Thermopylæ] thither chanced to flie, and neither had strength nor heart enough to abide a siege. And therefore when Philip sent certain messengers before unto them, to signifie, that there was some hope that they might be pardoned: they made them this answer, That the gates were open for the King, and that he might enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certain chief men of mark quit the City and departed, and Eurilochus killed himself. The garrison souldiers of Antiochus (for so they had capitulated) were conducted to Lysimachia through Macedony and Thrace, accompanied with a con-G voy of Macedonians, for fear that any man should do them harm. There were some few ships also in the rode of Demetrias, under the command of Isidorus, which together with their leader and Captain were dismissed. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperantia, and certain Cities of Perrhæbia.

During the time that Philip was employed in these affairs, T. Quintius having recovered the Island Zacynthus, departed from the Diet of the Achæans, and crossed the seas to Naupactum, which had been beleaguered already two months, & was at the point to be forced and lost: which

if it might have been won by assault, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the Æto- H lians there would have perished for ever. And albeit he had good cause to be highly offended and displeased with the Ætolians, in remembrance that they only checked and impeached his glory, at what time as he set Greece free: and that they were nothing stirred and moved with his authority, when he (forewarning them that those things would happen which afterwards fell out just so indeed) would have discounselled and scared them from foolish and furious designs: yet, supposing that it was a speciall part of his charge and work, that no nation of Greece (now freed by him) should utterly be subverted and destroyed, he began to walk up and down along under the walls, to the end that he might be seen, and soon known of the Ætolians. And anon the very formost guards took notice of him, & noised it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintius was there. And thereupon they ran from all parts up to the walls, every I man stretched forth his hands, and with one accord and consonant voice called by name unto Quintius, beseeching him to help and save them. And albeit he was moved at these their pitious cries with commiseration, yet for that time he signified by the turning away of his head, that he refused and denied them: asking withall, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards, being come unto the Consul, "Know you not (quoth he) O M. Acilius whereabout we are, and "what we have in hand? or if you be a man provident enough, esteem you not that it mainly con- "cerneth the common-weal? He set the Consul by these words a longing, and caused him to give more attentive ear what he would say, and withall, Why do you not speak forth (quoth the Consul) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintius: "See you not that after you "have vanquished Antiochus, you spend and lose much time here in the siege and assault of two K
"Cities, when as now the year of your government is wellnear come about? And Philip in the "mean time without seeing a battell or the ensigns of his enemies displaied, hath gained and joy- "ned to himself not Cities only, but so many nations already, namely, Athamanie, Perrhæbia, A- "perantia and Dolopia? But it is nothing so good and expedient for us, nor standeth it us so much "upon, to take down the Ætolians and pare their nails, as to look unto Philip that he wax not "too great: and (seeing you and your souldiers have not got yet two Cities in reward and re- "compence of victory) not to suffer him to go clear away with so many nations of Greece. The Consul accorded hereunto: but he thought it a shame and dishonour for him to give over the siege and effect nothing: but afterwards, all the matter was put unto the disposition of Quintius. Who went again to that side of the wall, whereas a little before the Ætolians called and L cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earnestly and with greater affection to take pitty of the Ætolian people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediatly, Phaneas himself with other principall persons of the Ætolians, went out unto him; unto whom lying prostrate and groveling at his feet: "Your present fortune (quoth he) and hard "estate wherein you are, caused me both to temper my choler and also to stay my tongue. Those "things you now see are faln out, which I foretold would come to pass. And not so much as this "is left unto you, That the calamities faln upon your heads can be truly said to have light upon "them that have not deserved as much. Howbeit, since it hath been allotted unto me as it were "by destiny to be a foster-father (as I may so say) to nurse up Greece, I will not cease even to do "you good, as thankless and ungratefull persons as you are. Send your Orators to the Consul, M
"to intreat him to grant you a truce for so long, untill you may address your Embassadors to "Rome, by whom you shall wholly refer and submit your selves to the Senat: and I will not fail "to be an intercessor and advocate to the Consul for you and likewise unto the Senat. And, as Quintius counselled them, so did they. Neither rejected the Consul their Embassie, but granted them abstinence of war for such a term as within which they might have an answer of their Embassage to Rome: so he dislodged, the siege was raised, and the army sent into Phocis. The Consul together with Quintius passed over the sea to Ægium, unto the generall Councill of Achæa. There was much treaty and parly about the Eleans, and the restoring of the Lacedæmonians exiles: but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans were desirous to reserve that for themselves, and to win thereby a thank, as proceeding from N their speciall grace. And the Eleans, chose rather to come and be united to the Achæans Parliament of themselves, than by the mediation of the Romans. The Embassadors of the Epirots came unto the Consul, who (it was well known) carried not themselves sound and upright in the entertaining of the Roman amity: howbeit, they had not levied a souldier for Antiochus. Charged they were to have relieved him with money; and deny themselves they could not but they had sent their Embassadors unto the King. And when they put up a petition, that they might be accepted again into the ancient band of amity: this answer the Consul returned unto them, That he knew not yet whether to range them in the number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and thereof the Senat should be judge; and therefore he referred their whole entire cause to Rome. And to that purpose a truce he granted them of fourscore and ten daies. The Epirots thus O sent to Rome, presented themselves before the Senat, and when they stood rather upon these terms in recounting those things wherein they had not shewed any open hostility, than in clearing themselves of those matters that were laid against them; they received such an answer, as whereby they might be thought rather to have obtained pardon, than to have made good and justified their cause. The Embassadors also of King Philip about that time had audience given them in the Senat, who came to congratulate with the Romans, testifying their own joy, and wishing

A theirs for their victory: and upon their request, that they might sacrifice in the Capitoll, and offer an oblation and present of gold in the Temple of Jup. Opt. Max, the Senat gave the good leave. So they presented and offered a crown of gold weighing * one hundred pound. These Embassadors had not only a friendly answer and gracious dispatch: but also Demetrius the son of King Philip, who had lien as an hostage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home again unto his father. Thus was the war atchieved and brought to an end, which M. Acilius the Consul waged against King Antiochus in Greece. * 3600 pound sterl.

The other Consul P. Cornelius Scipio, whose lot was to govern the Province of Gaul, before that he took his journey to that war which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senat, that money should be assigned unto him, for to perform those plaies and games which B he had promised by vow, as Vice-Prætor in Spain, when he was driven to a great extremity in a battell. This seemed to be a strange and unreasonable demand. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat ordained, That what plaies the Consul had vowed on his own head without asking the advice and counsell of the Senat, the same he should exhibit and set forth either with the issue of the spoils got from the enemies, (if haply he had reserved any money raised thereout to that purpose) or else defray the charges out of his own purse. These plaies and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten daies. And near about the same time, the Temple of the great goddess dame Cybele (or Idæa) was dedicated. This goddess being brought out of Asia, in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (surnamed afterwards Africanus) and P. Licinius were Consuls, was conveyed from the sea-side into the mount Palatine. The Temple was set out to be built at a price (according to C an act of the Senat) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, when M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. Thirteen years after the bargain was made for the edifying thereof, M. Junius Brutus dedicated it. and for the honour of this dedication were the first stage-plaies exhibited (as Valerius Antias mine author saith) called thereupon Megalesia. In like manner, C. Licinius Lucullus (one of the two Duumvirs) dedicated the Temple of the goddess Juventus in the great Race called Circus Maximus. The same had M. Livius the Consul vowed sixteen years before, even that very day in which he defeated Asdrubal and his army. The same Livius in his Censorship, went through and bargained for the building thereof, whiles M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And in the honour of dedicating this Temple, the plaies were set forth: and D all was done with more devotion, because there was a new war intended against King Antiochus. In the beginning of this year in which these things passed, whiles P. Cornelius the Consul staid still behind at Rome, (for M. Acilius was gone forth already to war:) it is found in records, that two tame oxen climbed up a ladder in the street Carina, to the tile-roof of a certain house there. And the soothsayers gave expres order that they should be burnt quick, and the ashes to be thrown into Tyber. Also it was reported, that at Tarracina and Amiternum, it rained stones sundry times. Item, That in Minturnæ the Temple of Jupiter and the shops about the market-place, were blasted and smitten with lightning; and in the very mouth of the river Vulturnus, two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these fearfull prodigies, the Decemvirs by order from the Senat went to the books of Sibylla and perused them; and out of their learning pronounced, that a solemn fast should be now instituted in the honour of Ceres, E and the same to be observed and holden every fift year: also that a novendiall sacrifice for nine daies together could continue; and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this procession and supplication, should wear garlands and wreaths of flowers upon their heads: lastly, That the Consul P. Cornelius should sacrifice to what gods, and with what beasts, the Decemvirs would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified, as well by the accomplishment of the vows accordingly, as by taking order for the expiation of those wondrous signs, the Consul took his journey into his province: from whence he commanded Cneus Domitius the Pro-Prætor (after he had cassed his army) to depart to Rome: and himself entred with his legions into the territory of the Boians.

Within a little of that time, the Ligurians (by vertue of a sacred law that they had) levied and F assembled an army, and by night assailed the Camp unawares to Quintus Minutius the Pro-Consul. Minutius kept his souldiers in order of battell untill day within his hold, having an eye and circumspect regard, that the enemy should not mount over the trench and defences in any place. And at the day-break he sallied forth at two gates at once: neither were the Ligurians repulsed (as he hoped they should) at the first charge; for they sustained and held out the skirmish above two hours, with doubtfull event on both sides. At the last, when band after band issued out, and still fresh souldiers succeeded in the room of the wearied, for to maintain fight, the Ligurians in the end (besides other distresses, lost for want of sleep also) turned their backs. Of the enemies were slain above four thousand; of Romans and allies under three hundred. Two months after or somewhat less, P. Cornelius the Consul gave battell to the Boians and won the day; slew 28000 G enemies (as Valerius Antias writeth) took 3400 prisoners, gained 124 military ensigns, 1230 horses, chariots 247: and of the winners (as he saith) there died not above 1484. Where (by the way) how little credit soever (as touching the number) we give unto this Writer (for in that point there is none over-reacheth more than he) yet apparant it is, that a right great victory it was; both for that the camp was won, and the Boians after that battell presently yielded themselves; as for that in regard of this victory a joyfull procession was by order from the Senat holden, and greater beasts slain for sacrifice.

Not

Not much under or over this preſent time, M. Fulvius Nobilior returned out of the farther pro- H vince of Spain in pomp of an Ovation, and carried in ſhew 10000 pound weight of ſilver in bullion; of Bigats in ſilver coin 130000, and in gold 126 li. weight. P. Cornelius the Conſul, having firſt taken hoſtages of the Boian nation, and diſſeized them of the one half of their country, to the inhabiting whereof the people of Rome might if they would ſend their Colonies; at his departure from thence toward Rome to an undoubted and aſſured triumph, licenſed his army, with commandment to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he was come, the Senat had ſummons to aſſemble in the Temple of Bellona; where after he had diſcourſed of his acts and deeds atchieved, he required that he might be permitted to enter the City riding in triumph. P. Sempronius Blæſus a Tribune of the Commons for the time being, I ſtepped forth and ſaid, "That his advice was that Scipio ſhould not flatly be denied the honour of
"a triumph, but to put it off to a farther day. And why? The wars (qd. he) of the Ligurians have
"alwaies been joyned and linked with thoſe of Gaul: which nations being ſo near together, uſe
"ever mutually one to ſuccour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battel) had fol"lowed the train of victory, and either himſelf in proper perſon with his brave conquering army
"paſſed into the territory of the Ligurians, or but ſent part of his forces to Q. Minutius, who now
"for three years (or faſt upon) both been detained within thoſe quarters in a war of doubtful i-
"ſue; we might have ſeen an end ere this of the Ligurian war alſo. But now (forſooth) his ſouldi-
"ers are diſmiſſed, and brought home to accompany him & to ſolemnize his triumph; who might
"well have been employed ſtill and done good ſervice to the Common-weal: yea, & may do yet
"(if the Senat be ſo diſpoſed) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regain K
"that, which by over-haſtineſs of triumph hath been over-ſlipped. And therefore, in my opinion
"(qd. he) they ſhould do well to command the Conſul to go his waies back again, and take his
"army with him into his Province, & to do his beſt and utmoſt endeavour to ſubdue the Liguri-
"ans alſo. For unleſs they be brought under and made ſubject unto the people of Rome, the Boi-
"ans be ye ſure will not long be quiet: either we muſt have peace or war at once in both places.
"And ſo P. Cornelius in quality of Pro-Conſul (as many others before him, who in their full Magi-
"ſtracy triumphed not) may after ſome few months have his triumph. To this the Coſ. anſwered
"again and ſaid, That neither the Province of the Ligurians was any part of his charge by lot, nei"ther warred he at all with the Ligurians, nor yet demanded to triumph over them. As for Q.
"Minutius (qd. he) I hope that ſhortly after he hath ſubdued them, he both will require his due L
"triumph, and ſhall likewiſe obtain the ſame. For mine own part, I ſeek no more but to triumph
"over the Boians in Gaul, whom I have vanquiſhed in plain battell, beaten out of the field and
"camp; whoſe whole nation within two daies after the fight and their general diſcomfiture, yiel-
"ded and rendred themſelves into my hands; and from whom I have carried away hoſtages for
"aſſured pledge of future peace: nay, that which is much more than all this, I have had the killing
"of ſo many Gauls in open battel, and fought with ſo many thouſands of Boians, as no General e"ver did before me: the better half of 50000 men are ſain upon the edge of the ſword, and many
"a thouſand taken priſoners; ſo as the Boians have none left but old folk and young children.
"Can any man make a wonder then, why a victorious army, leaving no enemy behind in the Pro"vince, is come to Rome to honour the triumph of their Conſul? Whoſe emploiment, if the Se- M
"nat be diſpoſed to uſe in any other ſervice or Province, Whether of theſe two waies think they,
"will make them more willing and ready to put themſelves into new dangers, and enter into o"ther freſh labour and travell; either to pay them without delay & content them with the due &
"deſerved hire of their former peril and pain, or to ſend them away with bare hope only inſtead
"of the ſubſtance, for to expect ſtill without effect: ſince they have been once already put by and
"diſappointed of their firſt hope and expectation? Now for mine own part, I obtained honour
"enough that day on which the Senat ſent me (deemed & declared the beſt man in all the City)
"to receive that great goddeſs & dame of Ida. This title alone, without any other addition of tri-
"umph, ſhall be ſufficient to recommend to all poſterity for honeſty & honour both, the Image of
"P. Scipio Naſica. This ſaid, not only the whole Senat themſelves condeſcended generally to grant N him triumph, but alſo with their countenance & authority compelled the Tribunes of the Commons to give over their hold, and ſurceaſe their interpoſition of a negative voice. So P. Cornelius the Coſ. triumphed over the Boians. In which triumph he cauſed to be carried for ſhew in French chariots, armor, enſigns, and ſpoils of all ſorts: alſo French veſſels of braſs and copper. He commanded likewiſe to be led in pomp a number of horſes taken, together with Noblemen and Gentlemen captives. Of chains of gold he made a ſhew of 1470. Beſides, there was born in pomp, of gold 245 pound weight: of ſilver unwrought and wrought into plate, not unworkmanly after their manner (and namely in ſundry French veſſels) 2340 pound weight: lawly, of bigats in coin 234.
To his ſouldiers that followed his triumphant chariot he gave 225 Aſſes apiece, double as much to a Centurion, and trebble to an horſeman. The next day after he called the people to a general aſ- O

Tribune had offred unto him in that he would have tied him to the war of another, with intent to defraud himſelf of the fruit of his own victory, he caſſed his ſouldiers and diſcharged them quite.

Whiles theſe affairs thus went in Italy, Antiochus remaining at Epheſus, reſted very ſecure

Only Annibal, who at that time was of greateſt credit, and might do moſt with the King, ſaid unto him, "That he rather marvelled much why the "Romans were not already in Aſia, than doubted of their coming. For a neerer cut (quoth "he) it is by Sea out of Greece into Aſia, than out of Italy into Greece; and a greater motive to "war is Antiochus than the Ætolians. And as for their valour and power, as hardy they are and "mighty at Sea, as on Land; and their fleet hath hovered a good while already about Malea. "Moreover, I heard ſay of late, that new ſhips be arrived, and a new General come out of Italy, "to follow and perform this war. And therefore, let Antiochus feed no longer upon a vain hope, "and promiſe himſelf a permanent peace: for ſhortly he muſt make account to fight with the "Romans in Aſia, yea, and for Aſia, both by Sea and Land; and no mean there is, but that either
B "himſelf muſt loſe his Kingdom, or take from them their ſoveraign ſeignory, who affect and pre-"tend to be LL. of the whole world. He was the only man thought to forecaſt, and truly to fore-tell what would enſue. Whereupon the King himſelf in perſon, with thoſe ſhips which he had ready rigged and furniſhed, ſailed to Cherſonneſus, with intent to ſtrengthen thoſe places with good garriſons, if haply the Romans ſhould come by Land. The reſt of the navy he commanded Polyxenidas to prepare and put to Sea. And al about the Iſland he ſent about his pinnaces and brigantins as eſpials to diſcover the coaſts. C. Livius the Admiral of the Roman navy was arrived at Naples from Rome with fifty covered ſhips. At which place he gave commandment, That the open veſſels, which by covenant were due to be ſent from the allies of all that tract, ſhould meet. From whence he ſailed to Sicily, and paſſed the ſtreights by Meſſana. And when he had received ſix C Carthaginian ſhips ſent to aid him, and called upon the Rhegins and Locrins, and other aſſociats compriſed in the ſame league and holding by the ſame tenure, for that ſhipping which of duty they were to find: when he had alſo taken a ſurvey of all his armado at Lacinium, he weighed anchor, and put to the main Sea. Being arrived at Corcyra, which was the firſt City of all Greece, that he came unto, he enquired in what terms the war-affairs ſtood? (for as yet all was not throughly quiet in Greece) and where the Roman fleet was? After he heard that the Roman Conſul and King Philip, were about the paſs of Thermopylæ, and there lay in guard; that the fleet rid at anchor in the port and harbor of Pyræum; he thought it good to uſe expedition, and to make ſpeed for all occaſions whatſoever, and incontinently determined to ſail forward to Peloponneſus. And having at one inſtant waſted Samos and Zacynthus as he went, becauſe they choſe rather to band with D the Ætolians, he ſet ſail for Malea and having a good wind, within few daies he arrived at Pyræum, where the old fleet anchored. At Scyllæum King Eumenes met him with three ſhips: who had been a long time at Ægina, unreſolved in himſelf, whether he ſhould return to defend his own Kingdom (for he heard that Antiochus made preparation at Epheſus for war, as well by Sea as Land) or not to depart a foot from the Romans, upon whoſe fortune depended his whole ſtate. Aulus Atilius, ſo ſoon as he had delivered to his ſucceſſor five and twenty cloſe ſhips of war, looſed from Pyræum, and came to Rome. So Livius with a fleet of eighty one ſhips, armed at their beakheads with braſen pikes, beſides many other ſmaller veſſels, (which open as they were, had braſen heads, as is aforeſaid; or if they were without ſuch pikes, ſerved for eſpials) ſailed to Delos. Much about that time the Conſul Aiclius aſſailed Naupactum. At Delos, Livius for certain dayes
E was ſtaied by contrary winds (for that quarter among the Cyclades is exceeding windy, by reaſon that theſe Iſlands are divided aſunder, ſome with broader gulfs, ſome with narrower.) Polexenidas being certified by the poſt-ſhips (ſet in diverſe places to diſcover) that the Roman armado rid at anchor neer Delos, diſpatched meſſengers to the King, who leaving all matters which he enterpriſed in Helleſpontus, returned to Epheſus as faſt as ever he could make ſail with his ſhips of war, piked at the head: and preſently called a councel, where it was debated, whether he were beſt to hazard a battel at Sea or no? Polyxenidas was of opinion, "That he ſhould not ſlack the time, "but in any wiſe give battel and trie a fight, before that the fleet of Eumenes and the Rhodian "ſhips were joined with the Romans: for ſo in number they ſhould not be much overmatched, "and for all other things have the better, as well for nimbleneſs and agility of ſhips, as for variety
F "of aid-ſouldiers. For the Roman ſhips, as being unworkmanly built, they are heavy of ſteerage "and unweldy, loaden they are and fraught beſides with proviſion of victuals, as they are com-"monly that come into the enemies countrey. But as for your ſhips (ſeeing they leave all about "them peaceable and quiet) they ſhall be charged with nothing but with men and munition. Be-"ſides, the skill of theſe ſeas and lands, and of the winds in theſe quarters, will be a great help unto "you; whereas the enemies muſt needs be much troubled, for want of knowledge in them all. The deviſer of this counſel had credit given unto him on all parts and the rather, for that he was the man himſelf to put in execution the ſame counſel. Two daies they made ſtay to ſet all things in order and readineſs, the third day they ſet forward with a fleet of a hundred ſail, whereof 70 were covered the reſt open, and all of the ſmaller making; and for Phocæa they ſhaped their courſe.
G The King hearing that the Roman Armado approached, departed from thence (for that he was not to be preſent in perſon at the conflict upon the ſea) and went to Magneſia neer Sipylus, for to levy land-forces. But his navy made ſail to Cyſſus, a port of the Erythræans, to attend the coming of the enemy there: as in a place more commodious. The Romans, when the Northern winds were once laid (for they were aloft for certain daies, and locked them in) ſailed from Delos to Phana, a haven Town of the Chians, bearing toward the Ægean ſea. From thence they caſt about with their ſhips to the City, and there having victualled themſelves, they croſſed over to Phocæa. Eumenes

lion; of Bigats in ſilver coin 130000, and in gold 126 li. weight. P. Cornelius the Conſul, having firſt taken hoſtages of the Boian nation, and diſſeized them of the one half of their country, to the inhabiting whereof the people of Rome might if they would ſend their Colonies; at his departure from thence toward Rome to an undoubted and aſſured triumph, licenſed his army, with commandment to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he was come, the Senat had ſummons to aſſemble in the Temple of Bellona; where after
the City riding in triumph. P. Sempronius Blæſus a Tribune of the Commons for the time being, I
ſtepped forth and ſaid, "That his advice was that Scipio ſhould not flatly be denied the honour of
"a triumph, but to put it off to a farther day. And why? The wars (qd. he) of the Ligurians have
"alwaies been joyned and linked with thoſe of Gaul: which nations being ſo near together, uſe
"ever mutually one to ſuccour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battel) had fol"lowed the train of victory, and either himſelf in proper perſon with his brave conquering army
"paſſed into the territory of the Ligurians, or but ſent part of his forces to Q. Minutius, who now
"for three years (or faſt upon) both been detained within thoſe quarters in a war of doubtful i-
"ſue; we might have ſeen an end ere this of the Ligurian war alſo. But now (forſooth) his ſouldi-
"ers are diſmiſſed, and brought home to accompany him & to ſolemnize his triumph; who might
"well have been employed ſtill and done good ſervice to the Common-weal: yea, & may do yet
"(if the Senat be ſo diſpoſed) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regain K
"that, which by over-haſtineſs of triumph hath been over-ſlipped. And therefore, in my opinion
"(qd. he) they ſhould do well to command the Conſul to go his waies back again, and take his
"army with him into his Province, & to do his beſt and utmoſt endeavour to ſubdue the Liguri-
"ans alſo. For unleſs they be brought under and made ſubject unto the people of Rome, the Boi-
"ans be ye ſure will not long be quiet: either we muſt have peace or war at once in both places.
"And ſo P. Cornelius in quality of Pro-Conſul (as many others before him, who in their full Magi-
"ſtracy triumphed not) may after ſome few months have his triumph. To this the Coſ. anſwered
"again and ſaid, That neither the Province of the Ligurians was any part of his charge by lot, nei"ther warred he at all with the Ligurians, nor yet demanded to triumph over them. As for Q.
"Minutius (qd. he) I hope that ſhortly after he hath ſubdued them, he both will require his due L
"triumph, and ſhall likewiſe obtain the ſame. For mine own part, I ſeek no more but to triumph
"over the Boians in Gaul, whom I have vanquiſhed in plain battell, beaten out of the field and
"camp; whoſe whole nation within two daies after the fight and their general diſcomfiture, yiel-
"ded and rendred themſelves into my hands; and from whom I have carried away hoſtages for
"aſſured pledge of future peace: nay, that which is much more than all this, I have had the killing
"of ſo many Gauls in open battel, and fought with ſo many thouſands of Boians, as no General e"ver did before me: the better half of 50000 men are faln upon the edge of the ſword, and many
"a thouſand taken priſoners; ſo as the Boians have none left but old folk and young children.
"Can any man make a wonder then, why a victorious army, leaving no enemy behind in the Pro"vince, is come to Rome to honour the triumph of their Conſul? Whoſe employment, if the Se- M
"nat be diſpoſed to uſe in any other ſervice or Province, Whether of theſe two waies think they,
"will make them more willing and ready to put themſelves into new dangers, and enter into o"ther freſh labour and travell; either to pay them without delay & content them with the due &
"deſerved hire of their former peril and pain, or to ſend them away with bare hope only inſtead
"of the ſubſtance, for to expect ſtill without effect: ſince they have been once already put by and
"enough that day on which the Senat ſent me (deemed & declared the beſt man in all the City)
"to receive that great goddeſs & dame of Ida. This title alone, without any other addition of tri-
"umph, ſhall be ſufficient to recommend to all poſterity for honeſty & honour both, the Image of
"P. Scipio Naſica. This ſaid, not only the whole Senat themſelves condeſcended generally to grant N
him triumph, but alſo with their countenance & authority compelled the Tribunes of the Commons to give over their hold, and ſurceaſe their interpoſition of a negative voice. So P. Cornelius
the Coſ. triumphed over the Boians. In which triumph he cauſed to be carried for ſhew in French chariots, armor, enſigns, and ſpoils of all ſorts: alſo French veſſels of braſs and copper. He comman-
manner (and namely in ſundry French veſſels) 2340 pound weight: lawly, of bigats in coin 234.
To his ſouldiers that followed his triumphant chariot he gave 225 Aſſes apiece, double as much

From thence they caſt about with their ſhips to the City, and there having victualled themſelves, they croſſed over to Phocæa. Eu- menes who was gone to Elæa towatd his fleet, within few daies after, with four and twenty co- H vered ſhips, and more uncovered, returned to the Romans; whom he found preparing and marſhalling themſelves (a little ſhort of Phocæa) for a battel at ſea. Then ſet they all forward with a hundred and fifty cloſe covered ſhips, and more open and without hatches: and being with ſide Northern winds, at the firſt driven to the ſea ſhore, they were forced to ſail ſingle in rank one after another. But afterwards, as the violence of the wind began to be allaied, they aſſaied to croſs over to the haven Corycus, which is above Cyſſus. Polyxenidas, as ſoon as he heard that the enemies were at hand, rejoyced that he had occaſion preſented unto him of a naval battel: and himſelf ſtretched forth the left point of his fleet embattelled far into the ſea, willing the Captains of the ſhips to diſplay the right wing broad, toward the land: and ſo with an even front, he advanced forward to the fight. Which the Roman Admiral ſeeing, ſtruck ſail, took down the maſts, and I laying together al the tackling of the ſhips in one place, attended their coming that followed after. By which time there were thirty in a rank afront, with which, becauſe he would make them equal to the left wing of the enemy, he ſet up the trinkets or ſmall ſails, meaning to make way into the deep, commanding them that followed ſtill, to make head, and direct their prows againſt the right wing neer the land. Eumenes was the rere-Admiral, and kept the rereward cloſe together: but ſo ſoon as they began to be troubled with taking down their tackling, he ſet forward with all ſpeed and haſt that he could make: and by this time were they in view one of the other. Two Carthaginian ſhips led before the Roman navy, which were encountred with three of the Kings ſhips. And conſidering the ods of the number, two of the Kings came about one. And firſt they wiped away the oars on both ſides, then they ſhewed themſelves aloft with their weapons, and K boorded her, and after they had either overturned or killed the defendants, they were maſters of that ſhip. The other that was in ſingle fight, and aſſailed but by one, ſeeing the other ſhip taken by the enemies, fled back into the main fleet, before ſhe was environed by the three enemies. Livius chafing hereat, and angry at the heart, advanced forward with the Admiral ſhip afront the enemy: againſt her, thoſe other two which had encloſed the Carthaginian ſhip aforeſaid, hoping to do the like by this, came onward; which Livius perceiving, commanded the rowers to let their oars hang in the water on both ſides, for the more ſtay and ſteadineſs of the ſhip, and likewiſe to caſt their iron hooks faſhioned like hands, for to grapple the enemies ſhips, as they approached and came neer unto them; and when they were come to cloſe fight in manner of land-ſervice then to remember the valour of the Romans, and not to hold the Kings ſlaves for men of any worth. L And with much more facility and eaſe, than the two ſhips before conquered one, this one for that gained two. By this time the main fleet on both ſides encountred on all ſides, and fought pell-mell. Eumenes who being in the rereward, came laſt in place, after the conflict was begun, perceiving that Livius had diſordered the left wing of the enemies, made head againſt the right, where he ſaw them fighting on even hand, not long after the left wing began to flie. For Polyxenidas, ſo ſoon as he ſaw himſelf without all queſtion overmatched in valour of the ſouldiers, cauſed the trinkets and all the cloth he had to be ſet up, and purpoſed to flie amain. Thoſe likewiſe that were toward the land, and fought with Eumenes, within a while did no leſs. The Romans and Eumenes, ſo long as the mariners were able to plie their oars, and ſo long as they were in hope to annoy the tail of the enemies, followed the chaſe luſtily enough: but after that they perceived M their own ſhips (charged and heavily loaden with victuals) follow after to no purpoſe, and to lag behind nor like to overtake them which were the ſwifter, becauſe they were the lighter: ſtaied at length their purſuit, after they had taken 13 ſhips both with their ſouldiers and mariners, and ſunk ten. Of the Roman Armado there periſhed but one Carthaginian, which at the firſt encounter was beſet with two ſhips. Polyxenidas never gave over flight, but made way ſtill until he had recovered the haven of Epheſus. The Romans abode that day in the place from whence the Kings armado came, purpoſing on the morrow to make freſh ſail after the enemy. And in the mids of their courſe they met with thoſe 35 Rhodian ſhips covered, conducted by Piſiſtratus their Admiral; and taking thoſe alſo with them, they followed the enemy even as far as Epheſus, where in the mouth of the haven, they rid in order of battel: by which bravado, having wrung as it were from N the enemies a plain confeſſion that they were vanquiſhed, the Rhodians and Eumenes were ſent home. The Romans ſetting their courſe for Chius, firſt ſailed by Phœnicus, an haven Town of Erythæa, and having caſt anchor that night, the next day they weighed, and arrived within the Iſland, cloſe to the City it ſelf, where having ſojourned ſome few daies, eſpecially to refreſh their rowers, they paſſed forward to Phocæa. Where leaving four quinquereme Galeaces, the fleet arrived at Canæ. and becauſe the Winter approached, the ſhips were laid up in their docks on drie Land, and for their ſafety were trenched and paled about. In the years end the General aſſembly for election of Magiſtrats was holden at Rome, wherein were created Conſuls L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius. For now all men had an eye to the finiſhing of the war againſt Antiochus. The next morrow were the Prætors alſo choſen, namely, M. Tuccius, L. Aurunculeius, Cneus Fulvius, L. Æmylius, P. Junius, and C. Atinius Labeo. O

The ſeven and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

D WHen L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius were Conſuls, after order taken for the ſervice of the Gods, there was no matter treated of in the Senate, before the ſuit of the Ætolians. And as their Embaſſadors were inſtant and earneſt, becauſe the term of their truce was but ſhort, ſo T. Quintius, who then was returned out of Greece to Rome, ſeconded them. The Ætolians, relying more upon the mercy of the Senate, than the juſtice of their cauſe, and ballancing their old good turns done to the Romans, to the late harms and treſpaſſes committed, uſed humble ſupplication. But ſo long as they were in preſence before the Senators, they were wearied with their interrogatories of all hands, who ſought rather to fetch and wring from them confeſſion of a fault, then any other anſwer; and when they were bidden to void out of the Senat-houſe, they cauſed much debate within. For in the handling of their matter it was ſeen that anger bare more ſway than pity, becauſe they were not ſo much E offended with them for being enemies, as they blamed them for an unruly, untamed, and unſociable nation. And after much hard hold for certain daies together, they reſolved at length, neither to grant nor deny them peace. Two conditions were tendered and preſented unto them, either to refer themſelves wholy to the pleaſure and diſpoſition of the Senate, or elſe to deliver a 1000 talents: and withal to hold thoſe for friends or foes, whomſoever the Romans reputed theirs. And when they were deſirous to draw from the Senators thus much, as to know in what points, and how far forth, they ſhould ſubmit themſelves to the diſcretion of the Senat; they could have no certain anſwer to build upon. And thus without any peace obtained, they were diſmiſſed, with expreſs commandment to void the City that very day, and to be gone out of Italy within 15 dayes following. Then they fell to conſultation in the Senat about the government of the Conſular pro-F vinces. Both Conſuls deſired to have the charge of Greece. And Lælius was a great man with the Senat. Now when the houſe was minded that the Conſuls ſhould either caſt lots or agree between themſelves for their Provinces, he roſe up and ſaid, That it was more decent and befitting to put the matter to the judgment of that honorable court, than to the blind hazard of lots. To this Scipio for the preſent made anſwer, that he would conſider better of it: and after he had conferred ſecretly with his brother apart (who adviſed him to be bold and put it to the Senat) he gave Lælius to underſtand, that he was content to do as he would have him. When this ſtrange courſe and manner of proceeding (either new and unheard of before, or elſe after ſo long diſeaſe of the practiſe thereof forgotten and taken up again) cauſed the Senat to arm themſelves againſt a great ſtriſe and G contention, then P. Scipio Africanus ſaid, That if they would ordain his brother L. Scipio to have the Province of Greece, he would accompany him in that voiage, in quality of his Lieutenant. This one word of his (accepted of them all with a general conſent) ſtaied all debate: for a great mind they had to make a trial, whether Annibal being vanquiſhed could aid King Antiochus more than Africanus the Conqueror aſſiſt the Conſul and the Roman legions. And all in a manner aſſigned Greece to Scipio, and Italy to Lælius. But the Pretors had their Provinces, ſet out to them by lot; L. Aurunculeius obtained the civil juriſdiction of citizens, and L. Fulvius of forainers: L. Æmylius Regillus was L. Admiral of the armado, P. Iunius governed Tuſcany, M. Tuccius Apulia and the Brutii, and L. Atinius Sicily. Moreover that Consul, who was to be employed in Greece, had a commission granted, besides that army which he should receive of M. Acilius (and those were two legions) to furnish himself with a supply of 3000 footmen, and 100 horsemen of Roman citizens; also of 5000 foot, and 200 horse of allies that were Latins: and besides, granted it was in the same commission, that when he was arrived into his Province, he should pass over with his army into Asia, if he thought it so expedient for the Common-weal.

Unto the other Consul was allowed an entire whole army of new souldiers, consisting of two Roman legions, and fifteen thousand foot and six hundred horse of the Latin allies. Q. Minutius had direction (by reason that he wrote how he had performed in his Province all that there was to be done, and that the whole Nation of the Ligurians had yeelded subjection) to translate his forces out of Liguria into the Boians countrey, and to deliver the same to P. Cornelius the Pro-consul. Out of that territory which he had taken away from them after they were vanquished, those City legions were withdrawn, which had been levied and enrolled the year before; and committed they were to the charge of M. Tuccius the Pretor, besides 15000 foot, and 6000 horse of Latine allies: and all these forces were to be employed for to defend and keep in obedience, Apulia and the Brutians countrey. As for A. Cornelius the Pretor of the former year, (who with an army had the government of the Brutii) he was commanded to deliver unto M. Acilius (if the Consul thought so good) the legions transported over into Ætolia, if he would remain there still: but if Acilius would rather return to Rome, then A. Cornelius with that army, was to remain in Ætolia. Thought good it was, that C. Atinius Labeo should receive of M. Æmylius, the government of Sicily and his army: and if it pleased him, to take up and enrol out of that very Province 2000 foot and 100 horse, for to supply and fulfill the broken companies. P. Junius Brutus had commandment to levy a new army for the government of Tuscany to wit, one Roman legion, and 10000 foot of Latine allies, and 400 horse. Also L. Æmilius the Admiral, was to receive of M. Junius the Pretor of the former year, twenty Gallies, and the mariners and oars thereto belonging; and besides, to levy himself 1000 mariners more, and 2000 footmen: and with those ships and souldiers to sail into Asia, and to receive the fleet of C. Livius. As for them that were already in the government of both the Provinces of Spain and of Sardinia, they were to continue there still for one year longer, and to have the same armies at command. This year were two tenths of corn levied of Sicily and Sardinia: and order was given for all the Sicilian corn to be sent into Ætolia to the army: but out of Sardinia, that one part should be brought to Rome, and the other transported over into Ætolia, even to the same place that the other of Sicily aforesaid.

Before the Consuls set forward into their Provinces, it was thought meet, that the Pontifies should give order for the expiation of certain prodigies: for at Rome the Temple of Juno Lucina was smitten with lightning; so as both the lantern, yea, and the leaved dores thereof, were soully disfigured. Likewise at Puteoli, the Town walls in many places, and one gate, was blasted with lightning, and two men besides were strucken dead therewith. At Nursia it was for certain known, that the day being fair and cleer, there arose a stormy tempest, wherein also two free men lost their lives. The Tusculans reported, that with them it rained earth. And the men of Reate brought word, that within their territory a female mule foled. These prodigies (I say) were expiated: and the Latine festival holy-daies were celebrated anew, for that the dole of flesh was not given unto the Laurentins, which of duty should have been delivered. Moreover, a solemn supplication was ordained, in regard of all errours and faults escaped in divine service and religious observances. Also out of the books of Sybilla, the Decemvirs declared and shewed, to what Gods, sacrifice should be made: and ten young springals free born, and ten Virgins likewise, whose Fathers and Mothers yet lived, were employed about the ministery of those sacrifices. The Decemvirs also by night sacrificed young sucklings. And P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before he took his journey, erected an arch in the Capitol (over-against the high street that leadeth thither) with 7 gilded statues and 2 horses: and before that arch, he set up two cesterns or lavers of marble. About this time, 43 principal persons of Ætolia, (among whom were Democritus and his brother) were conveighed to Rome, by two Squadrons or cohorts sent of purpose from M. Acilius; and there were laid up fast in the prison called * The stone quarries: which done, the cohorts aforesaid were commanded by L. Cornelius the Consul, to make return to the army. From Ptolomeus and Cleopatra (King and Queen of Ægypt) there came Embassadors, testifying their joy which they conceived in the behalf of the Romans, in these terms, That M. Acilius the Consul had chased King Antiochus out of Greece: exhorting also the Romans to transport an army into Asia: for that not in Asia only, but likewise in Syria, all men were smitten with fear and amazed. As for the KK. of Ægypt, they would be ready to do for their parts, whatsoever the Senat should set down. Thanks were returned to the K. and Q. aforesaid, and order was taken, that to the Embassadors for a reward should be given 4000 brasen Asses apeece.

* Lautumiæ, or Latomiæ.

L. Cornelius the Consul, having accomplished all things to be done at Rome, published an Edict in a general assembly, That aswell those souldiers whom himself had enrolled for supply, as they who were with A. Cornelius in the Brutians country, should all meet at Brundusium upon the Ides of * Quintilis. Moreover he nominated three Lieutenants, Sex. Digitius, L. Apustius, and C. Fabricius Luscinus, for to gather ships together out of all the Sea-coasts into Brundusium. And when he had prepared and set all things in good order, he departed from the City, clad in his rich

* 5 of July.

A rich coat of arms. There preſented unto the Conſul as he went forth, to the number of 5000 voluntaries, Romans and allies together, who had ſerved their full years in the wars under the conduct of P. Africanus, and now were exempt from ſouldiery, who all offered to go with him and to be enrolled as preſt ſouldiers. Much at the time that the Conſul took his journey (during the feſtival Apollinare games in the honour of Apollo, upon the fift day before the Ides of July) it chanced, that in the day time when the air was cleer and fair, there aroſe a ſuddain darkneſs during the Eclipſe of the ſun, by reaſon that the body of the moon was directly under the Circle and rundle of the ſun. L. Æmylius Regillus alſo Admiral of the war, at the ſame time went to Sea. L. Aurunculeius was charged by order from the Senat, to build 30 Galeaces with five banks of oars, and 20 Gallies with three banks, becauſe a bruit was blown and blazed abroad, that Antiochus
B upon the late battail at Sea, was about to prepare a much greater armado.

The Ætolians, after their Embaſſadors were returned from Rome and had made relation, that there was no hope of peace, albeit all their Sea-coaſts (eſpecially toward Peloponneſus) were ſpoiled and waſted by the Achæans, yet minding more their peril like to enſue, than remembring their loſs received, ſeized the mountain Corax, intending to impeach and ſtop the paſſage of the Romans. For they made no queſtion nor doubt, but that the next ſpring they would return to beſiege and aſſault Naupactum. Acilius, who wiſt well what they expected, thought it better to go in hand with an enterpriſe unlooked for, and namely, to aſſail Lamia: for thus he thought, That ſeeing they had been already brought to a great ſtrait and extremity by King Philip; now they might be taken ſuddainly and ſurpriſed at unawares, becauſe they ſtood in fear of nothing leſs.
C Whereupon, removing from Elatia, he encamped firſt in the country of his enemies neer to the River Sperchius: from whence by night he diſlodged, and advanced forthwith his enſigns, and by the day break had inveſted their walls round about. Great fear and hurly there was, as in an accident unlooked for: yet all that day they defended the City more reſolutly, than a man would have believed and thought they could have done in ſo ſuddain a danger: whiles men ſtood at defence upon the walls, women ſet up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and darts of all ſorts, yea, and ſtones up to the walls unto them. Acilius, after he had ſounded the retreat, brought back his men into the camp about noon: and after they had there refreſhed their bodies with meat and reſt, he gave them warning (before he diſmiſſed the Prætorium) that ere day-light the next morning they ſhould be ready in arms: for that he would not come back again with D them into the camp, before they were maſters of the Town. At the ſame time as the day before, he gave aſſault in many places: and for as much as the Townſmens ſtrength decaied, their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts fainted, within few hours he wan the City. After he had made a riddance of the pillage, ſold ſome part, and given away the reſt, he fell to take counſel what to do afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go againſt Naupactum, conſidering that the Ætolians held and kept the paſs of Corax. Howbeit Acilius, to the end that he would not keep the field in ſummer without doing ſome exploit, and that the Ætolians might not enjoy that peace by the ſlacknes of the Roman ſouldiers, which obtain they could not at the Senats hand, he purpoſed to beſiege Amphiſſa: and ſo the army was conducted thither from Heraclea, by the mountain Oeta. When he had encamped himſelf under the Town walls, he began E not to inveſt it round with men as he did Lamia, but with ordnance and engins to batter it. In many places at once he ran with the ram againſt the walls: and albeit they were ſhaken, the Townſmen went not about either to make ready, or to deviſe and invent any means of defence againſt that inſtrument or engin. All their hope was in truſty armour and hardy valour. And ſo often they ſallied forth, that they diſordred and troubled not only the guards of the enemies, but alſo thoſe that attended about the fabricks and artillery. Howbeit, in many places the wall was battred and breaches made: and even at that very inſtant news came unto him, that his ſucceſſor had landed his army at Apollonia, and was coming by the way of Epirus and Theſſaly. Now came the Conſul with a power of 13000 foot, and five hundred horſe. And by this time was he paſ-
F ſed as far as to the vale and level of Malea: and having ſent certain afore to ſummon the City Hypata, and received anſwer again, that they would do nothing but by a publick decree of the Ætolians: becauſe the ſiege of Hypata ſhould not ſtay him, and Amphiſſa not yet won, he led his forces againſt it, and ſent his brother Africanus before. Ere they came, the Oppidans had quit the Town, for by this time the wall in many places lay open and naked, and were all fled armed and unarmed into a Caſtle which they had, impregnable. The Conſul pitched his tents ſix miles from the Town.

Thither arrived the Athenian Embaſſadors, and firſt they repaired to P. Scipio, who, as we have ſaid, was gone before the main army, and afterwards to the Conſul, intreating for the Ætolians. Of the twain they received a gentler anſwer at the hands of Africanus, who ſeeking ſome honeſt occaſion to leave the Ætolian war, ſet his heart and eye wholly upon Aſia and King Antiochus:
G and to this purpoſe he willed the Athenians to perſwade not only with the Romans but alſo with the Ætolians, to prefer peace before war. And ſpeedily, through the motion and perſwaſion of the Athenians there was a ſolemn embaſſage of the Ætolians diſpatched from Hypata. Induced "they were the rather to hope for peace by the ſpeech of Africanus (for to him they came firſt) "who diſcourſed unto them, how that many Nations and Cities in Spain firſt, afterwards in "Africk, had put themſelves under his protection, and in them all he had left greater teſtimonies "of his clemency and bounty, than of his warlike valour and martial proweſs. Thus they had brought the matter (as they thought) to a good paſs, and made it ſure: but when they came be- H fore the Conſul, they had the ſame anſwer of him, with which they were ſent away from the Senate, and commanded to avoid. The Ætolians wounded therewith anew, ſeeing they could win nothing neither by the mediation of the Athenian embaſſage, nor the gracious anſwer of Afri- canus, ſaid, they would make report thereof unto their States and country-men. So, they returned from thence to Hypata, where they were to ſeek what to do, and could not reſolve: for neither had they whereof to raiſe a thouſand talents: and again, if they ſhould abſolutely put themſelves into their hands, they feared to feel the ſmart thereof in their bodies. Therefore they commanded the ſame Embaſſadors to go again to the Conſul and to Africanus, and to exhibit a petition, that if they were minded indeed and verity to grant them peace, and not by vain ſhew and ſemblance only to fruſtrate and delude the hope of poor ſuppliants they would either rebate I them a quantity of that grand ſum of money, or elſe accept ſo of their abſolute ſurrender, that no free citizen might be touched thereby in his perſon. But nothing could be gotten at the Conſuls hands, for to alter or relent any jot: thus was this embaſſage alſo ſent away as it came, and nothing done. The Athenians came after them in place, the principal man of whoſe embaſſage, Eche- demus, ſeeing the Ætolians wearied with ſo many repulſes, and lamentably to no purpoſe bewailing the miſerable eſtate of their country; put them ſtill in ſome new hope, and gave them counſel to crave truce for ſix moneths, that they might addreſs their Embaſſadors to Rome, and receive an anſwer from thence: ſhewing unto them, that this delay could not augment their preſent calamity, which could not worſe be; but contrary-wiſe, time and ſpace coming between might afford many accidents whereby their preſent miſery might be mitigated and allayed. So by the advice K of Echedemus, the ſame men were ſent once again who had communed before with P. Scipio, and by his means obtained of the Conſul a truce for that term; which was the thing they craved.

The ſiege being raiſed before Amphiſſa, M. Acilius, after he had delivered up his army into the hands of the Conſul, reſigned his government, and departed out of the Province: and the Con-ſul likewiſe from Amphiſſa returned into Theſſaly, intending through Macedony and Thracia to conduct his army into Aſia.

Then Africanus entred into ſpeech with his brother, and ſaid: "The journey which you en-
"terpriſe L. Scipio, I for my part approve and think well of, but all reſteth in the will and plea-
"ſure of Philip: who if he be faſt and faithful to the ſtate and Empire of Rome, he will grant us
"paſſage, he will afford us victuals, he will furniſh us with all things which in ſo long a voyage L
"are neceſſary to the help and ſuſtenance of our army: but if he fail and forſake us once, you
"muſt make accompt of no ſafety and ſecurity throughout all Thracia: therefore I am of advice
"that the Kings affection be firſt founded. And that will beſt be done if the meſſenger who ſhall
"be diſpatched unto him, may come upon him on a ſuddain, and take him unprovided and ha"ving no time to put any prepenſed plot in practiſe. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a moſt nimble and active young Gentleman, was at that time choſen for the fitteſt perſon to perform this action:
who taking freſh poſt Horſes all the way as he rode, with incredible celerity made ſuch ſpeed, that from Amphiſſa (for thence he had his diſpatch) in three dayes ſpace, he arrived at Pella.
The King was at a feaſt or banket when he came, and wine he had taken full liberally. And finding him thus diſpoſed to ſolace and recreat his ſpirits, he had no reaſon to ſuſpect that he was M minded and inclined to any change or alteration: and ſo for that time this gueſt was bidden welcome, and had good cheer made him. The morrow after he ſaw the proviſion of victuals in great ſtore ready for the armies, he beheld the Bridges made over the Rivers, and the high wayes mended and prepared, where paſſage was difficult. With theſe intelligences he returned to the Conſul, with as great ſpeed as he went, and met him at Thaumaci. From whence, the army in much joy and with greater and more aſſured hope, entred into Macedony; where all was provided to their hands. The King at their coming received them right ſtately, and at their departure conducted them on the way as royally. Very willing, ready and courteous he ſhewed himſelf:
which Africanus much liked and highly commended, being a man as in all other things ſingular, ſo in allowing of elegancy and humanity, if it were without ſuperfluity and exceſs, nothing nice N and ſtreight-laced. Thus they held on their journey unto Hellespontus, paſſing through Macedo- ny and Thrace, and Philip ſtill accompanied them, and provided all things for their uſe afore-ſtand.

After the battail fought at Sea neer Corycum, Antiochus having had all the winter time free without any empeachment to furniſh himſelf with forces both for Land and Sea, above all things ſtudied and deviſed how to repair his fleet, for fear he ſhould be quite diſſeized and diſpoſſeſſed of the Sea. And evermore this ran in his mind, that he had an overthrow, and yet the Rhodians fleet was away. For thus he caſt with himſelf, that if they alſo ſhould be preſent at the next conflict (and ſurely the Rhodians, thought he, will not for any thing be behind again) he then ſhould have need of a mighty number of ſhips, to match the enemies Armado as well in greatnes as good- G neſs. And therefore he had both ſent Annibal into Syria for to take up the ſhips of the Phæni-cians, and alſo commanded Polyxenidas to repair thoſe veſſels which he had already and to make and rig others with ſo much more diligence as his fight afore was leſs fortunate. Himſelf paſſed the winter in Phrygia, and ſeeking for aid out of all places, he ſent out as far as into Gallogracia.
The people there at that time were great warriors; keeping ſtill the courages of Gauls, for that the race of that nation was not yet extinct and worn out. His ſon Seleucus he had left in Æolis with an

A an army to keep the maritime Cities in obedience, which Eumenes from Pergamus of one ſide, and the Romans from Phocæa and Erythræ on the other ſide, ſollicited to rebellion. The Roman fleet, as I ſaid before, wintered at Cana. Thither in the mids almoſt of winter came Eumenes with two thouſand foot, and a hundred horſe. Who having given out unto Livius, that great prizes might be raiſed out of the enemies territory about Thyatira, had ſo perſwaded and wrought with him, that he ſent with him five thouſand ſouldiers: who being ſet forth to this rode and expedition, in few dayes drove away a mighty booty. Amid theſe matters, there hapned a mutiny in Phocæa, by occaſion of ſome that would have withdrawn and turned away the hearts of the multitude unto King Antiochus. The wintering of the fleet was chargeable to that City. The impoſition of a tribute was heavy, in regard that they were put to the finding of five hundred ſide caſſocks, and as many coats for liveries: the ſcarcity of corn alſo was grievous unto them; for B which default the ſhips and the Roman garriſon abandoned the place and departed: whereupon that faction which in all their ſpeeches and aſſemblies drew the common people to ſide with Antiochus, was rid of all fear. The Senat and the principal citizens of Phocæa were of opinion to continue to the laſt, in the aſſociation of the Romans: but the perſwaders and counſellers of a revolt were of more credit with the multitude.

The Rhodians were not ſo ſlow the ſummer paſt, but they were as forward now in the ſpring: for before mid-March, they ſent out the ſame Pauſiſtratus Admiral of a fleet of ſix and thirty ſail. And by this time Livius looſed from Cana, and ſailed toward Helleſpontus, with thirty ſhips, and ſeven Gallies of four banks of oars, which King Eumenes had brought with him, to the end that he might prepare things neceſſary for the paſſage of the army, which he ſuppoſed would come by C Land. And firſt he fell with the bay or port which they call, The rode of the * Achæans, from whence he went up to Ilium, where, after he had ſacrificed to Minerva, he gave gracious audience to the embaſſages of the neighbors bordering, which came from Eleus, Dardanus, and Rhœtium, who committed their Cities unto his protection. From thence he directed his courſe to the ſtreights of Helleſpontus, and leaving ten ſhips in the rode over-againſt Abydus, with the reſt of the fleet, he paſſed over into Europe, to aſſault Seſtos. As the armed ſouldiers approached their walls, the frantick Prieſts of Cybele called Galli, bereft of their wits, preſented themſelves firſt unto them before their gates, in their ſolemn habit and veſtments, ſaying, That they being the ſervants and miniſters of Dame Cybele the mother of the Gods, were come by the inſtinct and commandment of that goddeſs to beſeech the Roman General to ſpare the walls and the City. And not one of D them had any harm done unto them. Anon, the whole body of the Senat with the Magiſtrats came forth to yeeld the Town. From thence they croſſed over to Abydus, where (after many parlies, in which they had ſounded their minds, and could have no anſwer tending to peace) they addreſſed themſelves to lay ſiege to the City, and to aſſault it.

Whiles theſe things ſtood thus about Helleſpont, Polyxenidas a Rhodian born, but baniſhed his countrey, and a Captain for King Antiochus, hearing that a Rhodian fleet was gone to Sea, and that Pauſiſtratus their Admiral, had in open audience given out certain proud and diſdainful ſpeeches againſt him, entred into a privat quarrel with him, toſſing and deviſing in his mind night and day nothing elſe, but how he might by ſome effectual and worthy deeds, check and confute thoſe brave and glorious words of his. He diſpatched therefore unto him as a meſſenger, a man E well known unto him, with credence and inſtructions to give him to underſtand, that himſelf would (if he might) ſtand both Pauſiſtratus and his country in good ſtead: and that Pauſiſtratus (if it pleaſed him) had means to reſtore him again into his native country. When Pauſiſtratus marvailed hereat, and was very inquiſitive to know how this might be effected; and gave him his faithful promiſe (at his requeſt) either to joyn with him in the action, or elſe to conceal all and keep counſel: then the meſſenger declared, that Polyxenidas would make over unto him the Kings navy either entire, or the greater part thereof: and in conſideration and recompence of this ſo great demerit, he deſired no more but that he might return into his country. The importance of this matter was ſo great, that he neither believed his words, nor yet neglected and deſpiſed the ſame. So he went to Panormus, a place in the Land of Samos, and there he abode to view F and ſee the thing that was offred unto him. Courriers there ran between, and never would Pauſiſtratus give credit to the party, until Polyxenidas wrote a letter with his own hand in the preſence of his ſaid meſſenger, that he would perform whatſoever he had promiſed, yea, and ſent the ſame letters ſealed with his own ſign Manual. By this ſure pledge or gage, Pauſiſtratus made full account that he had the traitor ſurely bound and obliged unto him. For thus he thought, that Polyxenidas living as a ſubject under the King, would never hazard the danger of ſuch pregnant matter to appear againſt himſelf, teſtified under his own hand-writing: ſo from that time forward the means of this pretended and counterfeit treaſon was deviſed and agreed upon. Polyxenidas gave him to underſtand, that he would of purpoſe lay aſide and neglect preparation of all furniG ture, that he would neither have rowers nor other mariners in any number about his fleet: moreover, under a colour of calking and calfretting he would lay up ſome ſhips on dry Land: others he would ſend away into the havens neer at hand, and keep ſome few riding at anchor before Epheſus in the haven, and thoſe (if he were forced to battail) he would ſet out to fight. The ſame negligence that Pauſiſtratus heard ſay Polyxenidas would uſe in his fleet, the ſame himſelf preſently ſhewed in his own. For ſome of his ſhips he ſent to Halicarnaſſus for victuals, and other to Samos the City, to the end that he might be in readineſs when the traitor gave the ſignal of aſſault.

Poly-

Polyxenidas ſtill by falſe ſemblance encreaſed the errors and vain imaginations of Pauſiſtratus: for H ſome ſhips indeed he drew aland and laid up dry: and as if he meant to hale up more, he repaired and amended the docks. Oremen and mariners he ſent not forth out of their winter harbors to go to Epheſus, but ſecretly aſſembled them to Magneſia. Now it fortuned that a certain ſouldier ſerving under King Antiochus, who was come to Samos about ſome private affairs of his own, was apprehended there for a ſpy, and brought to Panormus before the Admiral Pauſiſtratus. Who, being demanded what they did at Epheſus; I know not whether for fear, or upon ſmall loyalty that he bare to his Prince and countrey, diſcovered all: namely, that the fleet rid in the haven rigged, decked and trimmed in readineſs: Item, that all the rowers and mariners were ſent to Sipylus in Magneſia: Item, that ſome veſſels, and thoſe very few, were drawn up to land, and the docks and harbors were ſhut up cloſe: and laſtly, that never at any time before, the navy was ſo carefully I looked unto, nor Sea-affairs ſo well managed. But the mind of Pauſiſtratus was ſo poſſeſſed before, with fooliſh conceits and vain hopes, that he would not believe theſe informations and intelligences for true. Polyxenidas having ſet all things forward and in good readineſs, by night ſent for the rowers and mariners from Magneſia: and having in great haſt ſhot to Sea, and ſet aflote thoſe veſſels which lay at one ſide upon the land, after he had ſpent the whole day, not ſo much in making proviſion, as trifling out the time on ſet purpoſe, becauſe he would not have the fleet to be ſeen when it ſet forth, weighed anchor and looſed after the ſun was gone down: and with 70 ſail of covered ſhips, becauſe he had a contrary wind, entred the Bay of Pygela before day, where reſting all the live long day for the ſame purpoſe as before, the next night he ſailed to the neereſt coaſts of Samos. From whence he gave commandment to one Nicander an Archpirat, to ſet ſail K for Palinurus, with five cloſe covered ſhips, there to land; and from thence to march with his armed ſouldiers over the fields the neereſt way to Panormus, and to come upon the back of the enemies: himſelf in the mean while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Panormus, there to keep the entry and mouth of the haven on both ſides. Pauſiſtratus at firſt was troubled for a while at this unexpected occurrent: but afterwards, as one that was an old beaten ſouldier, he quickly took heart again, and calling his wits together, ſuppoſed that he might more eaſily re-pulſe the enemies by Land than by Sea; and led his ſouldiers in two Squadrons unto the promontories which bearing out into the Sea like two horns, to force the haven: from which two capes or heads he ſuppoſed that he might eaſily ſet back and put by the enemies with ſhooting darts from both ſides. But Nicander who was ſent by Land, impeached this deſign of his, ſo that he was L forced ſuddainly to change his mind and alter that courſe, and therefore commanded all his men to go a ſhipboord and away. Hereupon exceeding fear there was both among the ſouldiers and alſo the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by Sea and not to fight, ſeeing themſelves invironed at once both by Land and Sea. Pauſiſtratus ſuppoſing the only way to eſcape and ſave themſelves, was to make way through the mouth of the haven, and ſo to recover ſea-room; after he had ſeen all his men embarked, commanded the reſt to follow, and himſelf firſt plying and labouring hard with oars, ſcudded amain with his ſhip to the entrance of the haven. Now when ſhe was once paſt the ſtreight and come into the open Sea, Polyxenidas was there to welcome him with three Galeaces of five banks of oars, and ſo beſet him. The poor ſhip was wounded with the iron pikes bearing out in the beak heads of the Galeaces, and ſo bouged and ſunk withal. The M defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with ſhot of darts, and among the reſt, Pauſiſtra- tus himſelf manfully fighting loſt his life. The reſt of the ſhips were boorded and taken, ſome before the haven, others within: and ſome there were that by Nicander were ſeized as they laboured to looſe from the land, and to lanch forth. Five ſhips only of Rhodes, and two of Cous, eſcaped cleer and fled, which made themſelves way even among the thickeſt of their enemies, by the means of a fearful burning flame of fire that they had with them. For they ſet me two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two ſprit-ſails, in every ſhip, carying iron pots and pans afore them full of light fire. The Gallies of Erythrea, meeting the Rhodian ſhips not far from Samos as they fled the which were coming to help them, turned their courſe backward into Helleſpontus, unto the Romans. About the ſame time Seleucus gained the City of Phocæa by treaſon, entring in N at a gate which the warders ſet open of purpoſe for him. And for fear, Cymæ and other Towns of that coaſt revolted unto him.

Whiles theſe things thus paſſed in Æolis, and that Abydus had endured the ſiege for certain dayes by the defence of the Kings garriſon that manned the walls: now that all were overtoiled and wearied, the Magiſtrats of the City (by the permiſſion of Philotas Captain of the garriſon) articled with Livius upon conditions to render the Town. The only point whereupon they ſtood, and which ſtayed the concluſion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the Kings ſouldiers ſhould be ſent away armed or diſarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, news came of the Rhodians defeat, and ſo the opportunity of gaining the Town ſlipt out of their hands. For Livius fearing, leſt Polyxenidas puffed up with the ſucceſs of ſo great an exploit, would ſurprize the fleet O that rid at Cana, leaving preſently the ſiege before Abydus, and the garding of Helleſpont, put to Sea afreſh thoſe ſhips that lay dry at Cana. And Eumenes came to Elea: But Livius went to Phocæa with all his fleet, to which he had adjoyned two trireme gallies of Mitylenæ. But when he heard ſay it was kept with a ſtrong garriſon of the Kings, & that Seleucus was encamped not far off, after he had pilled the ſea-coaſt, and charged haſtily his ſhips with a good booty, & thoſe were prizes of men eſpecially, he ſtayed no longer there than until Eumenes might overtake him with his fleet,

A but directed his course streight to Samos. The Rhodians upon the first news of this their overthrow, feared much, and withal mightily sorrowed: for besides the loss of their Sea-souldiers and ships, they lost also the very flour and strength of their youth: for asmuch as many young Gentlemen of their nobility, accompanied Pausistratus, among other motives, in regard of his authority, which was right great and for good desert among his country-men. But afterwards considering how treacherously they were over-wrought, and namely, by one of their own citizens, born among them, their melancholy turned into choler, and their sorrow into anger. Whereupon they sent forth ten ships immediatly, and few dayes after other ten, under the conduct of Eudamus the Admiral over them all: who albeit he were not for other feats of arms and martial skill equal to Pausistratus, yet they supposed verily he would be a leader so much the more wary and circum-
B spect, as he was the less hardy and courageous. The Romans and King Eumenes first fell with the Iland Erythræa, where they stayed one night, and the morrow after gained the point of Corycus, a promontory of the Teians. From whence when they purposed to cross over to the neerest parts of Samos, not waiting for the sun-rising, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they hoised up sails against a very doubtful and dangerous tempest: for the wind turned from North-east to full North, as they were in the mids of their course, whereby they began to be mightily tossed among the surging billows of the rough and angry Sea. Polyxenidas supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Samos, there to joyn with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Ephesus, and first anchored at Myonesus: from thence he sailed to an Iland called Macris, to the end that as the enemies fleet sailed by, he might take advantage to set upon C either some ships singled and severed from the body of the fleet or play upon the tail and reregard thereof. After that he perceived the whole fleet to be dispersed by force of the tempest, he thought first to take that occasion to fall upon them: but the wind rising still more and more, and raising greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come neer to boord them, he cut over to the Iland Ethalia, minding the next day to assail the ships in the main Sea as they passed to Samos. Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samia, which they found void and empty: the rest of the fleet after they had been tossed and tormented all the night long in the deep, at length light upon the same harbor. Where being advertised by the peasants of the country, that the enemies ships lay in the rode of Athalia, they fell to consult, whether presently to bid battail and put it to the hazard, or expect the arrival of the D Rhodian fleet. Deferring therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed) they traversed to Corycus, from whence they came. Polyxenidas likewise, having staid at anchor in vain returned to Ephesus: and then the Roman ships, while the Seas were thus cleer of enemies, sailed over to Samos. Thither also arrived the Rhodian fleet few daies after: and that it might appear how long looked for it was, they all presently set sail for Ephesus, with purpose either to try an issue by a battel at Sea, or else if the enemy refused the tryal, to express and wring from him a plain confession of cowardise: which was a material point and of great importance to move the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Being arrived to the very haven mouth, they embattailed their ships and stood directly affront opposed unto it. And when they saw none make sail nor set out against them, the one part thereof rode aflote at anchor still in the very haven mouth; the E other discharged the souldiers and set them a land. Upon whom (as they were driving a mighty booty which they had raised by foraging all the country over) Andronicus a Macedonian, who lay in garrison at Ephesus, sallied forth, even as they approached the walls of the City; and having eased them of a great part of their prey aforesaid, he chased them to the Sea unto their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having bestowed an ambush about the mid-way between, marched in order of battail against the City, to see if peradventure they could train forth the Macedonian again without the walls: but perceiving that no man durst come abroad for suspicion and fear of an await, they returned to their ships again; and when they saw their enemies would not abide them neither at Sea nor on Land, in the end the fleet sailed again to Samos from whence it came. Thence the Pretor made out two Gallies of Italian confederats, and as many Rhodians under the F conduct of Epicrates the Rhodian Admiral, to defend and keep the streights of Cephalenia, which Hibristas the Lacedæmonian together with the youth of the Cephalens, infested with his roving and robbing, in so much as there could no ships pass by Sea to and fro with victuals between Italy and that coast. At Pyræum Epicrates met with L. Aemilius Regillus coming to succeed in the Admiralty: who hearing of the defeat of the Rhodians, and having himself but two Quinquereme Galleaces, brought Epicrates back with him into Asia with four ships. There accompanied them also the open ships of the Athenians. And he passed over by the Sea * Ægeum. Thither also ar- * Archipelagum.
rived Timasicrates the Rhodian in the dead of the night with two Quadrireme gallies from Samos.
G Who being brought unto Æmylius, declared how he was sent to quiet and defend that Sea-coast, which the Kings roving ships and men of war by their often excursions from Hellespontus and Asydus, had made too hot for the Hulks and other ships of burden which used to pass that way. As Æmylius sailed from Chios to Samos, two Rhodian Quadrireme Gallies were sent by Livius to meet him: and King Eumenes also with two Quinquereme galleaces presented himself unto him. Being all arrived at Samos, Æmylius after he had received the navy of Livius, and sacrificed orderly as the manner was, called a councel. At which C. Livius (for his opinion was asked first) spake and said, "That no man giveth more sound and faithful counsel than he, who perswadeth another man "to that which himself would do in the same case. As for me, my intent and purpose was, to

"go againſt Epheſus with the whole armado, and thither to bring with me the veſſels of burden H
"charged with heavy ballaſt of gravel and ſand, and to ſink them in the very haven mouth, for to "choak it up. And to make this bar againſt the haven, it was a matter (ſaid he) of leſs difficulty,
"for that the mouth and guller of the haven, was in manner of a river long, narrow, and full of "ſhelfs and ſhallows. By which mean I ſhould have cut off the benefit of the Sea from the enemy, "and make him loſe the uſe altogether of his navy. But no man there beſides himſelf thought well of this device. King Eumenes demanded, what they would do then after this choaking up and ſtoppage of the haven paſſage, by ſinking the ſhips? whether they would depart from thence with their own navy at liberty, to help their allies and terrifie and affright their enemies; or never the later ſtill, keep the haven (as it were) in ſiege with the whole fleet? For if they departed, who could make doubt but that the enemy would pluck up thoſe dams and bars that there lay I drowned; yea, and with leſs ado and trouble, open the haven again, than it was ſtopped? and if they meant to tary there nevertheleſs, to what purpoſe then was the haven ſhut up? But contrary-wiſe, they within Epheſus (quoth he) being in ſurety for any danger from their haven and having a moſt rich and wealthy City of their own, furniſhed with all things out of Aſia, would paſs the ſummer ſeaſon in reſt and repoſe; whiles the Romans floting in the open wide Sea, expoſed to the violence of waves and lying at the mercy of tempeſts, ſhould be driven to keep a continual guard, diſfurniſhed of all things, and rather tied up and debarred themſelves, for being able to effect thoſe things that were needful to be done, than in caſe to empeach and ſhut up their enemies. Then Eudamus the Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, opined for his part, and ſpake to the queſtion, ſaying, That he rather diſliked of that courſe, than knew himſelf a better, or could ad- K viſe what was to be done. Epicrates the Rhodian was of mind, to leave Epheſus for the preſent, and to ſend part of his ſhips into Lycia, for to aſſociate unto them Patara, the capital City of that nation: ſhewing two things of great conſequence, that hereby would accrue. For, both the Rho-dians aſſured of peace, and ſecured from all danger of thoſe quarters that lie about their Iſland, might thereby attend wholly, and employ all their forces upon the regard of this only war againſt Antiochus: and alſo the Armado which was prepared in Lycia might be ſtopped and empeached, for ever joining with Polyxenidas. This opinion imported, and prevailed moſt. Howbeit, thought good it was and agreed upon, that Regillus ſhould preſent himſelf before Epheſus, with the whole fleet, to ſtrike a terror into the enemies. And C. Livius was ſent with four Rhodian quadrireme Gallies, and two Smyrnean open ſhips into Lycia, with direction to take Rhodes in the way, and L with them there to communicate all his counſels. The Cities which he paſſed by, namely, * Mi- letus, * Myndus, * Halicarnaſſus, * Cnidus and Cous, performed willingly whatſoever was enjoined and impoſed upon them. Being arrived at Rhodes, he declared unto the Rhodians the effect of his commiſſion, and withal required their advice. They all approved the deſign, and when he had taken of them to the fleet that he had of his own, three quadrireme gallies more, he ſailed to * Patara. At the firſt he had a merry gale of wind, that ſet them forward directly toward the City, and good hope they had with their ſuddain terrour to do ſome good with the inhabitants: but afterwards, the wind being come about, the Sea roſe, and the ſurging waves began to make it troubleſome and dangerous; howbeit they laboured ſo with oars that they gat to the ſhore ſide.
But neither was there about the City any ſafe bay to ride in, neither were they able to keep the M Sea with anchor without the haven mouth of the enemies City, the Sea was ſo rough, and the night ſo neer. So paſſing along by the wall ſide of the City, they ſailed to the port of Phanicus, leſs than two miles diſtant from thence, which was a ſafe rode for their ſhips from all danger of Sea, but high cliffs and rocks there were over their heads which commanded them, and thoſe the Townſmen quickly ſeized, with the aſſiſtance of the Kings ſouldiers whom they had in garriſon.
Againſt whom Livius ſent out the aid-ſouldiers of the Iſſeans, and the nimbleſt and moſt agile young men of the Smyrneans, notwithſtanding the landing places were very difficult and untoward. Theſe ſuſtained the fight at firſt, ſo long as they ſhot darts, and made petty excurſions and profers rather of skirmiſhes, than a direct battel, as being but few in number. But after that they ran out of the City in great numbers, and that the whole multitude was iſſued forth, Livius feared N leſt not only thoſe auxiliars ſhould be environed and encloſed, but alſo the ſhips diſtreſſed and endangered from the land: ſo he brought forth to fight, not the ſouldiers only, but all the rabble of the mariners alſo and the rowers, armed and furniſhed with whatſoever weapons they could find.
And even then alſo there was a doubtful and dangerous conflict, wherein beſides certain ſouldiers
L. Apuſtius died in the conflict of this ſuddain and tumultuary skirmiſh. Yet in the end, the Lycians were diſcomfited, put to flight, and chaſed into their City. The Romans likewiſe retired to their ſhips, carrying away with them no bloudleſs victory for their part. From thence they ſhaped their courſe to the gulf or narrow ſtreight of Telmeſſus (which of one ſide toucheth Caria, and Ly- cia on the other) laying aſide all hope to aſſail Patara any more: and ſo the Rhodians were diſcharged and ſent home. Livius after he had coaſted along Aſia croſſed over into Greece, to the end, that having communed and conferred with the Scipios (who then abode about Theſſaly) he might ſail directly into Italy.

Æmylius when he had intelligence, that the deſignment intended in Lycia was given over, and that Livius was departed into Italy, being himſelf alſo returned to Samos (for that he was by violence of tempeſt repulſed from Epheſus, without effect of his enterpriſe) thought it was a ſhame and diſhonour, that the adventure was given upon Patara in vain, and therefore determined in

A proper perſon to make a voyage thither with his whole fleet, and to aſſault the City with all the force he could poſſible. And having paſſed along Miletus, and all that coaſt of the aſſociats, they disbarked from the gulf or creek of Bargilla, and came a land neer Iaſſus. The City was held by a garriſon of the Kings: and the Romans waſted by way of hoſtility, the territory about it. Then Æmylius ſent certain to parle with the chief citizens and the Magiſtrats, to ſound them how they were diſpoſed, and alſo to ſollicite them to revolt: but being anſwered again that it lay not in their own power to do as they would, he marched forward to give an aſſault to the City. Now there were certain Iaſſians, baniſhed perſons, in company with the Romans, who in great number beſought and importuned the Rhodians, not to ſuffer a City, ſo neer a neighbour and linked in bloud unto them, for to periſh and come to ruin, eſpecially having no way offended: alledging, B that the only cauſe of their baniſhment was their loyalty unto the Romans, and by the ſame violence of the Kings garriſon ſouldiers, were they alſo held in awe who remained in the City, by which themſelves had been expeiled. For all the Iaſſians in general were of one mind, moſt willing and deſirous to avoid and ſhake off the ſervitude under the King. The Rhodians were moved in compaſſion with their prayers, and joining unto them King Eumenes alſo, partly by ſhewing the conſanguinity and kindred between them, and partly by pitying and lamenting the diſtreſſed ſtate of the City (beſieged, as it were, already by the Kings garriſon) they prevailed ſo much that they forbare to aſſail it. So they departed from thence, and becauſe all other parts were peaceable, they ſailed along the coaſt of Aſia, until they arrived at * Lotyma, a port or haven town even a-C gainſt Rhodes. There in the Principia began firſt a ſecret whiſpering among the Colonels (which afterwards came to the ears of Æmylius himſelf) namely, That the navy was led away far enough off from Epheſus, where by right and of duty he was to war; to the end, that the enemy being left at liberty behind their backs, might attempt to do what he liſt without controlment, againſt ſo many Cities and States of the Roman allies, neer unto him. Æmylius was moved herewith, and calling unto him the Rhodians, demanded of them, Whether the whole armado might ride conveniently within the haven of Patara? And when they anſwered No, he took that occaſion to paſs no further, but to give over the voyage, and ſo brought back his ſhips to Samos.

In this ſame time Seleucus the ſon of Antiochus, after he had kept his army all winter time in Æolis, employing it partly in ſuccouring his aſſociats, and partly in ſacking and pilling thoſe whom D he could not draw into aſſociation, intended to invade the confines of King Eumenes his realm, whiles he (together with the Romans) was buſied far from home, in aſſailing the maritime parts of Lycia. And firſt he approached Elæa in countenance of an enemy, with banner diſplaied; but afterwards, leaving to beſiege the City, after ſpoil made in hoſtile manner of the territory, he marched forward to beſiege and aſſault the head City and capital ſtrength of al his Kingdom * Pergamus. Attalus at the beginning ſeemed rather to brave and provoke him unto fight with his ſtrong guards that he had placed without the City, and excurſions with his horſemen and light armour, than to ſtand upon his guard and defence, and to receive the forces of his enemy: but at length, ſeeing by theſe light skirmiſhes that he was in no reſpect able to match Seleucus, he retired himſelf within his walls, and ſo the City began to be beſieged. And much about the ſame time, E Antiochus alſo being departed from Apamea, firſt lay encamped at Sardis, and afterwards, not far from the camp of Seleucus, neer to the head or ſource of the river * Caicus, with a mighty army compoſed of diverſe and ſundry nations. The greateſt ſhew of terror in this army was a redoubled Regiment of Gauls, to the number of four thouſand, hired for wages, whom with ſome few other among them, he ſent out to waſt and deſtroy all parts of the territory about Pergamus. When news hereof came to Samos, Eumenes at the firſt, being called away by this war, (begun at home, even at his very dores) made haſt with his fleet to Elæa; where finding in readineſs certain horſemen and footmen both lightly appointed, by their ſure convoy and ſafe conduct, he came to Pergamus before the enemies had knowledge thereof, or enterpriſed anything. Where once a-F gain they began to make light skirmiſhes by way of excurſions, for in truth Eumenes lay off, and was not willing to hazard the main chance upon a throw. Few dayes after, both the Roman and Rhodian fleet came from Samos and were arrived at Elæa for to aid the King Eumenes. When Antiochus was advertiſed that they had landed their forces at Elæa, and that ſo many armadoes were met together in that one haven, and hearing withal about the ſame time, that the Conſul was already with a power in Macedony making reparation of all things for his paſſage over Helleſpont: he ſuppoſed now it was high time (before that he were preſſed at once both by Land and Sea) to treat for peace, and therefore he ſeized a certain hill over againſt Elæa, to fortify and encampin. Where, leaving his whole power of Infantry, he deſcended into the plain, under the very walls of Elæa, with all his Cavalry, to the number of ſix thouſand Horſe. And ſending an herald to Æmylius, he gave him to underſtand, that he was deſirous to have a treaty of peace.
G Æmylius ſent for Eumenes from Pergamus, and they both, together with the Rhodians, debated in councel what to do. The Rhodians refuſed not the offer. But Eumenes ſaid it was neither honourable to parle of peace at that time, nor yet poſſible to conclude thereof, if they went about it. "For being as we are (quoth he) pinned up within our walls and beſieged, how can we receive "from another, conditions of peace, ſaving our credit and honour? and who will hold that for a "firm and aſſured peace, which we ſhall contract without the preſence of the Conſul, without the "authority of the Senat, and without the grant of the people of Rome? For I demand of you, when "ye have made a peace, whether you will return preſently into Italy or no? whether you will "withdraw

" withdraw your fleet and army? or rather wait and expect to know the Conſul his mind and H
" adviſe, the Senats pleaſure and ordinance, and the general aſſent of the people in that behalf? It
" remaineth then after that is done, that you ſtay ſtill in Aſia, and that your forces being brought " back again into their wintering harbors, (after they have done with warfare) fall to conſume
" and eat out our allies, by charging them with proviſion of victuals: and afterwards, if it ſhall ſo
" pleaſe the higher powers, and thoſe that are in authority ſo to ordain, we muſt begin that war " anew, which now we are able (if we ſlack not the time, nor ſtop the forward courſe wherein we " are) before winter come, with the favor and power of the Gods, to finiſh and bring to a final
" end. This advice took place; and anſwer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treaty of peace before the Conſul his coming. Antiochus having thus in vain ſought for peace, when he had firſt forraged and waſted the territory of Elaa, and afterwards of Pergamus, left his I ſon Seleucus there, and went himſelf in perſon to * Adramytteum, pilling and ſpoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of hoſtility. Now this territory is a rich country, called, The champain plains of Thebe: much renouned by the Poet Homer in his poem; and in no one place beſides of all Aſia got the Kings ſouldiers a greater booty and more pillage. Thither arrived alſo to A- dramytteum both Æmylius and Eumenes (having fet a compaſs by ſea) for the defence of the ſaid City. During this time, they ſent for a thouſand foot, and a hundred horſe out of Achæa to come unto Elæa: all which forces were commanded by Captain Diophanes. So ſoon as they were diſbarked and landed, there were ready to receive them certain men ſent from Attalus of purpoſe to meet them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus. They were all old ſouldiers and well experienced in feats of war: and their leader Diophanes had been brought up and trained under Phi- K lopœmenes, the greateſt warrior in thoſe dayes of all the Greeks, who took but two dayes for to reſt his horſe and men, and to take view of the enemies guards, namely, in what places and at what time they uſed cuſtomably either to come forward, or to retire. The Kings ſouldiers were approached almoſt to the very foot of the hill, where the City is ſituate. By means whereof they might forage behind at their will, and there was not one iſſued out of the City ſo much as to lance a dart aloof againſt the corps de guard of the enemies. After they were once ſo neer driven for fear, that they were fain to keep themſelves cloſe within the walls, the Kings ſouldiers without, began firſt to contemn, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had not their horſes ſo much as ſadled and bridled, and ſome few were left in arms and in ordinance of battail: the reſt were gone aſide and ſpred over all parts of the champain: ſome went to play and took themſelves to L youthful ſports and wanton riot: others fell to feeding, pampering their bellies, and making good cheer under covert ſhade, and many were laid along aſleep. Diophanes beheld all the manner hereof aloft from an high turret of the City Pergamus, and preſently gave commandment to his ſouldiers to take arms and to be ready at the gate. Himſelf went to Attalus, and told him, that he purpoſed to aſſail the enemies corps de guard. Attalus (although he were very loth) gave him leave; for he ſaw full well, that he was to fight with one hundred horſe againſt three hundred: and one thouſand foot againſt four thouſand. Being out of the gate, he ſat him down not far from the enemies corps de guard, waiting when ſome good opportunity and occaſion would offer it ſelf. Both they within Pergamus of one ſide, deemed this to be folly rather than hardineſs; and alſo the enemies on the other ſide making towards them for a while, and perceiving them not to M ſtir, altered nothing of their uſual negligence, and that which more was, made a mockery and ſcorn of their ſmall number. Diophanes kept his men ſtill a good time, as if he had brought them forth only for a ſhew, to ſee and to be ſeen: but after he perceived once the enemies to be diſbanded out of their ranks and ranges, he commanded the footmen to make all the haſt they could after, whiles himſelf leading the way firſt among his horſemen, ran with his whole troop upon the ſpur as hard as ever he could, and ſetting up a ſhout and cry aloud on all hands, as well with foot as horſe, charged ſuddainly upon the enemies guards, ere they were aware of them. Man and horſe both were greatly ſcared: and the horſes eſpecially having broken their collers and halters wherewith they ſtood tied, made foul work and much trouble among their own party. Some few of the horſes kept their ſtanding ſtill unaffrighted, and even thoſe they had much ado to ſad- N dle, to bridle, and to mount upon; with ſo great a terrour came the Achæans, and with much more than ſo ſmall a number could be thought to make. And as for the footmen in order arranged and well provided they fell upon thoſe that were negligently diſperſed abroad, ere they looked for them, and in manner half aſleep. Great execution and butchery was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fled amain. Diophanes, having followed the chaſe as they ran away in ſcattering wiſe, ſo far as he might well with ſafety of himſelf, returned to the guard and defence of the City, having won great honor to the nation of the Achæans by this exploit: for not only the men, but women alſo beheld this ſervice, and looked on him from the walls of Pergamus. The next day after, the Kings Corps de guards were better ordered and kept cloſer together, yea, and retired half a mile farther from the City, where they encamped themſelves. The Achæans likewiſe, much about the ſame time advanced to the very ſame place. Many hours together they looked one upon another who would begin firſt, expecting every minute when the charge ſhould be given. But after the ſun was neer going down, and that it was time to return into the camp, they of the Kings part began to ruffle their enſigns and guidons together, and ſet forward with their bands, ordred in manner of a march for the way, more like than marſhalled for to fight a battail. Diophanes ſat ſtill ſo long as they were within ſight: but then he charged upon their rereward.

A ward, with as great violence and fury, as the day before, and put them again into ſo great affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would ſtay to make head and reſiſt, but trembling for fear, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were beaten into their camp. This boldneſs of the Achæans forced Selencus to diſlodge and remove out of the territory of Pergamus.

Antiochus after he heard ſay that the Romans and Eumenes were come to the defence of Adramytteum, medled no more with the town it ſelf, but after he had laid the fields waſte, departed from thence, and forced Perœa, a Colony of the Mitylenæans. As for Cotton and Corylenus, Aphrodiſias and Pryene, they were won at the firſt aſſault, and ſo he returned to Sardis by * Thyatira. Selencus remaining ſtill upon the ſea-coaſts, as he affrighted ſome, ſo he defended others. So they held on their courſe to Phocæa, and ſell with an Iſland called Bacchius, ſituat above the City of the Phocæans: and after they had pilled and rifled by way of hoſtility the Temples, which heretofore they had forborn, and taken away the Images (for the Iſland was magnificently adorned and beautified therewith) they croſſed over to the City it ſelf, which they aſſaulted in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three parts: but ſeeing that it might not be won with bare ſcaling and ſtrength of arms, without planting engins of battery and other fabricks; and beſides, that three thouſand armed men ſent from Antiochus for defence, were entred into the City, preſently they gave over the ſiege. and the fleet retired to the Iſlands, having done no other exploit, but only pilled the terri-

This done, it was thought good that Eumenes ſhould have licence to depart into his own kingdom, that he might provide for the Conſul and the army all neceſſaries toward the paſſage over Helleſpontus: alſo that the Roman and Rhodian fleets ſhould return to Samos, and there remain in guard, and have an eye unto Polyxenidas, leſt he removed from Epheſus and made ſome attempt that way. So, the King returned to Elea, the Romans and Rhodians to Samos, where M. Æmylius the Prætor his brother departed this life. The Rhodians, after his funerall obſequies performed, ſailed to Rhodes with thirteen ſhips of their own, one quinquerem galeace of Cous, and the other of Gnidos, there to lie in rode, ready to make head againſt the fleet, which as the bruit blazed, was afloat and coming out of Syria. Two daies before that Eudamus looſed from

D Samos with the Armado, thirteen ſhips ſent from Rhodes under the conduct of Admirall Pamphilidas to encounter the ſaid Syriack fleet, taking with them four other ſhips, which were for the guard of Caria, delivered from ſiege Dædala, and other petty forts which the Kings ſouldiers aſſailed. Then it was adviſed that Eudamus ſhould incontinently ſet forward on his voyage. And to that fleet which he had under his charge, he adjoyned alſo four open ſhips. Being departed, he made ſail in all haſte that he poſſibly could, and arrived at the port called Megiſte: where he overtook thoſe that were gone before; from whence they came in one band and train joyntly together unto Phaſelis, and then they judged it the beſt way, in that place to attend the coming of the enemy. This Phaſelis ſtandeth upon the confines between Lycia and Pamphylia. It lieth far within the ſea, & is the firſt land that ſheweth it ſelf, to them that ſail from Cilicia to Rhodes;

E and from thence a man may ken and diſcover ſhips under ſail afar off: for which cauſe eſpecially, this was choſen for a fit and convenient place, wherein they might encounter the enemies fleet. But by reaſon the air was unwholſome, and the ſeaſon of the year unhealthful (for it was midſummer) and the ſmels and ſtinking ſavours ſuch, as they had not been acquainted with; many contagious diſeaſes and maladies which they foreſaw not, began to ſpred commonly abroad, and eſpecially among the mariners: for fear of which plague and mortality, they departed from thence, and paſſed beyond the gulph of Pamphylium: and being arrived in the river Eurymedon, they received advertiſement from the Aſpendians, that the enemies were already before Sida. Thoſe of the Kings ſide had ſailed but ſlowly in regard of the adverſe ſeaſon of the winds named * Eteſia,

* Eaſterly winds yearly plowing about Midſummer for the ſpace of forty daies.

F which kept their ſet and certain time, like as thoſe do which they call * Favonii. Now of the Rhodians there were 32 quadrireme Gallies, and 4 other triremes beſides. The Kings fleet conſiſted of 37, and thoſe of greater burden and bulk: among which were three mighty Galleaces of * 7 banks of oars on a ſide, and four of * 6, beſides 10 ordinary trireme gallies. There were others alſo that knew by a ſentinel or watch-tower ſtanding on a certain high place, how the enemies were at hand. The next morning by break of day both theſe fleets ſet forth of the haven, as if they would have fought that very day. And after that the Rhodians had paſſed the cape, which from Sida hangeth over into the ſea, then preſently were they diſcovered of the enemies, and the enemies likewiſe deſcried by them. The left wing of the Kings fleet, flanked with the main ſea, was commanded by Annibal: and Apollonius one of his gallants and courtiers led the right: ſo as now they had ranged their ſhips broad in a front-rank. The Rhodians advanced forward ordred in length and caſting their battell into files. In the vanguard the Admiral ſhip of Eudamus was formoſt; Caryclitus governed the rereguard; and Pamphilidas had the conduct of the middle ward. Eudamus ſeeing the enemies battell arranged and ready for conflict, put forth into the open ſea, commanding thoſe that followed after in order to keep their array, and ſo directly to affront the enemy: which at the firſt cauſed ſome trouble, for he was not ſo far advanced into the deep, that all the ſhips could be ſet in array along the land ſide: and beſides, himſelf making too much haſte, with five ſhips only encountred Annibal, for the reſt followed not after him, becauſe they were bidden to range afront. Now the rereward had no room left them toward the land: and thus whiles H they haſtily were jumbled together, the fight by that time was begun in the right wing againſt Annibal. But at one inſtant the Rhodians caſt off all fear, as well in regard of the goodneſs of their ſhips, as of their own experience and uſuall practice in ſervice at ſea. For their ſhips with great quickneſs and agility making ſail into the main ſea, made room for every one that came after along the land ſide: and withall, if any one hapned to run upon a ſhip of the enemies with her piked beak head, either it rent the prow, or wiped away the oars, or paſſing clear through, between the ranks and files turned again and charged upon the poop. But the thing which terrified the enemy moſt was this, That a great galleace of the Kings which had ſeven banks of oars on a ſide, was bouged and took a leak with one only knock, that it received by a Rhodian ſhip far leſs: whereupon the right wing of the enemy doubtleſs enclined to flie away. But Annibal I preſſed Eudamus very much in the open ſea, moſt of all with multitude of ſhips: for otherwiſe in all reſpects Eudamus had the odds and better hand of him by far: and certainly he had compaſſed and encloſed Eudamus round, but that a flag was put out of the Admirall, (by which ſignall the diſperſed ſhips are wont to rally themſelves together:) whereupon all thoſe that had got the better of the enemy in the right wing, made haſte to joyn in one for to ſuccour their fellows. Then Annibal alſo and the ſhips about him, took their flight: but the Rhodians were not able to make way after them and to maintain the chaſe, by reaſon that the rowers many of them were ſick, and therefore the ſooner weary. Whereupon they caſt anchor in the main ſea, and ſtaid to eat and take ſome refection for to ſtrengthen their bodies. And in this while Eudamus eſpied and beheld the enemies how they haled and towed by ropes at the tail of the open ſhips (that went K only with oars) certain other which were lame, maimed, ſore bruiſed, and cracked: and might ſee 20 others not much ſounder than they, to leave the reſt and depart: whereupon cauſing an Oyes and ſilence to be made from an high turret in the fore-caſtle of the Admirall, Ariſe my hearts (ſaith he) and ſee a pleaſant ſight yonder and a goodly ſpectacle. So they all aroſe at once and beheld how the enemies were afraid and what poor ſhift they made in haſte to flie, and with one voice they all in a manner cried out to follow after and purſue them. Now Eudamus his own ſhip was ſhaken in many places and ſore bruiſed; whereupon he commanded Pamphilidas and Charicletus to make way after them, ſo far forth as they thought they might without danger. And for a good time they held them in chaſe: but ſeeing Annibal approaching near the ſhore, and fearing leſt the wind would lock them within the enemies coaſt, they returned toward Eudamus, and drew along L with them the great galleace which they took, and which at the firſt encounter was pierced, and with much ado trained it to Phaſelis. From thence they retired themſelves to Rhodes, not ſo joyous for this victory, as blaming one another that they had not either ſunk or taken the whole fleet of the enemies, having ſo good means as they had to do it. Annibal daunted with this one infortunate battell, durſt not even then paſs along the river of Lycia, but deſired to joyn unto the old fleet of the Kings as ſoon as poſſibly he could. To impeach him for effecting that, the Rhodians ſet out Charicletus and twenty war ſhips with piked ſtems, toward Patara and the Port of Megiſte; and commanded Eudamus to return unto the Romans to Samos with ſeven of the taleſt ſhips in all the fleet whereof he had the command: to the end, that he might induce the Romans with his counſell and advice, yea, and with all the countenance and authority that he had, force them to lay M ſiege unto Patara and to aſſault it. The Romans took great joy and contentment, firſt at the news and report of this victory, and afterwards at the return of the Rhodians. And it ſeemed, if that one City ſtood not in their way to ſtay them, and that they were once rid of that care, they would without any let and empeachment, make all the ſea coaſts ſure enough for any danger and damage from thoſe quarters. But becauſe Antiochus was departed from Sardis, the Romans held them back, and would not ſuffer them to abandon the guard and defence of Æolis and Ionia, for fear leſt the Cities upon the ſea-ſide might be ſurpriſed. And ſo they ſent Pamphilidas with four covered ſhips, to the fleet that lay about Patara.

Antiochus gathered together not only the garriſons and aids of all the Cities that were about him, but alſo addreſſed his Embaſſadors with letters to Pruſias the King of Bithynia, wherein he N gave out hard words of the Romans for their paſſage into Aſia: namely, "That their coming only "was for this, to demoliſh put down, and overthrow all kingdoms, and to ſet up the only Roman "Empire that none elſe might ſtand in the whole world. That Philip and Mabis already were ſub-"dued and depoſed and now himſelf was to make the third, againſt whom they were come. Nei-"ther would they make an end there but go on ſtill, like a continuall fire that burneth forward, "and take all afore them, and ever as they vanquiſhed one, proceed to another that is next. And "no doubt, they would make a bridge of him to paſs onward into Bithynia, now that Eumenes "hath gently taken upon his neck the yoke of voluntary ſervitude. Pruſias was ſomewhat touched with theſe letters, but when there came others written from Scipio the Conſul, and his brother Africanus eſpecially, he was wholly averted from entertaining any ſuch ſuſpition. For Africanus beſides the continuall cuſtome that the people of Rome had, to advance and amplifie the Majeſty of KK. their allies and confederates with all kind of honour; alledged for his part, the domeſtical examples of their own houſe and family: inducing Pruſias thereby to enter into a deſire to win his love and friendſhip. For he diſcourſed & ſaid, "That thoſe Princes and petty KK. in Spain, "whom he had received into his protection, he left behind him when he went away, mighty mo-"narches: alſo, that he not only had placed & eſtabliſhed Maſaniſſa in his fathers realm & throne,

A "but setled him in the kingdom also of Syphax, who before had chased & expelled him: so as now "he was not only the richest potentate and most wealthy K. of all Affrick, but also for majesty & "puissant forces a patagon, equall to any other K. in the whole world. As for Philip and Nabis, e-"nemies they were and vanquished by T. Quintius, howbeit they remained KK. afterwards within "their own Realms. And Philip verily the year that is past, had his tribute forgiven him and his "son an hostage delivered unto him: yea, and some Cities without the dominion of Macedony, "have received them as their K. and the Roman Generals have winked thereat and been conten-"ted. And surely Nabis had been likewise graced and honoured, but for his own peevish folly "first, & the treacherous falshood afterwards of the Ætolians, which was his utter undoing and "overthrow. But the chief thing of all that most confirmed the mind of K. Prusias, was the com-B ing of Livius unto him in embassage from Rome, he, who aforetime in quality of Prætor, had been Admiral of the navy. Who shewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much more assured to the Romans than to K. Antiochus; and withall how the Romans would be the fatter and surer friend of the twain, yea, and make more conscience of keeping amity.

Antiochus being put besides all hope of the association with Prusias, departed to Ephesus from Sardis, to visit and see the fleet, which for certain months had been rigged and in readiness: and this he did the rather, because he saw that he could not hold out with the Roman army and the two Scipios the commanders thereof, than for that his sea-service in it self at any time before sped well, or could assure him now of great and certain success. Yet some little dram he had of good hope for the present, in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian fleet was about C Patara, and King Eumenes also with all his own ships departed into Hellespontus to meet with the Consul. Besides this, in some measure his spirit was puffed up with the remembrance, how the Rhodian Armado had been defeated at Samos by a cautelous plot and practice contrived beforehand. Having laid these conceits for a ground, he sent Polyxenidas away with his navy, to hazard the fortune of a battel in some sort or other (it made no matter how:) whiles himself in person led his whole army to Notium (a town of the Colophonians, seated upon the sea, and distant about two miles from the ancient City Colophon.) The City it self he had a good mind to conquer and bring in subjection unto him: for, being so near unto Ephesus as it was, there could not any thing be done either by sea or land, but it was within the eye of the Colophonians, and by their means notified streightwaies to the Romans. Now he made full account that they would remove D their fleet from Samos to succour that associat City of theirs, and so Polyxenidas might thereby take his time and good opportunity to execute some notable exploit. Whereupon he went in hand to plant fabricks against Colophon, and having raised his rampiers, and cast trenches on both sides alike, even to the very sea, he approached with mantlets and terraces, as well the one part as the other, close unto the wals, and under the * roof-works, plaid upon them with the push & force of the ram. The Colophonians much troubled and affrighted with these dangers and distresses, sent their Orators to Samos unto L. Æmylius, to crave in humble manner the aid and succour of the Prætor and people of Rome. Æmylius was much discontented and offended in his heart, that he had made so long abode at Samos and performed no service. Nothing less thought he than that E Polyxenidas, whom twice already in vain he had challenged and bidden battell, would now offer to fight. He reputed it also for a disgrace and shamefull indignity unto him, that Eumenes his fleet assisted the Consul to waft over the legions into Asia, and himself was assigned and enjoyned to succour and aid the City of Colophon besieged, the issue whereof would be so doubtfull and uncertain. Eudamus the Rhodian, who was the man that had detained and kept him still at Samos, when he was desirous to pass over into Hellespont, yea, & all the rest were instant with him, shewing and declaring how much better it was, either to deliver his allies from siege, or to defeat the fleet again, which had been once vanquished, and so to put the enemy quite besides the possession of the sea, than with the abandoning of his confederats, and betraying Asia both sea and land into the hands of Antiochus, to depart into Hellespont (where Eumenes with his fleet was sufficient to hold him play) and to quit that part of the war which was committed to his charge. Well, they F loosed from Samos to provide victuals for that all their own provision was spent, & shaped themselves to cross over unto Chios. That was the garner and storehouse of the Romans, and the very place unto which all the ships of burden, and the hulks sent out of Italy, used to set sail and direct their course. So they set a compass about, toward the coast of the Island that lay fartheft off from the City, opposite to the Northeast, in regard of Chios and Erythræa. And as they were about to pass over thither, the Prætor was certified by letters, that great store of corn was come out of Italy to Chios: that the ships which were charged with wine, were kept back by contrary and crois winds. Likewise, reported it was, that the Teyans had furnished King Antiochus his fleet with victuals plenteously and liberally, and had promised also unto him five thousand vessels of wine. Whereupon he shifted sail suddenly in the midst of his direct course, and made
G head for Teios, intending either with their good wills to serve himself of the provision prepared for the enemy, or else to hold them for no better than enemies. Having directed the prows of their ships toward the land, they might descry, as it were, fifteen ships near unto Myonesus. Which the Prætor supposing at the first to be of the Kings fleet, resolved to make way after them: but afterwards it appeared, they were brigantines or pinnaces, and certain small barks of rovers and men of war. These rovers having harried and spoiled all the maritime coasts of the Chians, were upon their return with great store of prizes and pillage: but when they discovered a fleet

in the deep ſea afar off, they made all the ſail they could, and fled. Yare of ſteerage they were and good of ſail, by reaſon that their veſſels were more light, and made of purpoſe to rid way, and beſides nearer they were to land. And therefore they had recovered Myoneſus, before the fleet could come any thing near unto them. The Prætor thinking verily to force them out of the haven, made after without direction of a skilfull pilot, and knowledge of the place. Now this Myoneſus is a promontory or cape between Teios and Samos, a very mountain made in faſhion of a ſteeple, broad enough at the foot, but riſing narrower ſtill, and runneth up to the top ſharp pointed. On the main or land ſide it hath one paſſage by a ſtraight and narrow path. From the ſea it is founded upon rocks, beaten and eaten with the continual ſurging waves of the ſea, inſomuch, as in ſome places the cliffs that hang over, bear more into the ſea than the veſſels that lie under the harbor, take up of the ſea. The Prætor with his ſhips durſt not approach near unto thoſe crags, for fear of being within the ſhot of the pirats, who were perched upon the top of thoſe ſteep rocks, and ſo they ſpent that day and lay off. At the laſt, a little before night they gave over that vain enterpriſe without effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teios; and having lodged their ſhips within the harbor, which themſelves call Geraiſticus, (and it lieth out at the back ſide of the City) the Prætor ſet aſhore, and ſent out his ſouldiers to forrage the territory about the City. The Teians ſeeing how their lands were ſpoiled even under their very noſes, addreſſed certain Orators to the Roman Admiral, arraied all in white, after the manner of humble ſuppliants. And as they would have ſeemed to excuſe their City, for having done or ſaid any thing againſt the Romans tending to hoſtility; he both charged them directly, that they had relieved the fleet of the enemies with victuals, and alſo told them what quantity of wine moreover they had promiſed to Polyxenidas. But and if they could be content to do the like by the Roman fleet, he would recall his ſouldiers from pillage, otherwiſe he would repute them for his enemies. The Embaſſadors aforeſaid made relation of this heavy anſwer. Whereupon the Magiſtrates of the City aſſembled the people together, for to conſult and conclude about this matter what they were beſt to do. Thither as it hapned, was Polyxenidas arrived with the Kings Armado; who having looſed from Crlophon, when he heard that the Romans were departed from Samos, that they had chaſed the Pirats as far as Myoneſus, and were now waſting and harrying the lands of the Teians, alſo that their ſhips anchored in the rode Geraiſticus, himſelf alſo caſt anchor overagainſt Myoneſus, hard by an Iſland which the ſailers and mariners call Macris, in a ſecret bay hard by, eſcouting and eſpying from this near harbor, what the enemies did and intended. And at the firſt in good hope he was to diſcomfit and deſeat the Roman fleet, like as he had beforetime the Rhodian Armado near unto Samos, by ſeizing the mouth of the haven, and empeaching their iſſue forth. For this bay was in all reſpects like unto the other, lying juſt between two Capes, which meet ſo near, and in manner encloſe the mouth thereof, that hardly two ſhips at once can go forth together. And to this purpoſe Polyxenidas intended in the night ſeaſon to take poſſeſſion, and make himſelf ſure of the ſaid ſtraights, there to place ten gallies under either Cape, which ſtanding there at a vantage, ſhould from both points flank the broad ſides of his enemies ſhips in their going forth; and withall out of his other veſſels to disbark and land armed ſouldiers, like as he had done at Panormus, and ſo at once to aſſail them both by ſea and land, and make an end of them for all. Which deſignment of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romans, after that the Teians had promiſed them to do whatſoever they ſhould command, thought it more commodious for the receiving of their proviſion of victuals, to paſs with their ſhips unto the other harbor which was before the City, to the open ſea. Some ſay that Eudamus the Rhodian, ſhewed the inconvenience and diſcommodity of the other harbor, by occaſion that two gallies fortuned in that ſtraight to be ſo intangled, that they brake one anothers oars with juſtling together. And among other motives the Prætor was induced to change the harbor, becauſe from the land ſide there he ſhould lye within danger, conſidering that Anniochus himſelf was encamped not far off. Thus the fleet being brought about cloſe to the City ſide, the ſouldiers and mariners (without the knowledge of any commanders) were disbarked for to diſpoſe & diſpenſe the victuals and wine eſpecially to every ſhip. But about noon-tide a certain peaſant of the country chanced to be brought before the Prætor, who gave intelligence, That there was a fleet of ſhips which two daies already rode at anchor under the Iſland Macris; and that but a while ago, certain veſſels of them were ſeen to weigh anchor, as if they would hoiſe up ſail and be gone. The Prætor moved at this ſudden occurrent, commanded the trumpets to ſound the alarm, and to give knowledge and warning, that in caſe any were ſtragling abroad in the fields, they ſhould retire. The Colonels he ſent into the City to gather the ſouldiers together and the mariners, that they might repair to ſhip-boord. This alarm cauſed as great a trouble and confuſion, as uſually is ſeen in a ſudden ſcarefire, or when a City is ſurpriſed by the enemies. Here was ſcudding into the City to recall their fellows; there was running out of the City to recover their ſhips; not knowing who commanded, by reaſon of the diſſonant noiſe of men and ſound of trumpet: howbeit, as hap was, at length they ran all toward the ſhips, but in ſuch a hurly-burly and diſorder that they ſcarcely knew their own veſſels; or if they did, they could hardly for the croud and preſs, get thither and embark themſelves. Neither had this affright paſſed clear without danger both by ſea and land, but that Æmylius gave direction to every one what to do, and put out of the haven firſt himſelf with the Admiral ſhip into the open ſea, & there received every veſſell as they followed one after another in their order, & ranged them all afront: and if Eudamus alſo with the Rhodian fleet had not ſtaid at the ſhore to ſee good order, that the

A ſouldiers might be ſet aboord without hurrying in fearfull haſte, and every ſhip go forth as it was fitted and made ready. By this means both the formoſt of the vanguard were arranged in the ſight of the Prætor, and the Rhodians alſo kept their order in the rereguard in ſuch ſort, as they put themſelves into the open ſea in as good array, as if they had ſeen the Kings fleet under ſail. But they were between the two promontories, Myoneſus and Corycus, before they deſcried the enemy. The Kings Armado came forward in long files, two and two in a rank, who diſplaied and ſpread themſelves alſo affront towards the wing in ſuch wiſe, that they might be able to compaſs and encloſe the right wing of the enemy. Which Eudamus the rere-admirall perceiving, and ſeeing withall that the Romans could not poſſibly make head alike and extend themſelves as broad as the enemy, and were at the point already at the right wing to be environed, made haſte with his own
B veſſels (for the Rhodian barks were of all other in the whole fleet ſwifteſt by far) and after he had fronted equally and matched wing for wing, he made head with his own ſhip againſt the very admirall of the enemies, wherein Polyxenidas himſelf was aboord. By this time the battell began between both the main fleets, all at once from every part. Of the Romans ſide there fought fourſcore in all, whereof two and twenty were Rhodians. The enemies armado conſiſted of fourſcore and nine, all ſhips of greateſt bulk and making, and had among them three galeaces of ſix banks of oars on a ſide, and two of ſeven. For goodneſs and ſtrength of ſhips, as alſo for valour of ſouldiers, the Romans far ſurpaſſed the Rhodians. But for agility and nimbleneſs of their veſſels, for skilfull knowledge of Pilots, and expett cunning and readineſs of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And thoſe above all the reſt that carried fire before them in their noſes
C troubled and ſcared the enemies moſt: and that ſtratagem and device which had been their only help and means of ſafety, when they were ſurpriſed and beſet at Panormus, was now the thing that ſtood them in beſt ſtead to win the victory. For the Kings ſhips fearing the fire that threatned their very faces, turned aſide, becauſe they would not run affront with their prows: ſo as, they neither could themſelves ſmite and hurt the enemies with their brazen pikes in the beak head, nor yet avoid them, but expoſe their own broad ſides open to receive all puſhes and violence from them. If any one fortuned to encounter and run upon them, ſhe was ſure to be paid and ſped with fire that was flung and caſt into her: and more running there was to quench the ſame, than otherwiſe to fight. Howbeit, the reſolute valour of the Roman ſouldiers (which ever in war prevaileth moſt) was it that did the deed. For after the Romans by mere force had broken and clo-
D ven the main battaillon of the enemy in the very midſt, they turned about again, and preſented themſelves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the Kings ſhips whiles they fought affront and made head againſt the Rhodians: and thus at one inſtant the battaillon in the midſt, and the ſhips in the left wing that ſerved King Antiochus, were beſet round about, and ſunk to the bottom of the ſea. The right wing as yet entire and ſound, was more terrified at the loſs and overthrow of their fellows, than for any proper danger of their own. Howbeit, after they ſaw the other inveſted, and the Admirall her ſelf with Polyxenidas in her, to abandon her companions and to hoiſe up ſails, they likewiſe in haſte ſet up all their cloth and ſmall trinquet ſails (for a good forewind they had for Epheſus) and fled as faſt away as they could. Two and forty ſhips they loſt in this fight: of which thirteen were boorded and taken for the uſe of the Romans, the reſt were either E conſumed with fire, or devoured of the ſea. Two Roman ſhips were ſhattered and broken in pieces, and ſome other hurt, bruiſed and cracked. One Rhodian chanced to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked beak head ſtricken a Sidonian ſhip, with the violence of the blow ſhe ſhook out her own anchor, which by one of the flouks took faſt hold as if it had been a grapling hook by the prow of the other ſhip. The Rhodians much troubled herewith, gave over rowing ſtreight, as willing and deſirous to be looſe and parted from the enemy: and whiles they were buſie thereabout, the cable which the anchor drew with it caught among the oars of her own ſhip, and ſwept them clean away, and ſo left one ſide of it naked, whereby the ſhip being much weakned and enfeebled, was taken by the other that was ſmitten and tied faſt unto her. Much after this manner was the battel fought at ſea near Myoneſus. Where-F upon Antiochus was ſore affrighted: for being thus diſpoſſeſſed of the ſea, he diſtruſted himſelf that he ſhould not be able to hold and defend the places farther off: and therefore commanded the garriſon to retire from Lyſimachia, for fear it ſhou'd be ſurpriſed there by the Romans. But this was but a bad piece of counſell, as the ſequell and iſſue proved afterwards. For it had been an eaſie matter not only to defend Lyſimachia againſt the firſt aſſault of the Romans, but alſo to hold out the ſiege all winter: yea, and by drawing out the time on length, to bring the very aſſailants themſelves lying in leaguer, to extream neceſſity and want of all things: during which ſpace they might have taken ſome occaſion and opportunity, to find a mean and make way for peace. Neither did he only quit Lyſimachia and leave it for the enemies after this unfortunate battell, but alſo raiſed his ſiege before Colophon and diſlodged, yea, and retired himſelf to Sardis: from whence G he ſent into Cappadocia to Ariarates for aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces: and now was he ſet upon no deſign elſe, but to give battell, and to hazard all upon the fortune of the field.

After this Navall victory, Regillus Æmylius ſailed directly to Epheſus, where he embattelled his ſhips in array even before the haven, and when by this bravado he had at laſt wrung again from the enemies a plain and evident confeſſion that they had abandoned the ſea unto him, he ſet ſail for Chius, unto which he had intended to ſhape his courſe from Samos before the late late battell upon the ſea. There he repaired and calked his ſhips which were ſhaken and cracked in the forſaid fight: which done, he ſent L. Æmylius Scaurus with thirty ſail toward Helleſpontus to tranſport the army. And when he had rewarded the Rhodian ſhips with part of the pillage, and honoured them with the navall ſpoils, he gave them the renvoy, and ſent them home. But the Rhodians luſtily out-ſailed Scaurus; and prevented his ſhips to ſet over the forces of the Conſul: and after they had performed that ſervice alſo, then they returned to Rhodes.

The Roman Armado ſailed from Chios to Phocæa. This City is ſeated far within the gulph of the ſea, builded ſo, as that it lieth out in length. The wall containeth in compaſs the ſpace of two miles and an halt: and from both ſides it groweth narrow ſtill, and meeteth in the midſt, reſembling the form of a wedg or *coin, which the Inhabitants themſelves call Lampter, in which place the City is a mile broad and a quarter with the vantage. From which canton or corner there is a bank of firm land running a mile on end into the ſea like a tongue, which divideth the haven juſt in the midſt, marked out (as it were) juſt by a certain line. Where it joyneth to the narrow ſtraights it hath two moſt ſure harbors of both ſides, and thoſe lying two contrary waies. That which looketh toward the South, is called according as it is indeed, Naustathmos [namely, a ſhip-rode, or harbour] for it is able to receive a great number of ſhips: the other haven is neer unto the very Lampter aforeſaid. When the Roman fleet was once poſſeſſed of both theſe moſt ſure and ſafe harbours, the Prætor thought good before he ſet in hand either to ſcale the walls, or to raiſe any fabricks and plant engins againſt the City, to ſend certain of purpoſe to ſound the minds and affections of the principall Citizens and the Magiſtrates within. But after he perceived they were obſtinatly bent, and would not come on, he began to lay battery againſt it in two ſeverall quarters. The one part was not much peopled, and had but few dwelling houſes in it; and the Temples of their gods took up a good ſpace thereof; and there began he firſt to approach with the ram, and therewith to batter the walls, and ſhake the turrets: and by that time that the multitude ran thither in great numbers, and preſented themſelves ready to defend, the ram was puſhing alſo at the other part: So as now the walls were laid along in both places: and upon the fall thereof whiles ſome of the Roman ſouldiers preſently gave the aſſault at the very breach, mounting and marching upon the ruines of the ſtones that were faln: others alſo aſſaied to gain the top of the upright walls with ſcaling ladders. But the townſmen withſtood them ſo ſtiffly and with ſuch reſolution, that it was well ſeen they repoſed more hope of defence in arms and valour, than in the ſtrength of their wals. Whereupon the Prætor ſeeing in what danger his ſouldiers ſtood, and fearing to expoſe and ſacrifice them ere they were aware to the fury of theſe people ſo enraged like deſperate and mad perſons, commanded to ſound the retreat. And notwithſtanding the aſſault ceaſed and was given over, yet betook not the townſmen themſelves to reſt and repoſe, but ran from all parts every one, to raiſe countermures, fill up the breaches, and repair the ruins where the wall was down. As they were wholly employed about this buſineſs, Q. Antonius ſent from the Prætor, came toward them: who, after he had reproved and rebuked their wilfull obſtinacy, and made remonſtrance unto them, that the Romans had more care and regard than they themſelves of the City, that by continuall aſſaults and batteries it ſhould not utterly be deſtroyed: and how if they would be reclaimed and forgo their outragious folly, he would make them this offer, That they ſhould yield under the ſame conditions and in thoſe very terms, as aforetime they had ſubmitted to C. Livius when they came under his protection: At the hearing of that, they demanded and had five daies ſpace to conſider of the matter: during which time they made means to receive ſome aid from Antiochus; but after their Embaſſadors whom they diſpatched to the King, had made relation, That there was no ſuccour to be expected from him; then they ſet open their gates, having articled and capitulated beforehand, that no outrage by way of hoſtility ſhould be exerciſed and committed upon them. As the Romans entred into the City with banners diſplaied the Prætor declared with a loud voice, That his will and pleaſure was they ſhould be ſpared, foraſmuch as they had yielded. Whereat the ſouldiers on all hands ſet up a great cry That it was an intollerable ſhame that the Phocæans (who were never true and loyall confederates, but alwaies dogged and malicious enemies) ſhould go away ſo ſcotfree, and not ſuffer for their ſins. At which word (as if the Prætor had given them a ſignall of ranſacking) they ran into all parts of the City to rifle and ſpoil. Æmylius at firſt ſtaid them what he could. and reclaimed them again, ſaying, That it was not the manner to ſack Cities rendred by compoſition, but ſuch as were forced and won by aſſault; and even thoſe alſo were at the diſpoſition of the Generall and not of the ſouldiers. But ſeeing that they in their angry mood of revenge, and covetous deſire of goods, were of more power than the reſpective reverence of his perſon, his quality and commandment; he ſent out beadles and trumpetters throughout the City, charging all perſons of free condition whatſoever, to repair before him into the market place, to the end, that no villany and outrage might be done upon their bodies. And ſo the Prætor did his beſt to perform his word and promiſe in whatſoever lay in his power: for he reſtored unto them their City, their lands and their own laws. And for that the winter approached, he made choice of the two harbours of Phocæa to beſtow his ſhips there for the winter time.

Near about that time, the Conſul having paſſed beyond the borders of the Adrians and Maronits, received news, that the Kings navy was defeated at Myonesus, and Lyſimachia diſfurniſhed of the garriſon: and this latter tidings was more acceptable and pleaſing unto him, than the other of the navall victory; and eſpecially, when they came thither: where in very truth the City

A (plentouſly ſtored with all ſorts of victuals, as if they had been provided of purpoſe againſt the coming of the army) received them curteouſly; whereas they made no other account, but to endure extremity of want and painfull travell in beſieging thereof. There they abode ſome few daies as it were in camp, untill ſuch time as their carriages and ſickly perſons of their train might reach unto them; ſuch as they had left behind in all the forts and caſtles of Thrace, wearied with long journey and enfeebled with divers infirmities. When all were come and well refreſhed and recovered, they put themſelves again in their journey, and marching through Cherſoneſus, they came to Helleſpont: where, finding all things in readineſs for their tranſporting (ſuch was the induſtrious care and diligence of King Eumenes) they paſſed over without trouble and moleſtation into the peaceable coaſts of their allies and friends, without empeachment of any perſon, notwithſtanding B ſome ſhips arrived in one place, and ſome in another. And this was the thing that much content-ted the Romans and mightily encouraged them, to ſee they had ſo free paſſage into Aſia, which they made full reckoning would have been a matter of great difficulty and trouble. After this, they encamped and made their abode a certain time near Helleſpont, by occaſion of thoſe daies which hapned then to be, wherein the Salii uſed to dance with their ſcutchions called Ancilia; during which time they made ſcruple of conſcience to take any journey (untill thoſe Ancilia were beſtowed again in the temple of Mars.) By reaſon of which daies, P. Scipio alſo withdrew himſelf apart from the army upon a more ſtrict regard of conſcience & religion, which touched him nearer than other, becauſe he was himſelf one of the Salii, and was the cauſe that the army ſtaid behind and came not forward to overtake the camp.

C And even then there hapned to come unto the camp from Antiochus, one Heraclides a Byzantine, having in charge to treat as touching a peace: and good hope he conceived to obtain the ſame with eaſe, by reaſon of the long abode and ſtay of the Romans in that one place: of whom he had looked for no other, but that as ſoon as they had ſet foot in Aſia, they would have marched apace ſtraightwaies againſt the Kings camp. Howbeit this courſe he took not to go directly unto the Conſul before he had ſpoken and conferred with Scipio, (and indeed ſuch direction and charge he had from the King himſelf) in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope: for beſides his magnanimity and noble courage, as alſo the ſatiety of glory and honour, whereof already he had his full, (great inducements unto the King that he would be eaſily wrought and made moſt pliable to hearken after peace) all the world knew full well how ſoberly he had carried himſelf in his D victories, firſt in Spain, and afterwards in Affrick: and more than all this, a ſon of his was captive in the ſaid Kings hands. But where, when, and by what chance he was taken priſoner, writers agree not no more than in many things elſe. Some ſay, that in the beginning of the war, he was beſet and encloſed round within the Kings ſhips, at what time as he ſailed from Chalcis to Oreum.
Others write, that after the Roman army was paſſed over into Aſia; he was ſent out in eſpiall with a troop of Frægellan horſemen to view and diſcover the Kings camp: and when the Kings Cavalry made out to charge upon them, he made haſte to retire, and in that hurry his horſe fell with him and ſo he and two other men of arms with him, was ſurpriſed, taken, and brought to the King. But this one thing is for certain known, that if there had been ſure and firm peace between the King and the Romans, nay, if there had been familiar acquaintance and hoſpitality between E him and the Scipios, this young Gentleman could not poſſibly have had more friendly entertainment, nor been more kindly intreated, liberally uſed, yea, and honourably regarded than he was.
For theſe cauſes the Embaſſador attended the coming of Scipio: and ſo ſoon as he was arrived, preſented himſelf unto the Conſul, requeſting that he might deliver his meſſage and be heard.
Whereupon in a frequent aſſembly he had audience given him, and thus he ſpake: "Whereas "(quoth he) there have been divers and ſundry embaſſages paſſed to and fro as touching peace,
"and no good as yet done; I lay this for a ground and aſſure my ſelf now to ſpeed, becauſe the "former embaſſadors hitherto have effected and obtained nothing: for in all thoſe treaties and "diſputations the queſtion was about Smyrna, Lampſacus, Alexandria, Troas, and Lyſimachia, "which is in Europe. Of which Cities, the King my Maſter hath already quit Lyſimachia, to the F "end you ſhould not ſay, that he hath any one City at all within Europe: and as for thoſe other in "Aſia, he is ready to ſurrender them alſo; yea & all the reſt whatſoever, which the Romans would "recover out of the Kings hands and dominions, in regard they had ſometime ſided & taken part "with him. And for the charges which the Romans have defraied about this war, the King will "be willing to diſburſe and make good the one moity unto them again. And thus much ſpake
"he concerning the articles and conditions of the peace. The reſt of his ſpeech behind, was be"ſtowed in advertizing and putting them in mind of the alternative revolution of this world and "the affairs thereof; that as they ſhould uſe their own good fortune and proſperity with mea-
"ſure and moderation, ſo they ought not to preſs down others in their adverſity; but hold them"ſelves contented within the bounds and limits of Europe, and that was a dominion ſufficient (a G "man would think) and exceeding great: conſidering this, that it is an eaſier matter to win one "thing after another by way of conqueſt, than to hold and keep them all together when they are "won. To conclude, if the Romans were minded to diſmember any part from Aſia, ſo they would "make an end once, and limit out the ſame within certain precincts without any further doubt
"and difference, the King for the love of peace and concord, would ſuffer the Romans in their "unmeaſurable deſire and appetite, to ſurmount and outgo his temperance and moderation.
But thoſe matters which the Embaſſador ſuppoſed were of great importance and effectuall to obtain obtain peace, the Romans made a piſh at it, and lightly regarded: for they judged it but meet and H reaſon, that the King ſhould diſcharge all the expences they had been at in this war, conſidering through his default it firſt aroſe: alſo that he ought to withdraw his garriſons not only out of Ionia and Æolis: but alſo like as all Greece hath been made free and delivered, ſo the Greek Cities likewiſe in Aſia ought to be enfranchiſed and ſet at liberty: which poſſibly might not be unleſs Antiochus were diſleized of the poſſeſſion of all Aſia on this ſide the mountain Taurus. The Embaſſador perceiving well, that there was no reaſon to be had in the aſſembly, aſſaied privatly to ſound and to win the heart and good will of Scipio, according as he had in charge from the King.

And firſt this way he went to work and ſaid, That the King was minded to ſend him his ſon again freely without ranſom: then (ignorant as he was both of Scipio his nature and the manner of Romans) he promiſed him a mighty maſs of gold, yea, and to be made equall companion in the I government of the whole kingdom (the Kings name and royall ſtyle only reſerved) in caſe he would be an inſtrument and means to effectuate peace. To theſe motives and offers Scipio return-ned this anſwer, "That you neither know the Romans all in general, nor my ſelf in parrticular un-
"to whom you were ſent, I leſs marvell, ſeeing you are altogether ignorant of the ſtate of him "who hath ſent you hither. For if ye had meant to have ſought for peace at our hands, as of men "who were in care for the doubtfull event and iſſue of the war, ye ſhould have held and kept Ly-
"ſimachia ſtill, for to have empeached our entrance into Cherſonneſus, or elſe ye ſhould have made
"head againſt us in Helleſpontus, and ſtaid our paſſage into Aſia: but now ſeeing ye have granted
"paſſage into Aſia, and ſuffered your ſelves not only to be bridled and curbed, but alſo to be yo-
"ked, and like beaſts to bear and draw too; ſince I ſay there is no remedy but ye muſt endure to K
"be under our ſubjection, what equall and indifferent means of treaty is there left for you? Now,
"as concerning my ſon, I will accept it as a great preſent, and beſeeming the munificence and libe"rality of a King, in caſe he ſend him to me again. As for the other matters, I pray God I be ne"ver driven in regard of mine eſtate, to have that need: for ſurely, I carry a mind that will never "find the miſs and want thereof. And for theſe great offers that the King maketh unto me, he
"ſhall find me thankfull unto him, if it pleaſe him for any private benefit unto me done, to require
"at my hands a private favour and pleaſure again: but as touching the State and publike weal, he "ſhall pardon me; I will neither receive ought from him, nor beſtow any thing upon him. And all "that I can do for him at this preſent, is to give him good and faithfull counſell. Go your waies
"therefore and tell him from me, That his beſt courſe is to abſtain from war, and not to refuſe any L "condition of peace whatſoever. But all this nothing moved the King, who made reckoning that any hazard and fortune of war would be good and ſafe for him, ſince that there were laws impoſed upon him already, as if he had been quite vanquiſhed and overcome. Whereupon without any more parl of peace for this time, he bent his whole mind and employed his ſtudy about pro-viſion and preparation for war.

The Conſul having given order for the execution of all his plots and deſigns, diſlodged from thence, and marched firſt to Dardanum, and after to Rhœteum: the inhabitants of both which Cities came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence he went forward to Ilium, and encamped in a plain under the very walls: then he entred into the town, and aſcended up into the Caſtle, where he offered ſacrifice unto Minerva, the patroneſs of that City. The Ilians M entertained them with all ſhew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the Romans were deſcended from them, and the Romans again were as joyous and glad to ſee the place of their firſt original and beginning. From thence they removed, and the ſixt day after arrived at the head or ſpring of the river Caicus. Thither alſo Eumenes the King (who at firſt aſſaied to bring his fleet back from Hedeſpontus, to winter before Elæa, and afterwards, when he could not for certain daies double the point of Lectos, by reaſon of the contrary winds, went a land) becauſe he would not fail but be preſent at the beginning of theſe great affairs, made haſte the next way with a ſmall power to the camp of the Romans. From the camp he was ſent back to Pergamus, to give order for purveyance and proviſion of victuals: and after he had delivered out corn to thoſe whom the Conſul had appointed to receive it, he returned again to the ſame leaguer. The Conſul his pur- N poſe and intent was to be provided aforehand of victuals ſufficient for many daies, and together in one train to go againſt the enemy, before the winter ſurpriſed them.

Now the Kings camp lay about Thyatira: where Antiochus hearing that P. Scipio was carried ſick to Elæa, ſent certain Embaſſadors of purpoſe, to preſent and deliver his ſon again unto him. At which preſent of his, he took not only great contentment in his ſpirit, as a father might do for receiving his dear ſon, but much eaſement alſo and comfort to his ſick body. After he had ſatisfied himſelf at length with much embracing of his ſon, "Ye ſhall (ſaith he) recommend me unto the "King your Maſter, and tell him from me, that I thank him moſt heartily, and that I have no good "thing at this time to ſend to him again, but only this, That I adviſe him to take heed that he en"ter not into the field to give battell, before he hath heard for certain, that I my ſelf am returned O
"to the leaguer. Upon relation hereof, Antiochus albeit he was in camp ſeventy thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand horſe and above ſtrong (which puiſſant power otherwhile animated, and fed him with the hope of good iſſue of battell) yet moved with the authority of ſo great a perſonage as Scipio was in whom he repoſed his whole refuge againſt all doubtfull events of the fortune in war, he retired back, and paſſed over the river Phrygius, and pitched his camp about Magne-ſia near unto Sypylum. And fearing, leſt (if he ſhould be minded to make long ſtay and abode there)

A there) the Romans would aſſay to force his defences, he caſt a trench, ſix cubits in depth, and twelve in in bredth; and this trench he environed with a double bank and courſe of ſtrong ſtakes and pales, and upon the inward circuit and encloſure he oppoſed a mure with main turrets, for the more eaſie empeachment of the enemy, when he ſhould paſs over the trench. The Conſul ſuppoſing the King to be about Thyatira, marched continually, and upon the fift day came down into the plains of Hircania. And when he underſtood, that the K. was diſlodged and departed thence, he followed him by the tracts, and on this ſide the river Phrygius encamped four miles from the enemy. Where about a thouſand horſemen ſhewed themſelves (for the moſt part * Gallogræcians, ſome Dacians, with certain archers on horſeback of other nations intermingled among them) who in great haſte having paſſed over the river, charged upon the corps de guard of the B Romans. At the firſt they put the Romans to ſome trouble, finding them out of order and array: but as the skirmiſh grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romans ſoon increaſed, (by reaſon their camp was ſo near to yield them ſuccours) they of the Kings ſide being now wearied and not able to make their part good againſt ſo many of them, began to retire: and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by thoſe that followed the chaſe, and killed outright. For two daies after they ſtirred of no hand, for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The third day after the Romans all at once paſſed over, and encamped about a mile and a half from the enemies. But as they were pitching their tents, and buſied about fortifications and defences, three thouſand choſen horſemen and foot together from the Kings Camp, came upon them with a great trouble and affray. The number of them that were in guard, C was leſs a good deal; howbeit, of themſelves alone, without calling to help and aid the ſouldiers from their work about the fortification and defence of the camp, they not only at firſt received the charge with equall valour, but alſo afterwards, as the fight encreaſed, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed ſome hundred of them, and taken priſoners almoſt as many. For the ſpace of four daies next enſuing, both armies ſtood embattelled on either ſide before their Camp. And upon the fifth day the Romans advanced forth into the middle of the plain. Antiochus came not forward with his enſigns, inſomuch, as the hindmoſt were not an hundred foot off from the trench. The Conſul perceiving that he fell off and would no battell, called a councill the next day, to be adviſed and reſolved what he were beſt to do, in caſe Antiochus would not be fought withall. For conſidering that the winter approached, the ſouldiers were either to lie in the D field under their tents, or elſe if they minded for the winter ſeaſon to retire unto their garriſon towns, the war muſt be put off untill the next ſummer. Now the Romans never made ſo ſmall reckoning of any enemy as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole aſſembly they called upon the Conſul with one voice to lead forth to battell out of hand, and take the ſouldiers whiles they were in this heart ready if the enemies would not come out into the field, to paſs over ditch and rampier, and break into the camp amongſt them; making account, that they were not to fight with ſo many thouſands of enemies, but rather to make a ſlaughter and butchery of ſo many beaſts. Whereupon Cn. Domitius was ſent to diſcover the way, and to view the place where was beſt entring upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certain relation of all things, it was thought good the next morrow to approach near unto their camp: and on the E third day the enſigns were diſplaied forth into the midſt of the plain, and they began to range the army in battell array. Antiochus likewiſe ſuppoſed it was not expedient to lie off and ſtay any longer, for fear leſt in refuſing ſtill to fight, he ſhould either abate the courage of his own men, or increaſe the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces, and advanced ſo farforward from his camp, that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Roman army ſtood embattelled in one manner of form, as well for men, as munition and armor: for of Romans there were two legions, and of Latine aſſociats as many, and every legion conſiſted of five thouſand four hundred. The Romans put themſelves in the main battell, and the Latines kept both the points. The Haſtati were placed with their enſigns formoſt in the vanguard. After them the Principes in the midſt, and the Triarii in the reregard. Without this compleat battell, thus marſhalled, F the Conſul ſet to the right point the auxiliary ſouldiers of Eumenes, mingled together with the targetteers of the Achæans, to the number almoſt of three thouſand, whom he ranged equally afront, and beyond them more outward he oppoſed about three thouſand men of arms: whereof eight hundred were ſent from Eumenes, the reſt were the Cavalry of the Romans. Without all theſe in the outmoſt place, he put the Trallians and Candiots, who in all made up the number of five hundred. As for the left wing, it ſeemed to need no ſuch ſuccours, by reaſon it was flanked with the river and high ſteep banks, howbeit, in that ſide there were planted four troops of horſemen. Thus you ſee all the forces that the Romans had beſides two thouſand Thracians and Macedonians mingled and blended together, who followed as voluntaries, and were left for the guard of the Camp, and ſixteen Elephants, which they beſtowed in the rereguard for the defence of the G Triarii. For, over and beſides that they were not like to hold out againſt the Kings Elephants, which were in number fifty and four, you muſt conſider that thoſe of Affrick are not able to match them of India, ſay they were in number equall: either becauſe in bigneſs the Indians exceed the other (as in truth they are much greater by ods) or ſurpaſs them in courage and ſtomack. But the Kings army was compoſed of divers nations, different as well in arms as in ſouldiers. He had of Macedonians ſixteen thouſand footmen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phalangitæ; theſe made the main battell, and in the front ſtood divided in ten ſquadrons,

ſquadrons, parted and ſevered one from the other by two Elephants placed between. More H inward behind the forefront, the battell was diſplaied in two and thirty ranks of ſouldiers.
This was the ſtrength of the Kings army, and as in other reſpects, ſo eſpecially in regard of the Elephants ſurmounting aloft over all the ſouldiers, repreſented to the eye a fearfull and terrible ſight. For beſides that they were high and lofty of themſelves, their creſted headſtalls with plumes upon them, their turrets upon their backs, and in every turret four men ſtanding in glittering armour, beſides the Maſter and governor himſelf, made the apparence and ſhew far greater. On the right wing he placed cloſe unto the Phalangites, a thouſand and five hundred horſemen of the Gallogreeks: unto whom he adjoyned three thouſand lances in compleat armour, mounted upon barb horſes, and thoſe men of arms they themſelves called Cataphracti. To theſe were added another wing of a thouſand horſemen, which they named Agema. Medes they were, elect and cho- I ſen men, together with more horſemen of the ſame region, mingled of many nations one with another. Cloſe unto them in the rereguard was ſet a troop of ſixteen Elephants. On which ſide alſo in a wing ſomewhat farther drawn out ſtood the King his own cohort, bearing the name of Argyraſpid s, by occaſion of the ſilvered ſhields which they bare. After them followed 1200 Di-
*Like to Carbines. cians, * archers on horſeback. Then, three thouſand footmen lightly armed, and compoſed partly of Candiots, and partly of Tralleans, in number almoſt equall, and 2500 Myſians attended upon the archers. And the utmoſt ſide and tail of that wing was guarded with four thouſand Cyrtean ſlingers and Elymean archers ſorted together. On the left wing likewiſe there ſtood faſt unto the Phalangites aforeſaid 1500 horſemen Gallogræcians: and two thouſand Cappadocians armed after the ſame manner, ſent from King Ariarathes. Then the Auxiliaries of all ſorts 2700; K beſides three hundred lances in compleat harneſs upon barbed horſes armed at all pieces, and 1000 other horſemen. As for the Cornet of the Kings, it was more lightly armed, as well themſelves as their horſes. but their ſetting out and furniture otherwiſe, all one. And theſe were Syrians for the moſt part, with Phrygians and Lydians together. Before this cavalry went the chariots of four wheels, and drawn by as many horſes, armed with ſharp and trenchant hooks like ſith-blades, and the camels called by them for their ſwiftneſs Dromedaries. Upon theſe were mounted the Arabian archers, who alſo were armed with keen ſwords four cubits long, that ſit-ting as they did ſo aloft, they might notwithſtanding reach their enemy. Then after theſe were ſet another multitude equall to that in the right wing, whereof the formoſt were certain horſemen called Tarentins, and after them 2500 Gallogræcian horſe. Likewiſe of Neocretians a L thouſand: and of Carians and Ciciliians one with another 1500 armed alike. As many Trallians: and three thouſand targetteers. Theſe were Piſidians, Pamphylians and Lycians: and laſt of all, the ſuccours in the rereguard of Cirteans and Elymeans, in like number as they that were placed in the right wing, with ſixteen Elephants alſo diſtant a pretty way aſunder. The King himſelf in perſon had the conduct of the right point of the battell, and ordained Seleucus his ſon and Antipater his brothers ſon to command the left. The main battell in the midſt was committed to the leading and governance of three Captains, to wit, Minio, Zeuſis, and Philip the Maſter of the Elephants. There was a certain miſt aroſe in the morning, and as it waxed farther day gathered aloft into thick clouds, and made the weather dark: beſides, by the South-wind it reſolved into a ſmall driſſling rain, which wet and drenched all. This did little harm to the Ro- M mans: but contrariwiſe, was much hurtfull to the Kings ſide. For, albeit the air was dim and dark, yet by reaſon that the Roman battaillons took up no great compaſs of ground, they could for all the air was overcaſt, diſcern from one end to the other: and the moiſture that fell dulled nothing at all (to ſpeak of) either the ſwords or javelins of them that were heavily armed:
whereas the Kings army being embattelled ſo broad, had much ado, and hardly could ſee from the middle of the main battell to the wings of each hand, and much leſs diſcern from one skirt and flank of the battaillon to the other. Moreover, the dropping weather ſlugged their bows, ſoft-ned their ſlings and loops of their darts. Their ſithed chariots alſo, wherewith Antiochus made full account to break the arraies of his enemies, turned to the diſorder and fright of themſelves. Now theſe chariots aforeſaid were in this manner armed for the moſt part: certain ſharp pikes they N had about the ſpire-pole, bearing forward from the ſpring-tree, ten cubits in length, like unto horns, with which pointed pikes they would pierce through whatſoever they encountred.
Alſo at each end of the ſaid ſpring-tree there were two blades ſtood out, the one of juſt and even height with it, the other lower and bearing downward to the ground: the former was deviſed to cut through whatſoever came near the ſide thereof, the other to reach and tear them that were ſaln to the earth, or came under the chariot. Likewiſe at both ends of the axeltree without the nave of the wheel there were two ſuch like hooks faſtned and bended divers waies.
Theſe chariots thus armed the King had placed in the front of the battell as we ſaid before, becauſe if they had been ſet either in the middle or the rereguard, they ſhould have been driven through their own battaillons. Which Eumenes perceiving, one that knew well enough the man- O ner of that kind of ſervice, and how dangerous it was in caſe a man rather frighted the horſes than charged them directly by ordinary warlike force: he commanded the Candiot archers and ſlingers, with ſome other horſemen that lanced darts, to run forth not thick in troops, but ſcattring as far aſunder as they could, and at once from all parts to diſcharge their ſhot upon them. This forerunning tempeſt (as it were) ſo madded the horſes partly by galling, wounding, and pelting them with darts, arrows, and ſtones, diſcharged from all ſides at them, and partly with

A with the ſtrange and uncouth noiſe which they made, that ſuddenly as if they had been unbridled and without their geers, they flang out every way, and ran at random: which violence of theirs the light armed ſouldiers, the nimble ſlingers, and ſwift running Candiots avoided eaſily with a trice. And the horſemen withall following the chaſe, redoubled the fright and hurry amongſt the horſes, yea, and the dromedary camels too; which likewiſe were unruly and ſet a madding: and this hurly burly, the manifold cries from the multitude all about, helped well forward. Thus were the chariots chaſed in the middle of the plain between both armies: and when theſe vain bugs were once rid out of the way, then the alarm and ſignall was given on both parts, and they charged one another in battell-wiſe. But as fooliſh an occurrent as that was, it cauſed anon a diſcomfiture and overthrow indeed. For the auxiliaries and aids behind which were B placed next unto them, terrified with the fear and affright of the chariots, fled, and left all naked and and diſfurniſhed even to the bard horſes, in ſuch ſort, that when the rereguard was in diſarray, The Roman Cavalry entred upon the foreſaid horſe, and charged them ſo hotly, that part of them was not able to endure the firſt ſhock and encounter: ſome were put to flight, others were born down with the poiſe and weight of their harneſs and weapons. And preſently thereupon the whole left wing of the battell began to retreat. And after that thoſe ſuccours were disbanded and in diſarray which were between the Cavalry and the heavy armed footmen called Phalangitæ, the diſorder and fear went as far as to the midſt of the main battel: where ſo ſoon as the ranks and files were broken and ſhuffled together, by reaſon of the entercourſe of their own fellows among them, they had no uſe at all of their long pikes, which the C Macedonians call Sariſſæ. Then the Roman legions advanced their engins, and lanced their darts againſt thoſe diſordered ranks hudled together. The very Elephants that were placed between, nothing troubled and affrighted the Roman ſouldiers, as who had been uſed in the African wars, both to avoid the furious rage of thoſe beaſts, and alſo either with their javelins to flank and hurt them overthwart, or elſe if they could come near unto them, to hew them and cut their hamſtrings with their ſwords. By this time now was the front of the main battell defeated and beaten down: and the rereguard behind environed and cut in peeces: when as the Romans withall, might perceive their own fellows flying from the other part, and hear the cry of thoſe that were affrighted, even almoſt as far as to their camp. For Antiochus keeping the right wing, ſeeing in the left point of the Romans no other defence (by reaſon that they truſted upon the river) but only four troops of horſemen, and thoſe alſo by drawing themſelves
D cloſe to their fellows, to leave the bank-ſide void and naked, charged that point with his Auxiliaries and lances upon bard horſes, and not only made head and preſſed them afront, but from the river alſo ſet a compaſs and encloſed them; and flanked that wing ſo long, untill the horſemen were firſt diſcomfited, and then the footmen next unto them were put to flight, ſo as they ran amain toward their camp. M. Æmylius a Colonell, and ſon to M. Lepidus, who a few years after was created the High-Prieſt, had the charge of the camp: he with his whole guard came forth, and where as he ſaw them to flee, there he oppoſed himſelf, and firſt commanded them to ſtand, and afterwards to return to battell, checking and rebuking them for their beaſtly fear, and ſhamefull running away. Moreover, he proceeE deed to minatory words, ſaying, That in caſe they would not be ruled by his direction, they ſhould run headlong like blind beetles upon their own miſchief: and in the end, he gave a ſign to his own company, for to lay upon the formoſt of them that thus fled, and cauſed the multitude that followed, with dint of ſword and drawing bloud of them, to turn their face again upon the enemies. Thus the greater fear overcame the leſs: for ſeeing danger before and behind, firſt they ſtaid their flight, and afterwards returned to the battell. Æmylius alſo with his own regiment (which for the guard of the camp had 2000 tall and valiant men in it) withſtood the King right ſtoutly as he followed hot in chaſe upon thoſe that fled. Moreover, Attalus (brother of King Eumenes) in the right point of the battell, who at the firſt charge had diſcomfited the left wing of the enemies, perceiving that his fellows fled in their left point, and F hearing a great ſtir about the camp, came to the reſcue in good time with 200 horſemen. Antiochus, when he ſaw them turn head again whoſe backs erewhile were toward him, and begin to fight afreſh, and perceived withall a number coming againſt him, both out of the camp and alſo from the battell, turned his horſe head and took himſelf to flight. By this means the Romans obtained the victory of both the wings, and paſſed directly to the rifling of the camp over the dead bodies, which in the main battell moſt of all were maſſacred and lay by heaps: where the ſtrength and flower of the hardieſt men ranged cloſe together and the weight beſides of their heavy armor, would not give them leave to flie away. The horſemen of Eumenes were the firſt of all others that purſued the enemies: after them, the reſt of the Cavalry followed the chaſe all over the fields, and ever as they overtook any of the hindmoſt, killed them outright. But that G which troubled and plagued them in their flight more than all beſides, was their chariots, elephants and camels, intermingled among them as they fled; foraſmuch as being once disbanded and put out of their ranks, they tumbled one upon another like blind men, and were bruiſed and cruſhed under the beaſts feet which came running upon them. Great execution alſo there was committed in the camp, yea, and more in manner than had been in the battell: for the firſt that fled, and thoſe that fought in the vanguard, took their way moſt of them to the camp, and upon aſſured confidence of this multitude, the garriſon within fought more valiantly, and held out longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being thus ſtaid in the gates, and kept out of H the rampier which they thought verily to have forced and won at their firſt aſſault, when they were once at length broken through and got in, made the more bloudy ſlaughter amongſt them, for very anger and deſpight that they had kept them forth ſo long. It is ſaid, that there were ſlain that day about fifty thouſand footmen and 4000 horſemen, 1400 taken priſoners, together with fifteen Elephants with their governors. A number of the Romans were hurt and wounded, but there died not in the field above 300 footmen, and 24 horſemen: and of the regiment of King Eu- menes not paſt five and twenty. And for that day verily, the conquerours after they had ranſacked only the tents and pavilions of their enemies, returned to their own camp with great plenty of pillage: but the next morrow they fell to ſpoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their priſo-ners together. And upon this victory, there came Embaſſadors from Thyatira and Magneſia, unto I Sypilus, for to ſurrender and deliver up their Cities.

Antiochus, who fled accompanied with ſome few, having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themſelves unto him, arrived at Sardis about midnight with a ſmall power of armed men; and hearing that his ſon Seleucus and ſome other of his friends were gone before to Apamea, himſelf alſo at the fourth watch departed thence with his wife and daughter toward A- pamea; after he had committed the charge of guarding the City Sardis unto Zeno, and appointed Timon governour of Lydia. But the inhabitants of the ſaid City and the garriſon ſouldiers within the Caſtle, deſpiſed their governours, and by generall conſent addreſſed Embaſſadors unto the Conſul.

Much about the ſame time alſo, there arrived Embaſſadors from Tralles, and Magneſia (which K ſtandeth upon the river Meander) and likewiſe from Epheſus, to yield up their Cities. For Polyxeni- das (advertiſed of the iſſue of this battell) had abandoned Epheſus; and having ſailed with the fleet as far as Patara in Lycia, for fear of the Rhodian ſhips which rid in guard within the harbour of Megiſte, disbarked and put himſelf a ſhore, and with a ſmall company marched by land into Syria.
The Cities of Aſia were ſurrendred into the hands and protection of the Conſul, and ſubmitted to the people of Rome. By this time now was the Conſul poſſeſſed of Sardis, and thither repaired unto him Scipio from Elæa, ſo ſoon as ever he could endure the travell of journey.

At the ſame time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Conſul, who by the meditti-on of Scipio, made requeſt and obtained thus much, That the King might ſend his Orators and Embaſſadors unto him. And after few daies Zeuſis (who had been governour of Lydia) together L with Antipater (Antiochus his nephew, or brothers ſon) arrived. Who firſt dealt with King Eu- menes and communed with him, whom (by reaſon of old jars and quarrels) they ſuppoſed verily to be the greateſt enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to hear thereof: but him they found more reaſonable and enclining to peaceable terms, than either the King their Maſters or themſelves hoped and looked for. So by the means of Scipio and him together, they had acceſs unto the Conſul; who at their earneſt petition granted them a day of audience in a frequent aſ-ſembly, there to declare their Commiſſion and what they had in charge. "Then (quoth Zeuſis)
"we are not ſo much to ſpeak and deliver ought of our own ſelves, as to ask and be adviſed of you
"(Romans) what courſe to take, and by what means of ſatisfaction we might expiate and ſatisfie
"the treſpaſs of the King our Maſter, and withall obtain grace and pardon at your hands who are M
"the victors? Your manner alwaies hath been of a magnanimous and haughty ſpirit, to forgive
"Kings and nations by you vanquiſhed: How much more then is it decent and beſeeming you "to do the like: yea, and with a greater mind and more generous and bountifull heart, in this vi"ctory and conqueſt, which hath made you LL. of the whole world? For now it behoveth you "to lay down all debate and quarrel with mortall men here upon earth, and rather like the im"mortal gods in heaven, to provide for the good and ſafety of mankind, and them to pardon and "forgive. Now was it agreed upon before the coming of the Embaſſadors, what anſwer to make unto them; and likewiſe thought good it was that Africanus ſhould deliver the ſame, who ſpake by report in this wiſe: "We Romans, of all thoſe things which are in the power of the immortall
"gods, have that meaſure which they vouchſafed to give us: as for heart and courage which de- N
"pendeth upon our own will and mind, we have born (and ever will) the ſame without change
"and alteration in all fortunes: neither hath proſperity raiſed and lift it up aloft, nor adverſity "debaſed and put it down. For proof hereof, I might produce your friend Annibal as witneſs, to
"ſay nothing of others, but that I can report me to your own ſelves. For after we had paſſed
"over Helleſpont, even before we ſaw the Kings camp and army, when the hazard of war was in"different, when the iſſue doubtfull and uncertain, look what conditions of peace we then of"fered on even hand, and whiles we were equall one unto the other, and ſtood upon terms of ad"vantage the ſame and no other we preſent unto you at this time, now that we are conquerors.
"Forbear to meddle within Europe: depart wholly out of Aſia, ſo much as is on this ſide Taurus.
"Moreover, in regard of the expences defraied in this war, ye ſhall pay fifteen thouſand Ta- O
"lents of ſilver, according to the computation of Euboea: five hundred in hand, two thouſand and "five hundred at the aſſurance and making of the peace, by the Senat and people of Rome; and a "thouſand talents yearly for twelve years next enſuing. Alſo ye ſhall make paiment unto Eu-
"menes of four hundred talents, and the remnant behind of the corn and grain which was due "unto his father. And when we have contracted and concluded theſe covenants, to the end that "we may reſt aſſured that ye will perform the ſame, we demand for a gage and ſufficient pawn

A "that ye deliver into our hands twenty hostages, such as we shall like well of and chuse. And "for as much as we can never be perswaded that the people of Rome shall enjoy long peace there, "where Annibal is, we demand above all things to have him in our custody. Also you shall deliver into our hands Thoas the Ætolian, the principall author and firebrand of that war with the Æto- "lians, who caused you to take armes against us, upon assurance that he gave you of them: and likewise armed them upon the trust they had in you. Item, together with him you shall deliver "Mnasimachus the Acarnanian, together with Philo and Eubulidas the Chalcidians. The K. shall "now contract peace in worse estate then he was, by reason he maketh it later then he might "have done. But in case he hold off still and delay, know he well thus much, that the roial majesty "and port of Kings is with more difficulty abated & taken down from the highst pitch and degree "unto the midst; then from that mean estate, cast down headlong to the lowest. Now these Em-
B bassadors were sent from the King with this charge, to accept of any articles of peace whatsoever. And therefore it was decreed that Embassadors should be directly sent to Rome. The Consul divided his army into garrisons for to winter, some in Magnesia upon the river Maander, others in Trallis and Ephesus. After few daies the hostages abovesaid, were brought to Ephesus from the K. and Embassadors also came who were to go to Rome. Eumenes likewise went to Rome at the same time that the Kings Embassadors: and there followed embassies moreover of all the States of Asia.

While the affairs of Asia passed thus in these terms, there were two pro-consuls returned out of their severall provinces, both in maner at once, upon hope to obtain triumph, to wit, Q. Minutius out of Liguria, and M. Acilius out of Ætolia. When the exploits were heard as well of the one as the other, Minutius was flatly denied triumph, but Acilius had it granted with great C consent of all men: who rode into the City triumphant over K. Antiochus and the Ætolians. In which triumph there were carried before him 230 ensigns, 3000 pound weight of massie silver in bullion; of coin in Attick Tetradrachms 1130000: in Cistophors 248000. In plate many vessels engraved and chased, of great weight. He carried also in pomp the implements of the KK house all of silver, with rich and sumptuous apparell. Also crowns of gold 45 presented unto him by Cities associat: besides all sorts of rich spoils; and moreover he led divers noblemen prisoners, and last of all 36 captains, as well Ætolians as those who served under the King. As for Democritus, a great commander of the Aetolians, who some few daies before had broken prison and escaped by night, he was by his keepers that made fresh suit after him, overtaken upon the bank of Tybris: but be-D fore he could be attached by them, he fell upon his own sword, and ran himself through. Only there wanted those that should have followed after his chariot; otherwise the triumph had been magnificent and stately, both for the pompous shew and also of the honor and renoun of exploits atchieved. But the joy of this triumph was blemished with heavy tidings out of Spain, of a losse and overthrow received of the Portugals, in the countrey of Valcetans, neer the town Lyco, under the conduct of L. Æmylius: where 6100 of the Roman army were left dead in the place, and the rest discomfited and beaten back into the camp; which they had much ado to defend and hold, and were forced to retire in manner of flight, and by long journies recovered the peaceable quarters of their friends. And this was the news out of Spain.

From out of France the Embassadors of the Placentins and Cremonians, were brought by the Pretor L. Aurunculeius into the Senat: where they made much moan and complaint for default E and want of inhabitants, whereof some were devoured by the edge of the sword in wars, others consumed by malady and sickness, yea, and certain of them departed out of their colonies for weariness they had of the Gauls their neer neighbours. Whereupon the Senat ordained C. Lælius the Consul to enroll, if he thought so good, six thousand families, for to be distributed among those Colonies aforesaid: & L. Aurunculeius the Pretor to create three Commissaries called Triumvirs, for the conducting of the coloners and inhabitants aforesaid. And created there were M. Attilius Serranus, L. Valerius Flaccus the son of Publius, and L. Valerius Tappus the son of Caius.

Not long after, against the time of the Consuls election which approached neer, C. Lælius the F Consul returned out of France to Rome, and he not only by vertue of the act of the Senat made in his ablence, enrolled certain Coloners to supply the want in Placentia and Cremona, but also proposed a bill, and according to it the LL. of the Senat ordained, that two new Colonies should be conducted into the land that appertaine to the Boians. And at the very same time were letters brought from L. Æmylius the Pretor, as touching the battell at sea fought neer to Myonesus: which letters also give intelligence, that L. Scipio the Consul had transported his army into Asia. For joy of the said navall victory, there was ordained a solemn procession for one day, and in regard that the Roman army was then fight on foot in Africk, the said procession continued ano-
G ther day with supplication to the gods, that this voiage might turn to the prosperity and joy of the Commonwealth. And the Consul was enjoyned at each procession and supplication, to sacrifice twenty head of greater beasts. After this ensued the solemn assembly for the chusing of Consuls, which was holden with great strife and contention. For M. Æmylius Lepidus stood to be Consul, a man grown into an ill name, and hardly spoken of among the people, in that he had left his government and charge in Sicily for this occasion and business only, without making suit unto the Senat and craving leave so to do. Together with him were competitors in election, M. Fulvius Nobilior, Cn. Manlius Volso, and M. Valerius Messala. But Fulvius was chosen alone, because the had rest not sufficient voices of the Centuries, and the morrow after nominated Cn.

Manlius for his colleague, and gave the repulse unto Lepidus; for Massala kept silence and held H his tongue. Which done, the Pretors were elected, namely, the two Quintii Fabii, the one surnamed Labeo, the other Pictor (who had been consecrated that year for the Flamin Quirinall) M. Sempronius Tuditanus, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, Lucius Plautius Hypseus, and L. Bœbius Dives.

During the time that M. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Volso were Consuls, Valerius Antias writeth that there was a rise rumour raised at Rome, and held for certain, that L. Scipio the Consul, together with P. Africanus, were called forth to a parley with King Antiochus, as touching the enlargment and delivery of young Scipio the son of Africanus, and by that means were both of them arrested and taken prisoners: also that when these chief commanders were under arrest, the Kings army incontinently advanced against the Roman camp, the same was surprised I and forced and the whole power of the Romans utterly defeated. By occasion whereof, it went current also that the Ætolians began to look aloft, refused to obey, and shook off their allegeance; also that their Princes and chief States were gone into Macedony, Dardany and Thrace, to levy and wage auxiliary forces: moreover, that A. Terentius Varro, and Marcus Claudius Lepidus were sent unto out of Ætolia, from A. Cornelius the Propretor, for to report these news at Rome. Last of all, to make up the tale, he addeth and saith that the Ætolian Embassadors among other things being examined in the Senat about this matter, and demanded of whom they heard and understood that the Roman Generals were taken prisoners in Asia by King Antiochus, and the whole army overthrown? answered directly, that they had advertisement thereof by their own Embassadors, who had been with the Consul. But because I find no other author besides him that maketh mention of this rumor, I dare not for any thing that I can say of my self, report it for a cer- K tain truth, nor yet omit it as a meer fable or loud lie.

The Ætolian Embassadors were permitted to come into the Senat house; and being induced (in regard of their own cause and present condition) to confesse a truth, and as humble suppliants to crave pardon and forgiveness either for their fault, or misprision and error, began with a bedroll of their favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome, yea and in manner to upbraid the Romans with the valour which they shewed in the war against Philip. But with their arrogant and insolent language they offended the ears of the Senators: and by ripping up old matters done and past (time out of mind and utterly forgotten) they handled their own cause so, and brought it to this passe, that the LL. of the Senat began to call to mind much more harm and mischief contrived and practised by that nation, then kindnesses and courtesies received at their L hands: insomuch as the Ætolians having need of their mercy, incurred their heavy displeasure, and provoked them to anger and hatred. Being asked this question by one of the Senators Whether they would refer and submit themselves to the censure and judgment of the people of Rome? and likewise of another, If they could be content to hold them for their friends or enemies whom the Romans so accounted; they answered not a word: and thereupon immediatly were commanded out of the Court: and presently all the Senat began to cry out with one voice, that the Ætolians were all still for Kings Antiochus depending wholly and only upon that hope, and therefore they ought to war against them as undoubted enemies, and to take down and tame the so proud and fellonious hearts of their own. Over and besides all this, another thing there was that incited and kindled the stomacks of the LL. against them, because at the very same instant when they M seemed to require peace at the Romans hands, they warred against Dolopia and Athamania. So there passed a decree of the Senat, (and the same was moved by M. Acilius, who had vanquished and subdued Antiochus and the Ætolians) That they shall void that very day out of the City of Rome; and within fifteen daies next ensuing, out of all Italy. Au. Terentius Varro was sent to safe-conduct them on the way: and this warning they took with them, that if ever after there came any Embassadors from the Ætolians, without the warrant, license, and permission of the chief General who governed the province, or not accompanied with a Roman Legat, they should be reputed all of them for no better then enemies. In this maner were the Ætolians dismissed & sent away.

And thought good it was that they themselves should cast lots for Ætolia & Asia. Unto him whose lot it should be to govern Asia, was appointed that army which L. Scipio had. And for to furnish it fully up and make up the decaied bands, he was allowed to have four thousand foot men of Romans with two hundred horsemen: of allies that were Latins, eight thousand foot and four thousand men of arms, and with these forces he was to make war against Antiochus. The other Consul had assigned unto him that army which was Ætolia: and liberty he had for supply of that broken army to levy the same number of Citizens and allies that his companion in government had enrolled. To the same Consul was granted a commission likewise to set in order, furnish, and take with him those ships which the former year were prepared and rigged, and not only to make war with the Ætolians, but also to sail over into the Isle Cephalenia. And withall, the said Consul O had in charge to return home to Rome for the election of Magistrats, if he might so do conveniently with the good of the Common-weal. For besides the annuall Magistrats (who were to be chosen one under another) it was agreed upon, that Censors also should be created. But in case his affairs detained him, that he might not return in person, then he was to give advertisement, and signifie so much to the Senat, that he could not possibly be present at the time of the aforesaid Election. So Ætolia fell by lot to M. Fulvius, and Asia to Cn. Manlius. Then the Pretors fell to draw lots for their provinces. Sp. Posthumius Albinus had the jurisdiction over

Citizens

A citizens and forreiners both: M. Sempronius Tuditanus governed Sicily: and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinall Flamin, Sardinia: Q. Fabius Labeo was admirall of the navy at sea: and L. Plautius Hypseus was allotted to the rule of high Spain, and L. Babius Dives of the lower. For Sicily one legion was appointed, together with that fleet which was already in that province. Also there was order given that the new Pretor should impose two tenths of corn upon the Sicilians, and send the one into Asia, and the other into Ætolia. The like imposition was laid and exacted upon the Sardinians, and the said corn to be conveighed into the same armies that the Sicilian corn was. A supply was granted unto L. Bœbius for Spain of a thousand Rom. footmen and fifty horse besides: besides six thousand Latin foot, and two hundred horsmen. Unto Plautius Hypseus for the higher Spain were allowed a thousand Roman footmen: with two thousand Latine allies, and two hundred horse. Besides these supplements, both the provinces of Spain were allowed each B of them one legion. The Magistrats and governours of the former year continued still in place of command for one other yeer, to wit, C. Lælius with his army, and P. Iunius also the Propretor in Hetruria with those forces which were in the province M. Tuccius likewise in the Brutians country and Apulia.

But before the Pretors went into their provinces, there hapned a variance between P. Licinius, the Arch-Pontifie or chief Prelat, and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinall Flamin, like unto that which sometime fell out between L. Metellus and Posthumius Albinus. For at what time as Posthumius the Consul was upon his departure and journey to his fleet in Sicily, together with C. Lutatius his colleague, Metellus the Archbishop for the time being, kept him back
C upon occasion of certain sacrifices to be celebrated: semblably, when as Fabius the Pretor would have gone into Sardania, P. Licinius the high Priest detained him. Much strife and hard hold there was hereabout, as well in the Senat house, as before the people. Inhibitions passed to and fro. Cautions and pledges were distrained: fines they imposed one upon anothers head: the Tribunes were called unto on both sides for to interpose their authority, and they appealed both unto the people. In fine, religion, and the regard of holy rites took place, and carried it clear, and the Flamin was enjoined to obey the chief priest: and by order and expresse commandment from the people, all fines were taken off and forgiven. And when the Pretor for very anger and spite that he was debarred from his province, would have surrendred and resigned up his government, D the LL. of the Senat impeached and terrified him by their absolute authority, and ordeined that he should minister justice, and exercise civill jurisdiction between aliens. After that the musters were ended within few dayes (for many souldiers were not to be levied and enrolled) both Consuls and Pretors took their journey into the provinces. After this, there arose a bruit concerning the occurrents and affairs in Asia, blown and spread abroad I wot not how, nor from what author it proceeded: but after few daies there came certain messengers with letters from the Generals of the Roman army, sent of purpose to the City, which caused not so great joy presently ensuing upon the fresh fear aforesaid (for why, they were no more afraid of Ætolia by them already conquered) as dashed quite the fame and opinion that went on Antiochus, whom in the beginning of this war they supposed would have been a dangerous enemy unto them, as well in regard
E of his own puissance, as for that he had the direction and conduct of Annibal in the war: howbeit, they thought good to alter nothing, either as touching the sending of the Consul into Asia, or diminishing his forces, for fear they should have war with the French.

Not long after M. Aurelius Cotta, a lieutenant of Scipio, came to Rome with the Embassadors of King Antiochus, and likewise King Eumenes and the Rhodians. Cotta reported and declared first in the Senat, and afterwards in a full assembly of the people (by order and commandment from the LL. of the Councell) what affairs had passed in Spain. Whereupon ordeined it was, that there should be holden a solemn procession for 3 daies together: and order was given, that 40 head of greater cattel shou'd be killed for sacrifice. This done, the Senat assembled for to give audience to King Eumenes; first above all other matter: who briefly in few words having rendred F "thanks to the LL. of the Senat, for that they had delivered him and his brother from siege, and "protected his realm against the wrongs and outrages offred by Antiochus: also having testified "his joy by way of gratulation for their prosperous and fortunat affairs atchieved both by land and "sea: namely, in that they had discomfited and put to flight K. Antiochus, & driven him out of his "camp, that he could not keep the field; and withall disseized and dispossessed him first of Europe and afterwards of all that part of Asia which lieth on this side the mountain Taurus: he concluded and knit up all with this, That as touching his own demerits and employments about their "affairs, he had rather they took knowledge by their own generals, captains and lieutenants, "than from his mouth. They all approved well of this speech of his, and willed him to speak boldly without bashful modesty in that case, What he thought in equity and reason the Senat and people of Rome was to yeeld unto him by way of justly recompense: assuring him that the Senat would G do it more willingly and liberally (if possibly they could) according to the worth of his desert. The King answered thus again, that in case any other had made him that offer, and given him the "choice of his own rewards, he would gladly have used the counsell of that honorable court "of the Roman Senat (so he might have the means and liberty to aske their advice) to this end that "he would not be thought, either to exceed measure in covetous desire, or passe the bounds of modesty in craving a recompense. But now considering they are themselves to give that reward, "much more reason it is that their magnificence and bounty to him & his brethren should be re"ferred to their own arbitrement and diſcretion. The LL. of the Senat were nothing moved at this H language of his, but urged him ſtill to ſpeak himſelf in his own cauſe. And after a certain time that they had ſtrived a-vie, the LL. in courteſie and kindneſs, the King in modeſty and ſhamefaſtneſs, yeelding one unto the other reciprocally, in ſuch amiable and mutuall manner as hardly can be expreſſed, Eumenes, departed out of the temple. The Senat perſiſted neverthelefs in their reſolution ſaying, it was very abſurd and undecent that the King ſhould be ignorant upon what hopes he was come, and what he purpoſed to make ſuit and petition for: and himſelf muſt needs of all others know beſt what was meeteſt and moſt expedient for his own Kingdom: yea, and was far better acquainted with the eſtate and affairs of Aſia then the Senat was. And therefore no remedy, but he muſt be called again, and compelled to declare and deliver what his will, deſire and mind was to The Oration of King Eumenes in the Senat of Rome. have. Hereupon the King was brought back into the temple by the Pretor, and urged to ſpeak. I

"Then at laſt, my LL. (qd. he) I would have perſiſted ſtill in ſilence, but that I knew that anon ye
"will call the embaſſage of the Rhodians in place, and that after audience given unto them, I muſt
"neither will nor chooſe but make ſome ſpeech of neceſſity: and verily with ſo much more "difficulty ſhall I ſpeak, becauſe their demands will be ſuch, as if they would ſeem not only to "require nothing prejudiciall and hurtfull unto me, but alſo (which more is) matters little or "nothing pertinent to themſelves. For plead they will and maintain the cauſe of the Cities in "Greece, ſaying, they ought be ſet free and at liberty: which being once obteined, who can make
"doubt but rather they will withdraw from our obeiſance, not only the Cities which ſhal be freed,
"but alſo thoſe which have been homagers and tributaries unto us of old time? yea, and will keep "them as ſubjects in very deed and wholly at their devotion, whom being thus bound and obliged K
"to them by ſo great a benefit, they call by the name of Aſſociats, and would make the world be"lieve they repute them for no other? Yet forſooth (I wot well) in affecting and aſpiring to this ſo
"great power & puiſſance, they will carry it ſo cleanly & make ſemblant, as though this in no wiſe
"touched and concerned them: but it is befitting you alone, correſpondent & anſwerable to other "former deeds of yours. But be ye well adviſed, and let not their gloſing words deceive you;
"take you heed, I ſay, that ye go not with an uneven hand nor bear your ſelves equally, whiles you
"depreſſe and abaſe too much ſome of your allies, in promoting and advancing others beyond all
"meaſure; and above all, beware that they who have lift up their ſpear and born arms againſt you,
"be not more kindly intreated & in better condition, then your loving friends and faithfull confe-
"derats. For mine own part, in all other things I would gladly be thought of every man, rather to L
"keep within my compaſs; yea, and yeeld ſomewhat of my right whatſoever it is, then to ſtrive
"too much in the maintenance and holding therof: but in the queſtion of your friendſhip, my "affection towards you, and to the honour which ſhall come from you, I cannot endure with "patience that any one ſhould out-go and ſurmount my ſelf. This I account the greateſt inheri"tance left unto me by my father the firſt, (of all thoſe that inhabit in Greece and Aſia) who was "entertained in your amity and continued in the ſame alwaies moſt faſt, moſt conſtant and ſure
"ever to his dying day: who not only ſhewed found affection and loyall heart unto you, but alſo
"was in perſon employed in all your wars which ye made in Greece, as well at land as at ſea; aſſiſt-
"ed and aided you with all kind of proviſions, in ſuch ſort, as none of all your allies beſides was "any way comparable or came neer to him. And finally, as he earneſtly exhorted the Bœotians M
"to accept of your ſociety, he ſunk down, ſwooned in the very aſſembly & not long after yeelded
"up his ſpirit and dyed. His footſteps have I troden, and followed his good example. For affection
"verily and ſtudious deſire to honour you, I could not have more then he had (for I ſuppoſe it was "impoſſible to ſurpaſſe him therein:) but in kind pleaſures, effectuall ſervices, offices, courte-
"ſies, and favours, to ſurmount and go beyond him; the goodneſs of fortune, the occaſion of "times, King Antiochus and the war of Aſia, have miniſtred ample and ſufficient matter unto me.
"Antiochus King of Aſia and part of Europe) gave me his daughter in marriage, and with her en"dowed me with the repoſſeſſion of thoſe Cities which had revolted from us. He fed me more-
"ver with great hopes of encreaſing my dominion in time to come, if I would have ſided with him N
"againſt you. I will glory and vaunt of this, that I have done nothing to offend and diſpleaſe you:
"I will rather rehearſe thoſe pleaſures and ſervices which are beſeeming the ancient amity and "friendſhip between our houſe and you. In forces as well for land as ſea, I have friended and "helped your Generals in ſuch wiſe, as I forbid all your allies beſides to do the like: furniſhed them
"I have with victuals on the land, with proviſions at ſea. In all the battels and conflicts by ſhips
"(which were many and in ſundry places) I was preſent in perſon. I underwent all travels, ad-
"ventured all perils, and no where favoured my ſelf and thought much of my pains: nay, that "which is the greateſt calamity and miſery that followeth wars, I was beſieged, and endured it:
"enclofed I was and ſhut up within Pergamus, to the utter hazard of my life and of my realm and "royall dignity. And after I was delivered from that danger and the ſiege raiſed, albeit Antiochus O
"of one ſide and Seleucus on another, lay encamped about the principall fortreſſe of my Kingdom,
"I quit mine own affairs and laid all aſide, to come with my whole fleet into Helleſpont, & there
"to meet with L. Scipio your Conſul, and to aid him in tranſporting and waſting his army into
"Aſia. And when your forces were paſſed over, I never afterwards departed from him: there "was not a Rom. ſouldier more reſiant ordinarily in your camp then my ſelf and my brethren. No "expeditions, no rodes, no exploit of horſe ſervice was there without me. In battel have I ſtood on "foot & guarded that quarter which the Conſul hath appointed me to keep. I wil not ſay, my LL. what one

A "one person there is that hath done so good service for you in the last war as I my self, and who "is any way comparable unto me: nay, I dare make comparison with all states and Princes what"soever, whom you esteem and honour so highly? Masanissa before he was your friend, was "your professed enemie: he came not to you with his aids in the time of his upright fortune, and "whiles his Kingdome florished in good estate; but when he was banished, driven out of his "Kingdom, and turned out of all, he fled into your camp, accompanied only with a small troop
"and cornet of horsemen: Yet nevertheless, because he stood fast to you and bare himself in all "loyalty, and shewed his prowesse in your behalf against Syphax, and the Carthaginians in Africk,
"you not only restored him to his fathers Kingdome, and placed him again in the royall throne,
"but you laid unto his dominion the richest part of the realm of Syphax, made him the most puis-B "sant and greatest Prince of all the Kings in Africk. What reward then, nay, what honour are we "worthy to have at your hands; we (I say) who never were enemies, but ever friends? My fa"ther, my self, my brethren, have born arms in your quarrell by land, by sea, not only in Asia but "far from our own home and native soil, in Peloponnesus, in Bœotia, in Ætolia, during the war with "Philip, with Antiochus, with the Ætolians. What recompence demand you then? may some "man say. For as much as (my LL.) you will have it so, and it is your pleasure that I should speak
"my mind; good reason it is that I obey. This shall stand for all; if you have dispossessed Antiochus
"of all on this side Taurus, with this intent, to hold those lands your own selves; none better then
"you, and whom I would rather wish to be my neighbours and to confine upon me: neither can
"I bethink me, of any means in the world more important to the safety and strength of my King-
"dome. But in case your purpose be to depart and retire your forces from thence, I dare be bold C "to say, that of your allies, (and put them all together) there is not one more worthy then my self
"to have and hold that which you have won by conquest. But an honourable deed it is and mag"nificent, to set free and deliver Cities out of thraldome and servitude. True and I my self am of "the same opinion; provided alwaies, that they had attempted nought by way of hostilitie against "you. But in case they had taken part and sided with Antiochus; how much more standeth it with "wisdom, nay, with equity and reason, to be respective of your allies who have so well deserved "at your hands, then to regard your enemies. This Oration of the King much pleased the LL. of the Senat, and soon it was seen by their countenance that they would deal bounteously and liberally with him. yea, and gratifie him in what they might. Then audience was given to a brief D embassage of the Smyrneans, who by occasion that some of the Rhodians were absent, came between and delivered their message. Highly were these Smyrneans commended, in that they chose rather to endure all extremities, then to yeeld themselves unto King Antiochus. Then the Rhodians entred in place: and the chief man of their embassie, after he had declared the first occasion and beginning of the amity which they had with the people of Rome, and shewed withall the good deserts and services which the Rhodians had performed in the wars first against Philip and then against Antiochus, went on and spake as followeth. "Right honourable, there is nothing more "difficult and troublesome unto us in all the businesse that we have in hand then this one thing, The oration of the Rhodian Embassadors.
"that there is some variance and matter to be debated between us and Eumenes, the only K. of all "others, with whom especially every one of us in privat, and (that which toucheth us more) our E "City in publick, doth entertain the bond of friendship and mutuall hospitality. Howbeit no re-
"pugnancy is in our affections (my LL.) but even the course of this world and nature it self (the
"mightiest thing of all) which disjoyneth us and causeth difference: this maketh us (being men
"free born) to defend and maintain the freedom also of others: this is it, that moveth KK. to be
"desirous to have all in servitude and subjection under them, and at their command. But howsoe-
"ver it is, our modesty and the reverent regard we have of the King person hurteth us more, then
"either the debating of our cause with him is otherwise difficult unto us, or the deciding thereof
"like to be intricat and troublesome unto you. For in case it were so, that you could not honour
"and reward a King, your allie and friend, for his good service done in this war (for recompence "whereof you sit in consultation) by no other means, unlesse you deliver free Cities into his F "hands, to serve in bondage; then were it hard for you to resolve; for fear lest either ye should "send away a prince (your friend and confederat) without guerdon and honour; or seem to change
"that laudable enterprise of yours which you have begun, to stain and blemish your glory now
"(which you have acquired by the war against Philip) with reducing so many Cities and states
"into servitude. But your happy fortune easeth you right well of this difficulty and necessity,
"that you need not fear either to empair your credit and favour with your friends, or to endamage
"your reputation and honour among men. For (the gods be thanked therefore) you have atchie-
"ved a victory, no lesse rich then glorious, and sufficient (if I may so say) to discharge all your "debts, and set you clear with all the world. For Lycaonia, Phrygia both the great and the lesse, "whole Pisidia, Chersonesus, and in brief all the confines of Europe are under your dominion. Of G "all which provinces, if you lay but one by (which you will your selves) for K. Eumenes, you shal
"mightily enlarge and amplifie his Kingdom: but, give him all, you will make him equall to the "greatest princes and monarchs that are. You see then by this, that you may recompence and en"rich your allies out of the conquest gotten by war, and nevertheless hold out your good custom
"that you have begun, remembring alwaies what title you pretended first in your war with Philip,
"& now lately with Antiochus: cõsidering withal, what you did then after Philip was vanquish'd, &
"what is required and expected at your hands, now: not so much because you have used it alrea"dy, as for that it was meet and decent you ſhould ſo do. Many cauſes there be (and thoſe colour- H "ably juſt and lawfull) to enter into arms: one pretended this, another that; ſome in right of lands

"and territories, other of villages; ſome lay claim to towns and Cities, others challenge the poſ-
"ſeſſion of ports and havens, and one tract or other of the ſea-coaſts. As for you, before you en"joyed theſe things, you deſired them not: ſince then ye have now compaſſed the whole earth,
"and are LL. of the world, you cannot poſſibly covet the ſame any more. Warred you have and "fought for honour and glory, in the ſight of all the nations of the earth, who now this long time
"behold and regard your name and empire, no leſſe then they do the gods immortall. And I wot
"not well, whether thoſe things which we hardly come by, be not with more difficulty holden & I "kept afterwards, then they were purchaſed. You undertook to deliver & rid out of the ſervitude
"and oppreſſion of Kings, and to maintain in liberty, a moſt ancient and noble ſtate, renowned "for their worthy and famous acts, and right commendable for their ſingular learning and know"ledge in all ſciences. For your honour it is, having once received all this nation in your ſafegard
"and protection, to defend and preſerve the ſame for ever. And think not, that thoſe Cities only
"are more Greek which are built and ſeated upon the ancient ſoil of Greece, then their colonies
"which have been drawn from them, & in times paſt went from thence into Aſia: for the change
"of air and place hath wrought no alteration, either in the nature and complexion, or the maners
"and faſhions of the people. As for us, endevoured we have do better and better, and each City
"hath entered into an honeſt contention and religious emulation to out-go and ſurmount their "forefathers and firſt-founders in all good arts and commendable vertues. There be many of you "who have been in Greece, many have viſited the Cities of Aſia, and ſetting aſide this only, That K
"we are farther diſtant and remote from you, there is no difference and odds between us and "them. The Maſſillans, whom (if poſſible it had been, that an imbred temperature might be al"tered and overcome with the ſtrength and nature, as it were in the ſoil) ſo many wild, barba-
"rous, and untamed nations, environing them round about, would have made cruell and ſavage "long before this day; we hear ſay and underſtand to be in that requeſt and eſtimation (by good
"right, and their deſert) among you, as if they dwelt in the very midſt and heart of Greece, for
"not only they retain ſtill the very naturall language of their own, they keep them to their old
"faſhion of apparell and attire, and carry the ſame port in their geſture and countenance, but alſo
"above al things they have kept and obſerved their cuſtoms, their maners, their laws and natural
"diſpoſition pure and entire, notwithſtanding the frequent commerce with thoſe, in the midſt L "of whom they converſe and inhabit. Well, the mountain Taurus at this day is the limit of your "empire and ſignory one way: and therefore whatſoever lieth between you and that bound,
"you muſt not think it remote, but look how far your arms have reached, ſo far let your laws and "juriſdiction extend. Let Barbarians, who know no other laws then lords hefts, have their Kings, "ſince they take ſuch pleaſure in them, and much good may they do their hearts: as for the "Greeks, they muſt do as they may, and are not (we confeſſe) in ſo good caſe as you, howbeit
"they carry with them as brave a mind as your ſelves: and the day hath been, when they were
"Monarchs, when they conquered by their own ſword a mighty dominion, and held the ſame
"when they had it. Now they are content with that empire where it now is, nay, they wiſh it "may remain and continue there for evermore, where it is ſetled at this preſent. They ſhall be M
"well apaied, and think they are well, to maintain their liberty by your force of arms, ſince they "have no means of their own to defend the ſame. But (will ſome man ſay) there be certain Cities "that held a ſide and banded with Antiochus? I anſwer again, ſo were ſome before that took part "with Philip, ſo there were that conbined with Pyrrhus, as for example, the Tarentins: and to
"ſay nothing of other States, which I could name and rehearſe, even Carthage it ſelf enjoyeth
"freedom and is governed by her own laws. Conſider then my LL. what a precedent therein
"ye have ſet down to your own ſelves, and how ye ought to confirm and uphold ſo good an exam"ple. You muſt reſolve to deny that unto the covetous deſire of Eumenes, which you would not "grant to your own ire againſt the Carthaginians, which they had moſt juſtly deſerved. And N
"as for us Rhodians, with what valour and loialty we have ſerved and aided you, as well in "this war, as in all others which ye have had in thoſe parts and quarters, we report us to our "own ſelves, and leave it to your judgment. And now in time of peace, we here preſent unto you "that counſell, which if you will accept and approve, all the world will beleeve and ſay, That "you have born your ſelves more honorably in the uſage, then in the atchievance of your victory.
This Oration ſeemed to fit well the greatneſs and majeſty of the Romans. When the Rhodians had done, the Embaſſadors of Antiochus were called in. Who after the uſual and ſtale maner of thoſe that crave pardon, confeſſed the King was in fault, and humbly beſought the LL. of the Senat to have more regard of their own accuſtomed gracious clemency, then remember the Kings treſpaſſe, who had paied ſufficiently for it already: and finally that they would ratifie and con- O firm by their authority, the peace granted by L. Scipio the Lord Generall, according to thoſe conditions, which by him were capitulated and ſet down. So both the Senat thought good to admit of that peace, and alſo within few daies after the people gave their aſſent and eſtabliſhed the ſame. And this accord was ſolemnly confirmed in the Capitol, with the Kings Procurator or agent, to wit, Antipater, the chief of the embaſſage, who alſo was Antiochus his brothers ſon. This done, the other embaſſages of Aſia had audience, and were all diſpatched with this one anſwer, that the Senat would ſend ten deputies or commiſſioners, according to the an-

A cient custome of their ancestors, to hear, decide, and compose all their affairs of Asia. But the finall conclusion of all should be this, That whatsoever pertained to the dominion of Antiochus on this side the mountain Taurus, should be assigned to King Eumenes, excepting the countries of Lycia and Caria, so far as the river Maander, all which must lie to the signory of the Rhodians. As touching the other Cities of Asia, which had been tributaries to Attalus, those also were to pay tribute to Eumenes: but such as were sometimes homagers to Antiochus, those should be enfranciled and remain free. The ten commissioners whom they appointed were these, to wit, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minutius Thermus, App. Claudius Nero, Cn. Cornelius Merula, M. Iunius Brutus, L. Aurunculeius, L. Æmylius Paulus, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Ælius Tubero. These men had plenary power and full commission to take order and deter-
B mine as they thought good, in all the occurents that were presented in these affairs. But they had direction from the Senat, as touching the principal points: Imprimis, That all Lycaonia and Phrygia, both the more and the less, that Mysia, with the Kings chases and forrests, that the Cities of Lydia and Ionia, except those that were free at the day of the battell fought with Antiochus, and expressely by name Magnesia neer Sipylus, together with Caria, which is called Hydrela, and all the territorie of Hydrela lying toward Phrygia; moreover Telmessus and the forts of the Telmessians, reserving only that territory which belonged to Ptolomeus the Telmessian; that all these countries, I say, and Cities above writen, should be given and granted to King Eumenes. Item, That the Rhodian should be enfeoffed in Lycia, without the foresaid Telmessus, the forts and territory, appertaining sometime to Ptolomeus Telmessius: which parcels, I say, were reserved as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians. Item, to the Rhodians was granted that part of Caria, which C lieth beyond the river Maander, neer to the isle Rhodes, together with the towns, villages, fortresses, and lands bounding upon Pisidia: except those towns which were free the day before the battell with King Antiochus in Asia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senat for their graunties, were in hand with them for the City Soli in Cilicia: they alledged, that they likewise as well as themselves, were descended from Argos: by occasion of which confraternity and neer alliance, they loved together as brethren by nature: in regard whereof, they made petition that over and besides other donations, they would do them this extraordinary favour, as to exempt that City also from the servitude and subjection of K. Antiochus. Then were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called for, and treated withall about this matter, but to no effect. For Antipa-
D ter stood stoutly upon this point, pleaded hard, that the accord was past already, and might not be revoked or altered: and that against the tenour of the articles and covenants therein comprised, it was not the City Soli, but also Cilicia that the Rhodians demanded; and never would they rest till they were gotten over the mountain Taurus. Then were the Rhodians called back again into the Senat, unto whom the Lt. of the Senat, after they had made relation how earnest the Kings Embassador was with them upon the point, added thus much moreover and said, That if the Rhodians deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honour of their City and State, the Senat would work all possible means to cause the Kings Embassadors to relent, how stiff and obstinate soever they stood. For this courtesie, the Rhodians thanked them much more heartily then for all the rest before, and said withall, that they would yeeld and give place to the arrogant spirit
E of Antiochus, rather then seem to give any cause or occasion of troubling the peace. And so as touching the City Soli, there was no alteration made.

Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed, the Embassadors of the Massilians brought intelligence, that L. Bœbius the Pretor, being in his journey towards his province of Spain, was entrapped and enclosed by the Ligurians, and many of his train killed outright in the place, that himself mortally wounded fled without his lictors and sergeants into Massilia, and within three dayes left this life. The Senat upon the advertisment ordeined P. Iunius Brutus the Pro-pretor in Hetruria to go in person into the farther Spain, and govern the same as his own province: but F first to leave Hetruria and the army there to one of the Lieutenants whom he pleased to make choise of. This decree of the Senat, together with letters from Spurius Posthumius the Pretor of the City was sent into Hetruria: and so P. Iunius departed as Pro-pretor into Spain. In which province L. Æmylius Paulus (who afterwards wan a right glorious victory of King Perseus) having the former year fought unfortunatly, now a little before the arrival of his successor, gave battell to the Lusitanians with an army rallied and assembled in hast, in which the enemies were put to the worse and driven to flie. One thousand eight hundred of them well armed were left dead in the field, 3300 taken prisoners, and their camp forced and ransacked. The bruit that went of this victory set all matters in Spain in greater quietnes.

The same year upon the third day before the Calends of Ianuary, L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Atilius Serranus, and L. Valerius Tappo, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senat, planted a * 29. December.
Latine Colony at Bolonia; and three thousand people were thither sent to dwel. Every gentleman G by calling that served on horseback had 70 acres of ground set out unto him, and the rest of the coloners fifty apeece. The land divided thus among them had been conquered from the Boians in Gaul: and those Gauls first had dispossessed the Tuscans of the same.

This year there were many men of mark and name that sued to be Censors: and this competition as if it had not been of sufficient importance it self to move matter of debate, was the occasion of a contention and variance much greater. The competitors were these, T. Quintius Flaminius, P. Cornel. Scipio, the son of Cneus: L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Porcius Cato, M. Claudius Marcellus,

Marcellus, and M. Acilius Glabrio, even he who had vanquiſhed Antiochus and the Ætolians at Thermopylæ. To this man laſt reherſed the peoples favour and affection moſt enclined, by reaſon of many congiaries and largeſſes which he had given amongſt them in publick, by means whereof many a man was obliged and bound unto him. The reſt, being ſo many and nobly deſcended withall, took it to the heart, and could not endure that ſuch a perſon as he newly riſen and come up, and a gentleman of the firſt head, ſhould be preferred before them; whereupon P. Sempronius Gracchus, and C. Sempronius Rutilius, two Tribunes of the commonalty, commenſed action againſt him to anſwer at a day, laying to his charge that there remaineth a ſurpluſage of the Kings mony and other pillage gotten in the camp of Antiochus, over and above all that he either carried and ſhewed in triumph, or brought in accompt into the City chamber. Many and ſundry depoſitions there were to prove this inditement, as well of lieutenants as of colonels. But M. Cato above all other witneſſes was moſt noted: whoſe great authority acquired in the whole courſe of his life (whic h he had paſsed hithertoin all upright converſation and conſtant gravity) was much empaired and diſcredited now, with his white robe that he bare on his back. He being produced as a witneſs, depoſed and gave evidence, that he had ſeen certain plate as well gold as ſilver, among the reſt of the pillage found in the Kings camp, which he never could ſet eye on in all the triumph aboveſaid. In the end, Glabrio, becauſe he would bring ſome diſpleaſure particularly, and moſt of all upon Cato, ſaid, he would give over his ſuit for the Cenſorſhip, ſince that there was another competitor as newly come up as himſelf, (whereat the Nobles indeed took indignation inwardly, although they ſaid nothing) who purſued the cauſe ſo againſt him, even with incredible and ineſtimable perjury. Well, a fine was ſet upon his head of a thouſand aſſes. And twiſe was the matter traverſed, whether the mulct ſhould be taken off or paid. But when the third day was come, and the party in trouble (Acilius) had quite forcreaſed to ſue for the dignity, the people would not give their voyces as touching the paiment of the fine aforeſaid, and the Tribunes alſo themſelves let fall their action. So T. Quintius Flamininus, and M. Claudius Marcellus were created Cenſors.

About the ſame time the Senat ſate within the City in the temple of Apollo, in regard of L. Æmylius Regillus, who had vanquiſhed the Admiral of King Antiochus in battell at ſea; where he had audience given, and when he had declared what exploits he had done, namely, againſt how puiſſant Armados of the enemies he had fought, and how many ſhips of theirs he had either ſunk or taken; The LL. of the Councell with one generall conſent and accord, granted unto him an ovall triumph. And he triumphed upon the Calends of February. In which triumph there were born in ſhew fifty crowns ſave one, of beaten gold: but nothing that ſtore of coin as ſuch a royall triumph required only there were carried in pomp 34700 Attick tetradrachms, 123300 ciſtophors. After this (by decree of the Senat) there were proceſſions celebrated in conſideration that L. Æmylius Paulus had brought his affairs in Spain to an happy iſſue.

Not long after L. Scipio came alſo into the City, who becauſe he would not be inferiour to his brother in the honourable addition of his name, cauſed himſelf to be ſurnamed Aſiaticus. He diſcourſed before the Senat, and in the publick audience of the people, as touching his worthy acts. Divers there were who conſtrued the thing thus and ſaid, That the war was greater in name then difficult unto him in the mannaging: for with fighting one only memorable battel the matter was atchieved and ended, but the glory indeed of that victory was begun unto him and prepared for his hand at Thermopylæ. But if a man ſhould judg hereof aright, and according to truth, the battell of Thermopylæ may rather be accompted an exploit againſt the Ætolians then King Antiochus. For what great forces I pray you had Antiochus there in the field of his own? But in the laſt battell ſmitten in Aſia, the whole power and puiſſance that he had in all Aſia, ſtood there to be ſeen, yea, and all the aids and ſuccours which he could levy out of the nations as far as to the utmoſt parts of the Eaſt. Great cauſe therefore they had both to render much praiſe and thankſgiving to the immortall gods, in as ample maner as poſſibly they could deviſe (for vouchſafing unto them ſo brave a victory as it was, and the ſame with ſuch eaſe and expedition) and alſo to grant a triumph to the General. He triumphed upon the laſt of February, even in the very day that maketh the leap year. This triumph of his was much greater then that other other of his brothers in regard of the magnificent pomp and ſhew repreſented to the eye: but if one call to mind the ſubſtance of the things themſelves, and compare the dangers, the conflicts and difficulties of the one war with the other; there is no more equality between them, then if a man ſhould in compariſon of captain with captain, ſet Antiochus to match with Annibal. He ſhewed in triumph two hundred thirty four field enſigns and ſtandards: he carried before him the portraicts of two hundred thirty four towns and Cities: a hundred thirty four teeth of ivory: two hundred thirty four crowns of gold: 237300 ponnds weight of ſilver: 234000 Artick tetradrachms: 331070 ciſtophores: 140000 Philip-peeces of gold: of ſilver plate, and that was all graven and chaſed, a thouſand four hundred twenty four pound weight: of golden plate as much as weighed 1204 pound. Moreover there were led before his chariot 32 great commanders; either governors of provinces under the King, or attendant in his court. Every ſouldier ſerving on foot, had given unto him * 25 deniers: every centurion had double ſo much; and the gentlemen or knights triple. After the triumph done, the ſouldiers had their pay double in mony, yea, and the portion of corn likewiſe was doubled. He had moreover given them already a double proportion in Aſia, preſently upon the end of the battell. A year it was almoſt after his Conſulſhip expired ere he triumphed.

And

A And much about one and the ſame time, both Cn. Manlius and the Conſul entred into Aſia and Q. Fabius Labeo the Prætor repaired to the fleet. Moreover the Conſul had work enough and wanted not matter of war within France. The ſeas were quiet after that Antiochus was defeated and ſubdued: Fabius therefore ſtudied which way to take, and how to employ himſelf and his forces at ſea, becauſe he would not be thought and reputed idle in his province: ſo he reſolved at length to put over with his fleet into Crete. Now they of Cydon warred at that time againſt the Gortynians and the Gnoſians: and the voice went that there was a great number of Romans and Italians, captives, living in ſlavery and bandage in every quarter of that Iland. He looſed therfore from Epheſus and ſet ſail for Candy, and ſo ſoon as he was arrived and ſet aland, he ſent his meſſengers about to the Cities, willing them to abandon their armor and ſurceaſe from war, and to B ſearch and ſeek up throughout all the Cities and territories thoſe captives and priſoners aforeſaid, to bring them to him: nd moreover, to ſend their Embaſſadors or agents, with whom he would treat concerning the affairs that in common touched as well the Candiots as the Romans. The Ilanders made ſmall regard of theſe meſſages: and unleſſe it were the Gortynians, there was not one that delivered the captives Valerius Antias hath recorded, That out of the whole Iland there were rendred to the number of four thouſand; becauſe the inhabitants were frighted with threats of war. And that this was the cauſe why Fabius, although he performed no other exploit, obteined of the Senat a navall triumph. From Crete, Fabius returned to Epheſus; from whence he ſet forth three ſhips to the coaſt of Thracia, and commanded that the garriſons of Antiochus ſhould quit Ænus and Marona, to the end, that thoſe Cities likewiſe might be ſet free and en-franchiſed.

During

The eight and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

DUring the time of the wars in Asia, the affairs also in Ætolia were in smal rest and quietnes: which troubles arose first from the Athamanians, who after that Aminander was dispossessed of his Kingdom, were held in obedience by garrisons under th captains of King Philip; and they bare themselves so proud, insolent, and outragious in their government, that the Athamanians found a great misse of Aminander, and were desirous of him again. Now remained he at that time as a banished person in Ætolia; and upon letters received from his own nation (conteining the state wherein Athamania then stood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again, whereupon he sent the messengers back to Argithea (the chief City of Athamania) unto the principall men of the countrey, with this credence, That if he might be assured of the affection and love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Ætolians and come into Athamania, accompanied with the elect personages (and those are the councel of that nation) and Nicander the Prætor. When he understood and perceived that they were prest and ready to do him all service, he advertised them oftentimes upon what day he would enter with his army into Athamania. At the first there were but four persons that conspired against the Macedonian garrison and these took every one six more unto them for to be assistant in the execution of their complot. But afterwards trusting but little in this small number of their adherents and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep counsell and conceal a matter secretly, then to perform any action valiantly) they adjoyned unto them the like number unto the other: so as now they were two and fifty in all; and they divided themselves into four companies. One crew of them went to Heraclea; another to Tetraphylia, where the Kings treasure was usually kept; a third took their way to Thendoria; and the fourth to Argithea. But they all agreed upon this course, to hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converse in the market place of these Cities as if they were come about some particular negotiation of their own: and upon a certain day appointed to set to it at once, and to raise the whole multitude for to expell the Macedonian garrisons out of their fortresses. Now when the day was come, and Aminander ready upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Ætolians, the garrisons of the Macedonians were at one instant chased out of those four Cities aforesaid, like as it was complotted before hand: and letters were dispatched from all parts into other Cities, advising them to deliver and free themselves from the tyranny of Philip, and restore Aminander into his lawfull kingdome and throne of his father. Thus the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter: only the town Theium made resistance and held out some few daies against the siege, by occasion that Zeno (captain of the garrison there) had intercepted the letters, and they that sided with Philip were possessed of the castle. But in the end surrendred it was likewise unto Aminander, and all Athamania reduced unto his obedience excepting only the fort of Athenæum, situat upon the marches of Macedony.

Philip advertised of the revolt of Athamania, accompanied with a power of six thousand fighting men, rose himself in his journy, and with exceeding expedition, marched as far as Gomphi. Where he before the greater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure so long journey) and ere were 6 thousand came to Athenæum, the only place held by his garrison to his use. And from to him if after he had sounded the next neighbours, and soon found that there was nothing but hatred among them, he retired to Gomphi, and joined withall his forces together returned into Athamania. Then he sent Zeno before with a thousand footmen, and gave him in charge to seize upon Æthopia, a place that directly for his purpose commandeth Argithea: and seeing that his men were possessed thereof, himself sat him down, and pitched his tents about a certain temple dedicated to the name of Iupiter. There he was forced by reason of the foul and stormy weather to stay one whole day, and the morrow after he went forward with his army to Argithea. As they marched, behold they discovered the Athamanians, running from divers parts to the hill tops, which stood over the way along. They had no sooner espied them, but the formost ensigns made stay, and all that regiment of the vanguard was surprised with fear and fright. Every man began for his part to cast many doubts, and think with himself what should become of them, in case their companies were entred once into the vallies, so checked by those rocks aboveſaid. This tumult and trouble caused the King perforce to call back those in the vanguard, and to retire the same way that he came, notwithstanding he was very desirous (if they would have seconded him) to have made quick speed, and gotten through those streights. The Athamanians at first followed after them aloof quietly enough: but when they had once joined with the Ætolians, leaving them behind to come upon the tail of the enemy, they spread themselves all about and flanked them on the sides: some of them also got afore their head by the next waies which they were acquainted with, and beset the passages; insomuch, as the Macedonians were so greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fled in disarray, then marched in good order) to leave much of their armor, and many of their men behind, to passe over the river; and there the chase ended. From thence the Macedonians returned safely to Gomphi, and so forth into Macedony.

The Athamanians and the Ætolians assembled from all parts to Ethopia for to surprise and defeat Zeno and that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedonians reposing no great trust in that place, retired from Ethopia, to an hill much higher and steeper

A steeper on all sides, and therefore lesse acceptable. The Athamanians having found out diverse passages unto it, enforced them to forgo that hold also. And when they were dispersed among the blind rocks, and unto them unknown, and could not readily find the way out, some of them were taken prisoners & others slain. Many for fear tumbled down headlong from the pitch of the cliffs, and brake their necks, and very few escaped with Zeno to the King. The next day after they obtained truce, untill they had commited their dead to earth.

Aminander having thus repossessed his realm, sent Embassadors to Rome unto the Senat: likewise unto the Scipioes in Asia (who after the great battell with Antiochus, sojourned in Ephesus) He craved peace and pardon. he excused himself in that he had recovered his fathers Kingdome by the means and help of the Ætolians, and withall laid great fault and blame upon King Philip.
B As for the Ætolians, they departed out of Athamania, and made an expedition against the Amphilochians, and by consent of the greater part (reduced the whole nation under their puissance and subjection. Having thus regained Amphilochia (for in times past it appertained to their siegnory) upon the same hope they passed over in Aperantia, which yeelded also for a great part thereof, and came under their obedience. As for the Dolopians, they never belonged to the Ætolians, but unto Philip. And at the first they assembled together in arms, but understanding once that the Amphilochians took part with the Ætolians, that Philip was fled out of Athamania, and that his garison was put to the sword, they revolted likewise from Philip, and turned to the Aetolians. Who making now full account that they were sure enough on all sides from the Macedonians, by reason of so many nations which environed them about, they took knowledge (by the common C bruit) of the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans in Asia, and not long after their own Embassadors returned to Rome without hope of peace, relating withall that Fulvius the Consul had passed the seas already with army. Upon these news, they were much troubled and afraid: and in this perplexity, they induced and procured first the Rhodian and then the Athenian Embassages, to the end that by the credit and countenance of these two States, their praiers lately rejected, might have more easie accesse to the Senat: and with them they sent to Rome once again the principall personages of their nation, to try their last hope of obtaining peace; and never forcast to prevent war, before the enemy was come welneer within their sight. Now had M. Fulvius transported his forces to Apollonia and devised with the princes and states of the Epirots, where to begin war. The Epirots advited him to assail Ambracia, which as then was united to the Aetolians. And D why? if either the Ætolians should come to the defence of the place, they had a goodly large and open plain all about to bid them battel; or if they refused the field, and would not fight, they should find no great difficulty to assault and force the town. For not only there was at hand store enough of timber and other matter to raise mounts, mantelets, and other fabricks; but Arethon a river navigable, very commodious to transport all necessaries unto them, runneth under the wals of the City; and besides, the summer was a fit season for war-service. With these reasons they perswaded the Consul to conduct his army through Epirus. But when the Consul was come before Ambracia, he found it was no easie peece of work to besiege and assault the [illegible]. This Ambracia is situat under the stony and craggy hill, which the inhabitants call Per[illegible]e City it self looketh unto the West, what way as the wall reacheth toward the fields a[illegible] the fort E and castle thereof standeth upon the hill, and regardeth the East. The river [illegible]nning out of Acarnania, dischargeth it self into an arme of the sea, which beareth the nam[illegible]he City neer adjoyning, and is called Ambracia. This town, besides that it is well guarded with the river of one side, and defended with hils on the other, is fortified also with a strong wall, in circuit somwhat more then three miles about. Fulvius encamped strongly on the fields side, in two holds of a prety distance asunder, and raised one sconce upon an high ground, opposit against the fortress of the town. All these places he determined to enclose within the compass of a trench and rampier, to the end that they who were shut up within the town, might have no egress, and that from without there should be no ingress, for any aid and succour whatsoever. The Ætolians were assembled F already at Stratus by an edict from the Pretor Nicander incontinently upon the rumour that ran the siege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to march from thence withall their forces. But afterwards, when they preceived that a greater part of the City was streightly beleaguered already, and blocked with trench and rampier; and withall, that the Epirots were encamped upon a plain on the other side of the river, they were of advise to divide their forces in two parts. Eupolemus accompanied with a regiment of a thousand men lightly appointed, passed through the fortifications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together, and entred Ambracia. Nicander with the rest of the forces purposed at the first by night to assail the camp of the Epirots, considering that the Romans could not easily succour them, by reason of the river running between. But afterwards upon better advise, supposing this to be a dangerous enterprise (for fear lest the Ro-G mans should discover their march, and so intercept them that they might not retire again in safety) he altered his mind, and turned to the spoiling and wasting of Acarnania. Now when the Consul had made an end of all his fabricks devised for to invest and enclose the City, and finishing his engins wherewith he meant to shake the wall, he approached neer and gave assault in five places at once. Three batteries he planted in equall distance asunder, and where the easiest passage and accesse was from the plain, full upon that place of the City which they call Pyrrhanm: one over against the temple of Æsculapius; and another opposit to the Castle. With rams he shook the wals; with long poles and hooks he fetcht off and plucked down the

battlemens of the wals. The oppidans at the first were afraid to see their strange engins, and quaked to hear so terrible noise of their wals battered: but afterwards, seeing that the wals stood upright beyond their expectation, they plucked up their hearts again, and with swipes weighed either great counterpoises and weights of lead, or huge stones, then with a swing they let them fall ag in upon the rams of the enemies, or else tumbled mighty big logs of timber aloft, and so either brake them apeeces, or bare them down. And as for their hooks aforesaid, they caught hold of them with iron flouks like anchors, and so drew them over the wals to the other side with a witness and brake both them & their poles. Moreover, they sallied out in the night upon the watch that at attended their engins, issued forth of themselves in the day time, assailed the corps de guard, and put them great fear. As things stood in these terms before Ambracia, the Ætolians by this time were returned to Stratus from their rodes which they made into Acarnania. And then Nicander the Pretor conceiving some hope to levy the siege by some audacious and hardy adventure devised that one Nicodamus should put himself within the town of Ambracia with five hundred Ætolians; and appointed one certain night, and an hour also of the same night, when both they from out of the town should assail the fabricks and engins of the enemy planted against Pyrrhæum and also himself charge upon the camp of the Romans at the same time, and put them in fright: supposing by this twofold alarm (especially in the night which maketh every thing more fearfull) there might be some notable act and memorable exploit done. And Nicodamus verily for his part in the dead time of the night, having passed unseen and not descried by some of the sentinels, and by resolut force broken through the rest of the watches, passed over an arm of the river and recovered the City, and in some measure by this means heartned the besieged inhabitants to adventure anything, and put them in better hope to accomplish al. And when the night appointed was come, all on a suddain he set upon the engins, as it was before accorded between them. The adventure of this enterprise was much more then the effect, because there were no forces without to joyn with him; were it that the Pretor of the Ætolians was afraid to be too bold or that he thought it was a better peece of service to aid the Amphilochians newly recovered, whom Perseus King Philip his son, sent from his father to reconquer Dolopia and Amphilochia assailed with great force and violence. The Romans had planted their ordnance and artillery, as is aboveland in three places against Pyrrhæum, which the Ætolians charged all at one time, but not with like preparation of means, nor with the same violence. For some came with burning and flaming firebrands, others carried tow and hards with pitch, and faggots of dry sticks, and other like matter easie to be kindled, in such sort as all their companies shone again with a light fire. Many of the warders they killed at the first onset, but when the alarm and tumult was heard within the camp, and the sign I given by the Consul, they took arms, and ran apace out of all the gates for to rescue and defend them. In one quarter the Ætolians did their deed, and fought with fire and sword: but in the other two places after they had given the attempt, rather then began any skirmish, they retired and went their waies. The heat of the fight inclined wholly to one quarter, where the two captains Eupolemus and Nicodamus, encouraged their men as they fought from two divers parts, and entertained them with an allured hope, that Nicander according to agreement would hither and charge upon the back of the enemies. This for a good while mainteined the courages of the souldiers: but perceiving there was no sign appeared of their countrymen, and that they kept not touch with them, and seeing withall how the number of the enemies encreased, and themselves disappointed and destitute, they slaked their fight, and were not so eager upon the enemy, and in the end gave over: and having much ado to retire in safety, were chased into the City, after they had burnt some of the Roman engins, and slain a few more of their enemies then there died of themselves. And surely if the service had been followed in execution according as it was complotted and agreed, those devised engins no doubt might have been destroyed, if not wholly, yet in one part at least wise, and that with great murder and slaughter of the enemies. The Ambracians, together with those Ætolians which were within the City, not only gave over that nights enterprise, but ever after shewed more coldnes to hazard themselves again, as if they had been betrayed by their own fellows. Not a man would sally forth upon the ward and watch of the enemies, but they all from their walls and turrets stood upon their guard only, and with the vantage of the place defended themselves in safety.

Perseus advertised that the Ætolians approached Amphilochia, quit the siege of the City which he was about to assault: and after he had only harried and wasted the territory about it, retired from those quarters and returned into Macedony. The Ætolians likewise were enforced to depart from thence, by reason that their sea-coasts were spoiled and overrun: for Plenius the King of the Illyrians, was entred into this river of Corinth with a fleet of 60 barks, and with the fleet of the Achæan ships that lay in the rode of Patræ invested the maritim tract of Ætolia. Against whom were sent a thousand Ætolians, who waited upon the fleet at every turn as they doubled any reaches, and with the vantage of the short waies and next passages by the land, were ready to welcome them on the banks and make head against them.

The Romans lying still in siege before Ambracia, by battering and shaking the wals in many places, had dismantled a great part of the City, and laid it open: howbeit, they could not enter with it. For at every breach where the wall was broken down, they were ready to make a new countermure, and the souldiers standing upon the very ruins, served in stead of a bulwark. The Consul seeing he could not prevail by open force, determined to undermine and make a secret way

A way in the ground into the City; but first he covered the place where they wrought with mantlets. For a good while the pioners were not perceived by the enemies, notwithstanding they wrought both night and day, not only digging under the earth, but also casting up the mould as they went. But an huge heap of earth bearing up aloft from the rest, was discovered, and gave them within the town to understand, what the enemies were about: and fearing lest they had wrought so far already as under their wals, and that they were at the point to make a way into the town, they within began likewise to strike another trench just against the place covered with mantlets aforesaid: and when they had digged to that depth as the bottom might be of the enemies mine, they made no words within, but in great silence laid their ear too in divers places close to the earth, harkning if haply they might hear any noise of the pioners: and when they once had got B an ear of them, they countermined directly against them. And long they were not about it: for anon they came as far as to the void hollow ground, whereas the foundation of the wall stood upon staies and props, which the enemies had set to bear it up. Now when their works were met together, and that there was a continued passage out of this trench into the Mine, the pioners first fell to it and scuffled with their spades, shovels, and mattocks, and such other tools that they had used to work withall: but soon after, armed souldiers entred and encountred within the vault, and closely skirmished under ground. But within a while that manner of dealing grew more cold and slack by reason that they stopped up the Mine between when they list, one while with sacks and haircloath, otherwhiles with doors and such trash as they could come by in haste & stood next hand. One new invention above the rest was devised against those within the Mine, C and the same but a slight matter, and made without any great trouble, and this it was, The townsmen took a great tun or dryfat with a hole boared in the bottom, of that capacity, as might receive a pretty pipe like a faucet within it; and withall they made a pipe indeed of iron to fit it, and an iron lid likewise to cover the other end or mouth thereof, but the same had many holes in divers places of it. Now this vessell they stuffed full of down and soft feathers, and then set it with the head forward against the very Mine. From the lid or cover aforesaid there stood proking out long sharp pikes, which the Macedonians call Sarissa, for to keep off the enemies. Within the feathers they put a cole or sparkle of fire, and then with a pair of smiths bellows (the nose whereof went into the pipe aforesaid) they blowed the cole and set it on a smothering fire within the feathers. By which means there arose not only a mighty deal of smoak, but also it carried with it a D stinking savour, by the reason of the feathers burning within; and so filled all the Mine underneath, that scarce durst any man abide within for fear of being choaked.

During these affairs about Ambracia, Phaneas and Demoteles two Embassadors sent from the Ætolians by a generall decree of the whole nation, came with a full and plenary commission unto the Consul. For their Prætor (seeing of the one side Ambracia besieged, and on the other side the sea coast endamaged with the enemies ships, and in a third quarter the Amphilochians and all Dolopia piteously wasted by the Macedonians; and that the Ætolians were not able to oppose themselves and make head at once against three wars in divers parts) had assembled a generall Diet for to consult with the chief of the Ætolians what was to be done in this case. All their opinions jumped in this one point, "To seek for peace (if it were possible) under equall and indifferent E "conditions: if not, yet in as tollerable terms as they might. In confidence and assurance (say they) "of Antiochus, the war began: and now that Antiochus is vanquished both by land and sea, yea, "and hunted as it were out of the compass of the world into an angle beyond Taurus, what "hope remaineth to maintain and wage the war any longer? and therefore Phaneas and Demote- "les were to deal, as in such a case and time, as they thought best according to their wisdome and "fidelity, and the common good of the Ætolians: for what other counsell remaineth, what course "else can they take, or what choice beside hath fortune left them? With this so large and free "commission I say, were these Embassadors sent: who besought the Consul to spare their City, to "have mercy and pity of their nation sometime linked in amity unto them, and forced through "very calamity and misery (for loath they were to speak of any injuries and wrongs offered) to fall "into such follies: neither have the Ætolians in this late war of Antiochus deserved to suffer more "harm than they were worthy to receive good for their service in the former war against Philip: "and when they were not largely rewarded and recompenced then, so they ought not to be pu- "nished and chastised extremely now. The Consul made answer again, That the Ætolians had "made a suing for peace many a time, but sincerely and truly at no time: and since they had solli- "cited and drawn Antiochus to war, let them hardly follow his example in craving peace. Like as "he therefore hath not quit and rendred some few Cities which were in question about their li- "berty and freedom, but parted with a rich and wealthy kingdom, even all Asia, between this and "the mountain Taurus: so unless the Ætolians will simply lay all arms aside and come to treat for "peace unarmed, he would never give them audience. And to be short, if they will peace have, "they must deliver up their armour and all their horses first, yea, and make paiment of a thousand "talents of silver, and the one moity thereof to pay downright upon the nail before hand. Over "and besides this branch, I will annex unto the accord and covenant, That they shall hold for "their friends and enemies those whom the people of Rome reputeth to be theirs, & none other. To this answer the Embassadors said never a word, both for that they were very hard and grie- vous impositions, and also because they knew the natures and minds of their countrimen and neighbours at home, how untractable they were and not to be removed if they once took a pitch:

whereupon they returned unto them, without doing any thing at all, to know the advice once a- H gain of the Prætor and the principal States, what to reſolve upon in every reſpect, whiles all ſtood whole and upright. But they were welcomed with outcries, and well ſhent for their labour, in that they had not diſpatched and made an end, and ſo were ſent away, and commanded to bring back with them one peace or other. As they went again toward Ambracia, they were forelayed and ſurprized in an ambuſh laid for them near the high way ſide by the Acarnanian (with whom at that time they warred) and were had to Tyrrheum and there impriſoned. And by this occaſion the peace was delayed.

Whiles the Embaſſadors of Athens and Rhodes (who were come already to intreat for them) remained with the Conſul, Aminander alſo (the King of the Athamans) preſented himſelf under * Ambrachia, or Arta. ſafe conduct in the Roman camp, and took more care for the City of * Ambracia (where he had I ſojourned the greateſt part of his exile) than in the behalf of the Ætolians. By them, the Conſul was certified of the hard hap of the Ætolian Embaſſadors; and then he gave commandment that they ſhould be brought from Tyrrheum. When they were come, they began to treat of peace. Aminder in the mean while laboured what he could in that enterpriſe which he eſpecially had undertaken namely, to induce the Ambracians to ſubmit unto the Romans: but when he ſaw he did but ſmall good, for all his parling with the principal perſons of the City from their walls: at length by the Conſul his permiſſion he entred into the town; where, partly by good counſell, and partly by prayer and entreaty, he perſwaded them in the end, to put themſelves into the Romans hands.
Now as touching the Ætolians, they found much favour by the means of C. Valerius the ſon of that Lævinus, who firſt contracted amity with that nation; and was beſides half brother unto the K Conſul by the ſame mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Ætolians who came to aid them might go forth without harm, ſet open their gates. Then articled it was with the Ætolians: Imprimis, To pay 500 Euboik talents of ſilver; two hundred preſently, and the other 300 at ſix paiments yearly by even portions. Item, To render all Roman captives and fugitive traytors and runagates that they had into the hands of the Romans. Item, To challenge juriſdiction over no City, which ſince the time that T. Quintius paſſed over into Greece, was either forced by the Romans or entred voluntarily into amity and ſociety with them: provided alwaies, that the Iſle Cephalenia be not compriſed within this capitulation. Theſe articles albeit they were ſomewhat eaſier than they looked for, yet the Ætolians requeſted that they might acquaint their Council withall: and permitted they were ſo to do. Some ſmall variance and debate diſtracted and L held them awhile as touching thoſe Cities, which having been in times paſt within their ſeignory and juriſdiction they hardly could abide to be diſmembred (as it were) from their body. But in the end there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Conſul for a preſent a coronet of beaten gold, weighing 150 pound. Their ſtatues of braſs and marble their painted tables (wherewith Ambracia was better ſtored and adorned, than all the other Cities of that region, becauſe it was the royall ſeat of King Pyrrhus where he kept his court and reſiance) were all taken down and carried away: nought elſe was touched nor any hurt done beſides.

The Conſul diſlodged then and removed from Ambracia into the higher and more inland parts of Ætolia, and encamped before the City called Argos Amphilochium, two and twenty miles diſtant from Ambracia: and thither at length repaired the Ætolian Embaſſadors unto him, M who marvelled much at them why they ſtaid ſo long. When he underſtood by them that the generall council of the Ætolians had approved of peace, he willed them to go directly to Rome unto the Senat: and permitted alſo the Athenians and Rhodians (their mediators and advocats) to go with them and as orators to ſpeak in their behalf: & moreover he granted, that his half brother C. Valerius ſhould accompany them: which order when he had taken, himſelf croſſed over the water to Cephalenia.

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the ears and hearts of the chief Senators wholly poſſeſſed beforehand, with many complaints and imputations that Philip had enformed againſt them: for he by means of his Embaſſador and letters (complaining that the Ætolians had unjuſtly taken from him the Dolapians, the Amphilochians, and Athamania; and that his garri- N ſons, yea, and laſt of all his ſon Perſeus, were driven out of Amphilochia) had wholly averted the Senat from giving any ear at all to their requeſts and prayers: howbeit the Rhodians & Athenians had audience given them with patience and ſilence. "The Athenian Embaſſador Leon (by report)
"moved and perſwaded the Senat with his eloquent tongue: and by a familiar parable and ſimili-
"tude, he compared the people of Ætolia to the nature of the ſea: For like as it, being of it ſelf
"calm is troubled and made rough by the winds: even ſo (ſaith he) the people of that nation, all "the while they entertained friendſhip with the Romans, and performed their faithfull promiſe
"unto them, ſo long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet: but after that "Thoas and Dicearchus began to blow from out of Aſia, as after that, Menetas and Damoritus
"bluſtred and puffed from the parts of Europe, then aroſe a ſtorm and tempeſt, with the guſts O
"whereof driven they were to Antiochus, and caſt (as a man would ſay) upon a rock. Well, the Æ"tolians after they had been much toſſed a long time from poſt to pillar, in fine effected, that theſe "articles of peace enſuing, were freely agreed upon. Imprimis, The nation of Ætolia ſhall maintain faithfully and truly the Empire and Seignory of the people of Rome. Item. They ſhall ſuffer to paſs through their country and confines no army that ſhall be conducted againſt their allies and friends; nor aſſiſt them with any aid or maintenance whatſoever. Item, They ſhall repute the enemies,

A mies of the Romans for their enemies, and wage war against them. Item, They shall deliver unto the Romans and their confederats, all runagates, all fugitives, and prisoners that are among them, excepting such as having been once taken and returned home, chanced to be caught again the second time: or those, who being Roman enemies, were taken prisoners by them, at what time as the Ætolians served in garrison under the Romans. As for the rest, as many as are forth-coming and may be found, shall be delivered (without fraud or covin) within 100 daies next ensuing, to the Magistrate of Corcyra: but those that appear not within that time, shall be likewise rendred whensoever their fortune is to be met withall. Item, They shall yield forty hostages, such as the Roman Consul in his discretion will approve and like well of: provided, that none of these pledges be under twelve years of age, nor above forty. Neither shall there be ta-B ken for hostage any Prætor or Captain over horsemen, nor publike Notary or Secretary to the State, nor yet any one that hath lain in hostage before-time. Provided also, that Cephalenia shall be exempt from the articles of this accord. Item, As touching the sum of money which they are to pay, and the manner and terms of the paiment, there shall be nothing changed of that which hath been concluded with the Consul; yet, if they had rather pay the same sum in gold than in silver, they may so do; provided then, that they keep the rate and proportion, of one for ten, to wit, that one golden peece of coin go for ten times so much in weight of silver, and no more. Item, What Cities, what lands and territories, what persons soever, which having at any time heretofore held tenor of the Ætolians, were by the Consuls T. Quintius and Cn. Domitius, or any time since their Consulship, either subdued and conquered by force of arms, or otherwise
C of themselves came under the obeisance of the people of Rome, the Ætolians shall make no claim nor challenge unto them. Finally, the Æniades with their City and territory, shall appertain to the Acarnanians. Under these conditions aboveſaid, the accord was concluded with the Ætolians.

Not only in the same summer, but also much about those very daies wherein these affairs were managed by M. Fulvius in Ætolia, Cn. Manlius the other Consul maintained war in * Gallogræcia, whereof at this present I will begin to write. This Consul in the beginning of the spring came to Ephesus; where, after he had received the army of L. Scipio and taken a review and survey thereof he made an Oration to his souldiers; wherein, first he praised their valour and vertue, in that with one battell they had finished the war against Antiochus: then he exhorted them to enter
D into a new war with the Gauls who had succoured King Antiochus with aid; and were beside of nature so untamed, that unless their puissance were abated and their courage taken down, to little or no purpose it was that Antiochus was removed beyond the mountains of Taurus. Last of all, some discourse he made of his own person, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither vain untruths nor excessive reports. The souldiers gave audience to the Consul with great joy and a general applause, making this account, that since King Antiochus was vanquished, the Gauls alone (who were one part of his forces) would be of no puissance to withstand them. But the Consul supposed that it was much out of his way, that Eumenes should be absent (for then he was at Rome) who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whom it imported and concerned very much, that the power of the Gauls should be enfeebled and abated.
E And therefore he sent for Attalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enter into action with him and take arms. And when Attalus had made promise to aid him both in his person and with all the power that he could make, he sent him into his country to levy souldiers. After some few daies, when the Consul was departed from Ephesus, Attalus (accompanied with a regiment of a thousand foot and two hundred horse) met him at Magnesia; and had given order to his brother Athenæus, to follow after with the rest of the forces; having committed the guard and government of Pergamus and the kingdom to those, whom he knew to be fast and faithfull to his brother and himself. The Consul, after he had praised and commended the young gentleman, marched forward with his whole power as far as * Maander, and there encamped, because it
F was not possible to pass the river at any foord, and therefore boats and barges were to be got together for to ferry and transport the army. When they were set over the river, they went to Hiera Come, where there was a magnificent and stately Temple of Apollo, and an Oracle in it. And by report the Priests and Prophets there, deliver the responds and answers of the Oracle in verses, and those not rudely composed without rhithm & meeter. From hence they removed, and at two daies end arrived at the river Harpasus: & thither were embassadors come from the Alabandians, requesting the Consul, either by vertue of his authority, or by force of arms to compel one of their fortresses which lately had revolted from them and rebelled, to return again to their former obedience.
G And hither Athenæus also, brother to Eumenes and Attalus, was come together with Leusus the Cnidiot, and Corragus the Macedonian, bringing with them 1000 foot, and 300 horse, of divers nations mingled together. The Consul sent one of his martiall Tribunes or Colonels with a mean company, to summon the Castle or fortresse aboveſaid, and after it was forced and recovered, he delivered it into the hands of the Alabandians. Himself kept on his direct way, and turned on no side untill he came unto Antiochia upon the river Maander, where he encamped. This river Maander ariseth from Celænæ, where the first head and source thereof is to be seen. Now this Celænæ had been in times past the capitall City of all Phrygia. But in process of time this old Celænæ was abandoned by the Inhabitants, and not far from it they peopled a new City called Apamea, bearing the name of Apamea the sister of Seleucus. The river Marsyas likewise springing not far from the foreſaid ſources of Mæander, diſchargeth it ſelf thereinto. And as the common fame goeth, at this Celæna it was, where Marſyas the Muſician gave defiance to Apollo, and challenged him to play upon the flute. This Maander abovenamed, iſſuing out of an high hill at Celæna, runneth through the midſt of the City and firſt keeping his courſe along the country of the Carians, and afterwards of the Ionians, falleth at the laſt into an arm of the ſea, between Priene and Miletus. H

Whiles the Coſ. lay encamped about Antiochia, Seleucus the ſon of Antiochus, preſented himſelf unto him with corn for his army, according to the covenant contracted with Scipio. Some ſmall variance and difference there was as touching the aid demanded of Antiochus: for Seleucus pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman ſouldiers. But this debate was ſoon at an end by reaſon of the ſtiff reſolution of the Coſ. who ſent a Colonel to warn and charge the ſouldiers to accept no corn, before the aid-ſouldiers of Antiochus were received. From I thence he marched to * Gordiu tichos (a City ſo called) & ſo forward the third day to Tala. This City is ſeated upon the frontires of the Piſidians, in that coaſt which boundeth upon the Pamphylian ſea. This quarter was able to yield luſty men for war, when it had not been any way endamaged, but remained entire and whole. For proof whereof, even then alſo there iſſued out of the City a cornet of horſmen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the firſt onſet troubled them not a little. But afterward, ſeeing themſelves neither for number, nor yet for proweſs comparable unto them, they were driven back into the town, & craved pardon for their treſpaſs, ready to ſurrender their City into the Coſ. his hands. The Coſ. impoſed upon them a paiment of 25 talents of ſilver, and 10000 medimns of wheat, and upon that compoſition their ſurrender was accepted. Three daies after the Romans came to Chaus the river, & from thence to the City Eriza, K which at the firſt aſſault they won. After this the army marched as far as to a Caſtle called Thabuſion ſtanding over the river * Indus, ſo called of a certain Indian, whom an Elephant threw and caſt into it. Now they were not far from Cibyra, & yet no embaſſage appeared from the tyrant of that country and ſtate, Moagetes, a diſloyal and treacherous man in all his dealings, and beſides extream hard and unreaſonable. Whereupon the Coſ. ſent out before C. Helvius, with 4000 foot and 500 horſe, to ſound his diſpoſition and mind. As theſe companies entred into his frontiers, there encountred them his Embaſſadors, giving them to underſtand that the tyrant their Maſter was ready to do whatſoever they would command: only his requeſt was unto Helvius to paſs peaceably through his country, and to reſtrain his ſouldiers from waſting & ſpoiling the territories, & 15 talents they brought with them for to make a crown of gold. Helvius promiſed to ſave his L lands for being ſpoiled and waſted, but he willed the embaſſadors to go to the Coſ. Now when they had related the ſame unto him, he made them anſwer in theſe terms, We cannot gather by any ſign (qd. he) that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to us Romans: & again, if he be ſuch an one as the world taketh him for, we are to think rather of his chaſtiſement, than of admitting him into our amity. The embaſſadors ſore troubled at this word, requeſted him for that preſent no more, but to take the crown of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himſelf might have acceſs into his preſence for to parl with him and clear himſelf. The morrow after, by permiſſion of the Coſ. came the tyrant into the camp, bearing no port of a Prince. For a privat perſon and mean man of ſmall wealth would have gone in better apparel, and carried a greater train about him than he: neither went he ſo meanly but he ſpake as lowly, hacking and hewing his words, as if he had not M been able to ſpeak them out. He complained of his own bareneſs and want & likewiſe of the poverty of the Cities under his ſeignory (for beſides Cybira, he held in poſſeſſion Sylium & that which is called Alimne) Yet he promiſed to ſee what he could do if haply by undoing himſelf & ſpoiling his ſubjects he might make up five and twenty talents. Mary he miſtruſted greatly that he ſhould never effect ſo much. Are you thereabout? (qd. the Coſ.) Now verily I can no longer endure this mockery. Was it not enough that in your abſence you baſhed not to delude and diſappoint us by your Embaſſadors, but you muſt perſiſt ſtill in the ſame impudency now that you be here your ſelf in perſon? And would you make us beleeve indeed that the diſburſing of 25 talents will begget you and your whole kingdom? Come on ſir, I ſay; Bring me hither within theſe three daies, and lay me down in ready money 500 talents, or look for no other favour, but your territory to be N waſted, and your City beſieged. Greatly affrighted was he at theſe minatory words, howbeit he continued ſtill obſtinatly, counterfeiting & pretending his needineſs and poverty, and after much baſe hucking, and riſing by little and little, one while haſting and wrangling, another while praying and entreating (and that with whining and putting finger in the eye) he was fetcht over at length, and came off to pay 100 talents of ſilver, and to deliver 10000 medimns of corn beſides. And all this was exacted of him to be performed in ſix daies. From Cibyra the Coſ. conducted the army through the country of the Sindenſians, and after he had paſſed over the river Calauris, he there pitched down his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or meer Caralitis, and ſet them down and reſted upon the river Maander. As they advanced from thence toward Lagon the next City the inhabitants fled for fear: wherupon the town void of people, but repleniſhed with O abundance of all things was ranſacked and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or ſpring of the river Lycus, and the next day marched toward the river Cobulatus. The Termiſſians at the ſame time having forced and won the City of the Lyrians, were now upon the point to aſſault the Caſtle. They who were within beſieged, ſeeing no other hope of ſuccour ſent their Embaſſadors to the Conſul, beſeeching his help, and making pitifull moan, how they with their wives and children were ſhut up within the fortreſs, and looked every hour for death, either by famin or the ſword.

A sword. This fell out as the Cos. wished, namely, to have so good an occasion presented unto him, of turning his way into Pamphylia. At his first coming he delivered the Lyrians from the siege. To Termessus he granted peace, upon composition that he should receive first 30 talents. In like sort he dealt by the Aspendians and other States of Pamphylia. In his return from thence the first day he encamped fast by a river called Taurus, and the next day following, near a town which they call Xyline-Come. From whence he marched and held on his journey continually, untill he came to the City Cormasa. The next City unto it was Dorsa, which he found abandoned by the Inhabitants for B fear, howbeit, full of all kind of goods. As he marched still along the marshes there met him Embassadors from Lysinia, who came to render their City into his hands. After this, he entred into the territory of Sagalassus, a fertile & plenteous quarter, for all sorts of corn & fruits. The Pisidians inhabit those parts, who are the best warriors in all that country. In regard whereof, as also for that their territory is fruitfull and well peopled and their City strongly situat (as few like unto it) they were grown to be hardy and courragious. The Cos. seeing no embassage presented unto him in the entrance of the frontiers, sent out forragers to fetch in booties. When they perceived once their goods harried and carried away before their faces, their stomacks came down, and then they sent their embassadors and upon composition to pay 50 talents, 20000 medimns of wheat, and as many of barley, they obtained peace. From thence he passed to the fountains of Obrima, untill he C came to a village which they name Aporidos-Come, and there he encamped. Thither repaired the next day Seleucus from Apamea. And the same day, after he had sent away unto Apamea his sick folk and other baggage and pelf that he had (good for nothing) he took guides of Seleucus for the way, and entred into the plains of Metropolis, and the next morrow marched as far as Dinia in Phrygia. After this he entred into Synada, where he found all the towns about abandoned for fear and left desert. With the booty and pillage whereof his army was so heavily charged, that hardly he could march five miles a day; and so he came at length to Bendos, named, The old. From thence he passed to Anabura and the next day to the source of Alander, and the third day pitched down his tents near Abassus. There he lay encamped many daies together, because he was now arrived into the country of the Tolistobogians.

The Gauls in times past being a mighty people in number, were induced to take a voyage, either for want of land to inhabit, or for hope of booty and prizes: and supposing withall, that they could not pass through any nation whatsoever, comparable to themselves in feats of arms, entred D under the conduct of Brennus into the country of the Dardanians. Where, they began to mutine among themselves: by occasion whereof it hapned, that to the number of twenty thousand of them, following two of their Princes Lomnorius and Lutarius, departed from Brennus, and took their way into Thracia: where partly by warring with them that made resistance, and partly by imposing tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as far as to Bizantium: and after they had held tributary a good time the coast of * Propontis, they possessed themselves also of the good towns and Cities of that quarter. After this, they had a mind and desire to invade Asia; for they heard say, being so near, how fertile and plenteous the soil of that country was. And after they had surprized and won Lysimachia by a wile, and by force of arms conquered all Chersonesus, they descended to Hellespont. Where seeing how they were divided from Asia but only by the E straights and that it was but a small cut thither their desire was much more inflamed to pass over. And for this purpose they dispatched certain curriers to Antipater the governour of that coast, to demand passage. But by reason that they effected not this so soon as they hoped, there arose another new sedition between the Princes themselves. Whereupon Lomnorius accompanied with the greater part retired to Byzantium from whence he came. But Lutarius took from the Macedonions (who under colour of an embassage were sent from Antipater in espiall) two covered ships, and three brigandines. By means of these vessels, within few daies he had set over all his army, transporting them one after another day and night continually. Not long after Lomnorius also passed over into Asia from Byzantium, by the aid of Nicomedes Kings of Bithynia. After this, the Gauls joyned again together in one, and succoured Nicomedes in his wars against Zybœa, who held F part of Bithynia and by their help and assistance especially, Zybœa was vanquished, and all Bithynia became subject to Nicomedes. Then they departed out of Bithynia into Asia. Now of twenty thousand there were not above ten thousand armed. Yet so great a terrour they struck into all nations on this side the mountain Taurus, that both they to whom they approached not near, and also they whom they came unto, as well the farthest as the neerest, submitted themselves, and ranged under their obedience. In the end, being three nations of them, to wit, the Tolistobogians, the Trocmians, and the Tectosages, they divided Asia likewise into three parts, and parted them so equally among themselves, that each nation of them possessed a severall tract which paied them tribute. The coast of Hellespontus was given to the Trocmians: the Tolistobogians had for their share Æolis and Ionia: and unto the Tectosages were allotted the inland parts of the main con- G tinent of Asia. And in one word they demanded tribute of all Asia on this side Taurus. But they planted and seated themselves about the river Halys. The bruit of their name was so fearfull and terrible, and especially after their issue was multiplied and increased in great number, that the KK. also of Syria in the end refused not to be their homagers and give them tribute. The first of all the inhabitants in Asia that denied them homage, was King Attalus the father of Eumenes: and fortune beyond the expectation of all men, favoured his hardy and courragious enterprise: for he vanquished them in battell. Howbeit, he danted not their hearts so much, but still they upheld and maintained their ſoveraign ſeignory, in ſuch ſort, as their puiſſance continued untill the war H between Antiochus and the Romans. Yea, and after that Antiochus was vanquiſhed and chaſed out of part of his Realm, they conceived great hope to hold their own ſtill; by reaſon they were ſo remote from the ſea, and therefore thought that the Roman army would never pierce ſo far as to them. The Conſul now, for as much as he was to war with this nation, ſo terrible to all their neighbours in thoſe quarters, aſſembled his ſouldiers to a publike audience, and in this manner made ſpeech unto them.

"I am not ignorant, my ſouldiers, that of all the people which inhabit Aſia, the Gauls are moſt
"renowned for valiance in war. And why? this fierce and cruell nation having run over the world
"in a manner, and warred with all countries, choſe them a place of abode, and to ſettle themſelves
"in the midſt of a generation, of all other moſt mild and tractable. Big and tall they are of ſtature I
"and perſonage: their hair they wear long in golden criſped and ſhining locks: they carry bucklers
"of huge bigneſs, and handle ſwords of exceeding length. Beſides, when they enter into battell, "they uſe to ſing, to hoop, and dance, and with clattering their targets and weapons together, after
"the guiſe of their country, they make an horrible noiſe. And all this is done of purpore by them "to terrifie their enemies. But ſuch devices as theſe be, let the Greeks, the Phrygians, and Carians
"be afraid of, who are not uſed and accuſtomed to hear and ſee ſuch things: as for the Romans,
"acquainted, with the Gauls ſudden and tumultuous wars, they can skill well enough of theſe
"their toyes and vanities alſo. Once indeed, and but once, at the firſt encounter they diſcomfited
"the Romans at the river Allia: but ſince that time our Anceſtors for the ſpace of two hundred "years have made havock of them, killed, put to flight, and driven them like ſheep before them: K "and oftner, I dare well ſay, have they triumphed of the Gauls, than of all the world beſides. Thus "much we know of them by experience, that if a man be able to ſtand out their firſt ſhock and "violence (which upon a furious heat of their own by nature, and in blind choler and anger they "ſpend all at once) all the parts of their body run to ſweat and become faint: their weapons are "ready to fall out of their hands: their bodies are ſo tender, their courages ſo feeble (after their "cholarick anger is once allaied and paſſed) that the very heat of the ſun the duſt and the drought
"is able without drawing ſword, to overthrow them and lay them along. Proof and trial we have "had of them not only legions to legions, but man to man. T. Manlius and M. Valerius have "ſhewed plainly how far Roman vertue and proweſs ſurpaſſeth the furious rage of Gauls. Why?
"even Marcus Manlius, one man alone, repulſed and beat down the Gauls as they climbed up L
"by numbers to the Capitoll cliff. And thoſe anceſtors of ours beforenamed, had then to deal "with natural Gauls indeed, born and bred in their own country: whereas theſe here, by this "time now are a baſtard ſort of them, and clean degenerate, mingled they are with others, and in "truth as they be called, ſo are they Gallo-greeks. And it fareth with them as with plants, fruits,
"and living beaſts in which we ſee that the ſeed is not of that vertue, & ſo effectual to keep and
"retain ſtill the own kind and nature, as the property of the ſoil and the air where they are nou-"riſhed is to change the ſame. Thus the Macedonians who inhabit Alexandria in Ægypt, who "dwell in Seleucia and Babylonia, and other Colonies diſperſed over the earth, are grown out of "their own kind, and in manners become Syrians, Parthians, and Ægyptians. Maſſilia ſeated a"mong the Gauls, hath drawn ſomewhat of the nature of the nations adjoyning and bordering M
"upon them. And what have the Tarentins left them of that ſevere, rough, and hard diſcipline
"of the Spartans? For, whatſoever is ingendred and bred in the own proper place, is evermore "kindly, and retaineth its own nature better; but look what is tranſplanted into another ſoil,
"doth ſoon degenerate, and grow into a baſtard kind: for nature transformeth her ſelf, and chan-
"geth into that wherewith ſhe is nouriſhed. Be ſure therefore, that like as ye have defeated theſe "Phrygians (for no beter they be) overcharged and loaden with French arms in the battell a-
"gainſt Antiochus, even ſo being now conquerours, ye ſhall ſubdue and hew them in pieces once
"already vanquiſhed. And I fear me more that ye ſhall win too ſmall glory of them, then I doubt "by fighting ſo little with them that ye ſhall have their hands too full of war againſt them.
"Why, even King Attalus many a time and often hath diſcomfited and put them to flight. Neither N
"would I have you to think, that ſavage beaſts only newly taken, and keeping at the firſt their "fell and wild nature, after a time that they have been fed by mans hand, grown to be tame and "gentle; but that the fierceneſs and cruelty of man is likewiſe of the ſame nature to be diſ-
"made tractable. Are ye perſwaded that theſe Gauls reſemble their fathers and grandſires in con"ditions? Their forefathers long ſince left their native country for want of ground and land to "poſſeſs; and being driven to paſs through the moſt rough and difficult country of Illyricum, "firſt came into Pæonia & afterwards travelled all over Thracia, fighting ever as they went with
"moſt fierce and cruell nations, untill at length they ſeized upon theſe parts and ſetled there. Af"ter (I ſay) they had been hardned and made more fell by ſo many travels and dangerous adven"tures, they were received in the end within ſuch a land, as through abundance of all good O
"things might feed and frank them up. All that the fierceneſs and ſavage nature of theirs which "they had when they came firſt thither, is (no doubt) mollified by the goodneſs of the moſt fer"tile ſoil, by the ſweetneſs & pleaſure of a moſt temperat air, and laſt of all by the gentle and de"bonair nature of the inhabitants their neighbors. And even you alſo (in good faith) are to look
"unto it; (martiall men although you be, and the very off-ſpring of Mars himſelf) ye are (I ſay) to "take heed and beware of theſe delights of Aſia, and betimes to get you forth from them. So

"forceable

A "forceable are theſe forrain pleaſures and delicat enticements, to quench and corrupt the riger of "your ſpirits; ſo powerfull is the commerce and converſing with ſtrangers; ſo potent is the con"tagion (as it were) of their manners and diſcipline of neighbour inhabitants. Yet this one good "turn ye ſhall have, that as againſt you they have not that courage which in times paſt they had;
"ſo among the Greeks here, they are of as great name as ever they were in ancient time. So that "amongſt your allies, you ſhall win as great honour by your victory, as if you ſhould have conque"red the Gauls when they were at the height of their valour and proweſs. After the aſſembly diſmiſſed, and Embaſſadors ſent to Epoſſognatus (the only Prince in thoſe parts who perſiſted in amity with Eumenes, and had refuſed to aid Antiochus againſt the Romans) the Conſ. marched forward. The firſt day he came to the river Alander, and the morrow to a certain village which they B call Triſcon. Hither repaired unto him the Embaſſadors of the Oroadians, craving to be accepted as friends; but they were enjoyned to pay two hundred talents: and when they requeſted leave to make relation and report hereof at home, they were permitted. From thence the Conſ. led his army to Plitendum; and after that he encamped at Alyattos. Thither returned they who had been ſent to Epoſſognatus together with the Embaſſadors of Prince Compulſus, requeſting the Romans not to war upon the Tectoſages; for that both himſelf and Epoſſognatus alſo, would go in perſon to them and perſwaded the nation to do whatſoever they ſhould be commanded. The Prince obtained his requeſt; and ſo from thence the army began to march through the land which they
C call Axylos: and well it might be ſo called, for it hath no wood at all in it, nor beareth ſo much as thorns, or any thing elſe to burn and maintain fire: cow-dung is all their burning, for want of other fewell. Whiles the Roman lay in camp before Cuballum, (a fortreſs of Gallogræcia) they diſcovered the Cavalry of the enemies coming toward them with a great hurrey and tumult: and they charged ſo fiercely and ſuddenly upon the corps de guard of the Romans, that they not only troubled and diſordered them, but alſo killed ſome of them. The alarm being given within the camp the Roman horſemen at once iſſued forth of all the gates, diſcomfited the Gauls, and ſlew certain of them in the chaſe. The Conſul perceiving now that he was come into his enemies
D country, marched not from thenceforth without ſending out his eſpials before, and kept his army together in battell array with great heed and carefulneſs. Thus he held on his journey continually until he came to the river Sangarius, where he purpoſed to make a bridge, becauſe there was not paſſage over at any foord. This Sangarius ariſeth out of the mountain Adoreus, and running through Phrygia it joyneth with the river Thymbrus near unto Bithynia, and ſo growing bigger by receiving a double current, keepeth his courſe through Bithynia, and diſcharged himſelf into Propontis; a river not ſo famous and noble for the greatneſs thereof, as becauſe it yieldeth fiſh abundantly to all the nations bordering and dwelling thereupon. When the bridge was finiſhed and the army paſſed over, as they marched along the bank ſide, the Galli or Prieſts of Cybele (the great mother of the gods) were come from Peſſinus, and with ſtreamers inſules and other ornaments met them: and in their fanaticall verſes (as men diſtracted of their wits) ſeemed to propheſie and foretell, that the goddeſs vouchſafed the Romans a fair way to war and victory, yea, and the conqueſt and ſeignory of that country. Hereat the Conſul ſaid, That he accepted their words for a preſage of good fortune, and thereupon in that very place he pitched his Tents. The E next day he went as far as Gordium: a town verily it is none of the greateſt, but more frequented and reſorted unto for traffique and merchandiſe, then uſually ſuch dry towns are that ſtand far within the land. Three ſeas there be triangle-wiſe, of equall diſtance all from it. On the coaſt toward Sinope, it hath Helleſpont and the ſhores of the other tract, whereas the Cicilians inhabit by the ſea-ſide. Moreover, it bordereth upon the confines of many great nations, who for their mutuall need and commodity, have commerce of negotiation, and meet together in that one place. This town at that time they found altogether diſpeopled, by reaſon that the inhabitants were fled for fear: but well ſtored, and full of wares and goods of all ſorts. Whiles the Romans lay there encamped, there came Embaſſadors from Epoſſognatus, reporting unto them, that he had made a journey to the Princes of the Gauls, but could obtain no reaſon at their hands: alſo, F that they were diſlodged out of the champain country, had quit their villages and lands in great numbers, and together with their wives and children drave before them and carried with them whatſoever they could: and were retired to to the mount Olympus, from whence they purpoſed to defend themſelves by force of armis and the ſtrong ſituation of the place. The Embaſſadours likewiſe of the Oroandians, gave more certain intelligence, to wit, That the whole people in generall of the Toliſtobogians had ſeized the hill Olympus; that the Tectoſages ſeverally by themſelves had taken another mountain called Magana; that the Trocmians had committed their wives and children to the guard of the Tectoſages, minding with a main army to aid the Toliſtobogians. Now at that time the Princes of thoſe three States were Orgiago Combalomarus, and Gaulotas. And the principall reaſon and means that theſe had to enterpriſe war,
G was this, That being poſſeſſed of the higheſt hills of that country, and having brought thither proviſion of all things to ſerve them for a long ſpace, they ſuppoſed to weary and wear out their enemies in proceſs of time. For this account they made, that they would never venture to march againſt them through ſo hard, ſo difficult and diſadvantageous places; and if they aſſayed to do, they might be empeached, repulſed back and beaten down with a ſmall company: again, if they would ſit ſtill in leaguer at the foot of thoſe frozen mountains and do nothing, they were never able to endure the cold and the ſcarcity which they ſhould find there.

* Woodleſs.

And

And notwithſtanding the very altitude and height of the places defended them, yet over and be- H ſides they caſt a trench, and made other defences round about the tops of the mountains which they held. Alſo for proviſion of darts and other ſhot, it was the leaſt of all their care, ſuppoſing that the rough places would furniſh them with ſufficient ſtore of ſtones to fling. The Conſul forecaſting in his mind that he ſhould not deal with theſe enemies cloſe at hand-fight, but afar off when he was to aſſail their holds, had made proviſion aforehand of great ſtore of darts, light velitary javelins, arrows, bullets of lead, and ſmall ſtones that might be leveiled and ſent out of ſlings.
Thus being well appointed and furniſhed with ſuch kind of ſhot, he led his army toward the mountain Olympus, and about five miles off he encamped. The next day he together with Attalus advanced forward with 500 men of arms to view the nature and ſtanding of the mountain together with the ſituation of the Gauls camp. But the enemies horſemen being double in number to I them, iſſued out of their camp, and put them to flight, ſlew a few of them in the rout, and hurt many. The third day he ſet forward with all his forces to diſcover the places, and by reaſon that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, he rode round about the mountain in ſafety at his pleaſure, and perceived that on the South-ſide, there were certain little hils, all of of clean earth without ſtones, and the ſame riſing up with an eaſie aſcent to a certain place; but to the North were high rocks and the ſame in manner ſteep upright. And whereas all the reſt were inacceſſible, three only waies and advenues he found, the one directly toward the midſt of the mountain (where thoſe little mounts of earth ſtood) the other two were difficult the one lying Southeaſt, and the other Northweſt. After he had conſidered and viewed theſe places that day he pitched his camp at the very root and foot of the hill. The morrow after he ſacrificed and K finding by the firſt beaſts which he killed that the gods were pacified and favourable unto him, he divided his army into three battaillons, and ſo advanced againſt the enemy, and himſelf in perſon with the greateſt part of his forces mounted up the hill, whereas it yielded the eaſieſt aſcent. He commanded his brother L. Manlius, from the Southweſt to get up the hill as the place would permit with ſafety, giving him in charge that if he met with any dangerous places ſteep and hard of aſcent, that he ſhould not wreſtle with the difficulties of the ground, nor ſtrive againſt thoſe things which to force and overcome were unpoſſible; but rather to traverſe the ground, and retire toward him, and ſo to joyn with his battaillon. As for C. Helvius he willed him with a third part of the forces to wheel about by little and little, and fetch a compaſs at the hill foot and then from the Northweſt to mount up. Likewiſe the aids of Attalus, he divided into three equall parts, L and took order that the young Prince himſelf in perſon ſhould keep with him. The Cavalry and the Elephants he left in the next downs beneath the hills, and charged the Captains thereof to have a carefull eye and good regard to mark what was done in every place, yea, and to make haſte to reſcue and ſuccour whereſoever need ſhould be. The Gauls making full reckoning that on two ſides they were ſure enough, and the place that way to be inacceſſible; becauſe they would ſtop the other advenue by force of arms on the South ſide, ſent forth about four thouſand armed men to ſeize upon a certain hill within a mile of their camp, which hill commanded the way, ſuppo-ſing there, as from a ſconce and fortreſs to debar them of paſſage. Which when the Romans perceived they put themſelves in readineſs to fight. A pretty ſpace before the enſigns, marched the skirmiſhers, together with the Candiot archers and ſlingers from Attalus; likewiſe the Triballi- M ans of Thrace. The enſigns of the footmen followed ſoftly after (as well as they might) againſt the hill, bearing their targets before them ſo, as they ſeemed to cover themſelves only to avoid the ſhot, and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at firſt was equally performed with ſhot a good diſtance off: for as the Gauls got the advantage of the ground, ſo the Romans had the odds for variety and ſtore of darts. But as the skirmiſh continued and encreaſed, there was no more equality ſeen. For the ſhields of the Gauls being made long, and not broad enough for their bodies, and withall flat and plain without, hardly covered and defended them: and by this time all their ſhot was ſpent; & weapon had they none but their very ſwords, whereof there was no uſe at all, conſidering the enemy came not to cloſe fight. The only help they had was with ſtones, and thoſe too big for their handling and not eaſie to weild by reaſon they were not pro- N vided before, but ſuch as in that haſte came next to their hand without any choice. Moreover, being not uſed and exerciſed to flinging, they had neither the artificiall ſleight, nor yet ſuffi ient ſtrength to help themſelves withall: but contrariwiſe, from all parts were pelted with bullets of lead and galled with arrows & darts at unawares, which they could neither ward nor avoid: and for that with anger & fear together their wits & underſtandings were blinded, they wiſt not what to do, ſeeing themſelves ſurpriſed and overtaken in a kind of fight whereunto they were leaſt of all fitted. For as in cloſe conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, where raps are given and taken enterchangeably, choler kindleth courage: even ſo, when men are wounded aloof with light darts, & from whence they know not they wot not upon whom to run & at whom to make in that blind fit of theirs but they turn upon their own fellows without all reaſon at a venture, like wild beaſts O galled with arrows ſticking in their ſides. Now, they receive not a wound but it is ſeen by reaſon that they fight naked, and their bodies are fair ſlick and white, as being never bare but in battell:
by which means greater ſtore of bloud guſht out of the wounds in their fleſhy bodies, the gaſhes appear greater and their white skin much more ſtained with black bloud. But they paſs not ſo much for broad & wide flaſhes (for otherwhiles when the skin is cut away & the wound rather broad than deep, they take more pride therein, & think they fight with greater honor. Many it is

A happen at any time, that an arrow head or a bullet sticking within the flesh all hidden, put them to pain and torment, notwithstanding the hurt be small in appearance: yet when they seek to pluck out an arrow, and the head will not follow, then they take on and are stark mad, for shame that so small a prick should plagne them so, and be ready to kil them, insomuch as they cast themselves on the ground, and lie wallowing along every where. Others there be of them that ran full upon their enemy, and those were sticked with arrows and darts from all parts. & when they came near to hand, were by the skirmishers killed and cut in pieces with their swords. These souldiers use to cover themselves with a shield of three foot long, carrying in their right hand certain spears to use aloof, and wear by their side a Spanish sword. Now in case they come to hand fight, they shift their spear out of their right hand into the left, and take them to their swords. By this time there were B but few of the Gauls left alive; who perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them & seeing withall the ensigns of the legions to approach near unto them, took them to their heels on all hands, and began to flie amain toward the camp; which now was full of fear and trouble, as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folk (not fit to bear arms) were crowded and thronged together. The Romans following the train of their victory, seized the hils abandoned by the enemies that were fled. About the same time L. Manlius and C. Helvius, having mounted so far as they could find way, traversing the sides of the hill, when they were come to an end, where they could see neither way nor path, they turned to that quarter of the hill which only afforded a way, and both of them began to follow the Consuls battaillon, a pretty distance asunder, as if they had agreed beforehand so to do: and that which at first C had been simply the best thing to be done, they were of necessity forced at last to put in execution. For in such difficulties and places of disadvantage, succours behind in a rereward, have oftentimes served in right good stead: that if those in the vanguard should chance to be beaten back, they in the second place might receive and protect them, and also begin freshly a new fight. After that the formost engns of the legions were come to those hills; which the light armed before had seized, the Consul commanded the souldiers to rest them awhile and breath themselves, and shewed them withall where the bodies of the Gauls lay dead along all over the mountains. And if (qd. he) the light armed skirmishers have made such a riddance of them, what is to be looked for at the hands of the legionary souldiers, armed all over in compleat harness? What will they do that carry the hearts of most noble warriors? Surely they must needs win the camp, into which D the enemy is chased and driven by the light armed souldiers. Howbeit he commanded the light armed to go afore, who all the while that the legions rested themselves, spent not the time in vain, but employed it in gathering together the darts and javelins that lay about the hills, to the end that they might have sufficient shot. Now the Romans marched forward and approached the camp. The Gauls likewise for their parts, fearing lest their defences would not be able to defend them, stood armed before their trench and rampier. But afterwards being overcharged with all sorts of darts, they were driven in the turning of an hand within their hold, (for the more they were in number, and the thicker they stood, the less lighted any dart in vain) only they left strong guards about the gates and entrance into the camp. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the hold, there was discharged at random a mighty number of darts: and that many of E them were hurt thereby, appeared by their cry mingled with the shrikes of women and children. Now against them that warded the gates, and took up the avenues with their guards the legionary souldiers in the forefront let flie their javelins. And albeit these were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reason that their shields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them entangled one within another, and stuck fast. Long they could not abide the violence of the Romans, insomuch as before that the victors could enter into the camp, the Gauls fled forth at all the gates wide open, and ran they wist not whither like blind men, as well through places which had no way, as those that were passable. No rocks so steep with downfals, no cliffs so rough with crags, could stand in their way: and nothing feared they affront; their enemies only at their heels affrighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong down a mighty height and brake
F their necks, or else for very feebleness lost their breath, were windless, and ready to die. The Cos. after he had taken their camp, would not suffer it to be ransacked, but commanded the souldiers every one to follow the chase hard: and whiles the enemies were thus affraid, to affright them throughly. Then came the other regiment with L. Manlius, but the Consul would not suffer them to enter the camp, but sent them forthwith to pursue the enemies. Himself also in person anon afterfollowed, when he had delivered the charge of keeping the prisoners, unto the military Tribunes of the army: for this reckoning and resolution he made, that the war was at a finall end, if in this tumultuous fright of theirs he might either kill or take prisoners a number of them. The Consul was no sooner departed, but C. Helvius came with his third regiment, but he could not hold his souldiers from the pillage of the camp, insomuch as the booty and prizes were most un-G justly dealt among them who were at no end of the skirmish. The Cavalry stood all this while still and wist not of the fight, or that their fellows had gotten the victory: but afterwards they also espying the Gauls dispersed about the root of the mountains, made after them as well as their horses would mount against the hils: some they slew, and others they took prisoners. The just number of those that were slain cannot easily be counted, because they fled far and near among the cranks and windings of the mountains, where they were killed in blind corners. Many of them besides, having engaged themselves to the crags and rocks that had no way forward, ward, tumbled down into the vallies of a monſtrous depth underneath. Yea, and ſome hapned to be killed in the woods amidſt the thickets & buſhes. Claudius, who writeth of two battels fought upon the mount Olympus, reporteth that there died there forty thouſand enemies. But Valerius Antias, who otherwiſe is wont to overreach and exceed in number, hath recorded not above ten thouſand. But without all queſtion the priſoners amounted to forty thouſand full, becauſe they went with a train of all ſorts and ages, more like men diſlodging and removing out of one country unto another, than going to war. The Conſul, after he had burned all the armour of his enemies in one heap, commanded his ſouldiers to bring forth the reſt of the pillage and ſpoil into one place, and either ſold and made money of that which was to come into the publike treaſury of the City, or elſe parted it amongſt the ſouldiers indifferently, with great regard, that every one ſhould have a juſt and even portion. Moreover, he commanded them all in open audience, and rewarded every one beſides with gifts according to their ſeveral deſerts. But above the reſt, and with the general accord of all, he both praiſed, and alſo recompenced Attalus. For ſurely that young gentleman ſhewed not only ſingular valour and forwardneſs in all travels and dangers, but alſo a ſpeciall modeſty and rare ſobriety.

There remained yet entire and whole the war with the Tectoſages, againſt whom the Conſul made an expedition, & upon the third day arrived at Ancyra, a noble City in thoſe parts, from whence the enemies were little more than ten miles diſtant. During the time that he lay there encamped, there hapned a memorable act, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more priſoners, there fortuned to be kept in ward, the wife of Ortiagon, a woman of ſurpaſſing beauty. The Centurion who had her perſon in ſafe cuſtody, was lecherous and covetous withall, as many of theſe ſouldiers are. Her he ſollicited and tempted firſt to commit folly: but ſeeing her altogether unwilling, and that ſhe abhorred to proſtitute her ſelf unto him, he did violence upon that body of hers, which fortune had made bond and thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollifie and aſſwage the indignity of this villany, he put the woman in good hope, and promiſed that ſhe ſhould return home again to her friends: mary, he would not do all for pure love alone and freely without ranſom, for he bargained to have a certain ſum of gold beſides. And to the end forſooth that no perſon belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, he permitted her to ſend one of the priſoners whom ſhe would her ſelf as meſſenger to her friends and kinsfolk, and appointed a place near unto a river, whither the next night following ſhould repair two and no more (of the ſaid captive Ladies friends, with the gold aboveſaid) for to receive her at his hands. It fell out ſo that among the reſt of the captives committed to his guard, there was a bondſlave of her own: this meſſenger at the ſhutting in of the evening the Centurion conducted without the corps de guard. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed, both the two friends aforeſaid of the gentlewoman, and alſo the Centurion himſelf with his priſoner, where they ſhewed the gold, amounting to the full ſum of one Attick talent (according as it was agreed between them) and with that the woman ſpake unto them in her language and commanded them to draw their ſwords, and kill outright the Centurion as he was weighing the gold. Which done, ſhe cauſed his head to be ſtricken off, and wrapped it her ſelf within her garment, and ſo carried it home to her husband Ortiagon, who from Olympus had fled and eſcaped to his own houſe. But before that ſhe clipped and embraced her husband, ſhe threw down the Centurion his head at his feet. And when he wondred what mans head it was, and what act this might be, far paſſing a womans deed, ſhe confeſſed to her husband the injury that her body had ſuffered, and likewiſe the revenge for the abuſe of her chaſtity by force and violence: and (as it is reported) ſhe maintained the honour of this matronlike act ever after even to her dying day, in all ſanctimony of life and modeſt carriage of her ſelf like a chaſte dame.

Whiles the camp lay at Ancyra, the Orators of the Tectoſages ſhewed themſelves unto the Conſul, requeſting him not to diſlodge and remove from thence before he had parled with their Lords and Princes: ſaying withall, that they would accept any conditions of peace whatſoever, rather than war. The time was ſet down, even the next morrow, and a place likewiſe appointed, as juſt in the mid way (as it could be gueſſed) between the camp and Ancyra. The Conſ. thither came at the hour aſſigned, accompanied with a guard of five hundred horſe: but perceiving no Gaul at all there, he returned into the camp. And thither repaired the ſame Orators unto him the ſecond time, excuſing the default, and ſaying that their Princes could not come in perſon by occaſion of ſome ſcruple of conſcience that aroſe the while: howbeit, the chief perſonages beſides of the whole nation ſhould appear, by whom all matters might be compoſed as well as with themſelves. The Conſul made anſwer, that he likewiſe would ſend Attalus in his ſtead. So they came to this emparling from both parts. Attalus had three hundred men of arms about him for his guard: and certain conditions of peace were drawn and propounded: but foraſmuch as they might not grow to any finall concluſion in the abſence of their chief Commanders, accorded it was that the day following the Conſul and their Princes aforeſaid ſhould meet in that place together. Now the drift of the Gauls in making theſe delaies and trifling off the time, was this, that firſt they might gain ſome convenient ſpace to tranſport over the river Halys all that ever they had (which they would not hazard with their own perſons, together with their wives and children) and afterwards to lay a train of an ambuſh for the Conſul himſelf, who took ſmall regard, and was not provided for to prevent their villany intended under the colour of that conference. For that purpoſe, they choſe a thouſand horſemen out of all their cavalry, of eſpeciall valour and approved hardineſs,

A neſs, for the execution of this treacherous deſign. And ſurely this their fraud had taken effect, if fortune had not defended and maintained the law of nations, which to break and violate they had complotted. Certain ſouldiers of the Romans ſent out to purvey forrage and fewel, were directed to thoſe very quarters whereas the parly aboveſaid ſhould be kept. The Colonels thought it the ſurer place for them, becauſe they were to have the Conſuls guard alſo oppoſed for their defence againſt the enemy: howbeit, they ſet another corps de guard of their own, conſiſting of 600 horſemen nearer to the camp. Now by reaſon that Attalus aſſured the Conſul ſo certainly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be ſoon knit up and diſpatched, he departed out of the camp with the ſame guard of horſemen as before, and when he had marched almoſt five miles forward, and was not far ſhort of the place appointed, he diſcovered all of a ſudden the B Gauls riding in full gallop againſt them in moſt furious manner as enemies; wherupon he ſtaid the march and made a ſtand: commanding the horſemen to make ready their weapons and reſolve to fight. The firſt charge and ſhock he received right valiantly, and ſtepped not back one foot: but afterwards as the multitude preſſed ſtill upon him, he began to give ground and retreat, but ſo as he brake not the ranks of his troops. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer ſtay, than commodity and help in keeping their arraies, they all at once turned their horſe heads and fled. When they were diſarraied once, the Gauls purſued hard and killed them: and no doubt a great part of them had died for it, but that the forragers guard of 600 horſe aforeſaid came in to reſcue them. For they hearing afar off the fearful cry of their fellows, made ready their armor and C horſes, and being freſh & in heart, entred upon the fight that was given over by their wearied and diſcomfited companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the fear turned from the loſers to the winners; for at the firſt encounter the Gauls were put to flight: and withall, the ſaid forragers and fewelers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head and affronted the Gauls; inſomuch as they could neither flie readily nor eſcape ſurely, becauſe the Romans with their freſh horſes followed them in chaſe, and they themſelves were already tired: few therefore went away with life, and not one was taken priſoner, for the greater part by ods paid dearly by the loſs of their lives for violating of this their parly under the colour of truth and fidelity. The Romans whiles their ſtomacks were inflamed with anger, the very next day came againſt them with the puiſſance of all their forces. But the Cof. employed two whole daies himſelf in viewing and D diſcovering the ſituation and nature of the hill, becauſe he would not be ignorant of any thing requiſit. Upon the third day, after he had firſt taken the auſpices and preſages of the birds, and afterwards killed a ſacrifice, he led forth his army divided into 4 battaillons. Two of them were to mount up the midſt of the hill & the other two he ſet in the ſides to flank the wings of the Gauls, and to march up againſt them. The Tectoſages and Trocmions, who were the whole flower and ſtrength of the enemies, made their main battel in the midſt, conſiſting of 50000 men; and becauſe there was no uſe of horſe among thoſe rough & uneven rocks, the cavalry alight on foot to the number of 10000, and thoſe they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians with Ariarates, & the auxiliary Morzians, who aroſe to the number almoſt of 4000 men, held the left. The Cof. (like as before in the mount Olympus) marſhalled his light armed for skirmiſh in the forefront of the vangard, & gave order to have ready at hand as great ſtore of darts & other ſhot of all ſorts as he had E before. When they approached one another, all things anſwered both of the one ſide & the other, like as in the former conflict: ſaving that the courage of the victors increaſed in regard of their fortunat ſucceſs & the hearts of the enemies were much abated and danted. For albeit themſelves had not yet been foiled & vaquiſhed, yet they took the overthrow & loſs of their countrimen for their own. And therefore as the beginning of the battell was ſtable, ſo the iſſne was likewiſe. For the Gauls battell was overſpread & covered again as it were with a cloud of light ſhot. And not one of them durſt run forth out of his range, for fear he ſhould diſcover his whole body & lay it open to take all that came: and keeping ſtill together as they did, the thicker they ſtood, the fairer mark they were for the enemies to level at, & the more wounds they received. The Cof. perceiving they were already of themſelves troubled, and ſuppoſing that if he ſet forward & preſented unto them F the enſigns of the legions, they would immediatly all of them flie, received the light armed looſe ſhot, & the reſt of the auxiliary ſouldiers within his own ranks and files, and then advanced his legions. The Gauls affrighted with the freſh remembrance of the late defeat and overthrow of the Toliſtobogians, carrying alſo about themſelves the darts ſticking in their bodies, weary beſides with long ſtanding a foot, and overcharged likewiſe with many a wound, could not abide ſo much as the onſet and ſhout of the Roman legions. Then began they to take their heels and flie toward their camp, but few of them recovered it, and got within the rampier and other defences. The greater number fled here and there on both hands, and diſperſed themſelves into all parts as it took them in the head, and as every man in this confuſed fright caught a way by himſelf. The Conquerors followed them ſtill even hard to the very camp, and all the way charged upon their G backs and beat them down. Which done, they ſtaid and ſtuck ſtill in the camp for deſire of pillage, and there was not one that followed one foot after. The Gauls in the wings ſtood to it longer, by reaſon that it was later ere they were ſet upon but able they were not to abide the firſt charge and ſhot of the Roman darts. The Conſul, who could not poſſibly pluck thoſe out of the camp that were once entred in for greedineſs of ſpoiling and rifling the tents, ſent out thoſe immediatly that were in the wings to follow the enemies in chaſe ſtill forward. Theſe purſued them a certain ſpace: howbeit in this flight (for in truth it was no fight at all) there were not above eight thouſand ſand that left their carcaſſes behind them, all the reſt recovered the other ſide of the river Halys. H

Many of the Romans remained that night within the enemies camp; the reſt the Conſul brought back again to his own. The next day he took account and ſurvey of the priſoners and prizes, which was ſo great as a man would conceive that a nation of all others moſt greedy of pilling and ſpoiling might poſſibly rake and heap together for ſo many years, as they held all thoſe parts within the mountain Taurus by force of arms. The Gauls thus ſcattered in flight, rallied themſelves into one place, as being many of them hurt or diſarmed, and ſtripped clean out of all they had, ſent their Embaſſadors unto the Conſul to treat for peace. The Conſul willed them to give attendance upon him at Epheſus: himſelf made haſte to remove out of thoſe cold quarters, by reaſon that the mountain Taurus was ſo near (for now it was the midſt of Autumn) and led back his victorious army to paſs the winter near the ſea ſide. I Whiles the affairs thus paſſed in Aſia, all was quiet in the reſt of the Provinces. At Rome the Cenſors T. Quintius Flamininus and M. Claudius Marcellus made a new choice of Senators: and P. Scipio Africanus was choſen the Preſident of the Senat now the third time: four only were left out and diſcarded: but not one of them had born office of State, and had the honour to ſit in the Curule chair. The Cenſors ſhewed themſelves likewiſe paſſing mild in the review of the Cavalry and order of Knighthood. They put out to framing the foundations and ground works upon the Æquimelium in the Capitoll: and likewiſe they bargained for to pave the ſtreet with hard flint or pebble from the gate Capena to the Temple of Mars. The Campans demanded of the Senat, in what place they ſhould be aſſeſſed and enrolled: and thereupon a decree paſſed for their enrolment at Rome. The rivers were out, and great deluges hapned that year. The Tyber overflowed K his banks twelve times, and drowned Mars field and all the low parts of the City.

After that Cn. Manlius the Conſul had brought the Gauls war to an end in Aſia, the other Conſul M. Fulvius having utterly ſubdued the Ætolians paſſed over into Cephalenia; and ſent to all the Cities about the Iſland certain meſſengers, to ſound them whether they would rather yield themſelves unto the Romans or hazard the fortune of war? And ſo forcible was fear among them all, that there was not one perſon refuſed to ſurrender. And being enjoyned (according to the ability of the people who were but bare) to give hoſtages, the Neſiotes, Craniens, Peleuſians, and Samæans delivered twenty apiece. This peace no ſooner ſhone upon the Cephalenians beyond all their expectation, but ſuddenly one City of the Samæans revolted, and upon what cauſe it is not known: themſelves alledged and ſaid, That foraſmuch as their City was ſeated in a commodious L place they feared greatly to be diſpoſſeſſed and turned out of it by the Romans. But whether they only imagined this and put themſelves in fright, and ſo changed their quiet and repoſe for vain and fooliſh fear: or whether there had been queſtion hereof among the Romans, and upon much canvaſſing in mens mouth the rumour of ſuch a matter, ran unto them, it is not certainly known. Only thus much, after they had given their hoſtages, they ſhut their City gates upon a ſudden; and deſiſt they would not from their enterpriſe, for all the entreaty and prayers that their own hoſtages made, whom the Conſul had ſent (on purpoſe) even under their walls, to move their countrimen and parents to pity and compaſſion. When as therefore they would make no anſwer tending unto peace, the Conſul began to aſſault the City: and all the ordnance of artillery and engins of battery were under his hand, which had been brought from the ſiege of Ambracia. M And look what works and fabricks were needfull beſides to be made, the ſouldiers with great diligence and forwardneſs performed. So in two places at once they planted rams againſt the City and battered the walls. The Samæans on the other ſide for their part omitted and neglected nothing, that might either annoy the enemy or impeach the works. But two things there were principally wherewith they made reſiſtance and withſtood their violence: the one was, a countermure within the City, which they ever raiſed new inſtead of the old & ful as ſtrong as it was, that was demoliſhed and broken down: the other was, their often ſudden ſallies, one while upon the fortifications and fabricks, otherwhiles upon the corps de guard of the enemies: and for the moſt part in theſe skirmiſhes they had the better hand. But one mean there was deviſed, and the ſame of ſmall ſhew to ſpeak of, to reſtrain and keep them in from ſallying forth. The Ro- N mans ſent to * Ægeum, * Patræ, and * Dimæ, for an hundred ſlingers. Theſe nations from their childhood uſed to exerciſe themſelves (after the manner of the country) to diſcharge out of ſlings into the open ſea certain round ſtones, which commonly the ſhore is overſpread with among the ſands: by reaſon of which exerciſe, they have more skill both to ſling farther from them, and alſo to ſtrike more ſurely and give a ſmarter rap and ſtroke than thoſe of the Baleat Iſlands: for their ſling is not made with one only cord as the Balearians are, and thoſe of other nations; but it hath three leather thongs hardned and made ſtiff with many ſutures and ſeames, leſt if the leathering were ſoft and gentle, the bullet and ſtone within ſhould wag to and fro and roll out in the delivery and hurling of it: but being ſetled and counterpoiſed (as it were) it went merrily away, and ſent and driven out of the nooſe of a ſtone-bow. And ſo well practiſed O they were in this feat, that they could a great way off levell a bullet through garlands, rings, and hoops of ſmall compaſs, and miſs not: nay, they would be ſure to hit, not only the head of an enemy, but any part of the face that they aimed at, point blank, and never fail. Theſe ſlings (I ſay) made the Samæans to pluck in their heads, that they durſt not ſally out neither ſo often nor ſo boldly as they did. Inſomuch as from the walls, they requeſted the Achæans for a while to go aſide and repoſe themſelves, and ſee them how they skirmiſhed with the corps de guard of

* Viſliza.
* Patra, or Balubaſtra.
* Clarenſa: all three towns of Achæa.

A of the Romans. Four months ſpace the Samæans endured the ſiege. Now when of that ſmall number which they had, ſome or other daily dropt away, and were either killed outright or wounded; and they that remained, were both tyred in body, and danted in courage; the Romans one night paſſed over the wall, by the fortreſs which they call Cyrtus (for the City where it boundeth upon the Sea, lyeth toward the Weſt) and entred ſo far as the market place. After that the Samæans perceived, that one part of the City was taken by the enemies, they fled with their wives and children into a greater fortreſs, and the next day yeelded: the Town was ranſacked, and they themſelves were all ſold in open market, to who would give moſt.

The Conſul having ſet the ſtate of Cephalenia in good order, and put a garriſon within Samæa, paſſed into Peloponneſus, having been called and ſent for to come thither a long time, principally B by the Ægians and Lacedæmonians. Time out of mind, and from the firſt beginning of the Diets of Achæa, the whole nation uſed to aſſemble and meet at Ægium ordinarily, were it for to grace and honour the City, or becauſe the place was commodious therefore. This ancient cuſtome Philopœmen that year began firſt to infringe, and went about to make a law and ordinance, That in all the Cities of Achæa, their Councels and Diets ſhall be holden in courſe and order at their times. And againſt the coming of the Conſul, when the Demiurges of the free Cities and ſtates ſummoned the Diet to be kept at Ægium, Philopœmen (Pretor for that time) came with a counter-ſummons and proclaimed it to be held at Argos. And when it was evident to be ſeen, that they all in manner minded thither to reſort; the Conſul alſo (albeit in affection he favoured the Ægians) came to Argos: where, after much debate, ſeeing the matter growing the other way, he C deſiſted from his deſign and gave over the cauſe. After this, the Lacedæmonians averted him from thence, and drew him away to the deciding of their controverſies and diſſentions. Certain baniſhed perſons they were who moſt of all diſquieted and troubled that ſtate: and many of them had their abiding place in the Caſtles coaſting along the frontiers of the Laconian territory toward the Sea, which was taken wholly from the City. The Lacedæmonians much diſcontented and offended hereat, entred one night a certain borough called * Las, ſurpriſed it unawares to the in- * Vacbi.
habitants, and kept it to their uſe; to the end, that if need were at any time to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome or elſe whither, they might have ſome free acceſs unto the Sea: and withal, be ſerved of a mart-Town for vent, and a place of receit for all forrain merchandiſe from ſtrangers to their neceſſary uſes. The Townſmen within, as alſo the exiles aforeſaid (there dwelling) were terrified at D the firſt with this ſuddain and unexpected occurrence: but afterward (before day-light) when they had once rallied themſelves together, with ſmall ado and skirmiſh chaſed forth the Lacedæmonians: howbeit, the fear ſpred over all the Sea coaſt, ſo that in one general accord, the Caſtles and Villages every one (yea, and the exiled perſons (as many as there inhabited) diſpatched their Embaſſadors to the Achæans. Philopœmen their Pretor (who ever from the beginning friended the cauſe of the baniſhed, and had alwaies adviſed and counſelled the Achæans to abate and take down the puiſſance and reputation of the Lacedæmonians) granted them at their ſuit and ſeeking, a Diet. In which (upon a motion by him made) there paſſed a decree in this form: That whereas T. Quintius and the Romans, had committed and delivered to the ſafeguard and protection of the Achæans, the fortreſſes, burroughs, and villages, ſituate along the Sea-coaſt of the B Laconians, and (by vertue of a covenant and accord) the Lacedæmonians had nothing to do therein, but ought to forbear them; and yet notwithſtanding, the Town Las was by them forced, and a great maſſacre there committed: therefore unleſs the principals and acceſſaries both of that outrage, were yeelded to the Achæans, they deemed the covenant and accord in that behalf provided, to be broken. Hereupon incontinently were Embaſſadors addreſſed to Lacedæmon, to challenge and demand the parties aboveſaid: but the Lacedæmonians took this for ſo proud a commandment, and thought it ſuch an indignity, that without all doubt, if they had been in as good eſtate then, as ſometimes they were, they would immediatly have taken arms. But nothing troubled and diſquieted their ſpirits ſo much as this, for fear leſt if once they received the yoke of ſubjection upon their necks, in yeelding obedience to their firſt demand, Philopœmen would effect and put in execution that which he long intended and went about: even to deliver the City Lacedæmon into the hands of the baniſhed aforeſaid. Enraged therefore with choler and anger, they fell upon thirty of that faction who were complotted in counſel with Philopœmen and the exiles, and ſlew them out-right; and withal made a decree, To renounce and reject all ſociety with the Achæans; and forthwith to ſend their Embaſſadors to Cephalenia, with commiſſion, to deliver Lacedæmon unto M. Fulvius and the Romans; and to beſeech him to take the pains to come into Peloponneſus, there to receive the City Lacedæmon under the obeiſance and protection of the people of Rome. When the Embaſſadors had made relation hereof to the Achæans, preſently war was proclaimed againſt the Lacedæmonians by common conſent of all the ſtates of that aſſembly and general councel: but the winter impeached them for entring into any action and preſent execution. Howbeit they made ſmall rodes into their frontiers, and waſted the ſame not only by Land, but alſo by Sea, after the manner of robbery and piracy, rather than of warlike hoſtility. Theſe troubles drew the Coſ. into Peloponneſus, and by his commandment a Diet was publiſhed to be holden at Elis; and thither were the Lacedæmonians ſent for to argue and debate their cauſe. Where there was not only much reaſoning and diſpute, but alſo wrangling and altercation. The Conſul who in other points bare himſelf nicely enough, and anſwered in doubtful terms, as one willing to entertain both parts, determined and ended the controverſie in one only

baſſadors to the Senate of Rome. So there were embaſſages addreſſed both from the one and the other to Rome. In likewiſe the baniſhed Lacedæmonians joined their cauſe and embaſſy with the Achæans. Diophanes and Lycortas, both Megapolitans, were the chief in the embaſſage of the Achæans, who as they jarred and diſagreed in the managing of State-affairs, ſo they accorded not but varied in the ſpeeches that they delivered. Diophanes referred the deciſion of all matters unto the Senat, as who were beſt able to compoſe all controverſies between the Achæans and Lacedæmonians. But Lycortas, inſtructed by Philopœmen, required that the Achæans might do and execute whatſoever they had ordained, according to the covenant, and the conditions therein compriſed; and that they would maintain their full liberty without abridging and empairing the ſame, according as they had received it at their hands. The nation of the Achæans in thoſe daies was in great I credit and reputation at Rome, howbeit the Senate thought it not good to make any change and alteration in the State of the Lacedæmonians. In concluſion, they returned ſuch an intricate and doubtful anſwer, that both the Achæans might conſtrue it, as if they had permiſſion and free liberty to do what they would with Lacedæmon, and the Lacedæmonians again took it as though they had not ſo large a ſcope and abſolute power allowed them, as to do their pleaſure in every thing. But this authority and liberty whatſoever it was, more or leſs, the Achæans ſtretched beyond all meaſure and compaſs, and uſed it too proudly and inſolently. Philopœmen continued ſtill in place of ſoveraign government, and levied a power to be ready in the beginning of the ſpring, and ſo encamped upon the frontiers of the Lacedæmonians. This done, he ſent his Embaſſadors to demand the delivery of them into his hands, who were the authors of the revolt; promiſing withal, K that if they would ſo do, their City ſhould remain in peace without any moleſtation, and they ſuffer and ſuſtain no harm, before they had anſwered for themſelves in open audience. All the reſt for fear kept ſilence and ſaid not a word, only they whom he had challenged by name, made offer of themſelves to go, under ſafe conduct received from the Embaſſadors, and faithful promiſe that no violence ſhould be done upon their perſons, until they had pleaded their anſwer. Accompanied they were with divers noble perſonages of great mark and name, both as advocats unto them in their particular quarrels, and alſo in regard of the Common-weal, as far as their private cauſe any way touched and concerned it. Never had the Achæans before time brought the Lacedæmonian exiles with them into the confins of Lacedæmon, becauſe they ſuppoſed that nothing might ſo much alienate and eſtrange the hearts of the whole City as that. But then the whole head, as it L were, of the vanguard, were no other but thoſe baniſhed perſons. And as the Lacedæmonians aboveſaid were coming, who ſhould meet and affront them arranged in order of battel at the very gate of the camp, but they? At the firſt they welcomed them with chiding and railing, after that they fell to bitter words and brauls, and their bloud was up on both ſides, inſomuch as thoſe of the baniſhed crew who were of hotteſt ſpirit and ſharpeſt metal, made no more ado but ran upon the Lacedæmonians: whereupon they called the Gods to witneſs, and cried to the Embaſſadors for protection; who together with the Pretor himſelf came between, voided the preſs, and ſafeguarded the perſons of the Lacedæmonians, empeaching and ſtaying ſome of their hands who were already about to bind them and make them ſure. But the tumult ſtill encreaſed, and the multitude was all up on a hurrey. The Achæans ran firſt to ſee only what the matter was, and to M be lookers on. But afterwards, when the exiles began with a loud voice to cry out, and report what wrongs and injuries they had ſuſtained, beſeeching them of their help, and avouching withall right confidently, that if they let ſlip this opportunity, they ſhould never have the like again, alledging moreover, That the league firſt made in the Capitol, after renued at Olympia, and laſt of all confirmed by a ſacred oath in the Caſtle of Athens, had been broken and diſanulled by them, and therefore the guilty and culpable parties were to be puniſhed accordingly before they entred into any bond of new accord. At theſe words the multitude was incenſed, and by occaſion of one mans voyce, who cried to ſtrike and knock them down, fell to flinging ſtones at them. And by this means ſeventeen of them, who during the garboil chanced to be tied in bonds, were ſtoned to death. The reſt, to the number of ſix and thirty, were the next morrow apprehended, whom N the Pretor had ſhielded and protected from violence, not for any deſire he had to ſave their lives, but becauſe he would not have them miſcarry and periſh before they were heard. Theſe were preſented and expoſed as a prey to the unruly and angry multitude: and when they had made ſome ſmall ſpeech unto them, from which they turned away their ears, they were all condemned and delivered over to be led to execution. When the Lacedæmonians were once put in this fear, then they were commanded, Imprimis, To demoliſh and break down their walls. Item, That all forrain auxiliary ſouldiers, who were waged and ſerved for pay under the tyrants, ſhould avoid out of the Laconian countrey. Item, That all the ſlaves whom thoſe tyrants had ſet free (and of ſuch there was a great number) ſhould depart before a certain day; and that it might be lawful for the Achæans to attach the bodies, to ſell and carry away as many as ſtaied and remained behind. O
Item, That they ſhould aboliſh the laws, ordinances and cuſtoms of Lycurgus, and frame themſelves to live after the faſhions and manners of the Achæans, for ſo they ſhould be incorporate into one civil body, and better accord and ſort together in all things. They condeſcended to none of all theſe conditions more willingly and ſooner, than to the raſing of their walls; and nothing troubled them ſo much and vexed their heart, as the reſtoring of the baniſhed perſons. Howbeit there paſſed an act at Tegea for their reſtitution in a general Councel of all the Achæans there held,

In

A In which assembly, upon a report and mention made, that the mercenary strangers above specified, and the new unrolled Lacedæmonians called Ascripti (for so they termed them, who by the tyrants were enfranchised and endued with freedom) had abandoned the City, and were departed sundry waies into the countrey, it was thought good before the army was dissolved and cassed, that the Pretor should go with a company lightly armed and appointed to lay hold upon all that sort of people, and make sale of them, as of a prize and booty gained from the enemies. Many of them were apprehended and sold. And with the money raised of them, that porch or Gallery at Megalopolis, which had been ruinate by the Lacedæmonians, was by the permission of the Achæans reedified. Likewise the territory of Belbina, which the Lacedæmonian tyrants unjustly held in possession, was laid again to that City, according to an old decree of the Achæans, which was B made during the reign of King Philip, son of Amyntas. The City of the Lacedæmonians by this means much enfeebled, continued a long time in subjection and thraldom under the Achæans. But their State received damage by no one thing so much, as by the abolishing of the discipline of Lycurgus, to which they had been used and accustomed for the space of 700 years.

Presently after the holding of this Diet, wherein the Achæans and Lacedæmonians debated their causes before the Consul, M. Fulvius repaired to Rome (for that the year was almost expired) against the solemn election of new Magistrats; wherein he created for Consuls, M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, and gave the repulse to M. Æmylius Lepidus his enemy, who that year made suit also to be Consul. This done, there were Pretors also chosen, to wit, Q. Martius Philippus, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Stertinius, C. Catinius, P. Claudius Pulcher, and C Lu. Manlius Acidinus. When this election was ended, it was thought expedient that M. Fulvius should return into his former Province to the army there: and not only he, but his colleague also Cn. Manlius, had their commission revived, and they continued in government another year. The same year according to the direction of the Decemvirs, there was brought into the Temple of Hercules the statue of the same God: and within the Capitol were set up by Cn. Cornelius six steeds in gold drawing a chariot with this inscription, That he being Consul gave that present. Also P. Claudius and S. Sulpitius Galba, Ædiles Curule, hung up twelve brasen shields, made of the fines that certain corn-hoorders paid, for hoording up and keeping in their grain. Moreover Q. Fulvius Flaccus an Ædile of the Commons, erected two golden images raised of the mony that one guilty person was condemned in (for they commenced their actions severally by themselves.)
D As for A. Cecilius his companion, he condemned none. The Roman great games were set forth all throughout, thrice: and the Plebeian plaies exhibited likewise full and whole, five times.

After this, M. Valerius Messala and C. Livius Salinator, entred their Consulship upon the * 15. day of March, and proposed before the Senat as concerning the affairs of the State, touching their Provinces also, and the armies. As for Ætolia and Asia, there was no change at all. The Consul, by a decree of the Senat had the charge, one of Pisa, together with the Ligurians; and the other of Gaul: and they were commanded either to agree between themselves, or to cast lots for their Provinces. They were enjoyned also to levy new armies, and each of them to enrol two legions, and either of them to charge the allies of the Latine Nation with 15000 foot, and 1200 horsemen. Unto Messala fell the government of Liguria: and to Salinator of Gaul. After this, the E Pretors likewise cast lots for their Provinces: the jurisdiction within Rome of citizens was allotted to M. Claudius, and of forainers to P. Claudius. Sicily to Q. Martius, Sardinia to C. Stertinius, high Spain to L. Manlius, and the low to C. Atinius. As for the armies, ordained it was, that the legions under the conduct of C. Lælius should be withdrawn out of Gaul, and made over to M. Tuccius the Propretor for to serve in the Brutians country. Item, That the forces which were in Sicily should be discharged: and that M. Sempronius the Vice-pretor there, should bring from thence the fleet to Rome. Ordained likewise it was, that either of the Provinces of Spain should have one legion, which at that time served there; and that both the Pretors should for supply levy of the allies three thousand foot, and two hundred horsemen apiece, and transport the same over with them. Now before that these new Governors went to their Provinces, by order from the F whole colledge and society of the Decemvirs, there was published a general procession and supplication to be holden for 3 dayes in all the quarrefours or cross streets of the City: for that in the day time between the third hour and the fourth, there arose a general darknes which continued almost all that while. Moreover, a Novendial sacrifice was published to be celebrated for 9 dayes together, because on the Aventine hill it had rained stones.

The Campans, when as the Censors (by vertue of an act of Senate which passed the former year) compelled them to be enrolled at Rome, (for aforetime they knew not where to be enrolled) made petition now that they might contract marriages and take Roman citizens to their wives; and that whosoever had wedded any of them before, might keep them still; and what children soever they had born before that day, should be reputed legitimate and their rightfull
G heirs. Both suits were granted. As concerning the free burgesses of Formiæ, Fundi, and Arpinum, C. Valerius Tappo a Tribun of the Com. preferred a bill, that they might be priviledged to give their voices in Rome: for before that time, citizens in deed they were of Rome, (and that was all) for liberty of suffrages they had none. This bill was crossed and nipped by four other Tribuns, because it was propounded without the warrant and approbation of the Senate. But being afterwards beter advised and informed, that it appertained to the people and not to the Senate to give their voices where it pleased them, they gave over their enterprise, and opposed themselves no more to hinder the proceeding thereof. So it paſſed; and enacted it was, That the Formians and Fundans ſhould give their voices in the tribe Æmylia; & the Arpinats in Cornelia: ſo in theſe tribes then firſt and never before, were they enrolled by an act of the ſame Valerius. M. Claudius Marcellus the Cenſor took a ſurvey of the City, and by lot obtained the pre-eminence thereof before his colleague T. Quintius. In which there were numbred 258308 polls of Roman citizens. This review being accompliſhed, the Conſuls took their journeys into their ſeveral provinces.

During that winter ſeaſon whiles theſe things thus paſſed at Rome, there reſorted Embaſſages from all States, Cities and Nations which inhabit on this ſide Taurus, unto Cn. Manlius firſt Conſul and afterwards Pro-conſul, whiles he kept his winter in Aſia. And as the victory atchieved over Antiochus was more honorable and glorious to the Romans, than that over the Gauls, ſo the conqueſt of the Gauls was more joyous and pleaſing to the Roman allies, than that other of Antiochus. For the ſervitude in which the King held them was more tolerable, than the cruelty of theſe ſavage and inhumane barbarians, and the doubtful fear and fright wherein they ſtood every day; as not knowing how far forth they would proceed, carried ſo (as it were) in a tempeſt to waſt and ſpoil them clean. And therefore as nations who by the defeat of Antiochus recovered liberty, and by the ſubduing of the Gauls enjoyed peace, they preſented themſelves not only to give thanks and ſhew their contentment in that behalf, but alſo brought with them certain coronets of gold, every one according to their ability. Likewiſe there came Embaſſadors from Antiochus, as alſo from the very Gauls, to have conditions of peace miniſtred unto them: yea, and from Ariarates King of the Cappadocians, who craved pardon, and offred to buy out his treſpaſs for mony, in that he had given aid unto Antiochus: and fined he was to pay 200 talents of ſilver. The Gauls had this anſwer returned unto them, That K. Eumenes when he came ſhould tender unto them articles of peace. The embaſſages of the other ſtates and cities were diſmiſſed with gracious anſwers, and went away better pleaſed and contented, than they were at their coming. The Embaſſadors of Antiochus were commanded to bring mony into Pamphylia, and corn likewiſe, according to the covenant made with L. Scipio: for thither the Conſul purpoſed himſelf to come with his army. After this, having taken a review and ſurvey of his forces, he ſet forward in the beginning of ſpring, and within 8 daies arrived at Apamea. There he ſojourned in camp for three daies: from thence he removed, and at the third daies end came to Pamphylia, whither he had given order to the Kings Embaſſadors to convey their mony and corn. There he received 1500 talents of ſilver which were tranſported unto Apamea. The corn was divided in the army. From thence he marched to Perga, which was the only country in thoſe parts held with a garriſon. When he approached, the Captain of the garriſon met him on the way requeſting 30 daies ſpace in which time he might know the pleaſure of K. Antiochus as touching the rendring of that City. The time was granted, and within that day the garriſon quit the place and departed. From Perga he ſent his brother L. Manlius with 400 ſouldiers to Oroanda, for to demand the reſt of the mony which by promiſe was due: and himſelf becauſe he was advertiſed that K. Eumenes and the deputies or commiſſioners were come from Rome to Epheſus, retired with his army alſo to Epheſus, and commanded the Embaſſadors of Antiochus to follow him thither. There, by the advice of the ten commiſſioners, a final league was concluded, and compriſed in theſe or ſuch like terms: There ſhall be amity and friendſhip between King Antiochus and the people of Rome, under theſe conditions enſuing. Imprimis, The King ſhall not ſuffer to paſs through any part of his realm, or their countries that are under his dominion, any army that intendeth to make war againſt the people of Rome or their aſſociats, nor aid them with victuals or any other ſuccour whatſoever. Item, The Romans and their allies ſhall do the like by Antiochus, and all thoſe that are under his ſubjection. Item, It ſhall not be lawful for Antiochus either to make war with thoſe that inhabit the Iſlands, or to paſs over into Europe. Item, He ſhall quit all Cities, Lands, Villages, and Fortreſſes on this ſide the mountain Taurus unto the River Tanais; and moreover from the foot and valley under the ſaid hill, unto that ridge thereof which bendeth toward Lycaonia. Item, Out of thoſe Towns, territories and Caſtles which he is to void, he ſhall carry away no armour: and if he have conveyed from thence any already, he ſhall duly reſtore the ſame to every place accordingly. Item, He ſhall receive neither ſouldier nor any other perſon out of the Kingdom of Eumenes. Item, If any citizens belonging to thoſe Cities which are diſmembred and cut off from his realm, chance to remain now with him they ſhall return all to Apamea within a certain day. Item, As many as appertain to the Kingdom of Antiochus and are now with the Romans or their allies, may depart home or tary ſtill at their pleaſure. Item All ſlaves, whether they be fugitives or taken captive in war; likewiſe all other perſons free of condition before, and afterwards either taken priſoners or revolted, he ſhall deliver again to the Romans and their allies. Item, He ſhall make delivery of all his Elephants, and ſhall provide himſelf of no more hereafter. Item, He ſhall yeeld up all his Gallies of war, with the tackling to them belonging: neither ſhall he keep above ten ſmall veſſels; and none of them ſhall have more than thirty oars to guide and row them; nor ſo much as one * Galley with a ſingle bank of oars to ſerve in any war that himſelf ſhall firſt begin. Item, He ſhall not ſail within the promontories of Calycadnum and Sarpedon, unleſs haply there be ſome ſhip that bringeth mony, Embaſſadors, or hoſtages. Item, It ſhall not be lawful for King Antiochus to levy and wage any ſouldiers out of thoſe nations which are ſubject to the people of Rome; no, nor to entertain ſo much as voluntaries from thence. Item What houſes and edifices belonging to the Rhodians and their allies, are now within the precincts of the realm of Antiochus, ſhall return to

A the ſaid Rhodians and their aſſociats, in as ſtood eſtate and tenor as they were before the war began. And if any mony or debts be to them due, they may demand and recover the ſame. Item, If ought have been taken from them, they ſhall have good law and right to ſearch, own, demand, and challenge it again. Item, If any of thoſe Cities which ought to be rendred, be held by thoſe unto whom Antiochus hath committed them, he ſhall withdraw the garriſons from thence, and take order that they be ſurrendred accordingly. Item, He ſhall pay within twelve years by even portions, 12000 Attick talents of good and lawful ſilver: provided, that every talent weigh no leſs than eighty pound after Roman poiſe; beſides 540000 modii of wheat. Item, He ſhall pay unto King Eumenes 350 talents within five years; and for corn according to the rate and proportion 127 talents. Item, He ſhall ſend unto the Romans 20 hoſtages, and change them for o-B thers every three years: provided, that they be not under 18 years of age, nor above 45. Item, If any allies of the people of Rome, begin of their own motion to make war upon King Antiochus, it ſhall be lawful for him to revenge himſelf, and use forcible means to withſtand their violence; yet ſo, as he hold no City in right of war, nor receive any into amity: and all controverſies which ſhall ariſe between them ſhall be decided by law and juſtice; or if both parties be ſo pleaſed they ſhall trie the iſſue by force of arms. Item, it was compriſed alſo within the covenants of this accord, That he ſhould deliver into the Romans hands, Annibal the Carthaginian, Thoas the Ætolian, Mnaſimachus the Acarnanian, Eubulus likewiſe and Philo the Chalcidians. Finally, if ought hereafter hapned to be added moreover, or changed otherwiſe, the ſame in no caſe to prejudice any thing contained within the covenants aforeſaid. To this accord the Conſul ſware; and C to receive the Kings oath likewiſe there went unto him Q. Minutius Thermus and L. Manlius, he who fortuned at that time to return from the Oroadians. And the Coſ. wrote his letters to Q. Fab. Labeo Admiral of the fleet, preſently to come to Patara, and what ſhips ſoever of the Kings were there, to hew them in pieces, and make a light fire of them. So he departed from Epheſus, and either brake into fitters or burnt, 50 covered ſhips belonging to the King. In the ſame voyage and exploit he ſurpriſed and won Telmeſſus, by reaſon that the Townſmen were ſo affrighted at the ſuddain coming of the fleet. Then forthwith he departed out of Lycia, and having given order to thoſe that were left behind at Epheſus to follow after, he croſſed the Seas (between the Ilands) over into Greece. After he had ſojourned ſome few daies at Athens, until the ſhips from Epheſus were entred into the harbor of Pyræum: from thence he brought back his whole armado D to Italy. Cn. Manlius having received (among other things which were to be yeelded up of Antiochus) the Elephants alſo, and beſtowed them all freely upon Eumenes, gave audience to the controverſies of many Cities and States, amongſt whom (during theſe changes and alterations) there aroſe ſundry troubles and much variance. And Ariarates the King, who by the means and mediation of Eumenes (unto whom about that time he had affianced his daughter in marriage) was diſcharged and had acquittance for the one moity of the mony impoſed upon him, entred into amity with the people of Rome. When the differences of the Cities aforeſaid were debated and known, the ten Commiſſioners ſet down an order between them, reſpectively to their condition. To as many as had been tributaries to King Antiochus, and yet ſided with the people of Rome in affection, they granted franchiſe and immunity: but as many as took part with Antiochus, or were tri-E butaries unto King Attalus, thoſe were commanded to pay their cuſtoms and duties to King Eumenes. Moreover, they freed and exempted from all task and tallage (expreſly by name) the Colophonians inhabiting Notium, together with the Cymeans and the Mileſians. Unto the Clazomenians (over and beſides the ſame freedom) they gave the Iland Drymuſa. To the Mileſians alſo the territory called Sacer: to the Ilians, they annexed Rhæteum and Gergithus, not ſo much for any freſh and late deſerts, as in memorial of their ancient beginning and foundation; which was the cauſe alſo that they ſet Dardanus free. Semblably the Chians, Smyrneans, and Erythræans, for their ſingular loyalty and devoir which they ſhewed in that war they not only indowed with fair lands and territories but alſo graced with all kind of honor and reputation above the reſt. Moreover, the Phocæans had both their own lands reſtored unto them which they enjoyed before the F war, and alſo liberty to live under their ancient laws. As for the Rhodians, they had thoſe things now confirmed and eſtabliſhed unto them, which by a former decree were granted: and to better their eſtate, Lycia and Caria were beſtowed upon them, as far as the River Mæander, all ſave the City Telmeſſus. Unto the dominion of King Eumenes, they laid Cherſoneſus in Europe; and Lyſimachia, with all the Caſtles, Villages, and Lands thereto belonging, in as large terms and ample manner as Antiochus held the ſame: alſo within Aſia, the one and the other Phrygia, as well that which confineth upon Helleſpont, as the other which they call the Greater. Moreover, they reſtored unto him Myſia, which King Pruſias had taken from him: over and beſides, Lycaonia, Mylias, and Lydia; together with theſe Cities by ſpecial name, Tralleis, Epheſus, and Telmeſſus. As G touching Pamphylia, ſome debate there was between the Agents of Eumenes and the Embaſſadors for Antiochus, becauſe one part thereof is ſituat on this ſide the mount Taurus, and the other lyeth beyond. The deciſion of this controverſy was wholly referred to the arbitrement of the Senat. Manlius having ſet down theſe covenants and decrees, departed with the ten Legates and all his army toward Helleſpont: and when he had cauſed the Princes of the Gauls thither to repair before him, he declared unto them in what terms and under what conditions they ſhould entertain peace with Eumenes: & therewith he gave them warning, to leave their manner of inroding and roving in hoſtile wiſe by force of arms, and to contain themſelves within the precincts and bounds of their own territories. After this, having gathered into one place all the veſſels from H the Sea coaſts, together with the entire flote of King Eumenes, which by his brother Athenæus was brought from Elea, he tranſported all his forces into Europe. From whence he marched through Cherſonneſus by ſhort & eaſy journies, becauſe his army was heavily charged with prizes and booties of all ſorts; and encamped at Lyſimachia, purpoſing there to reſt a while, to the end that his travelling beaſts of draught and cariage, might be freſh and in good heart to paſs through Thracia, which was a voyage and journey commonly feared and abhorred. The ſame day that he diſlodged from Lyſimachia, he came to the River which they call Melas, and from thence the next day to Cypſela. When they were paſt Cypſela, they had for ten miles almoſt no other way, but through wild woods, narrow ſtreights, and thoſe rough withal and uneven underfoot. For the difficulty of which paſſage, the army was divided into two parts. The one he ſ commanded to march I before, the other to come behind in the rereward a great diſtance after, and in the midſt between, he beſtowed the carriages with bag and baggage, and amongſt them were waggons and wains, loden with the publick treaſure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the ſtreight paſs, there were about 10000 and not above, railed out of four nations of Aſia, to wit, the Aſtians, Cœnians Maduarenes, and Cœletes, who beſet the ſtreights to debar them of paſſage.

It was ſuppoſed that King Philip of Macedony his hand was herein, and that they entred not into this action without his privity and traudulent practiſe: who as he knew that the Romans could return no other way but by Thracia, ſo he was aware and wiſt well enough what a maſs of money they carried with them. The Roman General himſelf was in the vanguard, careful only and troubled about the difficulty of the way. All this while the Thracians ſat ſtill and ſtirred not, until the K armed ſouldiers were paſſed by. But when they perceived once, that the vanguard was gotten out of the ſtreights, and that the rereward was far enough behind, they fell in hand with the packs and coffers of the carriages; and after they had killed the guards, ſome of them ranſacked and rifled that which was in the waggons, others led away the pack horſes and other ſumpter beaſts with their load and burden on their backs. Hereupon aroſe a cry and alarm, and was firſt heard of thoſe that followed, but afterwards of them alſo in the foreward, & ſo from both ends they ran to the midſt, and at one time in diverſe places, ſkirmiſhed without all order confuſedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encumbered with pillage, and moſt of them without any weapon at all, becauſe they might have the uſe of their hands more nimble and agile to ſnatch & catch unto them their prizes, were by this means more expoſed to receive hurt, and ſoon killed. The Romans again L were much diſtreſſed and annoied through the diſadvantage of the ground and the waies: which the barbarous people were well enough acquainted with, and out of them would iſſue forth to encounter, and otherwhiles lurk within hollow blind caves, and not be ſeen. The very packs like-wiſe and the waggons, ſtanding and lying unto wardly in the way, ſometime of one, and ſometime of other (as it hapned) troubled and hindred them much in their fight. So as here in one place lay the theef dead, there in another the true man that purſued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one ſort as the other, as their hearts and courages ſerved or failed them and as the number was more or leſs, ſo the skirmiſh and fight was variable: and in one word, of both ſides many a man ſay in the duſt and loſt his life. By which time the night approached, and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not ſo much to avoid wounds and for fear * Diana. of death, as for that they had ſped themſelves ſufficiently of prizes. The Roman vanguard encam- M ped without the forreſt in the open ground about the Temple of * Bendis. The rereward remained ſtill behind in the midſt of the woods to guard their carriage, fortified within a double palliſado of ſtrong ſtakes. The morrow after, when they had well diſcovered by their eſpials the way before them, they joined themſelves with the vanguard. In this battel (over and beſides a great part of their pillage loſt, and a number of camp-followers and lackies ſlain, with ſome ſouldiers alſo, for that there was skirmiſhing every where throughout the chaſe) there died Q. Minutius Thermus:
and a right great loſs there was of him for he was a man of much valour and execution. That day the army marched as far as to the River Hebrus. From whence they paſſed through the confines of the Ænians, neer unto the Temple of Apollo, whom the inhabitants name Zerynthius. And there N they met with another ſtreight paſſage about a place called Tempyra, as rough and cumberſome under foot as the former. But for aſmuch as there were no woods about it, it yeelded no good place for ambuſhes. Howbeit the Thrauſians (a people likewiſe of Thrace) aſſembled together, hoping alſo to light upon the like booty. But by reaſon that the vallies lay naked and open ſo as if any be et the narrow waies they might be diſcovered a far off, the Romans were leſs affraid and troubled. For, ſay that they were to fight in ſome place of diſadvantage, yet they might arrange themſelves in battel aray in open field, and join in cloſe fight hand to hand. Being therefore em-battelled in Squadrons thick and ſtrong they charged the enemy with a great ſhout and cry, and at the firſt ſhock forced them to retreat and loſe ground, and afterwards to turn back and flie. And in the rout they were beaten down and killed; for even their own ſtreights which they ſeized O for their vantage, empeached and hindred themſelves. The Romans having gotten the victory, encamped neer a village of the Maronits, called Sare. The next day they marched through the champain open countrey Priaticus, where they ſojourned three daies to take in corn, partly from out of the fields of the Maronits, which willingly of themſelves they conferred upon them, and partly out of their own ſhips, which followed after, well furniſhed with all kind of proviſion.
From this place they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and ſo paſſing through the territory

A of the Abderits, they came to Nestus. All this way they journeied peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the reſt behind, if it were not dangerous unto them for any hoſtility, yet ſuſpected ſtill it was, all the whiles that they paſſed night and day through the midſt of the Thracians, until at length they came into Macedony. The ſame army conducted ſometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and tractable, for no other cauſe, but that they had leſs ſtore of pillage and booty with them to ſet their teeth on water, and fingers on itching. And yet even then alſo (as Claudius writeth) there were fifteen thouſand Thracians that encountred Mutines the Numidian, as he marched before the vanguard to diſcover the coaſts: and he ſaith, that he had in his company four hundred Numidian horſemen, and ſome few Elephants: alſo that his ſon, with an elect wing of a hundred and fifty horſe, brake through B the midſt of the enemies, who alſo within a while after, (when his father Mutines having placed the Elephants in the midſt, and the Horſemen in the flanks, joined in battel with his enemies, charged them upon their backs, and put them in great fear) by means of which ſtorm and tempeſt (as it were) of the Cavalry, they never came ſo far, as to deal with the battel of the footmen. Cn. Manlius led his army through Macedony into Theſſaly, and marching on by the way of Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he abode all winter. For he made not ſo light a matter of winter ſailing, that he durſt take the Sea, and hazard the paſſage at that time of the year.

The year almoſt expired, M. Valerius the Conſul returned out of Liguria to Rome, for the creation of new Magiſtrats, having atchieved no ſuch memorable exploit in his Province during the time of his government, as might have yeelded any colourable reaſon of his long ſtay, in that he C came more tardy (than the uſual manner was) to the aſſembly for an election of Conſuls: (for holden it was upon the * 12 calends of March) wherein were created, M. Æmylius Lepidus and C. Flaminius. The next day after, theſe Pretors were elected; namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Ser. Sulpitius Galba, Q. Terentius Culleo, L. Terentius M ſſuliota, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Furius Craſſipes. After the election of Magiſtrats the Conſuls propoſed to the Senat as touching the Provinces and governments of the Pretors. And the LL. decreed, that two of them ſhould remain at Rome, to miniſter laws and execute juſtice: other two ſhould be employed out of Italy, in Sicily and Sardinia: two in Italy, to wit, at Tarentum and in Gaul. Immediatly before they entred into office they were enjoyned to caſt lots: and Ser. Sulpitius had the juriſdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentius of ſtrangers and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicily, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius D was to govern Tarentum, and M. Furius to rule Gallia. It fortuned the ſame year that L. Minutius Myrtilus and L. Manlius were delivered to the Carthaginian Embaſſadors, by the hands of the Fœcial heralds at the commandment of M. Claudius Pretor of the City for the time being, and tranſported over to Carthage, for that the voice and ſpeech went, That they had beaten the ſaid Embaſſadors. A bruit and rumour there was of a great war begun in Liguria, & which encreaſed every day more than other. Whereupon the Senat ordained to both the new Conſuls the Province of Liguria that day on which they propounded unto the Senat to conſult about the Provinces and the affairs of the Common-weal. But Lepidus the Conſul oppoſed himſelf againſt this their act and ordinance alledging, "That it was a ſhameful indignity, that both the Conſuls ſhould be ſhut up "and incloſed within the vallies of Liguria; whereas for two years already M. Fulvius and Cn. E "Manlius had raigned like Kings, the one in Europe, the other in Aſia, in ſtead of Philip and An"tiochus. And if (qd. he) it be the pleaſure of the Senat that there ſhould be armies maintained in "thoſe parts, more meet. I wot, it were, that Conſuls ſhould have the command & conduct there"of than thoſe privat perſons. As for them, they range about thoſe nations, terrifying them with "threats of war againſt whom there hath been none proclaimed: making merchandice and ſelling "peace among them for ſums of mony. Now if it be requiſit and needful to keep two armies for "the government and defence of thoſe Provinces, like as M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius Conſuls, ſuc"ceeded M. Acilius and L. Scipio Conſuls: ſo C. Livius and M. Valerius the Conſuls ought to have "entred in place of Fulvius and Manlius. At leaſt wiſe now, when the Ætolian war is finiſhed and "brought to an end, Aſia recovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquiſhed F "ſubdued, either ought Conſuls to be ſent unto their armies, or elſe the legions to be brought "back from thence, and at length delivered to the Common-weal. The Senat notwithſtanding they gave him the hearing, perſiſted ſtill in their reſolution that both Conſuls ſhould be imploied in the Province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was, that Manlius and Fulvius ſhould leave their Provinces, withdraw their forces from thence, and return to Rome. An old grudge there was and a cankred enmity between the ſaid M. Fulvius, and M. Æmylius the Conſul: and among other matters of diſcontentment, Æmylius gave out, that by the means of Fulvius, himſelf was created Conſul two years later than otherwiſe he ſhould have been. And therefore to work him deſpight and make him odious to the World, he cauſed the Embaſſadors of Ambracia (whom he had ſuborned and ſet on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senat-G houſe. Theſe being in place, complained that M. Fulvius had warred upon them at what time as they were in peace, performed all that other Conſuls before had impoſed upon them, and were alſo ready in all duty and allegeance to do the ſame unto him. "Firſt our lands and territories ſay "they were piteouſly ſpoiled and waſted: then were we terrified with the ſacking of our City, "and threatned with the killing of our people, that for very fear we were forced to ſhut our gates. "After wards we were beleaguered and aſſaulted, and againſt us all kinds of hoſtility practiſed, "by ſword, by fire, by ruinating and ranſacking our City. Our wives, our children, have been led

" and haled into captivity and bondage; our goods violently taken from us (and that which a- H " bove all went neereſt to our heart) our Temples throughout the whole City deſpoiled and
" robbed of their goodly ornaments: the images of our Gods, and finally our Gods themſelves
" plucked out of their ſhrines and places, and ſo carried away; yea, the very walls and pillars left
" bare and naked, ſo as the Ambracians have no Gods remaining amongſt them to adore and to " whom they might make their prayers and ſupplications. As they poured out their complaints, the Conſul of a mind to aggravat and heap more matter upon his adverſary, ceaſed not to propoſe unto them many interrogatories (as it was complotted between them before) and drew them on to ſpeak many things, as if with their good will they would not have uttered them. When the reſt of the LL. were moved herewith, then the other Conſul C. Flaminius undertook the apologie and defence of M. Fulvius, ſaying, " That the Ambracians trod in an old beaten way, and did no I
" otherwiſe than ſome before them had done. For even ſo was M. Marcellus accuſed by the Syra-" cuſians, ſo was Q. Fulvius charged by the Capuans. And why by the ſame means ſuffered they " not T. Quintius to be charged by King Philip, M. Acilius and L. Scipio by Antiochus Cn. Manlius
" by the Gauls, and the ſame Fulvius himſelf by the Ætolians and people of Cephalenia? That " Ambracia was aſſaulted, battred, and forced in the end; that images and ornaments were " taken from thence; that other acts were done and committed, which uſually follow upon the " winning of Towns, think ye my LL. that either I in the behalf of Fulvius will deny, or Fulvius
" himſelf will diſavow? who, in regard of theſe worthy exploits and noble acts, is minded to de" mand at your hands the honor of a Triumph, who purpoſeth to carry before his triumphant
" chariot the portraiture of Ambracia as it was taken, the images which they accuſe him to have K
" caried away and other ſpoils of that City; yea, and to ſet them upon the poſts of his houſe for a " memorial to poſterity? No reaſon there is that the Ambracians ſhould ſever themſelves from " the Ætolians, and do more than they, for their caſe and condition is all one. And therefore let " my colleague ſhew his rancor and malice, and bewray a feſtered enmity in ſome other cauſe: or " if he will needs follow and purſue this forward, let him intertain and keep ſtill his Ambracians " unto the coming of M. Fulvius. And for mine own part, I will ſuffer no act to paſs either of the " Ambracians or the Ætolians, ſo long as M. Fulvius is abſent. Æmylius accuſed his enemy for having a crafty head of his own, and for his ſuble fetches, as being notorious and well known to all men for no better; ſaying, that full cunningly he would trifle out the time, and make delaies all the year long, that he might not come to Rome ſo long as his adverſary was Conſul. Thus in this de- L bate between the two Conſuls two dayes were ſpent and nothing elſe done. And it appeared evidently, that ſo long as Flaminius was in place and preſence, nothing could be concluded and determined. Whereupon a time was ſpied out when Flaminius chanced to be ſick, and by that occaſion was away. Then upon a motion made by Æmylius there paſſed an act of the Senat, That the Ambracians ſhould have all their goods reſtored unto them again; that they ſhould enjoy their freedom and franchiſes, and live under their own Laws: and finally might take what cuſtoms, toll and impoſts they would for portage, as well by Land as Sea: provided alwayes that the Romans, and their allies the Latins, ſhould be exempted and free there from. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their ſacred Temples, the Senat ordained that when M. Fulvius was returned to Rome, the colledge of the Pontifies ſhould M have the hearing and deciding thereof, and look what they awarded and ſet down, it ſhould ſtand and be performed accordingly. And the Conſul not content with all this, took the vantage when there were but few Senators in the houſe, and procured an other act of Senat in this form, That they judged Ambracia not to be reputed a City forced by aſſault. This done, there was by vertue of an order from the Decemvirs a ſolemn ſupplication holden three dayes for the health of the people, in regard of a grievous peſtilence that diſpeopled both City and Countrey. After that the Latine feaſts and holy-dayes were celebrated. When the Conſuls had accompliſhed theſe devotions, and rid their conſciences of ſcruple, and withal made a full and compleat levy to furniſh legions (for both of them were deſirous to have new ſouldiers) they departed into their Provinces, and caſſed all the old. N

After the Conſuls were ſet forward on their journey, the Pro-conſul Cn. Manlius returned home to Rome. For whoſe ſake the Pretor Servius Sulpitius aſſembled the Senat in the Temple of Bel-lona. Where after relation made of his deeds atchieved, he demanded that in conſideration thereof, due honor and thankſgiving ſhould be rendred to the immortal Gods, and withal, that himſelf might ride triumphant into the City. The moſt part of the Legats and Commiſſioners, who had been with him gainſaid and denied the ſame, and above all the reſt L. Furius Purpurio, and L. Æmylius Paulus, who ſtepped forth, and informed againſt him in theſe terms: " That they had " been ſent in commiſſion to aſſiſt Cn. Manlius, for the making of a peace with Antiochus, and fi-
" niſhing of that accord and thoſe covenants and conditions, which were commenſed and begun " between him and L. Scipio. Yet Cn. Manlius, ſay they, endevoured all that ever he could to trou- O
" ble that peace yea, and to have ſurpriſed and intrapped Antiochus by trains of ambuſh if he had " ever come in his way, or within his reach. But the King being a ware of the Conſul his fraud and " deceit, albeit there was made great means many a time to have caught him by colour of parley
" and conference, yet avoided evermore not only to have ſpeech and communication with him,
" but alſo to come within his ſight. And when Manlius would needs have paſſed over Taurus,
" hardly and with much ado could he be kept back, notwithſtanding all the commiſſioners prayed

" and

A "and beſought him to ſtay, and not to hazard himſelf and incur the danger of a notable loſs and
"overthrow, fore-told by the verſes and propheſies of Sibylla to light upon them that would paſs
"beyond the bounds limited by the fatal deſtinies. All this notwithſtanding he advanced forward "and approached with his army, yea, and encamped neer the very pitch and top of the mountain,
"where all the water that falleth from above, runneth contrary wayes into divers Seas. And "when he could find no quarrel there for which he might make war (becauſe the Kings people "and ſubjects were ſtill and quiet) he turned the army about to the Gallogreeks, againſt which "nation there was no war intended, either by warrant and authority from Senat, or by grant and "commiſſion from the people. And what man was ever ſo hardy and bold, as to war upon his "own head? The wars againſt Antiochus, Philip, Annibal, and the Carthaginians, are moſt freſh B "in each mans remembrance: and of all theſe, the Senat was conſulted with, and the people gran"ted their ordinance. Embaſſadors many a time and often were addreſſed before: reſtitution and "amends were by order demanded: and laſt of all, heralds were ſent, ſolemnly to denounce and "proclaim war. Now tell me, Cn. Manlius, Which of all theſe things were done; that we may call
"this by the name of a publick war, allowed by the State of the people of Rome, and not rather a "privat brigandage and robbery of your own? But contented you your ſelf with this, and did you
"no more? marched you directly forward, and took you nothing but that which was in your "way; leading your army againſt thoſe only whom you took to be your enemies? or rather at "all turnings and windings, nay, at every forked high way leading on both hands, when you "were at a ſtand, followed not you like a mercenary and waged Conſul unto Attalus (King Eu- C "menes his brother) with the Roman army, what hand ſoever he turned and marched? There "was not a crank and nook but you viſited; there was not a corner that you left unſearched, in all
"Piſidia, Lycaonia, and Phrygia. There was not a tyrant, Prince nor Potentat there was not a Lord
"of any borough or caſtle, how far ſoever out of the way, but you had a ſaying to them to pill and "poll them, and to pick pence out of their purſes. For what buſineſs had you with the Oroandi-
"ans? What had you to do with other nations, as innocent and guiltleſs as they? Now as con"cerning the war, (in regard whereof you demand a triumph) in what ſort managed you it?
"Fought you a battail either in place commodious, or time convenient? Surely, I muſt needs ſay,
"great reaſon you have and good cauſe, to require that honor and praiſe be given to the immor-
"mortal Gods: firſt for that their gracious will and pleaſure was that the army ſhould not ſmart
"for the temerity and raſhneſs of their chief leader, warring as he did againſt the law of nations: D "then, in that they preſented unto us, not men indeed for enemies, but very beaſts and no better.
"For ye muſt not think, that it is the name only of the Gallogreeks, which is mingled and com"pounded; for long time before, both their bodies and minds have been mixed and corrupted,
"and the men themſelves baſtard and degenerate from their firſt nature. Had they been the ſame
"Gauls with whom we have fought a thouſand times in Italy, and with doubtful iſſue, and loſt as "much as we won, and every foot received as good as we brought, think ye there would have re"turned one meſſenger from thence, to bring us news, for any good at leaſt-wiſe that our Gene"ral there did? Twice he came to conflict with them: twice he encountred them in place of diſ-
"advantage; mounting with his army againſt the hill, and ranged in the botome of the valley, E "even under the enemies feet: in ſuch ſort, that if they had lanced no darts againſt us from the "higher ground, but only come upon us with their naked and diſarmed bodies, they had been able "to have overcome us and gone over our bellies. And what hapned hereupon? God-amercy the "good fortune of the people of Rome: we may thank (I ſay) the great and terrible name of the "Romans. The freſh renown of the late ruins and overthrows of Annibal, Philip, and Antiochus, "amazed and aſtoniſhed (as one would ſay) theſe men with their ſo corpulent and mighty bo"dies; with ſlings and arrow-ſhot only were they diſcomfited and put to flight, ſo affrighted
"were they. There was not a ſword once bloudied in all this Gauls war: at the firſt twang of the "bow and ſinging of the arrow they fled away, like ſwarms of bees with ringing of baſons. And "yet believe me, even we the ſame and no other (as if fortune would admoniſh and ſhew what F "had become of us if we had affronted an enemy indeed) in our return, when we fortuned to "light upon certain petty robbers and theeves of Thrace, were ſoundly beaten, killed, and put to "flight, and ſpoiled and well ſtript of our bag and baggage. Q. Minutius Thermus (by whoſe death
"we have ſuſtained a far greater loſs, than if Cn. Manlius had miſcaried, whoſe raſhneſs was the "cauſe of all this calamity and misfortune) with many a tall and valiant man beſides, loſt his life in "this skirmiſh. Our hoſt, bringing away with them the ſpoil and pillage of K. Antiochus, was diſ"membred and parted into three troops: the vanguard in one place, the rereguard in another, and
"the carriages in a third were fain to take up their lodging one whole night amongſt buſhes, bri-
"ars, and brambles, and lurk within the caves and dens of wild beaſts. Are theſe the brave and "worthy exploits for which you demand a triumph? But ſay, that you had received in Thrace, G "neither damage nor diſhonor; which be the enemies over whom you would needs triumph in "all the haſt? I trow they be thoſe, whom the Senat & people of Rome deſtined & aſſigned to be your "enemies: for ſo was triumph granted to this L. Scipio here in place: ſo likewiſe to that M. Aculius
"before him over K. Antiochus: ſo alſo erewhile to T. Quintius for the victory of Philip: and ſo to "conclude unto P. Africanus for ſubduing Annibal the Carthaginians and K. Syphax. And when "the Senat had ordained war, yet before they enterpriſed and began theſe high and hauty affairs,
"they made ſome doubt and pauſe in ſuch petty circumſtances as theſe, to wit, unto whom they
"ſhould

" ſhould ſend defiance and denounce the ſaid war: whether to the Kings themſelves in their own H
" perſon; or it were ſufficient to give intimation to one garriſon or other within their fortreſſes.
" And would ye now (my maſters) that all theſe obſervations and ceremonies ſhould be pol-
" ted and confounded, that the rights and laws of the Feciales and heralds ſhould be aboliſhed, &
" that there ſhall be no more Fecial at all. But let religion and divine ſervice (God forgive me if I
" ſeem to blaſpheme) be troden under foot: ſuppoſe the Gods were utterly forgotten of you, and
" their remembrance quite exiled out of your hearts; Is it your pleaſure alſo, and think ye it meet,
" that the Senat be conſulted no more for their advice in queſtion of war? or that a bill be not
" propounded to the people, in this wiſe: Pleaſeth it you or no, to ordain that war be levied a-" gainſt the Gauls? The other day, and no longer ſince, the Conſuls were deſirous and earneſt to " govern Greece and Aſia, yet when they perceived you to be reſolute and perſiſt ſtill in aſſigning I
" unto them both, the Province of Liguria, they were content and obeyed. Great reaſon ſhall
" they have therefore to demand a triumph at your hands, after they have atchieved an happy
" victory and finiſhed that war, which they firſt enterpriſed under your warrant and authority.
" After this manner as ye have heard, ſpake Furius and Æmylius. And Manlius again, as we find in " record, anſwered thus, or much to this effect, as followeth: "Right honorable & my very good
" LL. the Tribuns of the Commons were ever wont afore-time, to repugn and croſs them that " demanded triumph: and I take my ſelf much beholden unto them for this favour, that either in " their love to my ſelf, or in regard of my great and notable exploits, they have not only by their
" ſilence given their conſent for my honor, but alſo ſeem ready and preſt to propound the ſame
" unto the people, if need had been. But now forſooth, whom have I (and God will) for mine ad- K
" verſaries, but even ſome of my ten adjacents or ſuffragans, whom our anceſtors thought good to " give unto their Generals in the war, as a counſel both to aſſiſt and aid them, and alſo to counte" nance and grace them in their victory? L. Furius and L. Æmylius are the men and none but " they, who inhibit and debar me for mounting up into the triumphant chariot; they are ready to
" pluck from my head the glorious and honorable crown that I ſhould wear: even thoſe (I ſay)
" whom (if the Tribuns had hindred and empeached my triumph) I would have reported my ſelf
" unto as witneſſes of my worthy acts. Certainly, (my LL.) far be it from me, that I ſhould envy
" and repine at the honour of any man: but I remember well, that of late daies when certain Tri-
" buns of the Common ſtate (men of great courage and action) went about to ſtay and forbid the " triumph of Q. Fabius Labeo, ye by your authority diverted and ſcared them from that intended L " enterpriſe; and he triumphed in the end notwithſtanding his adverſaries gave out and ſaid a" loud, not that he had fought a war unjuſtly, but in reprochful manner charged him, That he had " not ſo much as ſet eye upon the enemy. And I, who have ſo often in ranged battel fought with " an 100000 moſt fierce and warlike enemies, ſlain or taken priſoners more than 40000 of them,
" forced and won two of their camps: and left all places on this ſide the ridge of the mountain
" Taurus, more peaceable and quiet than is the Land of Italy, am not only fruſtrate and put beſide
" my triumph, but alſo ſtand here before your honors to defend my ſelf againſt the challenge of theſe " mine own Counſel and Suffragans. Which accuſation of theirs, conſiſteth (as ye have heard my " LL.) of two principal points: for objected they have, firſt, that I ought not at all to have made
" war with the Gauls; and ſecondly, that I conducted and managed the ſame raſhly and with- M " out diſcretion. The Gauls (ſay they) were no enemies of ours; but being quiet in peace, and " ready to do whatſoever they were charged, were by you abuſed and wronged. I will not require
" (my LL.) that ye ſhould have the ſame hard conceit of the Gauls which inhabit in Aſia as touch" ing their cruelty and mortal hatred againſt the Roman name, which ye know generally to be in " the people of the Gauls: Do but conſider and judge of theſe Gauls as they be in themſelves " ſimply without reſpect of the infamous name and odious opinion that goeth of the whole ge" neration: O that King Eumenes were here. Would to God that all the States of Aſia were pre" ſent in place, that ye might hear them rather what complaints they would make, than my ſelf ac-
" cuſing of them. Send but your Embaſſadors to all the Cities of Aſia, and enquire whether ſervi-
" tude were greater and more grievous, that which they were delivered from by the chaſing of N
" Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus, or this whereof they are now eaſed by the ſubduing of " the Gauls? Let them relate unto you, and make report how often their territories have been
" waſted by them, how many booties have been driven, and prizes carried away out of them, and " how they were brought to ſo low a paſs, that they hardly could find means and make any ſhift
" to redeem their priſoners by ranſom. Let them tell you what they heard there beſides, how " they killed men, yea, and their children, to ſacrifice, unto their Gods. But know ye now from " me, that your allies yeelded tribut to the Gauls, yea, and ſhould have paied ſtill at this day, not-" withſtanding they were by you delivered from their ſubjection under King Antiochus. If I had " not beſtirred my ſelf the better. For the farther that Antiochus was removed from them the more
" proudly and outragiouſly would theſe Gauls have ruled like LL. over all Aſia, and whatſoever O
" lands had lien on this ſide the top of the mount Taurus, you ſhould have laid to the ſeignory of " the Gauls and not annexed to your own Empire & dominion. All this is true will ſome one ſay,
" and what of all that? Theſe Gauls likewiſe once ſpoiled the temple at Delphos, reputed in times
" paſt the common Oracle of the whole world and ſituat in the very heart and midſt of the earth, " & yet the people of Rome neither denounced nor made war for al that. Certainly, I alwaies would " have thought there had been ſome difference to be made between thoſe daies, when as neither

" Greece

A "Greece nor Asia was under your jurisdiction and obedience (that you should need to take care
"and regard of what was done in those parts) & this present time, in which ye have set the moun"tain Taurus to be the bound & limit, whereunto your Empire extendeth: in which you give free"dom and immunity to Cities: in which ye enlarge the confins of some, and take in the precincts
"of others; fining these cities with forfeiture & loss of their territories, punishing those with taxes
"and tributs: in which I say, you augment and diminish realms, give and take away Kingdoms at "your good pleasure: and in one word, in which ye judg it a matter that concerneth you, to pro"vide that there may be a general peace both on land and sea. Were you of opinion indeed, that
"Asia might not be counted free, unless Antiochus had withdrawn his garrisons which kept quiet
"within their fortresses and castles, and stirred not forth? and thought you withal, that your gifts B "granted unto King Eumenes, might be assured unto him and the freedom likewise of the Cities,
"established unto them, if whole armies of Gauls might range all about to and fro in those coun"tries? But why stand I so much arguing and reasoning in this manner, as if I had not found the "Gauls enemies, but rather caused them to be our enemies? O L. Scipio I call you here to witness,
"into whose charge and government I succeeded, whose vertue and felicity withal I besought the "immortal Gods to vouchsafe unto me (and my prayer was not in vain:) and you likewise, O P.
"Scipio, who with the Col. your brother and in the whole army, had the room & place indeed of "an adjoinct Lieutenant and no more, but carried the Majesty of a Collegue & joint companion;
"speak frankly both of you upon your knowledge, whether whole legions of Gauls served not in "the army of Antiochus? Tell us, whether you saw them not in the field, marshalled in both the C "points and flanks of the main battel, as the very flower and strength of the whole puissance of "Antiochus? Say directly, fought ye not with them slew you them not, & carried away their spoils,
"as undoubted and lawful enemies? And yet both Senat decreed and people ordained war with "Antiochus by name, and not with the Gauls. But I tro (or else I am much deceived) within this "decree and ordinance, they included all those besides that came to aid and assist him. Of whom "(excepting Antiochus himself, with whom Scipio had articled peace and alliance, and ye also had "expresly given order therefore) they all were our enemies no doubt, who had born arms against "us in the quarrel and behalf of the said Antiochus. Now albeit the Gauls above all others were "comprised in this number, together with some petty Kings and Tyrants besides: yet I contracted "accord and peace with others, (after I had forced them to suffer due punishment according to D "their trespass) as far forth as I thought it expedient for the honour of your Empire: yea, and I
"assaied also to gain and win the hearts of the Gauls, if haply it had been possible to have dulced
"and reclaimed them from their inbred fierceness and natural cruelty. But when I perceived that "they were untractable, untamed, and implacable, then and not before I resolved, that it was high "time to bridle and bring them into order by violence and force of arms. Now that I have clee-
"red the former point of my accusation, as touching the enterprise of the war, it remaineth that "I yeeld you an account of the conduct thereof. Wherein verily I would make no doubt to ap"prove mine innocence, and justify the goodness of my cause, if I were to plead, I say not, in the "Senat of Rome, but even at the councel table of Carthage; where (as men say) they make no more
"ado, but truss up, hang, and crucify their Generals if they proceed to execution of any service in E "war with bad advice and counsel, although the issue and event be never so good. But in that "City, which therefore useth the name of the Gods both before they begin, and also when they "proceed to the managing of all their affairs, (because no person should come to detract or de-"prave that miliciously, which the Gods have once approved) and which City in the grant & or"dinance either of procession or triumph, useth this solemn form of words: For that he hath well
"and happily administred and managed the weal publick: In this City, I say, if I were unwilling, nay,
"if I reputed it an odious matter, and favouring too much of pride and arrogance to vaunt my self
"and boast of mine own proweis: yet if in regard of the happy success and felicity of my self and
"mine army, in that without any loss of souldiers, we vanquished and subdued so great and mighty
"a nation, I demanded first that due honour and thanksgiving should be rendred unto the im-F "mortal Gods, and then, that I might my self ascend and mount up the Capitol in triumph, from "whence I descended to take my voyage, after I had conceived and pronounced my vows, and "made my prayers after the solemn and religious order; would ye deny both me and the immor"tal Gods also? Yes marry would you, and why? Forsooth I fought in a place of disadvantage.
"But tell me then, I pray you, in what ground I might have fought with better vantage? consi"dering the enemies were seized of the hill, and kept themselves within their strength and fort.
"I should have gone unto them, if I had been willing to have vanquished and overcome them.
"What? how if they had been there within a strong City? how if they had kept within the walls, "and would not have issued forth? You must then have laid siege unto them and given the "assault. Must I so indeed? And how I pray? Fought M. Acilius (I beseech you) at Thermopyla G "in a place of advantage? Why? did not T. Quintius after this manner dispossess Philip of the high "Mountains, which he held over the River Aous? In faith, I cannot yet devise what kind of ene"mies they either imagine to themselves they were, or would have you to take and esteem them "to be. If degenerate, if effeminate, if enervate with the delights and pleasures of Asia, what "danger was it to march up the hill against them with all disadvantage? If redoubted and terrible "for fierce courage and bodily strength, deny ye triumph for so noble a victory? Envy (my "good LL.) is blind, and can skill of nothing but to detract and defame vertues, to falsifie

and

" and corrupt the honors and rewards due thereto. Pardon me I beſeech your HH. and hold me H " excuſed, if I have been over long and tedious. It is not, I aſſure you, any delight and pleaſure that " I take to put forth and glorify my ſelf, but a neceſſity impoſed upon me (in mine own defence, " to confute theſe crimes objected againſt me) which hath driven mine Oration out in length. To " proceed, was it poſſible alſo that in Thrace I could make the paſſes within the forreſts large and " wide, which naturally were ſtreight and narrow? the ground plain and ſmooth, which by na" ture was uneven and rugged? Could I make level downs of ſteep mounts? open champian and " fair fields of woodland overgrown, and rough wylds. Lay it in me, to prevent thoſe Thracian
" theeves that they ſhould not hide themſelves within their lurking holes and ordinary covert " thickets? Was it in my power, to impeach them that they might ſnatch and carry nothing of " our baggage? Was I able to warrant that none of our laboring beaſts out of ſo great a number, I
" ſhould be driven and led away from their company? that no perſon ſhould be hurt? and finally,
" that Q. Minutius a brave and hardy knight, ſhould not die of his wound? My adverſaries preſs
" hard and much upon this misfortune, that it was our unlucky hap to loſe ſo worthy a Gentle" man: but they never think that if they would ſay nothing but ſuppreſs and conceal all, yet you
" ſhould know (ſince the whole army is here preſent to teſtify that which I ſay) That although " the enemy aſſailed us in a narrow ſtreight, in an inconvenient place of great diſadvantage, yet
" both of our battaillons at once, as well the vanguard as rereward, compaſſed the army of the " Barbarians buſy and occupied in rifling of our carriage, ſlew many thouſands of them that very " day, and within few daies after either killed or took priſoners a greater number of them by far.
" Well, if I had not drawn a ſword in Aſia, if I had not ſeen an enemy there, yet I Pro-conſul had K
" deſerved a triumph well enough for thoſe two battels in Aſia. But enough hath been ſaid of " theſe matters, and I am to requeſt you rather (my Lords all) to forgive me for my boldnes, if I " have held you longer than my will and deſire was.

The accuſation that day had prevailed more than his own defence, but that they continued arguing and debating in the Councel-houſe until it was late in the evening. Then the Senat aroſe with this mind (as it ſhould ſeem) to deny him a triumph. The next morrow, the kinſfolk and friends of Cn. Manlius, laboured all that ever they could. Likewiſe the authority of the ancients ſtood him in great ſtead; who ſaid plainly that the precedent could not be found in any hiſtories, That a General who had vanquiſhed his enemies, accompliſhed the full time of government in his Province, and brought his army back, returned into the City as a private perſon, without the L honor of the triumphant chariot and the laurel garland. The very indignity and ſhame of this example, ſurmounted the malice of his adverſaries, in ſo much as the Senators in a frequent aſſembly granted his triumph.

The remembrance and memory of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater contention that aroſe with a far mightier and more noble perſonage. For as Valerius Antias hath recorded, the two QQ. Petilii, called P. Scipio Africanus into queſtion, and ſet him down a day peremptorily to make his appearance, and anſwer for himſelf. This action divers men conſtrued diverſly, according to their ſeveral diſpoſition and affection. Some blamed not ſo much the Tribuns of the Commons, as the whole City in general, for ſuffering ſuch an abuſe: diſcourſing in this wiſe: That the two chiefeſt States and Common-wealths in the World were become at one time unthankful, M but Rome more ungrateful of the twain. For Carthage being ſubdued, had baniſhed Annibal likewiſe vanquiſhed: but Rome a victreſs was about to expulſe Africanus a conqueror. Others again reaſoned thus: that in no State there ought to be a citizen ſo pre-eminent and high above the reſt, that he might not be under law, and brought to anſwer unto interrogatories accordingly. And nothing preſerveth iſonomy in a City, and maintaineth equal liberty more, than to have the mightieſt man to hold up his hand at the bar. For what may be ſafely committed to any man (and ſurely the ſoveraign rule of the ſtate leaſt of all other things) if he be not to yeeld an accompt of the managing of his affairs? And verily, he that can not abide to be equal unto others, to proceed againſt ſuch a one by rigor and force, is no injuſtice at all. Thus men commonly talked pro & contra, until the judicial day came of his perſonal appearance, and anſwer to be made. Never was N there man known before that day (no, not Scipio himſelf when he was at the higheſt, either Conſul or Cenſor) accompanied with a greater train of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was conducted unto the common place and court of Pleas as an accuſed perſon, there to plead his cauſe. Being commanded to ſpeak in his own defence, he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entred into a diſcourſe of the acts by him atchieved; and that with ſuch a Majeſty and magnificence as it was well known and confeſſed, that never man was praiſed either better or more truly than he. For with what courage and mind he atchieved thoſe his brave exploits indeed, with the ſame ſpirit he delivered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was weary to hear his ſpeech, becauſe all that he related was for his own defence in this his danger, and not upon vain glory and oſtentation. The Tribuns of the Commons his adverſaries, when they had laid open certain ſuppoſed O crimes committed of old, as touching his waſtful exceſs whiles he wintred in Syracuſa; as alſo the riot and outrage of Pleminius which hapned at Locri; they proceeded to charge him by preſumptions and ſuſpitions, rather than by direct evidences and proofs, for embezling and averting to his proper uſe certain treaſure gotten from King Antiochus; and namely, that his ſon being taken priſoner, was rendred unto him without ranſom: and that in all other things, Scipio was reſpected and

A alone had carried the Roman peace and war under his girdle. Alſo that he bare a ſtrong hand over the Conſul, more like, I wot, a Dictatator and abſolute commander, then a Lievetenant and aſsiſtant unto him, all the while he was in the province. Neither aimed he and ſhot at any other mark, when he went that journey, but that the ſame, which long before was notoriouſly known to Spain, Gaul, Sicily, and Africk might as evidently appear to Greece, to Aſia, and all to the Kings and nations of the Eaſt parts, to wit, that he was the only man, he was the chief, the head and pillar of the Roman Empire, that under the ſhaddow of Scipio his wing, that City which is the lady of the world, was covert and protected; that a beck and nod of his head, was as good as all arreſts of Senat and heſts of people. Thus when they could not touch him in life, nor faſten upon him any note of infamy, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle envy. Thus with orations they ſpent the time untill night came, and the buſineſs was put over
B to another day: which being come, the Tribunes, only in the times in the morning were ſet in their pewes within the Roſtra [or common ple ding place] the defendant was called, who garded with a great company of his friends and followers, paſſed through the mids of the aſſembly, approached the Roſtra, and ſtood juſt under it. Then after an oyez; and ſilence made: "My "Maſters (quoth he) you that are Tribunes of the commons, and ye likewiſe Quirites, my neigh-"bors and citizens of Rome, upon this very day of the month it was that I fought a pight bat-tell againſt Annibal and the Carthaginians, with right fortunat and happy ſucceſſe; meet there-"fore and good reaſon ſince it is, that to day all pleas and actions ſurceaſe; I will go directly C "and immediately from hence to the Capitol and preſent my ſelf before Iup. Opt. Max. before "Iuno and Minerva, with all the reſt of other gods and goddeſſes, preſidents and patrons of that "temple and fortreſſe, to perform my humble duty unto them, to ſalute and thank them, for that "they have vouch afed me that reſolute affection and powerfull means with ill, both on ſucha "day as this; and alſo many times beſides to perform my devoir well and truly unto the Com-"mon-weal. As many of you therefore (Quirites) as well may, go ye with me, and pray the "gods to ſend to you like governors to my ſelf, and no worſe. If I ſay (and not elſe) as you ever "ſince I was ſeventeen yeers of age, even to theſe mine old daies, you alwaies advanced me to "honors before the ordinary time of mine age, ſo I again advanced and prevented the ſaid honors "with good ſervice and noble deeds. This ſaid he departed from the Roſtra and aſcended up to the Capitol; whereat the whole audience there aſſembled turned at once and followed Scipio;
D in ſo much as at laſt the ſcribes and notaries, ye, and the very ſergeants left the Tribunes there alone, without any to bear them company but their own bondſervants and the common cryer, who ſtill from the Roſtra called and cited the defendant. Scipio not only viſited the temples upon the Capitoll hill, but alſo made a perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole city to all the churches and chappels of their gods and goddeſſes. This was in manner a more ſolemn day unto him in regard of the affectionat favour of men, and the eſtimation of his true grandeur indeed, then on which he rode into the City in triumph over King Syphax and the Carthaginians. But it was the laſt fair day that ever he ſaw: and never ſhone the ſun again pleaſantly upon P. Scipio. For after this, foreſeeing envy growing toward him, and what a life and how full of debates he ſhould have with thoſe Tribunes, upon a longer day granted for the proceſſe of E law againſt him, he retired himſelf apart to Liternum, of ſet purpoſe to make default and not appear to plead his cauſe any more. He caried a greater ſpirit with him, his heart was too big, & uſed he had been to an higher degree of port & honor, then to take knowledg what it was to be accuſed: he could not skill to vale bonet and ſtoop ſo low, and to abaſe himſelf to the abject condition of thoſe that plead for themſelves at the bar. Now when the day was come, and that in his abſence his name began to be called, L. Scipio anſwered for him, and alledged ſickneſs to be the cauſe why he was away. But the Tribunes his accuſers, would not admit of that excuſe, replying and ſaying, "That upon the ſame pride of heart in which he avoided once before, his judiciall triall, and "left the Tribunes and the whole aſſembly, he now alſo would not appear to make his anſwer.
"Even ſo triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with thoſe whom he F "led after him as priſoners (after he had once taken from them their power and liberty to give "their cenſure and doom of him) he ſequeſtred himſelf that day, by way of an inſurrection from "the Tribunes of the Commons into the Capitol. Well are ye now ſerved therefore (ſay they) and "juſtly puniſhed for that daies folly and raſhneſs. For lo how he himſelf now abandoneth you, "who was your motive and leader then, to forſake us. See how every day more then other our "courage is fallen and heart abated: and dare not we now ſend folk to fetch him (a privat per-"ſon and no more) out out of his farm and houſe in the country, and make him to appear and "plead his anſwer; unto whom not paſt 17 yeers ago, at what time as he was General of an ar-"my on land, & Admirall of the Armado by ſea, we were ſo bold as to ſend Tribunes of the Com.
G & an Ædile, to arreſt and bring him away with them to Rome? In the end, the reſt of the Tribuns of the Com. being called earneſtly unto by L. Scipio for their lawfull favour, ſet down his order & concluſion, that if ſickneſs were alledged for his excuſe, and that there were nothing elſe but it that occaſioned his abſence, it ſhould be received for good & lawful, and their colleagues ſhould adjourn his trial to a farther day. It fortuned at that time that Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes between whom & P. Scipio there was ſome quarrel. He forbad expreſly that his own name ſhould be ſubſcribed to the inſtrument of the aforeſaid decree of his colleagues. And when every man looked to hear ſome heavier ſentence denounced againſt Scipio, he awarded in this maner. "For as much as L. Scipio excuseth the absence of his brother by sickness, it is good H " and sufficient in my opinion. And more then that, I will not for my part suffer P. Scipio to be ac" cused before he return again to Rome. Yea, and then also, if he call for my helping hand I will " give him assistance, and stop the course of processe against him. And as to the main point of " the cause, this is my resolution, that P. Scipio being advanced so highly as he is to that pitch of " honor, by his noble and famous exploits, and by the dignities received at the hands of the peo" ple of Rome, as it both gods and men had consented to set him aloft, for him to come down

" now and stand pleading below at the bar beneath the Rostra, and there to have his ears glow
" and ring again with the checks and taunts of certain green heads and busie youths, were a grea" ter shame and disgrace to the people of Rome, then to himself. Nay, he staied not thus with " this bare award, but sealed and set it on surely with words of indignation, testifying his offen- I " tention ent for this course and manner of proceeding. And shall Scipio (quoth he, my master Tri" bunes) that renouned conqueror of Africk, stand under your feet at your devotion? Defeated
" he and put to flight in Spain 4 most brave and noble Generals of the Carthaginians, with their 4 " entire armies? Took he Syphax prisoner, vanquished he Annibal, subdued he Carthage and " made it tributary unto us? Chased he Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus (for it must be " confessed, that in this glorious conquest L. Scipio had his brother copartner with him) and all
" for this, to be troden under foot of two Petilii? And that ye should seek to triumph over P. A-" fricanus? Will it never be better? Shall great personages (with all the good deserts of their own
" for all the dignities and honors by you upon them conferred) never reach and attain to a strong
" fort and sure place of defence, wherein they may make account to be safe and past all danger, K
" and wherin their old age may rest and repose, if not with worship and honour, yet at least-wise
" in security, exempt from abuse and violent outrage? The sentence it self of Gracchus (enforced " with such a speech especially) moved not others only, but also the very accusers themselves; who " made no other rejoinder again but thus, That they would consider better what they might by their place and what they ought of duty to do. When the assembly of the people was was broken up, the LL. of the Senat began to sit in councell; where, the whole order of the Senators (but principally the ancients and as many as had been Consuls) highly commended and thanked Tib. Gracchus, for that he had preferred the weal-publick, before privat grudges and particular quarrels. But the Petilii were well shent and baited with reproachfull checks and bitter rebukes, in that they would seem to rise by the fall of another, and so grace themselves with L the disgrace of Africanus, and seek to triumph over him and be enriched with his spoils. Well, after that, there was no more words of Scipio Africanus. The rest of his life he passed at Literum and never had mind to come to the City: there ended he his daies in a country village; and (as they say) he charged his executors upon his death-bed, to inter him in that very place. And there his tomb or monument was built, because he would not that so much as his funeral obsequies should be performed at Rome, (his native country) so unthankfull as it was. A rare man he was and worthy to be recommended to the memory of all posterity: howbeit the former part of his life was more singular and memorable, as well for the conduct of martiall exploits in war, as the governance of civill affairs in peace, then in his latter daies. For in his youth, he followed the wars continually; whereas in his old age, as his body decaied and faded, so whatsoever he did, M lost much of the wonted beauty and lustre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ that wit and spirit of his. What odds was there between his former Consulship and the second, although ye put his Censorship to it in the ballance? What comparison was there, and what semblable thing in that lieutenancy of his in Asia? of so little or no employment was it by reason of his own sicklinesse; and blemished withall, by the occasion of the misfortune of his son. And afterward, his return home again was no lesse unfortunat, for the hard choice whereunto he was driven, forced of necessity to abide the triall of a doubtfull issue in judgment, to quit withall his native City for ever. Howbeit he alone went away with the honor above all other, of finishing the punick war, as great and dangerous to the Romans as any that ever they made. N

When Africanus was once dead and his head laid, his adversaries and enemies were aloft: of whom, M. Porcius Cato was the chief and principall: a man who was wont to bark (as it were) and rail against him during his life in regard of his greatnes. And it is thought, that the Petilii were set on by him, and procured through his perswasion, both in the life of Africanus to have drawn out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this form and manner following: May
" it please you to grant and ordein, that true search and diligent enquiry be made, what sums of " money were taken in prize, carried away, and levied away of King Antiochus and those which " were under his obedience and dominion; and that of as much therof as came not into the pub" lick treasury and chamber of the City, Ser. Sulpitius (the Pretor of the City) may propose unto " the Senat, to know their advice and pleasure touching it: that whomsoever of all the Pretors O
" for the time now being, it shall please the Senat to appoint, he may sit in commission and inqui" sition thereof. This bill was first crossed by Q. and Lucius Mummius, who thought it meet and reason, that the Senat alone (as at all times heretofore) should make one enquiry of the monies so purloined and embezled: as is aforesaid, and not brought into the common chest of the City. The Petilii charged the Scipios for being over great and mighty, and as it were KK. in the Senat, to carry all before them. L. Furius Purpureo (a man that had been Consul, and one of the ten commissioners in Asia, was of opinion, that the forsaid enquest should be granted in more large & ample terms, namely,

A namely, as touching the mony not only taken from Antiochus, but also from other Kings and nations: covertly taxing herein Cn. Manlius his old enemy. L. Scipio on the other side stepped forth to dissuade this matter; albeit it was thought he would rather speak in defence of himself, then against the thing. He complained much and shewed his grievance, that such a bill as this should come forth now, and be set on foot after the death of his brother Africanus, the most valiant knight and noblest personage that ever was. As if it were not sufficient, that P. Africanus wanted the solemn Panegyrick oration at the Rostra after his death, but he must be accused also. Why? the very Carthaginians are contented with the exile of Annibal, and seek no more: but the people of Rome is not satisfied even with the death of Scipio, unlesse both his own good name after he is buried be wounded and mangled, and his brother also (to fill up the measure of mens malice and hatred) be killed and sacrificed upon his tomb. M. Cato spake in the behalf B of the bill, and perswaded that it might passe. His oration as touching the treasure of King Antiochus, it extant to be seen: and by the majesty of his authority, he diverted the two Mammii Tribunes of the Commons, clean away, from interposing themselves any more. When they once had renounced and given over their negative, all the tribes in general passed their voices affirmatively, Vti rogastis. After this, Ser. Sulpitius propoled unto the Senat, Whom they would appoint for this enquest according to the act Petilia? and the LL. of the Senat deputed Q. Terentius Culleo. This Pretor was so great a friend to the house of the Cornelii, that some authors, namely those, who report how P. Scipio both died and also was carried forth to be enterred at Rome (for that bruit also runneth currant) have written, How he went at his funeralls before C the bier and the mourners, with a cap of liberty on his head, like as he had done before in his triumph, and gave sweet wine or mede to all those that attended the convoy, as far as to the gate Capena. This honour he did Scipio at his death, for that among other prisoners in Africk, he was by his means recovered out of the enemies hand. But it should seem rather, that he was such an enemie to that family, that for the cankred rancour and malice which he carried against that name, he was by the adverse faction of the Scipios, chosen especially of purpose to sit upon & execute that inquisition. But certain it is, before this Pretor (all in his extremities, who either in love & friendship, or in hatred and enmity, kept no mean) information was given immediately against L. Scipio. Presentments were made likewise, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Hostilius and L. Hostilius both Catos: and of his treasurer besides, C. Furius Aculeo. And to the end that it D should appear to the world, that they were all attaint of this crime of purloining and robbing the publick treasure of the common-weal in one complot, there were two secretaries also and one of his sergeants called into question. But these three last mentioned, and L. Hostilius before-named, were found unguilty and acquit, before Scipio had his judiciall triall: howbeit Scipio and A. Hostilius his lieutenant, together with C. Furius were condemned. Scipio, for that he (as Valerius Antias writeth) to make a more easie peace to the contentment of Antiochus, received 6000 pound weight of gold, and 480 pound weight of silver more then he brought into the City chamber. A. Hostilius, for that he likewise deteined eighty pound weight of gold, and 483 pound of silver: and Furius the Questor for keeping back to his own use 130 pound of gold, and two hundred of silver. These sums I set down of gold and silver, as I find them gathered and registred by Valerius Antias in his Chronicle. As for the sum of gold and silver, which L. Scipio should embezle, I E would rather think that the clerk or secretary faulted with his pen in writing the copies, then the author lied so loud with his tongue in the first inditing of the Originall. For it is more likely of the twain, that the weight of the silver was more then of gold. As also for the fine wherein he was condemned, should amount but to forty thousand * Sesterces, then arise to two hundred and forty thousand. And I am rather induced thus to calculat, because it is said, that P. Scipio himself was required in the Senat to give his account but of such a sum; and when he had bidden his brother L. to fetch him that book of accounts, he took it of him, and there before the Senat, tare and rent it with his own hands, with indignation, that having brought into the Treasury two mili- F ons of Sesterces, he was called to his account for forty thousand. In which confident boldnesse of spirit and courage, when the Questors durst not (against the order of law) take forth mony out of the Treasury, he called for the keis, and said he would be so bold as to open the chests of the Treasury since he was the cause that they were locked. Many things besides are diversly reported of Scipio, especially as touching the latter end of his life, his trouble and accusation, his death, his funerals, and last of all, of his sepulchre and tomb, which distract me so, that I wot not what report to cleave unto, nor which records to beleeve. For they accord not as concerning his accuser. Some write it was M. Nævius, others againsay that they were the Petilians that called him to his answer. Neither agree they in the time when he was troubled, nor in the yeer, no, nor the place wherein he died, nor yet where he was enterred. Some affirm he ended his daies G and was buried at Rome, others at Liternum. And in both places there are monuments and Statues of his to be seen. For of Liternum there stood a tomb, and over the same tomb an image of his personage erected, which of late time we our selves saw overthrown in a tempest. At Rome likewise without the gate Capena, there be three statues upon the monument of the Scipios, whereof two are said to be of Pub. and L. Scipio, and the third of Q. Ennius the Poet. And this difference among authors is not touching his acts and affairs only, but also about the very Orations (if so be they were the orations indeed of P. Scipio & Tiberius Gracchus, which are commonly so taken and caried about, which disagree so much as they do. For the title of the oration that goeth for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Nævius, a Tribune of the Commons: but through the whole

* Sestertius, is the forth part of a Roman denarius, three halfepence farthing cue.

Oration it ſelf there is no mention at all of that accuſers. He termeth him one while Nebulo H [Knave] and another while Nugator [Couſiner.] In like ſort the oration of Gracchus maketh no mention at all either of the Petilii, the accuſers of Africanus, or of the day aſsigned unto him for his anſwer. And we muſt deviſe to tell the whole tale otherwiſe, it would have it to agree with the oration of Gracchus: and follow we muſt thoſe authors; who write, that when L. Scipio was accuſed and condemned for taking bribes of King Antiochus, his brother Africanus was Embaſſador in Tuſcany; and upon the news of his brothers misfortune, left his embaſſage and made haſt to Rome. Where he took his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that it was told him how his brother was going to priſon) and thruſt the ſergeant from his body, yea, and when the Tribunes themſelves would have reſtrained him, he uſed violence againſt them, and caried himſelf in this action ſo, as he ſhewed more kindneſs and love to his brother, then maners and civility otherwiſe. For thus complaineth Gracchus in his oration, that the Tribunes autho- I rity and power was infringed and broken by a privat perſon. And in the latter end, when he pro-miſed to aſsiſt L. Scipio, he knit up his ſpeech with theſe words, that it was a thing more tolerable that both the Tribunitian puiſſance and the Common-weal ſhould ſeem overcome and ſurmount-ed by Tribunes themſelves, then by a privat man. But he aggravated and enforced this one violence and exceſsive outrage againſt him, and made it odious in ſuch ſort, that in blaming him for ſo much overſhooting himſelf and degenerating as it were from his own nature, he rehearſed the commendable parts of his moderation and temperat carriage of himſelf aforetime, and that in ſo good terms and ample maner, that thereby he made him ſome part of amends for the ſharp reprehenſion he uſed for the preſent. For he ſaid, that in times paſt he had rebuked and reproved K the people, when they would have made him a perpetuall Conſul and Dictator; that he had for-bidden expreſly, that any of his Statues in triumphant habit, ſhould be ſet up and erected in the publick places of aſſemblies, as in the Comitium and Curia, in the Capitoll and chappell of Iupiter Opt. Max. Theſe commendable reports of him, if they were uttered in an oration penned of purpoſe for his praiſe, muſt needs teſtifie and ſhew a wonderful magnanimity of his, in the moderat uſe of high honours according to a civil port; which an enemy by way of reproach and upbraiding him, acknowledgeth and confeſſeth. But all writers accord, that Gracchus, took to wife the yonger of his two daughters (for the elder without all queſtion was affianced and given in marriage by his father to P. Cornelius Naſica. But it is not ſo certainly agreed upon, whether ſhe was both betrothed and wedded alſo unto him, afters her fathers death or no. As alſo, whether L it be true (as it is reported) that when L. Scipio was a leading to priſon, Gracchus, ſeeing none of his own fellow Tribunes to ſuccour and reſcue him, ſware a great oath and proteſted that he was an enemy ſtill to the Scipioes as much as ever he was, and would not do any thing to curry favour with them, or to come into their grace; yet could he never endure that he ſhould be caried to that priſon, into which he had ſeen his brother Africanus lead Kings, great generals and commanders of enemies, captive. Moreover, that the ſame day the Senat fortuned to be at ſupper together in the Capitol, and aroſe up all at once, and requeſted Africanus to affiance his daughter to Gracchus, before the ſupper and banket was ended. Which eſpouſals being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of that ſolemn feaſt, Scipio, when he was returned home to his houſe, ſaid unto his wife Æmylia, that he had fianced and beſtowed his daughter upon an hus- M band. She then falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and chafing that he had not made her acquainted with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her child as his, brake out into theſe words withall, that if he had given her in marriage to Tiberius Grac- chus, yet good reaſon it was that the mother ſhould have been at the making of the bargain.
Whereupon Scipio took great contentment and joy at this conformity of judgment in the choice, and inferred ſtreight waies, that he was the man to whom ſhe was eſpouſed. Thus much I thought good to relate of this worthy and noble perſon, albeit there is great variety of opinions, and diverſity of writings in that behalf.

After the Pretor Q. Terentius, had finiſhed the inquiſition and whole proceſſe thereof, Heſti- N lius and Furius, who were attaint and condemned, that very day put in ſufficient ſureties to be bound in recogniſance to the treaſurers of the City, for the paiment of their fines. But Scipio debating the matter ſtill, & pleading that all the mony which he had received was in the City chamber, & that he had purloined none of the publick treaſure, was laid hold on to be had away and committed to priſon. P. Scipio Naſica called unto the Tribunes for their help, and made a ſpeech full of true praiſes and commendations, not in generall only of the whole name and family of the Cor- nelii, but in particular alſo of his own houſe. And namely he alledged and ſaid, That himſelf and P. Africanus, together with L. Scipio (who now was going to priſon) had to their fathers Cn. Scipio
" and P. Scipio, moſt noble and famous perſonages; thoſe who for certain yeers in the land of " Spain, advanced the renoun and glory of the Roman name, maugre the heads of many captains O
" & armies, as well of Carthaginians as Spaniards; not only in martial feats of war, but alſo in this
" eſpecially, that they had given teſtimony and proof unto thoſe nations, of the temperat govern" ment, & faithful dealing of the Romans: and in the end both of them ſpent their bloud and loſt
" their lives in the quarrel of the people of Rome. And albeit it had been ſufficient for all their poſte" rity to maintein only & uphold the glory from them received, yet P. Africanus ſo far ſurpaſſed the " praiſe worthy acts of his father, that it was verily beleeved he was not born of human bloud,
" but deſcended from ſome divine and heavenly race of the gods. As for L. Scipio, who now is in " trouble, to ſay nothing of his worthy acts which he atchieved in Spain and in Africk, when he was

A "was lieutenant there to his brother Conſul) he was both reputed by the Senat ſufficient, with-
"out any caſting of lots, to undertake the province of Aſia and the war againſt King Antiochus,
"and alſo eſteemed by his brother Africanus ſo worthy a perſon, that himſelf who had been Con-
"ſul twice, Cenſor once, and had ridden in triumph, thought not ſcorn to accompany him unto "Aſia in quality of his lieutenant. In which province (to the end that the greatneſs & reſplendent
"glory of the lieutenant ſhould not dim the brightneſs of the Conſul, and ſo drown his vertues and "good parts) it ſo fell out, that the very ſame day, on which L. Scipio vanquiſhed Antiochus
"neer Magneſia, P. Scipio lay ſick at Elea, a City diſtant certain daies journies. He defeated I ſay
"an army there, nothing inferior to that of Annibal, with whom his brother had encountred be"fore in Africk. In which battell among other great commanders and captains under the King, B "Annibal was himſelf imploied in perſon, even he who had been the grand-General in the Pu-"nick war. Which ſervice was ſo well conducted and managed, that a man poſsibly could not "find fault ſo much as with fortune, or any accident that happned there. And now when the war
"is unblamable, there is picked matter of crimination in the peace: and it (they ſay) was bought "and ſold for money. In which challenge the ten deputies and aſſiſtance in councel, are alſo touch"ed and noted with corruption, by whoſe adviſe the ſaid peace was granted and concluded. Well,
"of thoſe ten, there were ſome that ſtepped forth and accuſed Cn. Manlius: yet ſo far off was "that accuſation of theirs from being credited that it did not ſo much as hinder and delay the ve"ry time of his triumph. But (beleeve me) in Scipio his caſe, the very conditions of peace ſavour
"ſtrongly of bribery and indirect dealing, for that they are advantageous, reſpective & favorable on C "part of Antiochus. For his kingdom is left entire and whole unto him; now that he is vanquiſh-
"ed, he poſſeſſeth as much as before the war began: and Scipio having received from him a mighty
"maſſe of gold and ſilver, hath brought nothing into the common treaſury, but averted all from "thence, and converted it to his proper uſe. Why? was there not caried in pomp at the triumph of
"L. Scipio (in the very ſight of all men) as much gold and ſilver, as in ten triumphs before (and put "them all together) could not be ſhewed. For what ſhould I ſpeak of the confines and frontiers of "his realm? Namely, that Antiochus before time held under his dominion all Aſia, and the marches "alſo of Europe adjoining? & great a part of the world that is, which extendeth from the hill Tau-
"rus, and lyeth out ſo far as the Ægean ſea; how many not Cities only, but ſpacious countries
"and populous nations it containeth, all men know right well: as alſo that this countrey, bearing D "out in lenghth more then 30 daies journey, and in bredth between two ſeas ten daies journey,
"even as far as to the top of the mountain Taurus, is taken from Antiochus, & he driven into the "utmoſt angle and corner of the globe of the earth? What could he have been diſſeized of more
"in caſe his peace had coſt him never a penny of mony? When Philip was conquered, he had
"Macedony left unto him: when Nabis was ſubdued, he enjoied ſtill Lacedæmon: and no man "ever went about to call Quinctius in queſtion for it. And why? mary he had not to his brother
"Scipio Africanus, for whoſe ſake the envy and malice of men hath defaced and hurt L. Scipio, "whereas his brothers glory ought to have graced and helped him. Would any man of ſence and "reaſon judg, that ſo much gold and ſilver was brought into the houſe of L. Scipio, as may not "not poſsibly be raiſed, if all the goods he hath were ſold to the worth? What ſhould become of E "all that gold of the Kings? Where be thoſe great purchaſes of lordſhips and inheritances that "he hath made therewith? Certainly it cannot be, but in that houſe that hath not exceeded in "ſuperfluous expenſe, there ſhould be ſeen ſome heap and mount of this new treaſure. But what
"care his enemies for this? That which cannot be made of the ſubſtance and goods of L. Scipio
"they will make good on his body and back; which they mean to torture (belike) and expoſe
"to contumely & villany, to the end that a man of the beſt mark and quality that ever was, ſhould
"be ſhut up in a dungeon among robbers by the high-way ſide, amongſt night theeves and cut"purſes, and there in the hard ſtocks and baleſull darkneſs render his laſt breath; and when he is F "dead, to have his body caſt out naked at the priſon dore. But be it whenſoever it ſhall, this will "be no greater Blot to the houſe Cornelia, then a ſhamefull reproach for ever to the City of Rome. Againſt all theſe remonſtrances, the Pretor Terentius oppoſed and read the law Petilia, the decree of the Senat, and the ſentence given of L. Scipio, and he for his own part ſaid, he could not do withall, but if the ſum wherein he was condemned, were not brought into the common Treaſurehouſe, he knew no other remedy, nor what elſe to do, but to command him (a condemned perſon) to be apprehended again, and had away to priſon. Then the Tribunes went apart to con-ſult and lay their heads together. And within a while after C. Flaminius pronounced aloud, according to his own advice and the opinion of all his Colleagues (excepting only Gracchus) that the Tribunes would not interpoſe themſelves, but that the Pretor might do and execute his office and his authority to the full. But Tib. Gracchus ſet down his own decree in this form, That as touch-G ing the ſum wherein L. Scipio was condemned, he would not be againſt it, nor impeach the Pre-tor, but that he might uſe his power according to his place, and take it out of his goods, as far as they would extend. But that L. Scipio who hath ſubdued the mightieſt and moſt puiſſant monarch in all the world, who hath drawn out and extended the bounds of the Roman empire, as far as the farthelt frontiers of the earth; who hath obliged and bound King Eumenes, the Rhodians & ſo many Cities and States beſides of Aſia, and made them beholding to the people of Rome for favours and benefits beſtowed upon them; finally, who hath himſelf laid up faſt in priſon many a General captain over the enemies, after he led them in triumph: that he I ſay, ſhould lie in priſon & irons among the enemies of the people of Rome he would never ſuffer: and therefore he commanded H him to be releaſed and ſet at large. This decree was heard with ſo great applauſe, and all men were ſo joious to ſee L. Scipio delivered, that hardly a man would have beleeved (unleſs he had ſeen it) that there had been ſuch a judgement paſſed in the ſame City. Then the Pretors ſent the Queſtors or Treaſurers, to enter and ſeize upon all the goods of L. Scipio, in the name and to the uſe of the City: whereof there was not to be found, ſo much as any one token or mention of the Kings money, no, nor ſo great a ſum could be raiſed, as the fine came to wherein he was condemned. The friends, kinſfolk, followers and wellwillers of L. Scipio, made ſuch a contribution of mony for him, that if he would have accepted of it, he had been a richer man by odds, then before this croſſe and calamitie fell upon him. But he took never a denier. His neereſt kinſmen in I bloud bought again and redeemed as much of his own goods, as ſerved for his neceſſary maintenance and no more. And the envy and hatred of men intended againſt the Scipios, turned upon the heads of the Pretor and his councell, together with the accuſers themſelves.

MArcus Æmylius the Conſul after he had ſubdued the Ligurians, made the ſtreet or high way from Piſaſance to Ariminum, untill it met with the way Flaminia. In this book are reconnted the beginnings of riotous and diſſolute life brought in by the Aſian army. All the Ligurians on this ſide Apennine are tamed and brought under. The Bacchanales (a Greekiſh feaſt and celebrated in the night ſeaſon, the very ſemenary and nurſe-garden of all wickedneſs, being grown to this enormity, that therein was contrived a conſpiracy and complot of a mighty multitude) were now viſited and ſearched into by the Conſul, and put down with the puniſhment of many perſons. L. Quintius Flaminius, the brother of T. Quintius, was deprived of his Senators dignity by the Cenſors, to wit, L. Valerius Flaccus, and Mar. Porcius Cato, a right excellent man, as well for feats of arms as peace. The cauſe L was this, for that whiles he was Conſul and governor in Gaul, at the requeſt of one Philippus Pœnus, a notorious wanton Ganymede whom he loved, he ſlew a certain Gaul with his own hand: or, as ſome have written, becauſe at the entreaty of an harlot, upon whom he was enamoured, he beheaded one of them that were condemned. The invective oration of L. Cato againſt him is extant. Scipio departed this life at Liternum, and (as fortune would have his funeral accompanied with the death at the ſame time of two moſt renowned and great perſonages) Annibal poiſoned himſelf. by occaſion that Pruſias King of Bithynia (unto whom he was fled for ſuccour after the defeat of King Antiochus) would have yeelded him into the hands of the Rom. who had ſent of purpoſe T. and Parma. Over and beſides, this book containeth the proſperous affairs againſt the Celtiberians: alſo the beginning and cauſe of the Macedonian war, whereof the original ſpring aroſe from Philip, much diſcontented, that his Kingdom was empaired by the Romans, in regard that he was forced by them to withdraw his gariſons out of Thrace and other parts.

The nine and thirteth Book of T. Livius.

DUring the time that theſe affairs paſſed at Rome (if this were the year wherein they hapned), both Conſuls made war againſt the Ligurians, a nation born as it were to maintain N the military diſcipline of the Romans, and to find them occupied in all times of reſpit and reſt from greater wars; neither was there any other province that gave a ſharper edge to the valour of the ſouldiers, For Aſia with the beauty of their Cities, the abundance of all commodities as well by ſea as land, the effeminat tenderneſſe of the enemies, and the roialty of the Kings riches, had made their armies more wealthy then valiant: and eſpecially under the government of Cneus Manlius, nuſled they were in much looſneſſe and neglegence. And thereupon it was, that finding the way in Thrace a little more rough and difficult then ordinary to travell in, and an enemy better practiſed and exerciſed to deal withall, they received a great foil and loſſe among them. Now in Liguria, they met with all things that might rouſe and awake ſleepy ſouldiers: the countrey rough and full of mountains, that much ado they had themſelves to O ſeiz the ſame, and as great a labour they found to diſſeize the enemies, that were before poſſeſ-ed of them: the waies, ſteep up-hill, narrow, and dangerous for ambuſhes: the enemy, light, ſwift, nimble, and ſuddainly ſetting upon them, giving no time of reſt, no place of re-poſe and ſecurity. Drven they were of neceſsity to aſſault ſtrong and fortifie Caſtles, with great difficulty and danger both: the countrey poor and needy, which cauſed the ſouldiers to ſpare and live hardly, and afforded them no opportunity of preys and prizes: and therefore no victuallers, ſcullions, ſouldiers boyes and lackies, followed the camp; neither the labouring beaſts for carriage, took up a length in their march: nothing there, but armour and men, repoſing all hope in their

A their arms, and nothing elſe. And never wanted they ſome matter of quarrell, and ſome occaſion or other to make w r: for by occaſion of their bareneſſe and penury, they made rodes into the lands of their neighbours, but ſo, as they never ventured all at once, nor put the main chance in hazard.

C. Flaminius the Conſul having fought ſundry times with the Friniat Ligurians, and in many battels gotten the better hand over them, even at home in their own country, brought the whole nation by compoſition under the obedience. and diſarmed them: but becauſe in the delivery of their armor, they dealt not ſoundly and faithfully, and ſhould have been chaſtiſed therefore, they abandoned their villages & fled to the mountain Anginus; whither the Conſul purſued them hard at heels: howbeit, being disbanded and ſcattered again, and moſt of them diſarmed, they fled B into the valley through places where no wayes led, and over broken and cragged ſteep rocks, whereas the enemies could not poſsibly follow after, and ſo paſſed the other ſide of Apennine. But as many as kept ſtill within their hold, were beſet round about and overthrown. Then were the legions led to the further ſide of Apenninus, where the enemies for a ſmall while, defended themſelves by the hight of the place, but anon they yeelded. Then was their armor ſought for with more care and deligence then before, and they were diſfurniſhed and ſtript out of all. After this, was the war diverted and before turned wholly upon the Apuan Liguri ns, who had ſo overrun the territories of Piſa and Bolonia, that they could not be manured and tilled. The Conſul having ſubdued them alſo, granted peace unto the borderers: and now that he had brought the province into quietneſs and reſt; to the end that his ſouldiers ſhould not be idle and do nothing, he C made a cauſey or ſtreet-way from Bononia to Aretium.

The other Conſul M. Æmylius, ſet on fire the villages, and waſted the lands of the Ligurians, as well in the campain fields as the valleys, when the inhabitants themſelves were retired into the two mountains Baliſta & Suiſmontium, which they held. Afterwards he aſſailed them alſo who had taken the hils aforeſaid: and firſt wearied them with light skirmiſhes; afterwards, he forced them to deſcend into the plain, and there in a ſet battell vanquiſhed them: in which conflict he vowed a temple to Diana. Thus having ſubdued, all on this ſide Apennine, he then ſet upon thoſe that dwelt beyond the mountain; among whom were the Friſin t Ligurians, (ſo far as to whom C. Flaminius went not:) all thoſe, Æmylius, ſubdued deſpoiled them of their armour, he forced the multitude of them to forſake the mountains and come down into the plains. After he had D quieted the Ligurians, he led his army into the country of the Gauls, and made an high way from Placentia to Arminum, ſo as it met with the cauſey Flaminia: and in the laſt battell, wherein he fought with banners diſplaied againſt the Ligurians, he vowed a temple to Queen Iuno. And theſe were the exploits for that yeer, in Liguria.

M. Furius the Pretor in Gaul, ſeeking in time of peace for ſome pretence and colour of war, had taken from the Cenomans their armour notwithſtanding they were innocent and did no harm. The Cenomans made complaint hereof at Rome to the Senat, and were put unto the Conſul Æmylius, unto whom the Senat had directed a commiſsion of oier and determiner. After great debate with the Pretor, they overthrew him in the action, and had their armour delivered unto them again: and ſo the Pretor was commanded to give over his government and depart out of E the province.

After this, the Embaſſadors of the Latin nation, who aſſembled and reſorted in great number out of all p rts of Latium, had audience given them in the Senat. Theſe complained, that the great multitude of their own naturall citizens, were removed and gone to inhabit in Rome, and there were enrolled: whereupon a commiſsion was granted to Q. Terentius Culleo the Pretor, to make ſearch for ſuch: and look how many of them thoſe Latine allies could prove to have been enrolled (either themſelves or their fathers) in any City or corporation of theirs, either at the time that C. Claudius and M. Livius were Cenſors, or after their Cenſorſhip, to force thoſe to return thither again, where they had been entred or matriculated. By vertue of this inquiſition, to the number of 12000 Latins returned home again into their own country: for now the City of F Rome was overcharged and peſtered with a multitude of ſtrangers and forreiners.

Before that the Conſuls repaired to Rome, M. Fulvius the Proconſul returned out of Ætolia: who, after he had diſcourſed of his exploits performed in Ætolia and Cephalenia, before the Senat aſſembled in the temple of Apollo, requeſted of the LL. to judg it meet and requiſit, and accordingly to grant and ordein, that praiſe and thankſgiving might be rendred unto the immortall gods, and himſelf allowed to triumph, for that he had ſo well and happily managed the affairs of the common-weal. Then ſtept forth M. Aburius a Tribune of the Commons, and declared openly, That in caſe they went about to paſſe any decree in that behalf, before the coming of M. Æmylius the Conſul, he would croſſe it: for that the Conſul himſelf was minded to contradict G that proceeding, and had given ſtreight charge unto him, at what time as he took his journey to the province, that the conſultation of this matter ſhould be reſerved wholly untill his return home. And Fulvius (quoth he) ſhall loſe ſo much time: and when the Conſul himſelf is preſent in place to aſſiſt, then might the Senat move what decree it pleaſed them. Then anſwered M. Fulvius and ſaid, "If men were ignorant either of the grudg and quarrell between me and M. Æmylius, or "with what outragious ſpirit and Kinglike choler and indignation he purſued the ſaid enmity "and variance, yet it were not a tolerable thing and to be endured, that the abſence of the Con"ſul ſhould both impeach the honour due unto the immortall gods, and alſo hinder and ſtay the triumph

"triumph which I have ſo juſtly deſerved: that a Generall (I ſay) who had ſo worthily atchie- H
"ved his ſervice, and an army ſo victorious, ſhould ſtay and give attendance without the City
"gates untill it pleaſed the Conſul to return home: who no doubt of very purpoſe and on let pur"poſe, upon this occaſion would make ſlow haſt and take his leiſure. But now conſidering that "the enmity and heart-burning that the Conſul beareth to me is ſo notorious as it is, What indif"ferency and reaſonable dealing may a man look for at his hands? who taking the advantage of "the time when a ſmall number of Senators were aſſembled, cauſed an act of the Senat to paſſe
"by ſtealth, and entred it in the treaſure houſe, conteining thus much in effect, that Ambracia
"ſhould not be reputed as a own forced by aſſault, notwithſtanding it were aſſailed with "mantilets and platforms: where we were driven to erect new fabricks, and plant other en- I
"gins and ordance of war after the former were conſumed with fire: where we maintained fight
"about the wals, as well under the ground as above, for the ſpace of 15 daies together: where
"after that the ſouldiers had ſcaled and gained the wals, the conflict endured notwithſtanding a "long time doubtfull, from morning to night; and where were ſlain above 3000 enemies. Now as "touching the ſacriledg commited (after the City was forced) in ſpoiling the churches of the im-"mortall gods what a ſlander think ye, hath he raiſed of me? what a matter hath he made thereof,
"and how he hath informed the Pontifies and Biſhops? unleſſe a man would ſay, that lawful it was "not for the City of Rome to be garniſhed & beautified with the ornaments of Syracuſa & other "Cities won by force; but the law of war extended it to this only City of Ambracia? I beſeech
"you therfore the LL. of the Senat, yea, and I requeſt the Tribuns, not to ſuffer me to be mocked "and abuſed by a moſt inſolent and proud adverſary. Then at all hands they dealt with the Tri- K bune, ſome intreated him, other rebuked and blamed him: but the ſpeech of Tib. Gracchus (one of his collegues) moved him moſt of all others: who ſhewed, that it was no good precedent and example, that men ſhould maintain and follow their own privat quarrels in time of magiſtracy and publick government, but a ſhamefull matter and a foul indignity it was, and much beſeeming the Tribuns of the Commons and their ſacred laws, that a Tribune ſhould be Proctor to other men and proſecute their actions and enmities. "Men ought (qd. he) according to their own diſcre-
"tion and judgment, either to love or hate the perſons, to like or diſlike the cauſe; not to depend "and hang upon the countenance and beck of others, not to be carried to and fro with the wils, "pleaſure, and appetites of other men. As for the Tribune of the Commons here, he accordeth and
"taketh part with a cholerick and teſty Conſul, and remembreth well what M. Æmylius left with L.
"him in privat charge; but forgetteth altogether that the Tribunſhip was commited unto him by "the people of Rome: committed I ſay, and put into his hands for to aſsiſt privat perſons, and to "maintein their liberties, and not to uphold the Kinglike rule and a roialty of a Conſul. Never
"ſeeth he thus much before him, that it will be written another day in the Annals and yeerly
"Chronicles, that of two Commoner Tribuns in the ſame fellowſhip and ſociety, one for the love "of the Common-weal renounced and gave over his own privat diſpleaſure and enmity to a par"ticular perſon, and the other took charge as it were by way of Commiſsion, to purſue the quar-
"rell of another man. The Tribune could endure no longer theſe rebukes and checks, and therewith departed out of the temple: then the Pretor Ser. Sulpitius propounded the bill the ſecond time; and ſo a triumph was granted to M. Fulvius. Who after he had rendred great thanks to the M LL. of the Senat, added moreover and ſaid, that the very day wherein he forced the City Ambra- cia, he had by vow promiſed, to the honor of Iupiter Opt. Max. for to exhibit the great and ſolemn Rom. games. And to that effect the Cities of Greece had contributed towards the charges, a hundred pound weight in gold: his petition was therefore, that the Senat would ordein that out of that maſs of money which he was to carry and ſhew in triumph, and meant to beſtow and lay up in the City Treaſury, the forſaid ſum of gold might be ſequeſtred and reſerved apart for the proper uſe abovenamed. The Senat commanded, that the Colledg of the Prelats and Prieſts in this caſe ſhould be conſulted with, and their advice demanded, whether they thought it neceſſary that ſo much gold ſhould be ſpent and conſumed in the charges of the ſaid games? The Prelats N made anſwer again, that it was not materiall to relegion and to the ſervice of the gods, to how great a great a reckning ſoever the charges of the games ſhould ariſe. Whereupon the Senat permitted Fulvius to defray what he would himſelf, ſo as it exceeded not the ſum of 80000 [Aſſes.] He had propoſed to triumph in the month of Ianuary, but hearing that Æmylius the Conſul (who was advertiſed by letters, that Aburius the Tribune of the Comons had renounced and let fall his oppoſition which he commenſed) was coming in proper perſon to Rome, only for to hinder the triumph, and ſtaid by the way ſick; he prevented the day, for fear he ſhould have had more anger and trouble in his triumph, then during his war. So upon the 22 day of December he triumphed over the Ætolians and Cephalenia. Before his chariot there were born 100 crowns of gold, weighing 12 pound apeece: of ſilver 83000 pound weight: of gold 243 pound weight: of Attick Tetra- O drachms 118000: of Philip peeces of gold coin 12422: images of braſſe 285: of marble 230.
Likewiſe of armor, as well defenſive as offenſive, and other ſpoil of the enemies, an huge deal, be-ſides Catapults, Baliſts, and other engins and peeces of battery. Moreover, there went before him 27 captains either Ætolians and Cephalens, or elſe under King Antiochus, left by him in thoſe parts. The ſame day before that he entred into the City, he beſtowed in the cirque Flaminius, many military gifts upon many colonels, captains, horſmen and centurions, as well Romans as allies.
Generally to all the footmen he gave out of the pillage 25 Denarii apeece: twice as much, to the centurions, and threefold to horſemen.

Now

A Now approached the time of the ſolemn aſſembly for the election of Conſuls, and becauſe M. Æmylius whoſe lot it was to be preſident thereof, could not be preſent at the day, C. Flaminius came of purpoſe to Rome. By whom were created Conſuls Sp. Poſthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Phillipus. After that were Pretors elected, to wit, T. Mœnius, P. Cornelius Sulla, C. Calpurnius Piſo, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aurelius Scaurus, and L. Quintius Criſpinus. In the end of the ſaid yeer, after the magiſtrates were thus created, Cn. Manlius Volſo, the third day before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gauls who inhabit Aſia. The cauſe why he triumphed ſo late, was this, for that he would avoid making his anſwe (according to the act of Petilius) whiles Q. Terentius Culleo was Pretor, fearing he ſhould burn in the flame of the ſame ſentence and judgment whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, or leſt the flame of another mans judgment, B I mean the ſentence wherby L. Scipio had been condemned, would have been too hot for him, and caught hold of him likewiſe: conſidering that the jury and enqueſt were more incenſed and provoked againſt him then Scipio; for that he ſucceeeding after him, had ſpoiled and marred with all kind of licentious looſneſs, the military diſcipline, which Scipio had obſerved moſt preciſely and ſeverely. Neither was he noted and touched in name for thoſe things only which by bare hearſay were reported to have been done in the province, far remote from the view of men, but alſo of thoſe particular inſtances to be ſeen daily in the demeanor of his ſouldiers. For verily the forein exceſſe and ſtrange ſuperfluities took beginning from the Aſian army, who brought all with them into the City. They were the firſt with in Rome that took up the uſe of braſen tables of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupboord-cloths, hangings and curteins of ſundry kinds of tyſſue.
C Likewiſe of one footed ſtanding tables, buffets and cupboords, which in thoſe daies were counted magnificent and ſtately moveables. Then came up the maner of having at bankets ſinging miniken wenches, and ſuch as could play upon the dulcimers or other inſtruments of muſick, with dancers, jeſters and other paſtimes, and delightſome pleaſures and fits of mirth at the table. Then began the boord to be furniſhed and ſet out with more exquiſit & deinty viands, and of greater expenſe. Then Cooks, who in old time were reputed the moſt contemptible ſlaves, as well for calling as eſtimation, as for the uſe they were put unto, came to be in great requeſt: and that which before time was a mechanicall kind of manual ſervice, grew now to be accompted a ſcience of deep skill and underſtanding. And yet all theſe things that then bare ſo great a ſhew, were ſcarce ſo much as ſmall ſeeds and ſlips, to the exceſsive ſuperfluities that were to enſue.

D Well, C. Manlius caried in triumph two hundred crowns of maſsie beaten gold, weighing twelve pound a peece: of ſilver 220000 pound weight: of gold 2103 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachms 127000; of Ciſtophors 250000; of Philip golden peeces 16320. Alſo much armor there was and ſpoils of Gauls carried in ſhew upon wagons: and 52 captains of enemies were led before his own chariot. Amongſt the ſouldiers he gave a donative of 42 denarii a peece, he doubled the ſame to every centurion. Alſo to every footman he gave double pay, and to every horſman triple. Many there were of all States and degrees, whom he rewarded with military preſents for eſpecial ſervice, and thoſe followed next after the chariot. The ſouldiers chanted ſuch ſongs and ſonnets, as a man might eaſily ſee they were compoſed to feed the humor of a General deſirous of glory, and one that made much of his ſouldiers eſpecially; whereby his triumph was more ho-E nored with the affectionat favour of them, then otherwiſe recommended and celebrated with the hearty love of the people. Howbeit the friends of Manlius ſerved him in good ſtead to win the good will of them alſo, through whoſe ſolliciting & earneſt endevour, there paſſed an act of the Senat, that out of that mony which had been ſhewed in triumph, there ſhould be repaied unto the people that ſubſidy which had been levied among them for ſouldiers pay, and not yet contented back again. So the Treaſurers of the City made true and faithfull paiment with all diligence of 25 aſſes and d. in every thouſand [for the loan.]

About the ſame time two Colonels came out of both provinces of Spain, with letters from C. Catinius and L. Manlius the governors there: by which letters intelligence was given, that the Celtiberians and Luſitans were in arms, waſting and ſpoiling the lands of the Rom. confederats.
F The Senat referred the entire conſultation of this matter to the new Magiſtrates. During the time of the Roman games that yeer which P. Cornelius Cethegus, and Aulus Poſthumius Albinus repreſented, a certein maſt or high pole which ſtood not faſt in the ſhew place called Circus maximus, fell down upon the image of Polleutia, and overthrew it to the ground. The LL. hereupon made ſome ſcruple in conſcience, and ordeined, that the ſolemnity of thoſe games ſhould continue one day longer, and cauſed two images to be ſet up for that one, and that the new ſhould be all gilt. Likewiſe the Plebeian plaies were renewed one day more, by the Ædiles, C. Sempronius Bleſus & M. Furius Luſcus. The yeer following averted the Conſuls Sp. Poſthumius Albinus, & M. Martius Philippus from the army, from the regard I ſay of wars and government of provinces abroad, G to the puniſhment of a certain inteſtine conſpiracy at home. The Pretors laſt coſts for their provinces. T. Manius had the juriſdiction of the citizens, and M. Licinius Lucullus between citizens & ſtrangers. Unto C. Aurelius Scaurus fell the governance of Sardinia, and to P. Cornelius Sulla of Sicily: L. Quintius Criſpinus was aſsigned to the hither Spain, and P Calpurnius Piſo to the farther. Both Conſuls were enjoined to make inquiſition into ſecret conſpiracies within the City.

There was a certain Grecian of baſe degree and condition, who came firſt in Hetruria; a man not endued with any of thoſe arts, whereof the nation (of all others moſt learned) hath brought many unto us, as wel for the erudition of our minds, as the triming of our bodies: but a ſacri-ficing

ficing prieſt he was, and a divining wiſard withall. Neither was it one that made out-ward profeſſion of reaching men, and thereby getting a living openly, and ſo by an open ſhew of religion poſſeſſed their heads and minds with fear and horror; but the knowledge he had forſooth for certein hidden and ſecret ſacrifices. Theſe myſteries of his at firſt he taught but unto a few, howbeit afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women: and to this religion were added pleaſures and delights of wine and good cheer, to the end that more cuſtomers might be allured and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when wine had drowned and dulled the underſtanding: when the night ſeaſon, when the entermingling of men and women together one with another (and namely, they of yong and tender yeers, with thoſe of elder age) had clean put out and extinguiſhed all reſpect and regard of ſhamefaſt honeſty: there began firſt to be practiſed all ſorts of corruption, for every one had all pleaſures ready at commandment, and his choice of thoſe whereto by nature he was more prone and given to luſt after. Neither was there wickedneſs committed here, of one ſort, namely, the abuſing of mankind and womenkind one with another without diſtinction: but out of this ſhop and workhouſe proceeded falſe witneſſes, forging of ſeals, depoſitions, and teſtimonies; and more then ſo, wrong and untrue informations. From hence came the diveliſh caſt of poiſoning, and privy murders of the neereſt of kindred in one houſe; and the ſame ſo ſecret, that otherwhiles the bodies would not be found to be commited to the earth. Many ſinfull parts were there played by way of fraud, guile, and cuning couſenage; but more by apert force. As for violence, it was kept cloſe and hidden, by reaſon that with the hideous noiſes, with the ſound of tymbrels, tabors and cymbals, there could no voice be heard of ſuch as cried out, when either they were forced to villany and abuſe, or beaten to death. The infection of this catching poiſon of Hetruria, ſpred as far as Rome, like a contagious malady. At the firſt the ſpacious capacity of the City, having been uſed to wink and bear with ſome enormities, concealed all: at length revealed it was to the Coſ. Poſthumius, much after this maner.

The Bacchanals detected.

P. Ebutius (whoſe father had ſerved in the wars in quality of a gentleman of Rome with a City horſe) left an orphan, after that his guardians were likewiſe deceaſed, became ward to his mother Duronia and his father in law (her ſecond husband) T. Sempronius Rutilus, under whom he had his bringing up. Now as his mother was wholly devoted and obſequious unto her husband, ſo his father in law had ſo handled the matter in his guardianſhip, that he could make no good accompt thereof, and therefore his deſire was, that either the infant his ward ſhould be made away, or elſe obliged and enthralled unto him. The only way to compaſſe and bring this about, was the corruption and abuſe of the Bacchanals. The mother therfore upon a time called her ſon unto her, and told him, that ſhe had made a vow for him when he was ſick, that ſo ſoon as ever he ſhould recover and be well again, ſhe would preſent him to the prieſts of Bacchus to be conſecrated and profeſſed in their myſteries: and now, quoth ſhe, ſeeing that by the goodneſs of the gods thou art amended, and I thereby obliged by the bond of that vow, I will acquit my ſelf therof, and perform it accordingly. She bare him in hand therefore, that he muſt for ten dayes live chaſt, and not touch a woman, and at the ten dayes end after he had taken his ſupper, and was wel waſhed and purified after the manner, ſhe would bring him into the holy place of thoſe ſacred myſteries. Now there was a famous ſtrumpet, by condition a bondwoman enfranchiſed, named Hiſpala Feſſenia, too good, I wis, for that occupation which ſhe uſed while ſhe was a yong wench and bondſervant: but yet ſtill after that ſhe was manumiſed and in frank ſtate of a free denizen, ſhe maintained her ſelf by the ſame trade and manner of living. Grown ſhe was into familiar acquaintance with the foreſaid yong Ebutius, by reaſon they were neer neighbours, and dwelt not far aſunder: yet ſo, as ſhe endamaged not the youth one jot either in charging his purſe, or touching his credit. For ſhe it was that firſt was inamored upon him, and him ſhe woed: and for as much as he had but ſhort allowance every way from his mother and father in law, and by them kept hardly, he was maintained well by the bounteous liberality of this loving harlot. Nay, more than that, in continuance of time ſhe was ſo deeply ingaged in him, that when her own patron was dead, and her ſelf at the diſpoſition of none, ſhe ſued unto the Tribunes and the Pretor for another tutor, becauſe ſhe meant to make her laſt will and teſtament, wherein ſhe declared Ebutius her only heir in remainder to all that ſhe had. There paſſing thus between them theſe gages and pledges of love, and they uſing to empart the one unto the other the ſecrets of their hearts, the yong youth by way of mery and pleaſant talk, willed her one day not to marvell or think any thing in it, if for certain nights he lay away and parted beds with her: for that upon a religious zeal and devotion that he had, he was minded for to be profeſſed and conſecrated by the Prieſts of Bacchus, and all to be aſſoiled from a vow made in regard of his health. The woman hearing him ſay ſo, and troubled in ſpirit, Mary god forfend, (quoth ſhe) and I would not that for all the good in the world. And better it were for me and you too to die both at once, then ſo to do: and with that ſhe threatened, ſhe curſed and banded, wiſhing all miſchief and plague to light upon them that had put ſuch a thing into his head. The youth wondred much to hear her words, and to ſee her ſo to fare and take on beyond all reaſon and order, beſeeching her of all loves to be content, and to forbear thoſe curſed ſpeeches, and ſaid it was his own mother, by the conſent of his father in law, who had enjoined him ſo to do. And is it that father in law of yours, quoth ſhe, (for peradventure I ſhould not do well to blame your mother) that haſteneth you by this action of yours to make ſhipwrack of your honeſty and chaſtity, of your credit and good name, your hope another day, and laſtly, to hazard your very life? Hereat the yong man marvelled much more then before

A fore, and desired earnestly to know the depth of all this matter. Then after she had prayed all gods and goddesses to pardon her, if for tender love and affection that she bare unto him, she could neither will nor chuse but reveal those secrets that indeed were to be concealed, she set tale on end and said "That she her self once entred into that chappel, when as she waited on her mistresse, "but since that she was made free and at her own liberty, she never set foot within the doore. "And upon my knowledge (qd. she) it is the very shop and workhouse of all wickedness that "can be devised. And now for certain these two yeers last past, there is not one professed and "admitted to those mysteries there, who is above 20 yeers of age. So soon as any one is inducted "and brought thither, she or he is delivered to the priests as a very sacrifice to be killed: for they "lead them to a place which resoundeth with yelling and crying, with singing of divers tunes, B "with jangling noise of cymbals, with thumping & beating of tabers, to the end that the voice of "any one that cryeth and complaineth of force and violence done to the abuse of his or her body "might not be heard. Now I beseech you therefore, and of all loves I pray you, that in any case "by one means or other you avoid this, howsoever ye do: and plunge not your self headlong thi-"ther, where first you shall be sure to endure and suffer, and afterwards to perpetrat and commit "all abhominable wickedness not to be named. And never would she let the youth go from her, untill he had made her faithfull promise to abstein and forbear such mysteries and ceremonies. When he was come home, and that his mother was in hand with him, telling him what he must do this day and that day, and so forth; he flatly denied and said plainly, he would do neither the one nor the other, and at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be, whatsoever came of C it. His father in law was present and at one end of this resolute speech of his. His mother straightwaies cried out and said, that he could not find in his heart to lie apart from Hispala one ten daies, and that he was so far bewitched and envenomed with the charms & poisoned allurements and baits of that false serpent and perilous Hydra, that he had no respective regard either of his mother, or mothers husband, no, nor any reverent fear of the immortall gods. The mother railed him of one side, the father baited and courst him on the other, till in the end they hunted him out of dores with 4 bondslaves besides. The yong man betook himself to Ebutia, an aunt that he had by his father side, and shewed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of her house by the head and shoulders: which done, by her advice and counsell the next day he opened and declared the same in great secret, without the hearing of any earthly creature, to the D Consul Posthumius. The Consul commanded him to repair again unto him three daies after, and so for that time dismissed him. Then the Consul in the mean while enquired of his wives mother Sulpitia, a brave and sober matron whether she knew an old wife called Ebutia dwelling in the Aventine? Yes that I do qd she, and I know her to be an honest dame, and a woman of the old world, and few her like now adayes. I must needs speak with her (qd. he) and therefore I would have you send a messenger unto her, for to will her to come hither. Ebutia at the first sending came unto Sulpitia; and the Consul within a while sorted (as it were by chance) into their company, & began to find some talk of her brothers son Ebutius: with that the woman eyes stood full of water, and with tears she began to bewail the case and mishap of the yong man; who being spoiled of all his goods and patrimony (by those who of all others should least have done it) was now at E home in her house, chased and driven out of doors by his own mother: for that the honest good youth (God blesse us all and be mercifull unto us) was unwilling to be consecrated and admitted to certain filthy and detestable sacrifices (if all be true that is reported thereof.) The Consul had enough now, and was fully perswaded of Ebutius, that he had told him no lie. Then he gave Ebutia leave to go her waies home, and requested his mother in law Sulpitia aforesaid, to send likewise for Hispala from thence out of the Aventine to come unto her; a woman (qd. he) affranchised and well enough known to all the neighbours of that street: for that I have somewhat also to say to her. Hispala was somewhat disquieted at this message, to think that she should be sent for to so noble and honourable a dame, and knew no cause wherefore. But after that she saw the Lictors before the entry of the doore, the troop and train also belonging to the Consul, and with-F all the Consul himself in person, she was astonied and (in manner) half dead. The Consul taking with him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward room of the house, and said unto her, that she need not to be affraid, if to be she could find in her heart to tell the truth: and for assurance thereof, she should have the faithfull word and promise either of Sulpitia (a lady of so good credit and reputation) or of himself if need were. Only he would have her to utter and declare what it was ordinarily done at the grove of Simila in the Bacchanals, where they used to sacrifice in the night season. The woman had no sooner heard that word, but she fell into such a fear, trembling and quaking all over her body, that for a good while she was not able to open her lips and speak a word: but after she was come to her self again out of this trance, and by them G heartned and encouraged, she said, that when she was a very yong wench and a bond-maid, she, together with her mistresse, was there professed and consecrated: but for certain yeers of late, and namely since that she was affranchised and made free, she was not acquainted with the place, nor wist not what work was there. I conthee thanks for this yet (quoth the Consul) that thou denyest not how thou wert there entred into that profession; but say on and tell out the rest as truly and faithfully. She answered again, that she knew no more then she had already disclosed. The Consul replyed upon her and said, that in case she were taken in a trip, & that mother came forth to her face & reproved her, she should neither find the same pardon, nor have the like favour at his hands as otherwise she might if of her self she confessed the thing, forasmuch as he who had all from H your own mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was then, and was perswaded verily (as it was indeed) that Ebutius was a blab of the tongue, and had revealed this secret: whereupon she fell down at the feet of Sulpitia; and first began in most humble manner to beseech her, that she would not suffer, that words of course passed between her an enfranchised woman and her paramour, should turn not only to earnest and importance, but also to a capitoll matter, to touch her as much as her life was worth: for what I said (quoth she) was but to fright him, and not for that I knew any such thing. Posthumius hereat was chafed, and fell into a fit of choler: What? (quoth he) thou thinkest belike that thou art jesting and cogging with thy lover Ebutius, and forgettest how thou art in the house of a right worshipfull lady, and in communication with a Consul. But Sulpitia on the other side, willed her to stand up, (affrighted I as she was) and withall, both exhorted her to be of good cheer, and also appeased the wrath of her son in law. In the end after she had taken a better heart unto her, she greatly blamed & found fault with the disloyalty and falshood of Ebutius for serving her so, and requiting her full badly again for so singular a good turn that she had done him, and then said, That she stood in great awe of the gods, whose secrets she should reveal and divulge; but in greater fear of men, who no doubt for bewraying these matters, would be ready to tear her in pieces with their very hands. And therefore she besought Sulpitia, and entreated the Consul to take some order for her, and to send her into some place out of Italy, where she might passe the rest of her daies in safety yet of her life. But of good cheer woman (quoth the Consul) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou shalt live at Rome, and that without all danger. Then declared Hispala the ori- K ginall and first commencements of these sacrifices and solemnities. At the beginning (qd. she) it was priviledged place & consecrated for women only & they alone medled with those mysteries; neither was it the custome and manner, that a man should enter in among them: and three set holidayes they had in the yeer, during which time, the priests of Bacchus performed their ceremonies in the day time, and folk were admitted by them, to their religion and profession; and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created priests for that purpose, in their time & turn one after another. But Paculla Minia (a Campane woman) when she was the priest, changed all, as being advertised and admonished by the gods so to doe: for she was the first that sacred and admitted men, to wit, her own sons Minius and Herennius the Cerrinians: she altered the solemnity from the day to the night; and for three daies in the whole yeer, she ordeined five in- L very month, to serve for the attendance and ministery of these mysteries. Since which time that these sacrifices & ceremonies were thus divulged, & men and women intermingled together, & the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, there is no act so wicked, no fact so filthy, but there it is committed: and more sinful & unnatural abuse there is, of mankind one with another, then there is of women. If any are either unwilling to suffer this foul filthinesse, or beslit themselves more dully in the beastly action and performance of that villany, such presently are to be killed and sacrificed as beasts. And this is supposed amongst them, the principall point and sum of their religion, to hold and beleeve that nothing is unlawfull whatsoever. The men shaking and wagging their bodies to and fro after a fanaticall fashion, as if they were distracted & out of their right wits, seem to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the she-priests of Bac- M chus, with their heads unbound and their hair hanging loose about their ears, run down with flaming torches to the river Tyber; where they dip their torches into the water, and take them out again light burning still, because they are made with sulphur vive and quick lime: and they say that certain men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth whither; such as they bind fast to a certain engine or frame, and harry them out of sight into certain hidden caves: and those be such, as either would not swear to be of their conspiracy, or be partners with them in al their mischievous designments, or endure against kind to be abused. The number & multitude there assembled, is exceeding great, and grown now be another body of a people: and among them are some noble persons, as well men as women. But now for these two yeers last past, or- N deined it is That none should be there professed and sacred above twenty yeers old; for such ages they lay for to serve their turn, as are soonest seduced and drawn to error, or most subject to be forced to suffer abuse and villany. When she had thus finished her information and discovered all, she fell down upon her knes again, and lay at their feet, and repeated her former supplication the second time, to wit, That he would send her away out of the countrey. Then the Consul intreated his mother in law to spare some void corner of her house, wherennto Hispala might retire her self, and there make her abode. So she allowed her an upper lodging in her house, and the and the staits that led towards the street were stopped up, and the entrance turned into the house. Then presently were all the moveable goods and houshold stuff of Fessenia removed, and her family sent for thither, and there entertained. Likewise Ebutius was commanded to go and lodge O with a tenant or client belonging to the Consul. Thus when both the informers were forthcoming and under Posthumius his hand, he declared the whole matter to the Senat. And after he had laid every thing abroad in order, namely, what was reported unto him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquiry, the Lords of the Senat were surprized with exceeding great fear, as well in regard generally of the commonweal, lest those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret complot of mischief and danger: as also for doubt in in particular, that some of their own friends or family should be accessary and culpable.

The

A The Senat yet were of this mind, that the Conſul was highly to be praiſed and thanked, for that he had found out and brought to light ſuch a matter as this, both with ſo ſingular care & diligence, and alſo without any tumult and uprore. Then they took order and ordained. Imprimis, That the Conſuls ſhould have an extraordinary commiſſion to make ſeach and inquiſition into theſe Bac-chanals and night-ſacrifices. Item, That Ebutius and Feſſenia the informers thereof ſhould not be prejudiced thereby, nor come to harm for it, yea, and that a recompence and reward ſhould be propounded to others that could give light and reveal the ſame. Item, That the Prieſts belonging to theſe religions, be they men or women, ſhould be ſought out not only at Rome but in all other markets towns, fairs and places of frequent reſort and convented before the Coſſ. to be and remain at their diſpoſition. Item, That proclamation be made at Rome, and edicts ſent through-B out all Italy, that no perſon whatſoever, who had been ſacred & profeſſed religious by the Prieſts of Bacchus, reſort any more into aſſembly or conventicle for thoſe ſacrifices, nor yet do ought pertaining to ſuch divine ſervice. And above all things, that information and preſentment be made of all thoſe that had frequented ſuch meetings or conventicles, to commit whoredome or any ſuch filthineſs and wickedneſs. And theſe were the ordinances of the Senat. The Coſſ. then granted their warrants out to the Ædiles Curule, to make diligent ſearch and enquiry for thoſe Prieſts of that religion, and upon apprehenſion to keep them in free ward and large priſon forthcoming for to be examined: alſo to the Ædiles of the Commons to look well, that no ſervice of the gods be celebrated in ſecret. Moreover the Triumvirs capital were ſtraightly charged to ſet good watch and ward throughout the City, and ſee to meetings by night, for fear that no ſcare-fire caught hold C of any place. To thoſe three Commiſſaries or Triumvirs were five other Quinquevirs adjoyned aſ-ſiſtants, who every one ſhould watch well and take charge of all the houſes of his quarter with in Tyberis. Then the Coſſ. having ſet them about theſe their ſeverall charges mounted up the Roſtra or place of publike audience. And when the people were aſſembled together, then the Conſul after he had pronounced the ſolemn prayer which Magiſtrats are wont to uſe as a preamble, before they make ſpeech unto the people, began his Oration unto them in this wiſe. "Never in any "of your aſſemblies O Quirites, was this ſolemn prayer unto the gods either ſo meet and conve"nient, or ſo requiſit and needfull as in this, to advertiſe and put you in mind, that thoſe be the "true gods indeed whom your anceſtors ordained, that you ſhould honour, ſerve, worſhip, and
"pray unto, and not theſe here who prick & provoke (as it were) with goads of furies, your ſpirits D "and minds tranſported and carried away with falſe and ſtrange religions to commit all wicked-
"neſs, miſchief & filthy luſt. Surely for mine own part I wot not either what I were beſt to con"ceal, or how far forth to ſpeak out and utter my mind. If you know not all, I doubt I ſhould give "you occaſion to be negligent; again, if I diſcover all, I fear me that I ſhall affright & terrifie you "too much. But what and how much ſoever I ſhall ſay, be ye ſure it will be far leſs than the great-
"neſs and enormity of the thing requireth. Yet endeavour will we ſo much to deliver, as may ſuf-
"fice to give you a warning and watch-word to take heed. This am I well aſſured of, that you un-
"derſtand not only by hearſay and bare report, but alſo by the ringing noiſes and yelling cries in "the night ſeaſon that the Bacchanals have been a long time kept over all Italy, yea, and in many "places throughout the City of Rome, which reſoundeth again therewith. But what manner of E "thing it is, I am verily perſwaded there is not one of you that knoweth. Some beleeve that it is a "certain worſhip and ſervice of the gods; others ſuppoſe it is ſome foolery and wanton paſtime
"tolerated and winked at. But be what it will be, they think there are but a few intereſſed & em"ployed therein. As touching the number and multitude of them, if I ſhould tell you that they "were many thouſands, you cannot chuſe but ſuddenly be afraid, unleſs I alſo preſently ſhew, who "they be and of what quality. Know ye therefore firſt and formoſt, that the moſt part of them are "women (& from thence is ſprung the ſource of all this miſchief.) Then are there men indeed, but
"ſuch as for all the world reſemble women, ſo effeminat they are: ſuch I ſay, as have abandoned
"themſelves as well to be abuſed as to abuſe others: fanatical perſons and bereaved of their wits
"by reaſon of exceſſive watching paſt ſence & even aſtonied with bibbing of wine without mea-F "ſure, with houting, hollowing & crying all night without intermiſſion. This conventicle of con-"ſpirators is yet of no great force, howbeit it gathereth much ſtrength, in regard that they multi"ply ſtill, & their number is every day more than other. Your anceſtors in times paſt would in no
"wiſe admit that ye ſhould aſſemble together at a venture and without important and juſt occa-
"ſion, unleſs it were either by rearing a ſtandard or banner upon the fortreſs for to levy an army;
"or to gather the people together to give their voiced in elections of Magiſtrats; or that the
"Tribunes proclaimed a general congregation of the common people; or ſome of the Magiſtrats
"ſummoned them to an open audience for to hear an Oration: and whereſoever a multitude were
"thus met together there they ordained and thought meet to have a lawfull governour and over"ſeer of them. But what kind of night conventicles think ye firſt theſe might be & namely, where G "men and women are met and thronged together pell mell one with another? In faith, if ye wiſt
"at what age they of the male ſex are profeſſed and made novices, ye would not only pity them,
"but alſo be aſhamed and diſmaied. Think ye my maſters Quirits, that young men thus profeſ-
"ſed & having taken this oath, are meet to make ſoudiers of? and that ye are to put weapons "into the hands of ſuch as are taken out of that ſtinking and deteſtable Chappel? Shall theſe, thus
"ſtained polluted, and overwhelmed with filthy uncleanneſs, as well of their own kind as o"thers, fight for the pure chaſtity, for the honeſty (I ſay) of your wives and children? Leſs harm

The Oration of the Conſul Poſthumius, for the overthrow of the Bacchanals.

" had it been, if they could have reſted ſo, and become only effeminat by their own unchaſte im- H
" purity (for that had redounded moſt to their proper ſhame and diſhonour) and not have abuſed
" their hands to practice miſchief, and buſied their brains to contrive fraud and deceit. But never " was there in Commonweal either ſo great and dangerous a malady, as touching more perſons,
" or reaching to farther matters of greater conſequence. For wot ye well this, that all the ſinfull
" parts committed for theſe late years, were it filthy luſt, crafty cozening, or any wickedneſs what" ſoever, proceeded & ſprung out of this one ungracious chappel and place of counterfeit holineſs,
" and no other. Yet have they not put in practice all their miſchiefs, which they have moſt curſed-
" ly complotted and ſworn to execute. Hitherto their impious & deteſtable conſpiracy hath bro" ken out, and paſſed no further than to particular and privat miſchiefs, becauſe they have not ga" thered force and ſtrength enough to invade and oppreſs the Common-weal. Howbeit, the evill I " encreaſeth, and the malady ſpreadeth further daily, and by this time is grown ſo much, as it will " not contain within the privat fortune and condition of particular perſons, but threatneth the " very main State of the Common-weal, And unleſs (Quirits) ye take order to prevent it, theſe
" night-Congregations may ſoon be as frequent and great as this preſent aſſembly, ſummoned by " order of Law and commandment of the Conſul in the open day time. Now are they (ſingled by " themſelves apart) afraid of you, when they ſee you thus all aſſembled together, but ſo ſoon as " you are retired either to your houſes within the City, or farms in the country, & by that means
" ſevered aſunder, they will ſurely meet together; deviſe they will and conſult both to ſave them-
" ſelves, and alſo to ruinat and deſtroy you at once. Then take heed to your ſelves; then ſhall you
" (ſingled one from another) be in dread and danger of them all in generall. It behoveth therefore K
" every one of you to deſire and wiſh that all they who belong any way unto your charge, be wiſe
" and well given. Then, if either fleſhly luſt or furious rage, have drawn & haled any one of them
" headlong into that gulph and ſink of ſin, to hold ſuch a perſon to be of their crue, with whom he " hath thus ſworn and devoted himſelf to all ſin and abominable wickedneſs, and not reckon him
" of your own retinue and train any more. Moreover, careleſs I am not of your own perſons in " this behalf, that none of you ſhould be ſeduced and led away with errour. For nothing is there " in the world, that deceiveth more under fair ſemblance, than falſe religion. For when the name
" and Majeſty of the gods is pretended to cover and colour naughtineſs, ſuddenly there entreth
" into our mind a ſcrupulous awe, which doth captivate and poſſeſs our conſcience, for fear leſt
" in chaſtiſing and puniſhing human treſpaſſes, we violat and offend ſome divine right and power L
" therewith. But of this ſcrupuloſity diſcharged ye are, by an infinit number of Pontifical decrees, " acts of the Senat, yea, and anſwers of divine Sages and Soothſayers. For how many a time and " often in the daies of our fathers and grandfathers, hath commiſſion been granted to the Magi-" ſtrats, To reſtrain and forbid expreſſely all forrain ſacrifices and ſtrange liturgies? To chaſe & ba-
" niſh all odd hedg-Prieſts, Wizards, Tellers of Fortune, and Magicians out of the common place,
" out of the ſhew place and theatre, yea, and quite out of the City? To ſearch out all their books
" of Magick and Propheſies, and to ſet a fire on them? Laſtly, to aboliſh all other order and man" ner of ſacrificing but according to the Canon, form, and order of Rome? For they judged (wiſe " men as they were, and deeply ſeen in all divine and humane laws) nothing ſo forcible to ruinat
" and overthrow religion, as when divine ſervice is celebrated after ſome ſtrange and forrain fa- M
" ſhion, and not according to the ancient cuſtome of the place. Thus much I thought good by way " of caveat to foretell you of, to the end that no ſuperſtitious opinion ſhould trouble your ſpirits
" when you ſhall ſee us to demoliſh and overthrow the Bacchanals, and ſcatter theſe unlawfull " aſſemblies. For all this will we do with the good leave, favour, and grace of the gods. Who be" ing highly offended to ſee their divinity and godhead thus polluted with wicked and abomina" ble filthineſs, have diſcovered the ſame lying hid in darkneſs, and brought it to light: neither in " their wiſdom and providence, was it their will and pleaſure, that ſuch enormities thus detected
" ſhould remain unpuniſhed, but be ſuppreſſed and extinguiſhed for ever. Now hath the Senat " directed out unto me and my Collegue an extraordinary commiſſion and warrant to make due
" inquiſition hereinto: by vertue whereof, we for our parts will accompliſh our charge according- N
" ly with all diligence and expedition. As for the night-watch throughout the City, we have gi" ven order already to the inferior Magiſtrats to look unto it. Likewiſe, meet and reaſon it is,
" that every one of you according to his place and calling, quit himſelf well in whatſoever ſhall
" be impoſed and laid upon him: and eſpecially to endeavour and prevent that no danger or mu" tiny ariſe by the malicionſneſs of thoſe that are culpable and offenders. Then the Conſuls commanded the acts of the Senat in this behalf to be read openly: they propounded and promiſed alſo rewards to all informers, that either convented and brought before them any ſuch perſons, or preſented their names, if they were abſent and out of the way. And look whoſoever were thus nominated and fled upon it, they would aſſign him a certain day to make his appearance: upon which day, if he anſwered not to his name when he were called, he ſhould be condemned not- O withſtanding his abſence. And if any of their names were preſented, who hapned at the time of the information to be without the land of Italy, he ſhould have a longer term ſet down, to come in and make his anſwer. After this, they publiſhed an Edict, forbidding (leſt any one ſhould be deſirous to ſell or buy ought tending to flight and departure) to receive, conceal, aid, or maintain by any means thoſe that were about to flie. After the aſſembly of the people diſmiſſed, great fear there was over all the City: neither was it contained within the walls, liberties, and territory only

A of Rome, but in all parts of Italy they began to quake and tremble for fear; and namely, after that letters came from their friends and acquaintance, touching the ordinance of the Senat the ſolemn aſſembly of the people, and the Edict of the Conſuls aforeſaid. The next night following that day (wherein this matter was thus declared openly in audience before the people) many would gladly have ſtarted aſide and been gone, but apprehended they were and brought back again by the Triumvirs, who had ſet a good watch at every gate. Many preſentments were made, and certain perſons thus preſented, as well men as women, killed themelves. It is reported that there were found in this conſpiracy of both ſexes one with another above eleven thouſand. The principal heads were known for certain to be M. and L. Cæcinius Romans both, and by calling * not ſo good as Senators: L. Opiternius of Falerii, and Minius Cerrinius a Campane. Theſe were the ringleaders of the reſt, B from them aroſe all miſchief and villany whatſoever: these were the chief Prieſts (for ſooth) and the founders of this religion. To apprehend theſe perſons with all ſpeed, no poſſible means were neglected. And when they were brought before the Conſuls, they confeſſed all: and for any let in them, they might preſently have been condemned. But ſuch a number there was of them who fled out of the City, that becauſe the actions and goods of many men hereby were in danger to be loſt and periſh, the Prætors T. Manius and M. Licinius were conſtrained by the Senat to give thirty daies reſpit and delay for the pleas, until ſuch time as the Conſuls went through with their inquiſition. By occaſion of the ſame infrequency (for that they whoſe names were preſented, neither made anſwer nor could be found) the Conſuls were enforced to ride their circuit about market towns and places of reſort, and there to hold Aſſiſe and Seſſions for to make inquiſition, and C judicially to proceed in ſentence againſt the offenders. As many as they found to be only entred, and to have taken orders, namely, ſuch as according to a certain form of words endited and prompted by the Prieſt, had made their prayers ſaying after him (in which was contained a deteſtable ſacrament and oath that they took to commit all wicked acts and beaſtly filthineſs, and yet notwithſtanding had offered and done no ſuch act either in their own perſons, or in others, to which they were obliged by oath) thoſe I ſay they let ſtill in priſon and durance. But ſuch as were defiled with filthineſs of uſt, polluted with bloudy murders, ſuch as were attaint and ſtained with bearing falſe witneſs, with forging and oiſting of wills and teſtaments, with counterfeiting of ſeals, and other ſuch cozening cats, thoſe they executed with loſs of life, and the number of them that thus were put to death ſurmounted thoſe other that ſuffered only impriſonment. But D a wondrous multitude there was of both ſorts the one and the other, and thoſe as well women as men. As many of the women as were condemned they committed over to their next kinſfolk, or to thoſe guardians under whoſe tuition and ſubjection they were, that they might themſelves privatly at home puniſh them accordingly. But if there were none to be found meet to do the execution, then they ſuffered publikely abroad in the face of the world. After this a commiſſion was granted to the Conſuls, for to overthrow and pull down firſt at Rome, and then throughout Italy, all the places of theſe Bacchanals, unleſs in any of them there ſtood ſome old altar or image conſecrated. And for the time to come, by an act of the Senat a prohibition went out, that there ſhould be no Bacchanals any more either in Rome or in Italy. Moreover, If any perſon made ſome conſcience of this religion, and held it for a devout, ſolemn, and neceſſary inſtitution, and proteE ſted before the Prætor of the City that he could not lay away the ſame without prick, remorſe, and clog of conſcience: then the ſaid Prætor was to put the cauſe in queſtion before the Senat, and if the Senat (aſſembled in no leſs frequency than one hundred) would allow and permit the ſame, then might the party ſolemnize that devotion and divine ſervice: provided alwaies that there were not above five perſons preſent thereat, to aſſiſt him nor any common ſilver to be uſed in the miniſtery, nor Offer-maſter nor Prieſt. Over and beſides, another act of the Senat there was joyned unto this, and the ſame moved by the Conſul Q. Martius, That as touching thoſe perſons whom the Conſul had for the informers and revealers of this matter, the full authority in diſpoſing of them, ſhould be wholly referred to the Senat, ſo ſoon as Sp. Poſthumius had finiſhed his inquiſition, and was returned to Rome. As for Cerrinius the Campane, they ordained F that he ſhould be ſent to Ardea there to lie in priſon, and that the Magiſtrates of Ardea ſhould have a charge given them beforehand to look to their priſoner more ſtraightly, that neither he brake priſon and made an eſcape, nor yet might have means and opportunity to make himſelf away. After a certain time Sp. Poſthumius came to Rome again, and when he put to queſtion before the Senat, concerning the reward of P. Ebutius, and Hiſpala Feſſenia, for that by their means the Bacchanals were diſcloſed, there paſſed an act and decree, That the Treaſurers of the City ſhould deliver unto them out of the City Chamber 100000 aſſes apiece. Alſo that the Conſuls ſhould deal with the Tribunes of the Commons for to prefer a bill unto the people, as ſoon as poſſibly they might that P. Ebutius for ever might be exempt from ſouldiery, and have his penſion and fee, as if he had accompliſhed his term of ſervice by law required, ſo as he neither were comG pelled to go to warfare againſt his will, nor the Cenſors ſhould aſſign unto him a publike horſe of ſervice. Moreover, that Feſſenia Hiſpala might have the liberty and power to make a deed of gift or alienation of her goods unto whom ſhe pleaſed, yea, and ſpend the ſame, and do therewith what ſhe thought good. Item, That ſhe might be wedded out of her own family into what houſe ſhe would her ſelf, and make choice of her tutor and patron to her own liking and contentment, as if her husband by his will and teſtament had ſo ordained and ſet down. Item, That ſhe might be wedded to one of frank condition or freeborn, and that he who had eſpouſed and married her, ſhould not thereby ſuſtain diſcredit, or receive damage. Finally, that not only the Conſ. and Prætors now in place, but alſo thoſe hereafter to come, ſhould provide and take order that no wrong be done to that woman, but ſecure her from all harm. This the Senat judged meet and requiſite to be done. All theſe things were likewiſe propounded unto the Com. and executed according to the ordinance of the Senat. Finally, as touching both the impunity and alſo the recompence of other the Informers, it was referred to the diſcretion of the Conſuls. H

By this time Q. Martius alſo having finiſhed the inquiſition in his circuit and quarter, made preparation to go into his Province of Liguria, after he had received for to ſupply and make up his legions 3000 foot, and 150 horſemen Romans, beſides 5000 footmen and 200 horſe of Latins. The ſame Province with the like number as well of horſe as foot, was decreed likewiſe unto his companion in government. Thoſe armies they took charge of which the former year C. Flaminius and M. Æmylius the Conſ. had: moreover, by an act of the Senat enjoyned they were to enroll two new legions beſides: and withall they levied of the Latine allies 20000 foot, and 3000 horſe; 3000 footmen alſo and 200 horſemen Romans. All theſe forces (ſetting aſide the legions) it was thought good to be led to furniſh out the army in Spain. And therfore the Conſ. whiles they were themſelves in perſon occupied about the foreſaid inquiſitions, gave commiſſion to T. Memmius for to take the muſters. And when thoſe enqueſts were performed and done as is beforeſaid Q. Martius took his journey firſt of the twain towards the Apuans in Liguria. But whiles in eager purſuit of them he engaged himſelf into the ſecret and blind paſſes, wherein at all times they had their lurking retreats and places of ſafe receit: within thoſe ſtreights and paſſages which the enemies had ſeized before, he was environed by them in a place of great diſadvantage: where he loſt 40 of ſouldiers, with three enſigns of the ſecond legion, and eleven banners of the Latine allies which were all taken by the enemies. Alſo, much armour and many weapons were thrown away here and there, by reaſon that they were encumbred therewith as they fled through the woody paths of the forreſt: neither did the Ligurians give over their chaſe, before that the Romans ended their flight. The Conſul ſo ſoon as he was eſcaped out of the enemies territory ſent his army away into divers parts of the peaceable country, to the end, that it might not be ſeen, how much his forces were empaired. yet could not he for all that ſuppreſs and smother the bruit that was blown abroad of his unfortumat journey, nor cancell the remembrance of the overthrow: for ever after, the forreſt out of which the Ligurians hunted him was called, The ſtreights of Martius. A litte before the news of the affairs in Liguria, the letters out of Spain were read, containing ſorrow mixed with joy: to wit, That C. Catinius (who two years before went as Prætor into that Province) fought a field with the Luſitan in the territory of Aſta, where, 6000 enemies fell upon the ſword; and the reſt were diſcomfited put to flight and driven out of their camp. Afterwards, he conducted his legions to the aſſault of the town Aſta, which he forced and won with no greater ado than before he gained their camp. But as he approached near the walls and took no good heed to himſelf, he was wounded, and of his hurt within few daies died. Upon the reading of theſe letters (importing the death of the Pro-Prætor:) the Senat was of advice to diſpatch a meſſenger (to overtake the Prætor C. Calphurnius) as far as the port of Luna, and give him to underſtand from the Senat that their advice was he ſhould make all the haſte he could in his journey, to the end, that the Province might not be without a governor there to command. The courrier which was ſent, within four daies arrived at Luna: and but few daies before, Calphurnius was departed and had put himſelf in his journey. I K L M

Moreover, L. Manlius Acidinus (who was gone into his Province at the ſame time that C. Catinius went) ſtruck a battell likewiſe with the Celtiberians in the hither Province of Spain. But they departed on both ſides out of the field with doubtfull victory ſave only that the Celtiberians the next night following diſlodged and removed from thence: whereby the Romans had liberty and time both to inter their dead, and to gather up the ſpoils of their enemies. And within few daies after, the ſame Celtiberians having raiſed a more puiſſant army, of themſelves gave the Romans battell near the City Calagurris. It is not ſet down in the hiſtory what ſhould be the cauſe why they were the weaker, conſidering their number was re-enforced: but foiled they were in fight and had the overthrow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000 and not ſo few as 2000 taken priſoners: and the Romans likewiſe were Maſters of the camp. And had not Manlius been empeached and reſtrained in this train of victory (which he hotly followed) by the coming of Calphurnius his ſucceſſor in government, the Celtiberians had been utterly ſubdued. The new Prætors withdrew both armies to their wintring harbors. N

At the ſame time that theſe news came out of Spain, the plaies called Taurilia were exhibited two daies together, in honour of the gods. And after them, M. Fulvius ſet out (with great furniture in ſumptuous maner for the ſpace of ten days) his plaies which he had vowed in the Ætolian war. And for to do him honour, and grace this ſolemnity, many cunning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the firſt time that there was repreſented at Rome the ſhew of champions and wreſtlers for the beſt game: then alſo was exhibited the paſtime of hunting and baiting Lions and Panthers: and in one word, theſe ſports were celebrated with as great magnificence and variety almoſt as the modern paſtimes and games in theſe daies. After all this was holden a Novendiall feaſt: during which, there was much ſacrificing, and all by occaſion that for three daies it rained ſtones in the Picene country: and becauſe it was reported, that the lightning in divers places, and in ſundry ſorts, had blaſted and lightly ſinged the garments eſpecially of many folk. O

A To the ſaid feaſt, there was adjoyned a ſupplication of one day, ordained by a decree of the Pontifices, for that the Chappel of the goddeſs Ops (ſtanding in the Capitol) was ſmitten with a thunderbolt. In regard of theſe prodigies, the Conſ. procured expiation by ſacrificing greater beaſts, and ſo they purged and hallowed the City. At the ſame time word was brought out of Vmbria, that there was an Hermaphrodite or Scrat found almoſt twelve years old. This was held for a deteſtable monſter; and therefore order was given, that it ſhould be kept out of the territory of Rome, and killed out of hand.

The ſame year, certain Gauls from beyond the Alps paſſed into the territory of Venice, without forraging, ſpoiling, and uſing any hoſtility; and not far from the place where as now Aquileia ſtandeth, they ſeized upon a plot of ground to build a City in. Certain Roman Embaſſadors were B ſent about this matter beyond the Alps; where they received this intelligence and anſwer from the inhabitants of the country, That neither thoſe Gauls took that voyage and expedition by authority and warrant from the whole nation neither knew they what they did in Italy.

L. Scipio likewiſe about the ſame time, ſet out his plaies for ten daies together: for which he ſaid, that he had made a vow during the time of the war againſt Antiochus: & he defraid the charges thereof with the money contributed unto him by divers KK. and States for that purpoſe. Valerius Antias writeth, that after he was condemned, and his goods confiſcat and ſold, he was ſent in Embaſſage into Aſia, for to take up certain controverſies and differences between the two KK. Antiochus and Eumenes: and then it was (ſaith he) that the ſaid contribution was made, and many skilful artificers and plaiers gathered unto him out of all Aſia: and in the end, after this Em-
C baſſage, he moved the Senat for theſe games, becauſe he had made no mention nor words at all of them after the ſaid war: by occaſion whereof (by Valerius his ſaying) he vowed them.

The year being now at an end, Q. Martius in his abſence was to leave his Magiſtracy: & Q. Poſthumius having ſate upon the inquiſition aforeſaid, and with all fidelity and carefull diligence that might be, brought it to an end, held the ſolemn aſſembly for election of Magiſtrats: wherein were choſen Conſ. Ap. Claudius Pulcher & M. Sempronius Tuditanus. And the morrow after were elected for Prætors, P. Cornelius Cethegus, A. Poſthumius Albinus, C. Fraxus Stellio, C. Actilius Serranus, L. Poſthumius Tempſanus, & M. Claudius Marcellus. At the years end upon the relation of Sp. Poſthumius the Conſ. that in his viſitation about the enqueſts aforeſaid as he rode along the ſea coaſts of Italy on both ſides, he found certain Colonies diſpeopled and deſolate, to wit, Sipontum upon D the Adriatick ſea, and Buxentum upon the Tuſcan. T. Manius the City Prætor (by vertue of an act of the Senat in that behalf) created three Commiſſaries, called Triumvirs, for to enroll and plant new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tucius, and Cn. Babius Tamphilus.

The war againſt King Perſeus and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding, aroſe not upon that cauſe & occaſion which moſt men imagine, nor yet from Perſeus himſelf: for the firſt groundwork thereof was laid by Philip, who if he had lived longer, would have been ſeen in open action. One thing there was above the reſt which ſtung him, at what time as the Romans impoſed conditions upon him after he was vanquiſhed, to wit, That the Senat laid a bar for to be revenged of thoſe Macedonians who had revolted from him: which he deſpaired not but it had been poſ-
E ſible to have obtained at their hands, conſidering that Quintius in the capitulations of peace reſerved that point entire and excepted not againſt it. Now afterwards, when Antiochus was defeated in the battel of Thermopylæ, and that both Philip & the Conſ. entred upon the ſeverall exploits; Acilius went in hand to aſſault Heraclea, and Philip at the ſame time the City of Lamia. Heraclea was no ſooner forced, but Philip had commandment to levy his ſiege before Lamia, and the town was yielded to the Romans: and this he took to the heart. Howbeit the Conſ. appeaſed his choler for the time, in that making haſte in perſon to Naupactum (unto which town the Ætolians after their rout were retired) he ſuffered Philip to war upon Athamania and Aminander; to adjoyn alſo and lay unto his kingdom thoſe Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Theſſalians. Now had Philip chaſed Aminander out of Athamania, and won certain Cities without any great
F ado, Demetrias alſo (a ſtrong City of great importance, and very commodious for all things) together with the nation of the Magnetes he brought under his obedience. After this, he forced certain towns in Aſia, which were troubled with the ſeditious variance of their principal and great perſonages by reaſon that they knew not how to uſe their new liberty, wherewith they had not been acquainted: he won thoſe Cities (I ſay) by taking part with thoſe, who in this civill diſſention were the weaker, and otherwiſe would have gone to the walls. By theſe means the wrath of the King againſt the Romans was well allaied for the preſent: nevertheleſs, he ceaſed not all the time of peace to bethink how he might gather more ſtrength, and be able to war again, whenſoever any good occaſion ſhould be preſented unto him. He encreaſed therefore the revenues of the Crown, not only by raiſing taxes out of all the fruits of the earth and ſetting impoſt and cuſtoms upon all merchandiſe brought into his Realm by ſea from forrain parts; but alſo revived
G the rents & iſſues of the old mines which had diſcontinued, yea, & in many places ordained new. Moreover, to repleniſh his country, which by many calamities following war, was diſpeopled, he not only took order that his ſubjects ſhould multiply by forcing them to get, breed, and bring up children, but alſo tranſlated a great multitude of Thracians into Macedony; and for a good time wherein he was in repoſe and reſt from the war, he bent his whole mind, and employed all his ſtudy how to make himſelf great, and augment the puiſſance of his kingdom. Then old matters and quarrels were renewed, which might whet his ſtomack, and kindle his anger againſt the Romans. For the complaints which the Theſſalians and the Perrhœbians made for that their H Cities were by him poſſeſſed, likewiſe thoſe grievances which the Embaſſadors of King Eumenes laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he ſeized and held by force, were heard by the Romans; ſo as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not. But that which moved the Senat moſt, was this, That they had inteliigence how he intended to be Lord of Ænus and Ma- ronea: as for the Theſſalians, they took leſs regard of them. Moreover, there came the Embaſſadors of Athamania, who complained not for the loſs of ſome part of their territory, nor that he encroached upon their frontiers, but that all Athamania full and whole, was reduced under the ſub-jection and jurisdiction of the King. The baniſhed perſons alſo of Maronea, who had been chaſed out of the City by the Kings garriſon (for that they ſtood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Maronea was in the hands of Philip, but the City of Ænus alſo. Like- I wiſe there came Embaſſadors from Philip, to purge him of all theſe matters laid to their charge, who averred, That their King and Maſter had done nothing but by commiſſion and warrant from the Roman General. They pleaded and alledged, that the caſe of the Theſſalian, Perrhœbian, and Magneſian Cities, yea, and the whole nation of Athamania together with Aminander, was all one with the Ætolians: namely, That after Antiochus the King was chaſed and expelled the Coaſt, himſelf being emploied and occupied in beſieging the City of Ætolia, ſent Philip for to recover the States abovenamed, which being vanquiſhed in war, were now ſubject unto him. Hereupon the Senat, becauſe they would not determine and ſet down any thing in the abſence of the King, ſent three Delegates or Commiſſioners, to decide theſe controverſies, to wit, Q. Cacilius Metellus, M.

Bœbius Tamphilus, and T. Sempronius. Upon whoſe arrival, there was publiſhed a generall Diet of K all thoſe States that were at difference with the King to be holden at Tempe in Theſſaly. When they were all ſet there in councill, the Roman Legats, as umpiers and judges, the Theſſalians, Perrhœbians, and Athamans as plaintiffs and accuſers, and Philip as defendant to hear and receive the challenges and accuſations againſt him; the chief Embaſſadors from the ſaid Cities, pleaded againſt Philip bitterly or mildly, more or leſs, according to the ſeveral diſpoſition of their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bare to him.
Now all the queſtion and debate touching Philippopolis, Tricca, Phaloria, Eurymenæ, and other towns about them was this: Whether thoſe pieces, conſidering the Ætolians won and held them by force (& well known it was, that Philip had taken them from the Ætolians) belonged in right to the Theſſalians or appertained of old time to the Ætolians? for Acilius had granted them un- L to the K. upon theſe conditions, namely, if they were any of the appurtenances of the Ætolians, and if they combined and took part with the Ætolians willingly of their own accord, and not by conſtraint and force of arms. Upon like terms ſtood the controverſie of the Perrhæbian and Mag-neſian towns. For the Ætolians had brought a confuſion in all their tenures, by reaſon that they held and poſſeſſed thoſe Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occaſions. Beſides theſe ſub-ſtantiall points properly to be decided, the Theſſalians came in with their complaints alſo: "For "that thoſe towns (in caſe they were out of hand delivered unto them, yet) he ſhould render "them ſpoiled, naked, and deſolat. For over and beſides thoſe who miſcarried by caſualty of war, "Philip had carried away into Macedony 500, even the principall flower of their youth, and abu-
"ſed them like ſlaves, in putting them to baſe miniſteries & ſervil drudgeries, and look whatſoe- M
"ver by compulſion he redelivered to the Theſſalians, he had taken order afore that they ſhould "be good for nothing. As for example (ſay they) Thebes in Phthia, the only maritime City for "much traffick and merchandiſe, was in times paſt gainful and commodious to the Theſſalians,
"and brought them great revenues and profits. But Philip had turned the ſtaple and all the trade
"and negotiation by ſea from thence to Demetrias, and having got hulks and hoys, cauſed them "to baulk and paſs by Thebes, and direct their courſe for Demetrias. Nay, he could not ſo much as "hold his hands from evill entreating their Embaſſadors, who by law of nations are inviolable.
"For he forelaied them in ambuſh, as they were in their journey to T. Quintius. By which means "the Theſſalians all in generall were ſo over-awed by him, and put in ſuch fear, that there is not "a man amongſt them dare open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and N "Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are far "off, but an imperious Lord they have that ſitteth ever on their skirts, and pricketh them conti"nually in the ſides, and will not ſuffer them to uſe and enjoy the benefits granted them by the "people of Rome. For take away from them the liberty of ſpeech once, what freedom have they "left? And even at this preſent for all the aſſurance and confidence they have in the priviledge of "Embaſſadors, they rather ſigh and groan out their words, than ſpeak frankly, and parley with li"berty. And unleſs the Romans provide better in ſome good ſort, that both the Greeks remain"ing in Macedony, may be void of fear, and Philip alſo curbed and kept ſhort for being ſo bold, it "will be to no purpoſe at all, that either he was vanquiſhed, or they enfranchiſed. He is therefore "to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headſtrong and unruly horſe, O
"that will not be ruled with a gentle ſnaffle. In this ſharp and eager manner dealt the laſt, where-
"as the former had uſed fair language to appeaſe and mollifie his anger, beſeeching his grace to "pardon them in caſe they ſpake their minds for their liberty, to lay down the rigor of a Lord and "Maſter, to bear himſelf like a kind ally and loving friend, & to take example of the Romans, and
"them to imitate, who choſe rather to gain aſſociats by love, than conſtrain them by fear. After "audience given to the Theſſalians, the Perrhæbians came in place, and alledged that Gonnocondy-

"lus

A "Ius (a City which Philip named Olympias) belonged in right to Perrhæbia: & earneſt they were,
"that it might be reſtored unto them. They demanded alſo to have Malla and Ericinum again.
"Then the Athamans put in, and ſpake for their liberty, and to have the forts of Athenæum and "Poetneum rendred unto them. Philip becauſe he would ſeem more like a plaintiff than a defen"dant & to accuſe rather than to be accuſed, began himſelf alſo with complaints. He found him-
"ſelf grieved, that the Theſſalians had won by force of arms the City Menelaus in Dolopia, part of "the appurtenances belonging to his kingdom. Item, That the ſame Theſſalians and the Perrhæ-
"bians together had forced Petra in Pieria. As for Xyniæ (an Ætolian town without all queſtion)
"they had indeed laid it unto his ſeignory, but Parachelous, which ſhould be under Athamania, "by no right in the world was annexed to the Theſſalians & compriſed within their charter. For B "as touching the matters (quoth he) charged upon me ſo odiouſly, namely, of laying await for the "Embaſſadors of frequenting thoſe port-towns or abandoning thoſe: the one is a meer mockery
"and ridiculous thing: namely, for me to give account what havens, merchants and mariners ſail
"unto or arrive at; the other is clean adverſe & contrary to my nature & that which I never could "abide to practice. For theſe many years (qd. he) Embaſſadors have never ceaſed and given over,
"to inform grievous matters againſt me to the Roman Generals, and to the Senat at Rome: and
"which of them ever to this day hath had ſo much as a foul word given again unto him from me?
"Suppoſed & objected it is that once they were forlaied by the way as they were going to Quin-
"tius, but it is not ſaid withall what hapned unto them. This manner of dealing & accuſation ſa-"voureth of quarrellers that fain would have ſomewhat to ſay, be it never ſo falſe, when they can C "find no matter of truth to charge a man withal. Theſe Theſſalians beyond all meaſure abuſe the "kindneſs & indulgence of the people of Rome, & taring as men who had endured a long drought,
"they drink over-greedily, pouring in ſheer liberty & nothing elſe to it, and know not when to "make an end, and to break their draught: Like, for all the world to bondſlaves ſuddenly ſet at
"freedom beyond their hope and expectation whoſe manner is to break out into broad terms
"and licentious language, and cannot contain but revile and rail at their very Maſters. And at laſt,
"in a furious fit of choler he burſt forth into theſe words, That the ſun was not ſet and gone to "bed for ever, but would one day riſe again. This minatory ſpeech of his not only the Theſſalians took to themſelves but the Romans alſo conſtrued as a glance at them. Upon theſe words aroſe ſome bruit and murmuring in the aſſembly, but being in the end appeaſed & ſtilled, he anſwered D the agents for the Perrhæbians and Athamans in this wiſe, "That the caſe and condition of thoſe
"Cities for which they ſtood, was one and the ſame namely, that the Coſ. Acilius and the Ro"mans paſſed them unto him by a deed of gift as having aforetime belonged to their enemies.
"Now if they who have given, will alſo take away the ſame, then (qd. he) I muſt needs quit my "hold, and loſe them: but in ſo doing they ſhall to gratifie their fickle, inconſtant and vain allies,
"men of no regard, and good for nothing, do mere and manifeſt wrong to a far better and more "faithfull friend. For nothing is there in the world more thankleſs and leſs while accepted than li"berty, eſpecially with them who know not how to uſe it, & by abuſe thereof will ſoon ſpill the "grace of ſuch a benefit. Then the Roman Delegats having heard the reaſons and allegations of both parties pronounced ſentence, That the Macedonian garriſons ſhould quit the Cities above-E ſaid, and the Realm of Macedony be confined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have been reciprocally offered from one to another, there was a form and courſe of law to be ſet down which ſhould contain a proceſs and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and compoſed.
Hereat the King was highly offended and diſpleaſed, but the Delegats went their waies toward Theſſalonica, to viſit likewiſe the Cities of Thrace, and to hear their cauſes; where the Embaſſadors of King Eumenes made a ſpeech to this effect.

"If the pleaſure of the Romans be, that the two Cities Ænus and Maronea ſhall be free, it is not "for us in modeſty to ſay any more, but advertiſe & admoniſh them to leave the ſame in reall and "not in verball liberty, and not ſuffer a gift by them granted to be impeached or intercepted by F "another. But if they have leſs care and conſideration of the Cities and States planted in Thrace,
"yet more meet and reaſon it is, that thoſe places which ſometimes were ſubject unto Antiochus,
"ſhould fall to Eumenes rather than to Philip; by way of recompence for war-ſervice, in regard
"as well of the merits of his father Attalus during the war againſt Philip, as of his own deſerts,
"who during the war with Antiochus, was perſonally preſent in all travels & dangers both by ſea
"and land. And to this effect, he hath beſides an award of the ten Delegats paſſed already before"hand, who in the grant and donation of Cherſonneſus & Lyſimachia, have no doubt given Ma-
"ronea & Ænus likewiſe to be as dependants of a greater gift, conſidering the near vicinity and "neighborhood of thoſe other Cities. For, as concerning Philip, what hath he deſerved at the "hands of the people of Rome? What right of ſeignory can he pretend, why he ſhould plant gar-G "riſons in theſe Cities ſo far remote & diſtant as they be from the frontires of Macedony? I wiſh
"ye would call for the Maronits, and hear what they can ſay, who are able to enform you more "fully and certainly in all reſpects of the whole ſtate of theſe Cities. Then were the Embaſſadors of the Maronits called in: who affirmed "That the King had a garriſon not in one place only of "their City (as he had in other Cities beſides) but in many quarters thereof at one time; ſo as "Maronea was peſtered full with Macedonians. And therefore (ſay they) the Kings favorits and "flatterers are they that rule all and bear the ſway: they and none but they, may be allowed to

"nance of the laws, either are driven their country and baniſhed, or ſit a cold & blow their nails, limits, to wit, That Q. Fabius Labeo, at what time as he was in thoſe parts, confined Philip within the bounds of the old Kings-ſtreet or high way, which directly leadeth to Paroreia in Thrace, and in no place declineth toward the ſea: but Philip afterwards had made a new cauſey, and drawn it with a compaſs about, within which he empaled and took in the Cities & territories alſo of the Maronits. To theſe challenges Philip began far otherwiſe, than he did of late againſt the Theſſali- I

The Oration of King Philip. ans and Perrhœbians, and in this wiſe he ſpake: "I have, quoth he, no matter to debate either "with the Maronits or Eumenes; but now at this preſent I am to conteſt even with you (my Ma"ſters of Rome) at whoſe hands I have ſeen thus long that I can obtain no reaſon and equity. I "thought it meet and right, that the Macedonian Cities, which had revolted from me during the "time of truce, ſhould be rendred again unto me: not for any great encreaſe of ſeignory that "thereby ſhould have accrued unto my kingdom (for ſmall towns they are god wot, and ſituat up"on the utmoſt frontiers) but becauſe their precedent and example might have imported much,
"to retain the reſt of the Macedonians in their duty and alleageance. In no wiſe it would be gran"ted. During the Ætolian war, I was enjoyned by the Conſul Acilius to beſiege and aſſault the "City Lamia: and after I had been toiled out and wearied with maintaining skirmiſhes, raiſing K
"fabricks, planting ordnance and engins againſt it, even when I was at the very point to ſcale
"the walls and force the City, the Conſul reclaimed and called me away, yea, and compelled me to "levy the ſiege, and withdraw my forces from thence. And for to make me ſome part of amends
"for this wrong done, permitted I was to win again and conquer certain ſmall piles and forts,

"have continued in his Realm, unleſs the Romans, I will not ſay, had vanquiſhed K. Antiochus, L
"but ſurely if they had not waged war againſt him. And therefore is he endebted unto you, and "you no waies beholden unto him. As for my kingdom, ſo far was it off, that any part or quarter

"to buy my ſociety with three thouſand talents, and fifty covered ſhips of war, together with "all thoſe Cities in Greece which I held in poſſeſſion aforetime; I refuſed all, and diſdained his

"Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Conſul, was employed in what part ſoe"ver of the war, which he charged and laid upon me. Alſo when L. Scipio the Conſul his ſuc-
"ceſſor, determined to lead his army by land to Helleſpont, I not only gave him leave to paſs
"peaceably through my Realm, but alſo cauſed the high waies to be paved and gravelled, bridges M

"I, not in Macedony alone, but alſo throughout all Thrace, where among other matters, this "was not of leaſt importance and conſequence, to reſtrain thoſe barbarous nations there, from

"in reaſon to give me ſomewhat to that I have, to augment and encreaſe my dominion by your
"largeſs and munificence or, to take from me (as you do) that which I have either in mine own "right, or by gift from you? The Macedonian Cities, which you confeſs to have been parcels of "my kingdom are not reſtored unto me. Eumenes on the other ſide, he comes to make ſpoil of "me, as if I were Antiochus, and (mark I pray you the device of it) he pretendeth a decree of the N
"ten delegats to colour his moſt ſhameleſs impudent & cautelous falſhood; even that by which "himſelf may be moſt refuted and convicted. For in very expreſs and plain terms it is thus writ"ten, That Cherſonneſus & Lyſimachia are given to Eumenes. Where I pray you, and in what cor"ner of the inſtrument and patent ſtand Ænus, Maronea, and the Cities of Thrace? Shall he ob"tain that at your hands, and by your means, as given and granted from thoſe ten Delegats, which
"he never durſt ſo much as once demand and reuiqre of them? Tell me (if the thing be worth ſo "much) in what place ye would range and reckon me? If your purpoſe be to perſecute me as an "enemy and mortall foe, ſpare not, but go on ſtill as ye have begun: but if you reſpect me as a "King, as your ally and friend, I beſeech you, repute me not worthy of ſo notorious and mani"feſt a wrong. This Oration of the King in ſome meaſure moved the Commiſſioners, and there- O fore by framing a mean and indifferent anſwer, they held the matter ſtill in ſuſpence undecided.
"If (ſay they) the Cities in queſtion were given to Eumenes, by vertue of a decree ſet down "by the ten Delegats, we will not change nor alter any thing therein. But in caſe Philip acqui"red them by Conqueſt and force of arms, he ſhould have held them as the guerdon of his "victory. If neither, we are of opinion, That the hearing and deciſion of this difference ſhall

those

A "thoſe Cities ſhall be withdrawn and depart. Theſe, I ſay, were the cauſes that principally eſtranged the affection of Philip from the Romans, and wrought diſcontentment in his heart; inſomuch, as evident it is, that the war was not enterpriſed by his ſon Perſeus upon any new quarrels and freſh occaſion, but upon theſe motives left unto him by his father to be purſued.

No ſuſpition was there at Rome of a Macedonian war. L. Manlius the Pro-Conſul was returned out of Spain: and when he demanded a triumph of the Senat aſſembled in the Temple of Bellona, the ſame in regard of his noble and worthy exploits might have been obtained, but for example ſake it was not granted. For an order it was in Rome, by ancient cuſtome of their forefathers, that no man might triumph, who brought not his army back with him unleſs he left unto his ſucceſſour the Province fully ſubdued and ſetled in peace. Howbeit, Manlius was allowed an indiffe-
B rent honour, namely, to enter into the City by way of Ovation. In which ſolemnity he had born before him in a pompous pageant two and fifty coronets of gold. Moreover, in gold a hundred thirty two pound weight, and in ſilver ſix thouſand three hundred. Alſo, he pronounced aloud in the Senat, that Q. Fabius the Queſtor was coming, and brought with him ten thouſand pound weight more of ſilver, and eighty of gold, which he meant likewiſe to bring into the Chamber of the City.

That year a great commotion and inſurrection there was of bondſlaves in Apulia. L. Poſthumius the Prætor had the government of Tarentum, and he ſat in inquiſition upon a damned crew of certain herdmen and graziers, who had conſpired together and uſed to rob by the high-way
C ſide, and in the common paſtures belonging to the City; which Commiſſion he followed with ſuch ſeverity and rigor, that he condemned 7000 of them. Many eſcaped and fled, but many were executed and ſuffered death. As for the Conſuls long were they kept in the City of Rome, about the levy of ſouldiers, but at length they went into their Provinces.

The ſame year, C. Calphurnius and L. Quintius the Prætors in Spain, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintring holds, and joyned their forces together in Bauria, advanced forward into Carpetain, (where the enemies were encamped) with a reſolution to manage and conduct the war with one joint mind and common counſill together. Not far D from the Cities Hippon and Toletum, there began a skirmiſh between the forragers of both parts, that were gone forth to make proviſion: ſeconded they were from the one camp and the other, by means whereof, the whole armies of both ſides by little and little, came forth into the field to ſtrike a full battel. In this tumultuary skirmiſh the enemies had the vantage, as well of the ground wherein they were embattelled, as of the manner of fight and ſervice. By reaſon whereof, both the Roman armies were diſcomfited and driven back into their camp; but the enemies preſſed not upon them, notwithſtanding they were put in great fright and much diſordered. The Roman Prætors doubting leſt their camp the morrow after ſhould be aſſailed, diſlodged in the night be-E tween, in great ſecret and ſilence, without any ſound of trumpet, and departed. In the morning by break of day, the Spaniards in ordinance of battell approached the trench and rampier: and being entred within the camp (which they found void and empty beyond their hope and expectation) they rifled and ranſacked all that the Romans left behind them, whiles they made haſte away in the night ſeaſon: from whence the enemies returned to their own camp, and there for certain daies abode in ſtanding leaguer and ſtirred not. In that battell and in the chaſe together, there were ſlain of Romans and allies 5000: and with the ſpoiles of their bodies, the enemies armed themſelves: from thence they marched to the river Tagus. The Roman Prætors in the mean ſeaſon employed all that time to levy and aſſemble new forces out of the Confederat Cities of Spain, and in comforting and encouraging the hearts of their own ſouldiers after their fright, upon this adverſe conflict and unlucky foil. Now when they had gathered (as they thought) a ſufficient F power, and took themſelves ſtrong enough, and that the ſouldiers alſo deſired to be doing with the enemy, for to raſe out and cancell the former ignomy and diſgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus aforeſaid: and about the third watch of the night advanced their ſtandards, and marching in a four ſquare battell by day light they were come to the bank of the river (now were the enemies lodged upon a little mount beyond the water:) and incontinently in two places (where the river ſhewed a foord) they waded through with their arms, Calphurnius on the right hand, and Quintius on the left. All this while the enemies continued quiet and mo-
G ved not: but in the mean time, while as they wondred at their ſudden coming, and deviſed how to trouble and diſorder the ſouldiers as they ſhould make haſte to paſs the river, the Romans had tranſported over themſelves, and their bag and baggage alſo; yea, and brought all together into one place. And becauſe they perceived by this time the enemy to ſtir and remove, and had no time to fortifie their camp, they put themſelves in battell array. In the midſt ſtood the fifth legion of Calphurnius, and the eighth of Quintius, which was the very flower and ſtrength of the whole army. Now they had a fair open plain all the way between them and the enemies camp, ſo as there was no cauſe to fear any ambuſh. The Spaniards ſo ſoon as they eſpied two armies of their enemies upon that ſide of the bank which was next to them all at once iſſued out of their camp, and ran to battell; to the end that they might ſurpriſe and empeach them before they could joyn and range themſelves together. The fight was ſharp and hot in the beginning: for the Spaniards of the one ſide were puffed up with the conceit and pride of their late victory: and the Romans of the other, were galled and incenſed for anger of a diſhonour received, which they were not uſed unto. The battell in the midſt (conſiſting of two moſt valiant and hardy legions) fought right couragiously: which the enemies, seeing that they could not o- H therwise forch to retreat and give ground, began to charge upon them with a battaillon in coin-fashion close together; and still they pressed hard upon them in the midst more & more in number, and euer thicker ranged. Calphurnius the Prætor seeing this battell distressed and in danger, sent with all speed L. Quintilius Varus, and L. Iuventius Talva, two Lieutenants, to either of the legions severally, to encourage and exhort them to stick to it like men, and to make remonstrance and relation. "That in them alone consisted all the hope of conquering and keeping Spain: if "they never so little yielded back & lost their ground, there was not one of the whole army that "should ever see Italy again no, nor so much as the farther bank of Tagus. As for himself, he took with him the Cavalry of two Legions, and when he had wheeled a little about and set a compass with them, he charged hotly upon the flank of the foresaid strong battaillon of the enemies, which I assailed and urged still the main battell. Quintius also with his Cavalry flanked the enemies on the other side; but the horsemen of Calphurnius fought more fiercely by odds than the other, and the Prætor himself in person was formost of them all; for he was the first that drew bloud of an enemy & so far engaged himself within them that hardly a man could know of which side he fought:

by his singular valour, the horsemen were mightily animated; and by the valour of the Cavalry on horseback, the Infantry also were enkindled to fight on foot. The principall Centurions were abashed and ashamed to see the Prætor in person among the pikes and swords of his enemies:
and therefore every man for his part did his best, put forward the port-ensigns, willing them to advance their banners, to the end that the souldiers might follow hard after. Then began they on all hands to set up a fresh and lusty shout; they took their bier and charged upon them as from K the vantage of an higher ground: by reason whereof they disarrayed them first, and like a forcible stream they bare them down before them, so as they could not stand upon their feet and sustain this violence of theirs, but fell one upon another. As many as fled toward the camp, the horsemen pursued, and so intermingled themselves among the rout of the enemies, that they entred pell-mell with them into their hold; where they that were left for the guard thereof, renewed the fight, so that the Roman horsemen were forced to light from their horses: and whiles they maintained the conflict, the first Legion came to second them, and consequently more and more succours as they possibly could ran to them: down went the Spaniards and were massacred in all parts of the camp; and not above 4000 of them all, fled away and saved themselves: of which number, about 3000 (who still kept their armour) seized upon a hill near adjoyning: the other L thousand being for the most part armed by the halfs, were scattered all over the fields. The enemies were at first above 35000, but after this battell see how few of them were left: and from them were won 123 ensigns. Of Romans and Allies, there died few above six hundred; of auxiliary souldiers from out of the Province, about 150. Five martiall Tribunes were lost, and certain Roman Gentlemen whose death especially, made it seem a bloudy victory. After which the army abode within the enemies camp, for that themselves had no time to fortifie their own.
The next morrow C. Calphurnius in an open audience, highly praised the horsemen, and rewarded them with rich harnes and trappings, declaring aloud, That by means of their good service principally the enemies were discomfited and their camp forced. As for Quintius the other Prætor, he bestowed upon his men of arms, small chains and buttons of gold. The Centurions M likewise of both armies received gifts at their hands, and namely, those who fought in the main battell.

The Consuls having finished the levy of souldiers, and accomplished all things requisite to be done in Rome, led the army into their Province of Liguria. Sempronius departed from Pisa, and made a journey against the Apuan Ligurians; where, by wasting their territories and burning their towns and fortresses, he made way into the forrest and opened the passages as far as to the river Macra and the port of Luna. The enemies took a certain mount (an ancient hold) where their ancestors sometimes had seated themselves: but from thence they were by force disseized, by reason that the Romans overcame the difficulties of the avenues thereto. Ap. Claudius likewise for his part, was equall in valour and good fortune to his Collegue, as having fought certain prospe- N rous battels with the Ligurian Inguames. He forced besides six towns of theirs, and took many thousands of prisoners within them. Of the chief authors of that rebellion, he caused three and forty to lose their heads.

Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for election of Magistrats at Rome: and albeit Sempronius his lot it was to hold the said assembly, yet Claudius returned first to Rome, because P. Claudius his brother made suit to be Consul. He had for his competitors, L. Æmylius Q. Fabius Labeo, and Servius Sulpitius Galba all four of the Nobility. Old suitors they were all, and because they had suffered the repulse aforetime, they renewed the suit for this dignity, as being so much the rather due, because it had been once denied them. And this was the cause that these four followed & pressed the harder for to obtain the same, because it was not lawful for any more O than one of the Patritii at once to be created Cos. There were also of the Commoners certain persons well beloved and of good reputation that stood in election for the place, to wit L. Porcius, Q. Terentius Culleo and Cn. Bæbius Tamphilus: they also had taken repulse beforetime, and were put off still in hope one day yet to obtain that honourable dignity. Claudius of them all was only the new Competitor. Now men thought verily without any doubt & question, yea, and destined in their conceits, Q. Fabius Labeo, and L. Porcius Licinius to be Consuls. But Claudius the Consul, together

A together with his brother beſtirred himſelf, and without his Uſhers attending upon him, travelled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place: notwithſtanding the adverſaries, yea, and the moſt of the Senators cried out upon him, and ſaid, That he ought to conſider and remember rather that he was the Conſ. of the people of Rome, than brother to P. Claudius; why then ſat he not ſtill in the Tribunal either as preſident and judge of the court aſſembled, or elſe as a beholder and ſpectator only, without ſaying any word himſelf? Howbeit, he could not poſſibly be reclaimed from this diſordinate affection of his which he ſhewed in labouring for his brother. This election was divers times alſo troubled with the great debates and contentions cauſed by the Tribuns of the Commons: whiles ſome of them ſpake againſt the Conſ. others again maintained his ſuit, and took part with him. But in the end, Fabius took the foil, and Appius went away with the game, for B his brother. So P. Claudius Pulcher was created Conſ. beyond his own hope, and more than others looked for. L. Porcius Licinius held his own, and obtained the ſecond place in his courſe; for that the Commoners went moderatly to work, & ſhewed not ſo much affection and forcible means as Claudius did. After this, was holden the election of Prætors. And choſen there were, C. Decimius Flavus, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Navius Matho, C. Sempronius Blæſus, and A. Terentius Varro. Thus much concerning the acts atchieved both at home in the City, and abroad in the war, that year wherein App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Conſuls.

In the beginning of the next year, in which P. Claudius and L. Portius bare the Conſulſhip, when as Q. Cæcilius, M. Babius and T. Sempronius (who had been ſent to hear and decide the C controverſies between the two Kings, Philip and Eumenes, and the States of Theſſaly) had made report of their embaſſages; they permitted likewiſe the Embaſſadors of the ſaid Princes and Cities, to enter into the Senat. Who related the ſelf-ſame things again, which had been alledged before in the preſence of the foreſaid Legats in Greece. After this, the LL. of the Senat addreſſed another new embaſſage into Macedony and Greece, whereof App. Claudius was the chief for to viſit and ſee, whether the Cities adjudged and aſſigned to the Rhodians, Theſſalians, and Perrhæbians were delivered unto them accordingly. They alſo had in charge to cauſe the garriſons to quit Ænus and Maronea, and to look that all the ſea-coaſt of Thracia, were freed from the ſubjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoyned moreover to go into Peloponneſus, from whence the former embaſſie was departed in more doubtfull terms than if they had never gone thither. For over and beſides other things they were ſent away without any anſwer for their diſpatch: and al- D beit they requeſted the Achæans for to aſſemble their generall Diet, they might not obtain it. For which, when as Q. Cæcilius found himſelf diſcontented and grievouſly complained, and the Lacedæmonians withall made pitious moan, that the walls of their City were demoliſhed and raſed, their common people lead away in captivity into Achæa, and there ſold, and the laws of Lycurgus taken from them, under which their City and Common-weal untill that day had been maintained and governed: the Achæans excuſed themſelves moſt of all for the imputation of refuſing to hold a Council; and to that purpoſe they rehearſed a Law and Ordinance, whereby they were forbidden expreſſely to call and publiſh a Diet, unleſs it were in the caſe of levying war and contracting of peace, upon occaſion that any embaſſadors came directly unto them from the Senat of Rome with letters, or commiſſion in writing. But for that this manner of excuſe ſhould not ſerve their E turn again afterwards, the Senat gave them plainly to underſtand, that they ought to take care and order that the Roman Embaſſadors might at all times have means of free acceſs to their Councils, like as they alſo reciprocally ſhould have a Senat held for their ſakes, as often as they would themſelves.

After theſe embaſſages were departed, Philip was advertiſed by his Embaſſadors, that there was no remedy but he muſt abandon thoſe Cities, and withdraw his garriſons: and herewith being mightily offended & angred againſt all, yet he diſcharged his choler only upon the Maronits. Unto Onomaſtus, warden of the ports and ſea-coaſts, he gave commandment to kill the chief of the adverſe part. And he by the means of Caſſander, one of the Kings ſuppoſts and favorits who a long time had dwelt in Maronea procured certain Thracians to be let into the town by night & there F he committed murder and maſſacre, as if it had been a City won by force of arms. And when the Roman embaſſadors made complaint to him, namely of ſuch outrages committed ſo cruelly againſt the guiltleſs Maronits, and ſo proudly and inſolently againſt the people of Rome; in that they ſhould be killed and cut in peeces as enemies, unto whom the Senat had ordained reſtitution of their freedom he made anſwer and ſaid, that neither himſelf, nor any of thoſe who belonged unto him, could do withall: but it was long of themſelves and their variance one with another; whiles ſome of the Citizens drew to him, and others enclined to King Eumenes. Which ye may (qd. he) ſoon know to be a truth, if ye will but ask the Maronits themſelves: for this account he made, that whiles they were all terrified with ſo late and freſh a maſſacre, there durſt not one of them open his mouth againſt him. Appius replied again, and ſaid, That they were not to make G an enquiry in this ſo evident and notorious a fact, as if it were in any reſpect doubtfull: but if he would diſcharge and clear himſelf as innocent of the action, he ſhould ſend to Rome Onomaſtus and Caſſander, who were named to have committed the outrage, that the Senat might examine them upon interrogatories. This word at the firſt ſo troubled and daſhed the King that his colour went and came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himſelf, he made anſwer, That (if they needs would) he cared not much to ſend Caſſander, for that he had dwelt & continued in Maronea; but as for Onomaſtus, who neither was at Maronea, nor ſo much as in any quarter near unto it, how poſſibly could he be charged or touched with the matter? Now as he ſpared Onomaſtus the rather of the twain, and was loath to have him come in queſtion, as being his more dear and honourable friend: ſo he feared him much more than the other, leſt he ſhould bewray and diſcloſe the thing; for that himſelf had conferred with him thereabout; and beſides, he had ſerved his turn divers times as a Miniſter to execute, and been privy unto him as a complice to plot ſuch like deſignments. Caſſander alſo, as it is verily thought, was poiſoned and made away, by certain that were ſent of purpoſe to accompany him through Epirus to the ſea ſide; and all becauſe the villany ſhould not be detected and come to light. Thus the Legats departed from the parley and conference with Philip, as ſhewing in their countenance, that they were nothing well pleaſed: and Philip on the other ſide went his waies as reſolute to levy war again: but foraſmuch as his forces as yet were not ſufficient to do any exploit, and becauſe he would delay the time between, he determined to ſend his younger ſon Demetrius to Rome, both to purge his father of thoſe matters wherewith he was charged, and alſo by humble requeſt to appeaſe the anger of the Senat; ſuppoſing, that this young gentleman, who had been left as an hoſtage at Rome, and there had ſhewed a good teſtimony of a Princely nature and royall diſpoſition, might much avail in the cauſe. In the mean while himſelf under colour of aiding the Bizantins, but in very truth to ſtrike ſome terrour into the Princes of Thrace, made an expedition againſt them: and when he had in one battell diſcomfited them, and taken priſoner their chief Captain Amadorus, he returned into Macedony, having ſent certain meſſengers to ſollicit the barbarous nations inhabiting near the river Iſter, for to enter and invade Italy. In Peloponneſus alſo the coming of the Roman Legats was expected, who by this commiſſion were enjoyned to paſs out of Macedony into Achæa: againſt whom becauſe the Achæans would not be to ſeek what to ſay, Lycortas their Prætor ſummoned a publike Councill aforehand. In which there was parly as touching the Lacedæmonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become informers and accuſers, and danger it was, leſt when they were vanquiſhed they would be more to be feared, than all the time that they waged war. For during the wars, the Achæans found the Romans to be their good aſſociats, but now the ſame Romans are more friendly to the Lacedæmonians, than to the Achæans, ſeeing that Areus and Alcibiades (baniſhed perſons both out of Lacedæmon, and by the means of the Achæans reſtored again to their place) had undertaken to go in embaſſage to Rome, againſt the Achæan nation, which had ſo well deſerved at their hands; and there gave ſo hard language againſt them, as if they had been chaſed and driven out of their country and not reſtored thereunto by them. Hereupon aroſe a great outcry from all parts of the aſſembly, for to put to queſtion, what ſhould be determined expreſſely of them by name; and in this fit, where all went by choler, and nothing by counſel, condemned they were to die. Some few daies after came the Roman Embaſſadors, for whoſe ſake a Councill was holden at Clitore, a City in Arcadia. But before any matter was treated on the Achæans were ſurpriſed with exceeding fear, conſidering and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carried with any indifferency for their behoof; foraſmuch as they ſaw Areus & Alcibiades (condemned by them in the laſt Councill) to be in the company of the ſaid Embaſſadors, and no man durſt open his lips and ſpeak a word. Appius declared, That the Senat was much diſpleaſed at thoſe matters whereof the Lacedæmonians had made complaint, namely, That firſt in a tumultuary fray and conflict, they were murdered, who had been called forth by Philopœmen, and came to plead and ſpeak in their own cauſe: Then, after they had exerciſed their cruelty thus againſt their perſons, to the end, that in no part their inhumanity ſhould be wanting, they had raſed the walls of a right noble and famous City, aboliſhed their moſt ancient laws, and put down the diſcipline and government of Lycurgus, ſo renowned throughout all nations. When Appius had made an end of his ſpeech then Lycortas, both in regard that he was Prætor, and alſo becauſe he took part with the faction of Philopœmen (who was the author of all that had been done at Lacedæmon) made anſwer in this wiſe: "More hard it is for us now, O Appius, to ſpeak before you, than of late it was "in the preſence of the Senat. For then we were to anſwer the Lacedæmonians, who accuſed us: "but at this preſent we have you to be our accuſers before whom, as competent judges we ſhould "plead in our own defence. Howbeit, we have ſubmitted our ſelves, and undergone this unequal "and hard condition, preſuming upon this hope, that you will lay aſide that accuſatory heat "which not long ſince you uſed, and put upon you the perſon of a Judg to hear with indifference "and equity. For mine own part, conſidering that you erewhile have but related thoſe matters "which the Lacedæmonians both here in place before Q. Cæcilius of late, and alſo at Rome afterwards complained of, I would think that I am to anſwer therefore not unto you, but unto them "in your hearing. You charge us with the murdering of them who being called out by the Prætor "Philopœmen to plead their cauſe were killed. This crime I hold that it ought not to be objected "againſt us by you Romans, no, nor ſo much by any other in your audience. And why ſo? becauſe "it was expreſſely ſpecified in your own treaty and accord of covenants, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould have nothing to do with the maritime Cities. At what time as the Lacedæmonians "took arms, and ſeiſed by force in the night thoſe Cities, which they were preciſely forbidden "to meddle withall; T. Quintius, if the Roman army had been in * Peleponneſus, as aforetime no "doubt we muſt needs think, that being thus ſurpriſed and evill entreated, they would have had "recourſe thither for ſuccour. But ſince ye were ſo far off, whither elſe ſhould they flie and retire themſelves, but to us your allies, whom they had ſeen before to help and ſuccour Gytheum? "whom

A "whom upon the like cauſe they knew to have aſſailed Lacedæmon together with you? It was in "your quarrel therefore that we enterpriſed a juſt and lawful war. Which being an act of ours, by "others commended, and which ought not by the very Lacedæmonians to be condemned, and "conſidering that even the Gods themſelves have approved thereof in that they gave us victory,
"how cometh it then to paſs, that you bring thoſe matters into queſtion which are by right of "law warranted? And yet a great part thereof in no reſpect toucheth and concerneth you. That "we cauſed them to come forth to anſwer their cauſe, who had raiſed a commotion of the multi"tude, who had forced the maritime Cities, who had ranſacked them, who alſo had maſſacred
"the principal citizens, we are to anſwer therefore, and to us that properly appertaineth. But "that they were murdered in the way as they came into our camp, was nothing to us, but your B "deed O Areus and Alcibiades, who now (forſooth) are become our accuſers. The baniſhed La-"cedæmonians (of which number thoſe two alſo are, and who at that time were with us, for that "they choſe the coaſt Towns to retire into for their habitations) ſuppoſing that their own death
"was ſought, and that there would have been outrage committed upon them, they ran upon
"thoſe, by whoſe means they were driven out of their countrey; even upon an indignation that "they might not ſo much as paſs their old age in baniſhment with ſafety. They were the Lace-
"dæmonians then and not the Achæans that ſlew the Lacedæmonians: whether juſtly or unjuſtly, "that is not the queſtion, neither skileth it. But what ſay ye to this O Achæans, how can ye deny
"but that ye are culpable, in that ye have aboliſhed the Laws and the moſt ancient diſcipline of "Lycurgus? and withal raſed the walls of Lacedæmon? And how is it poſſible that both theſe C "points ſhould be objected unto us by the ſame men? conſidering that thoſe walls were never "built by Lycurgus, but contrary-wiſe (and not many years paſt) for to overthrow and anull the "diſcipline inſtituted by Lycurgus? For the tyrants of late daies built them to ſerve as a fortreſs
"and bulwark for themſelves, and not for a defence unto the City. And if Lycurgus at this day
"ſhould riſe again from death to life, he would take joy in their ruins, and ſay that he acknow"ledged now his own native countrey and ancient Sparta indeed. You Lacedæmonians ſhould
"not have expected Philopœmen nor the Achæans but your ſelves ought with your own hands to "have pulled down and deſtroied all the tokens and memorials of tyranny. Thoſe walls were the "very marks and as a man would ſay the unſeemly and deformed ſcars of your thraldom and ſer-"vitude. And you who without walls for the ſpace almoſt of 800 years had lived in freedom, D "yea and for a certain time alſo had been maſters of Greece became ſlaves during a hundred years, "enlocked and reſtrained within walls, as if ye had been fettered by the feet. Now as touching the "laws, which ye pretend to have been taken away by us, I ſuppoſe verily that the tyrants they "were, who deprived the Lacedæmonians of their ancient laws: and that we have not taken from "them theirs (for none they had of their own) but rather have given them ours: neither have
"we done otherwiſe than well by them, but regarded much the good of their City and Common"wealth, in that we have united them in our ſolemn court of Parliament, and incorporated them
"unto us: to the end, that in all Peloponneſus, there ſhould be but one body, one State, and one "Counſel. Then (I wot well) they might have juſtly complained to have been wronged, then
"they might have grieved and ſaid they had not been well uſed, in caſe we our ſelves had lived E "under one kind of laws, and put them to be ruled by others. I know full well, O Appius, that "all my ſpeech hitherto is neither beſeeming allies to uſe unto their allies, nor decent and meet
"for a nation that is free but rather (to ſpeak more truly) fit for ſlaves debating before their ma-
"ſters. For if that ſound of the trumpet, if that voice of the publick crier were not in vain, where"by ye ordained and declared, That we Achæans before all others ſhould be free; if the confede"ration ſtand firm and ſtable; if our alliance and amity be entertained and obſerved equally and "indifferently; why demand not I of you Romans what you did after the winning of Capua? See"ing you will have us Achæans to make account unto you, what we did to the Lacedæmonians "whom we conquered by war? Set caſe that we cauſed ſome of them to be killed. What of that?
F "Commanded not you (I pray) that the Senators of Capua ſhould loſe their heads? We have "demoliſhed the walls indeed, but ye have not only ruinated their walls, but wholly turned them "out of City and territory. But (you will ſay) the confederation in behalf of the Achæans is equal "and indifferent in outward apparence, and in truth and effect their liberty dependeth upon the "good will and pleaſure of the Romans, who indeed have the pre-eminence of the ſeignory and "dominion beſides; I know it Appius, as well as you can tell me, yea and (although it behoveth
"me not ſo to be) I am not overmuch offended and diſcontented therewith. But this I beſeech
"you, let there be as great odds and difference as ye will between us Achæans and you Romans:
"provide this only, that your enemies and ours be not with you in as good regard and account,
"nay, that they be not in a better degree and condition than we your allies and aſſociats. For,
"that they ſhould be equal to us, we have been the cauſe: in that we granted them our own laws, G "in that we admitted them to be incorporate in the general Diet of the Achæan State and com"monalty. But will ye have the truth? the conquered have not ſufficient to content and ſatisfie
"the conquerors: enemies demand more than allies have and enjoy: and thoſe things which are "confirmed by oath, ratified and conſecrated by monuments and inſtruments of writings, cut and "engraven in ſtone, for a perpetual memory to all poſterity, they would force and wreſt from us "even with our perjury. True it is, O Romans we honour and revence you; yea and if you will
"needs have it ſo, we dread and fear you alſo: but yet ſo, as we both honour and alſo fear the im" mortal Gods more than you. Audience he had with the accord and conſent of the greater part: H and all men judged, that he had ſpoken like a Magiſtrat indeed, and for the dignity and Majeſty of his place: in ſuch ſort, as it was eaſily ſeen, that they were never able to hold their dignity and maintain their authority with the Romans, in caſe they went coldly to work and proceeded in mild terms with them. Then Appius anſwered and ſaid, " That he would gladly adviſe and per" ſwade them, all that he poſſibly could, to be reconciled unto the Lacedæmonians, whiles they " might do it with full contentment; for fear leſt ſoon after they ſhould be conſtrained and forced " to ſeek unto them againſt their wills and maugre their hearts. At this word they all ſighed and groned again; but affraid they were and durſt not refuſe to do that which they were commanded.

This petition only they made unto the Romans, that as touching the Lacedæmonians they would change & alter what they thought good, and not force the Achæans to ſin againſt their conſcience, I in diſanulling thoſe things which they had eſtabliſhed and ratified with a ſolemn oath. So the ſentence of condemnation only (lately paſſed againſt Areus and Alcibiades) was reverſed.

In the beginning of this year (when at Rome they had ſitten in conſultation about the Provinces of Conſuls and Pretors) Liguria was aſſigned unto the Conſuls for their charge and government, becauſe there was no war in any other place. Then the Pretors caſt lots for theirs. To C. Decimius Flavus fell the juriſdiction of the City: and to P. Cornelius Cethegus that other between citizens and forrainers: C. Sempronius had the government of Sicily, and Q. Nævius Matho of Sardinia with commiſſion alſo to ſit upon the inquiſition in caſe of poiſoning. A. Terentius Varro was deputed L. Governor of high Spain, and P. Sempronius Longus of the low. Out of thoſe 2 Provinces it fell out ſo, that there came much about the ſame time two Lieutenants, L. Juventius Talva and T. K Quintilius Varus; who having related before the Senat how great a war was now diſpatched and finiſhed in Spain, required withal, that there ſhould be rendred praiſe and thanks to the immortal Gods for the happy ſucceſs in the wars, and likewiſe that the Pretors might be permitted to bring away their armies. So there was a ſolemn proceſſion ordained to be holden two dayes: but as touching the reducing of the armies, they gave order to refer it wholly to be debated, at what time as there ſhould be queſtion about the armies of Conſuls and Pretors together. Some few dayes after, it was ordained, that the Conſuls ſhould have with them into Liguria two legions apeece, which Ap. Claudius and M. Sempronius had the conduct of. As touching the Spaniſh forces, great contention there was between the new Pretors and the friends of Calpurnius and Quintius in their abſence. Both ſides had Tribuns and both had Conſuls to take part with them. The Tribuns L threatned to croſs the act of the Senat, if they ordained that the armies ſhould be brought home.
The Conſuls again proteſted, that if the Tribuns thus oppoſed their negative, they would not ſuffer any other decree and ordinance to paſs. In concluſion, the reſpect of thoſe that were abſent, was of leſs importance: and an act of the Senat was entred, That the Pretors ſhould enrol 4000 footmen of Romans, and 400 horſemen: likewiſe 5000 foot and as many horſe of Latine allies, to conduct with them into Spain. And when they had thus enrolled theſe four full legions, look what ſurpluſage there remained over and above 5000 foot and 300 horſe in a legion, they ſhould give them their congie and diſmiſs them of ſouldiery; firſt, as many as had ſerved out their full time, and then thoſe who had born themſelves moſt valiantly in the war under Calpurnius and Quin- tius.

After this debate and variance was appeaſed, there aroſe another in the neck of it, occaſioned M by the death of P. Decimius the Pretor. Cn. Licinius and L. Puppius (who had been Ædiles the laſt year before) likewiſe C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, laboured to be in his room late deceaſed. As for the laſt of theſe rehearſed (becauſe he was Ædile Curule) he ſhewed not himſelf in his white robe; but he made more means and laboured above all the reſt, having to his adverſary and concurrent the Flamin aboveſaid. At the firſt he ſeemed equal only unto him in the ſuit, but afterwards when he began to have the better of him, certain Tribuns of the Commons ſtood upon this point, and alledged, That his name was not to be accepted as eligible; for that one and the ſelf-ſame perſon might neither take nor exerciſe at one time, the function of two Magiſtracies; and namely, both Curule or of State. Others again ſaid, that it was N meet and reaſon that he were diſpenſed with and exempt from the Laws in that behalf, to the end, that the people might be at liberty to elect whom they would for Pretor. L. Porcius the Conſul was firſt of this reſolution, not to admit his name: and afterwards, becauſe he would ſeem to do by warrant and authority of the Senat, he aſſembled the LL. together and ſaid that he propounded and put to queſtion before them, That for aſmuch as an Ædile elect ſued to be Pretor without all right, or any precedent tolerable in a free-ſtate; for his own part he was minded (unleſs they were of a contrary opinion) to hold the general aſſembly for the election according to law.
Then the LL. gave their advice, that L. Porcius the Conſul, ſhould commune and treat with Q.
Fulvius, that he would be no hinderance, but that the aſſembly for the ſubſtitution of a Pretor in the room of C. Decimius departed, might be holden by order of law. As the Conſul was thus in O hand with him according to the act of the Senat Flaccus made anſwer, That he would do nothing unfitting his own perſon. By this doubtful and indifferent anſwer of his, he put thoſe in good hope (who expounded and conſtrued as they would have it) that he would accommodate and apply himſelf to the authority of the LL. of the Senat: but at the time of the election he ſued more earneſtly than before; complaining of the Conſul and Senat, That they wrung and wreſted out of his hands the benefit of the people of Rome intended unto him; and to bring him into ill will and obloquy

A obloquy of the people, they made much ado about two offices and a double dignity: as if all the world saw not, that after he were declared and pronounced Pretor, he would incontinently resign up the Ædileship. The Consul perceiving both him fully resolute and set upon a pitch in the suit, and also the favor and affection of the people enclined more and more toward him, brake up the assembly aforesaid, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent session of Senators it was ordained, That for as much as Flaccus was little or nothing moved with the authority of the LL. of that honorable court, he was to be dealt withal in a general assembly before the body of the people. When the people were met together at the summons of the Consul, he proposed the matter unto him before them. Flaccus relented never a jot, but persisted still in his opinion, and gave the peo-
B ple of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they shewed themselves willing to elect him Pretor, so often as they had time and place wherein they might testify and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindness of his fellow citizens, he never meant to reject and abandon. This constant and resolute speech of his, kindled and enflamed so great love and affection in them toward him, that past all peradventure he had been chosen Pretor out of hand, in case the Consul would have received his name. Much strife and debate there was amongst the Tribuns, one against another; yea and between them and the Consul, until at length the Consul held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wise. That forasmuch as the wilfull stubbornes of Q. Flaccus of one side, and the inordinat affection of men on another side, was such, as the solemn assembly for subelecting of a Pretor in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the laws, the Senat agreed and resolved, that there were already Pretors enough, and P. Cornelius should administer
C and execute both jurisdictions in the City, and exhibit the playes and games in the honour of Apollo.

After this troublesome debate about the election, was by the sage wisdome and valorous courage of the Senat suppressed, there arose another far greater by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the persons agents therein more in number and for quality and place mightier. There stood in election to be Censors (and that with earnest endeavour and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus, P. and L. both Scipiones, Cn. Manlius Volso, and L. Furius Purpureo, all Patritii. And of commoners, M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Nobilior, T. and Marcus both Sempronii, the one surnamed Longus, the other Tuditanus. But M. Porcius over-went them all by many degrees, as well those of the Patricians as also of the commons, notwithstanding they were D come of most noble families. This man carried with him so vigorous a spirit and pregnant wit, that howsoever he were born and descended, it seemed he was able to make way of himself to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisit for the managing either of private busines of his own, or publick affairs of state: cunning he was in country husbandry, as well as in civil policy. Some are advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places, by their deep knowledge in the law: others attain to promotion by eloquence: and there be again, who have risen and become great through martial prowess and feats of arms. But this man was by nature so trainable and pliant to all alike, that whatsoever he addicted and gave himself unto, a man would have said, he had been born and framed even from his mothers womb to it and to nothing else. In war a most hardy and valiant souldier: and in many foughten fields highly re-
E nowned. Being mounted once to high places of honorable calling, a right excellent commander he proved, and General of an army. In peace again, for sound counsel in the civil law, passing well learned: for pleading at the bar and making orations, most eloquent. Neither carried he himself so, that his tongue flourished only whiles he lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his singular eloquence; but it liveth, nay, it flourisheth still, immortalized as it were and recommended to posterity in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extant many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his own cause as for the defence of his friends, yea, and invectives also against others: for able he was to put down and weary his adversaries, not only by declaiming and accusing them, but also by pleading his own cause. Factious quarrels and enmities there were exceeding many, that tormented him; and he plagued others with as many: and hard it is to say or set F down, whether he were urged and pressed upon by the nobility, or himself coursed and baited them more. Doubtless, by nature he was austere and rigorous, his speech was sharp biting, and beyond measure plain and free: but he carried a mind with him that stooped to no desires and lusts whatsoever: his life so severe and precise, as it was untouched and without all spot of blame: despising all fawning favours, and contemning earthly riches. In thrift and frugality, in sobriety, in patience, in sufferance of travail and danger, his body was steel to the very back. And as for his mind and courage, it was such, as very age and time (which abateth and consumeth all things else) was not able to break and daunt: when he was fourscore years old and six, he pleaded at the bar for others: he made orations for his own defence, and wrote books: and in the nintieth year of his age, he convented Sergius Galba before the people to receive his judgment by them. As all his G life time before, the nobility was set against him, so when he stood now to be Censor, they pressed hard upon him: insomuch as all his competitors (excepting L. Flaccus, who had been his colleague in the Consulship) complotted together, how they might give him the repulse and put him besides the Cushion: not only for that their own teeth watered, and they were desirous themselves rather of that honor; nor because they repined to see a new risen Gentleman, and one of the first head to be a Censor: but also because they looked for no other but that his Censorship would be rigorous and prejudicial to the name and reputation of divers men; considering how he had been crossed and hurt by very many, and was desirous himself to wait them a shrewd turn, and be meet H with them again. For even then, whiles he laboured and sued for the place, he used minatory speeches, and gave out, that they only were opposed against him, who feared they should have a Censorship sharply exercised without partiality and respect of persons. And herewith he maintained and upheld the suit of L. Valerius with him, saying that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, he should be able to repress the wicked enormities newly come up and rife in the City, and to bring in request again the ancient manners and fashions of the old world. Men were much moved in these respects and considerations; and so maugre the heads of the nobility, they not only created him Censor, but also adjoyned unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that government.

After the election of Censors was ended, the Consuls and Pretors took their journies into their I several Provinces, all save Q. Nævius; who before that he could go into Sardinia, was staied behind no less than four months, about certain inquisitions of poisoning: whereof, he sate upon many without the City of Rome, in corporate burroughs, market Towns and places of great resort, for that he thought that manner of proceeding more convenient. And if we list to believe V. Antias, he condemned two thousand persons.

Semblably, L. Postumius the Pretor, (unto whom the government of Tarentum by lot fell) did good justice upon great conspiracies made by certain grasiers; and with great care and diligence followed the enquest of the Bacchanals, and dispatched the reliques thereof quite and clean. Many of them who were adjourned and made not appearance, but gave the slip and left in the lurch their sureties bound body and goods for them, and lurked in that quarter of Italy; he either K judged and condemned as guilty and convicted, or caused them to be apprehended and sent to Rome unto the Senat; who were all cast in prison by P. Cornelius.

In the farther part of Spain all was quiet, by reason that the Lusitans were in the last war subdued: but in the nither part, A. Terentius forced Corbio a Town of the Suessetans, which he assaulted with mantilets and other fabricks of war, and sold all the prisoners: which done, he passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spain also.

The old Pretors, C. Calpurnius Piso and L. Quintius returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and consent of the LL. of the Senat allowed to triumph. And first C. Calpurnius triumphed over the Portugals and Celtiberians. In which triumph, he carried in shew 83 coronets of gold, and 12000 pound of silver. Within few dayes after, L. Quintius triumphed over L the same Portugals and Celtiberians. In which solemnity, there was represented in shew, as much gold and silver as in the former.

The Censors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, whiles men hung in suspence between fear and hope what they would do, held a review and a new choice of the Senate. Seven Senators they displaced and deposed from that dignity: amongst whom, there was one of mark, for his nobility of birth and honorable offices which he had born, namely, L. Quintius Flamininus who had been Consul. An ancient order (they say) it was in time of our fore-fathers, That when the Censors had put any out of the Senat, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, extant there be divers sharp orations of Cato, against them whom either he caused and displaced out of Senat, or from whom he took away horses of service: but of all others, the foulest and bittrest is that of his, against this L. Quintius; which if he had pronounced M as an accuser before he had noted him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very own brother T. Quintius (if he had been then Censor) could not possibly have kept L. Quintius in the state of a Senator. Among other grievous matters he articled against him, That he had trained with him from Rome into his Province of France (in hope of many great rewards) one * Philippus Pœnus, a notorious and costly Ganymede. This boy, as he was fooling and playing the wanton with the said Quintius then Consul, used to upbraid him with this, That he was had away from Rome, against the very time that the shew of sword-players at utterance was to be exhibited: and this he said, to shew how ready he was to satisfy the pleasure of him his lover. Now it chanced as they were making good cheer together, and having taken their wine liberally N were well heat therewith, news came and reported it was in the banket time, That a certain noble man of the Boians was arrived, with his children, as a renegat from the adverse part; and was desirous to speak with the Consul, for to have assurance from his mouth of safe-conduct: who being brought into the pavilion began to parly with the Consul by a truchman or interpreter. And in the midst of his speech: How saist thou (quoth Quintius to that wanton deinty, his Catamite) because thou hast missed and lost the sight of those sword-players at Rome, wilt thou see presently here this Frenchman die in the place before? He made not any great semblance unto him in good earnest of his desire that way: but the Consul at the first beck of that beastly filth and baggage, caught the naked sword which hung over his head, and first gave the poor Gaul a wound in his sconce as he was speaking unto him, and afterwards as he made shift to flie from him, and called upon the protection of the people of Rome, and the assistance of those that were present, Quintius ran him quite through the sides. Valerius Antias, who never had read the oration of Cato, but gave credit to a flying fable only, without any head or author, telleth the tale with some other circumstance howbeit much like in substance of matter, as touching his lecherous lust and bloody cruelty. He writeth, that Quintius whiles he abode at Plaisance, sent for a famous courtesan (upon whom he was enamored) to a banket; and as he courted and made love to this strumpet, vanting himself unto

* This Philip I take to be no Carthaginian. The name soundeth not like others of that nation: but both it and Pœnus are Roman proper names.

A nnto her, among other discourses he recounted with what rigor he had followed certain inquisitions; what a number of prisoners he had in irons condemned to death; and how many of their heads he minded to chop off. Then this harlotry sitting next beneath him, said, That she had never in all her life seen any man to cut ones head off, and it was a sight that of all other she would fainst see. Wherupon, this kind amorous knight, to gratify the quean, caused one of those poor souls condemned to die, to be set out of prison into the banketting room, and presently to be beheaded before her face. A cruel fact it was & inhuman, whether it were committed as Cato hath objected in his Oration, or as Valerius hath written in his story, that any human creature should be thus massacred like a sacrifice, and the table besprinkled with his blood, amid the cups standing full of wine and the dishes furnished with viands, where and when the manner and custome was to tast
B and take the first essay in the honor of the Gods, and that devoutly with grace and good prayers; and all to content and feed the eye of a wanton and shameless Harlot, lying in the bosome of the Consul. In the end of Cato his Oration, this condition was offered unto Quintius, That if he would plead unguilty, and deny this fact and others which he charged him with, then he should put in a real caution, and stand to his defence and trial: but if he confessed himself guilty then he willed him to consider whether he thought any man would grieve and be sorry at the ignominie which he was to receive, who being transported beside his understanding with wine and women, made but a sport and pastime to shed mens blood at a very banket. In taking a review of the Cavalry or Gentlemen of Rome, L. Scipio Asiaticus had his great horse of service taken from him. This Censorship was likewise executed with severity and rigor to all sorts and degrees, and namely, in C the prising and valuation of their goods. For Cato commanded the Sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, and apparrel of women, also of their chariots and coaches if they amounted to the sum of 15000 asses, and to enrol the same in the Censors book. Item, all bondslaves under twenty years of age, sold after the last tax or assessment for 10000 Asses or upward, that they should be valued at an higher price by ten fold than they were esteemed worth: and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the City chamber after three in the thousand. These Censors cut off all water either running out of any common stream into a privat house, or derived into particular fields and grounds. And all houses either built by private persons upon common ground, or any wayes encroaching and leaning to publike places they caused to be demolished and pulled down within thirty dayes. After this, they set out divers peeces of work to D be wrought at a price, of that money which was ordained to that purpose; namely, to pave certain pools with stone, to scoure the draughts and sinks where need was: and in the mount Aventine and other parts where none were already to make new. And particularly of themselves Flaccus caused the causey or wharf to be made against the waters called Neptunia, that the people might pass to and fro that way: and also a street-way through Formianum. And Cato for his part built two galleries, * Mœnium and Titium, in the Mineries; and bought four shops for the City: he built there also the stately Hall or Palace called Porcia. As for the City revenues, they did set and let them forth to farmers, at an exceeding racked rent: but all the City works they put out to undertakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains aforesaid being once cancelled by order from the Senat, and new made at the importunat suit and that with E outcries and tears of the Publicans, as well farmers as undertakers: then the Censors by proclamation commanded those to avoid fat from the subhastation, who had disanulled the former leases and bargains, and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they demised the same profits and revenues again to others. This was a censorship of great note, full of rapine, ill will, and heart-burning, which troubled and molested M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to be the author of that severity and rigor exercised therin.

* Quarries. * Latumiæ.

The same year two Colonies were erected and inhabitants sent from Rome, to wit, Pollentia into the Picene territory, and Pisaurum into the Gauls country. Six acres of land were assigned to every one of the coloners. And the same Triumvirs, namely, Q. Fabius Labeo, M. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Fulvius Nobilior, were they that both parted the said lands, and also had the leading and plan-
F ting of the foresaid Colonies.

The Consuls that year atchieved no memorable exploit at all, neither at home in City, nor abroad in war. Against the year following they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entred into their government, put to question as concerning the Provinces, as well their own as the Pretors. For there had been chosen Pretors C. Valerius the Flamin of Iupiter (who also the year before was in election for the place) Sp. Posthumius Albinus and P. Cornelius Sisenna, also L. Puppius, L. Iulius, and Cn. Sicinius. Unto the Consuls was assigned the province Liguria, together with the charge of the same armies which P. Claudius and M. Porcius had conducted. As for both the Provinces in Spain [as well beyond as on this side Iberus] they were reserved with their ordinary forces, for the Pretors of the G former year by special commission without casting any lots at all therefore. The new Pretors were enjoyned for to dispose and part their governments, that C. Valerius the Flamin of Iupiter might exercise one of the jurisdictions of Rome. So he was L. chief justice for the forrainers, and Sisenna Cornelius over the citizens. Unto Sp. Posthumius fell Sicily, to L. Puppius Apulia, to L. Iulius Gallia, and to Cn. Sicinius Sardinia. As for L. Iulius he was enjoined to make hast and set forward on his journey: for the Transalpin Gauls (beyond the mountains) had passed over by the streights of the forrests and waies unknown beforetime, into Italy, as hath been beforesaid, and were building them a Town in that territory, which at this day is called Aquilienſis. This Pretor had in charge to impeach them in that enterpriſe, ſo far forth as he might poſſibly without war and force of arms: and if there were no other remedy but that they muſt of neceſſity uſe violence, then to certify the Conſuls therof: for agreed it was that one of them ſhould lead the Legions againſt the Gauls. In the end of the former year there was a general aſſembly holden for the chuſing of an Augur: wherin Sp. Poſthumius Albinus was created in the room of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus late deceaſed. But in the beginning of this preſent yeat P. Licinius Craſſus the arch-Pontify departed out of this world, in whoſe place M. Sempronius Tuditanus was inveſted for the Biſhop. But C. Servilius Geminus was created the arch-prelat or high-prieſt aforſaid. In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a dole of fleſh; and a ſhew exhibited of 120 ſword-fenſers fighting at ſharp: likewiſe there were repreſented funeral plaies and games, which continued three dayes: and after that ſolemnity, a feaſt was holden; during which, when the tables were ſet & ſpred accordingly all over the grand-place of the City, ſuddainly there aroſe a tempeſt with great ſtorms, which forced moſt men to erect tents and booths there: but after a while when the weather was fair again, they were taken down and had away: and men commonly gave out and ſaid, That wheras the Prophets & wiſards had foretold among other their fatal preſages, that they ſhould be forced to quarter & pitch tents in the market place of Rome; now that propheſie was fulfilled, and they were freed and excuſed from farther danger. And no ſooner were they eaſed and delivered of that ſcruple, but they were troubled with another; for that it had rained blood two daies in the court-yard of Vulcan: and the Decemvirs publiſhed a ſolemn ſupplication for the expiation of that prodigious ſign.

Before that the Conſuls departed into their provinces, they brought into the Senat for to have audience, the embaſſages come from beyond Sea. And never before that day were ſo many men of thoſe forrain parts ſeen at Rome. For from the time that the bruit was blown abroad amongſt the nations bordering upon Macedony, that the Romans gave no deaf ear to the complaints and accuſations commenſed againſt Philip, and that many had ſped well by complaining; every City and State in their own behalf, yea, and many privat perſons in particular (for an ill neighbour he was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and eaſed of their wrongs, or to diſcharge their ſtomacks and be moned and comforted for their miſeries. Likewiſe from King Eumenes there arrived an embaſſage accompanied with his own brother Athenæus to make complaint, as finding themſelves grieved that the garriſons were not withdrawn out of Thracia: as alſo to inform that Philip had ſent certain aids into Bithynia to Pruſias who made war upon Eumenes. Now Demetrius (Philip his ſon) at that time a very yong Gentleman, was to anſwer to all theſe challenges: and an eaſy peece of work it was not, either to bear in mind all the matters objected; or to think upon the points of every anſwer accordingly. For over and beſides, that the articles were many in number, moſt of them were of very ſmall conſequence and importance; namely, ſtrife about limits and land-marks, about carying away men and raviſhing women; of driving of cattel, of miniſtring juſtice partially and with affection, or elſe of none miniſtred at all: of ſentences given and judgments paſſed in cauſes either by force or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demetrius could ſpeak to theſe points and give them good evidence, nor themſelves be well informed and clearly inſtructed by him; being moved alſo and grieved to ſee the youth ſo raw a ſcholer in theſe affairs, and therwith much troubled in ſpirit, gave order to enquire and demand of him. Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father, as touching the premiſſes? And when he anſwered and ſaid, Yea, they thought the firſt and principal thing for them to do was, to ſee and hear what were the anſwers of the King to every ſpecialty and particular. And thereupon they preſently called for that book of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents therof. Now therein were ſet down certain brief abſtracts of pleas and defenſes, to each ſeveral point; ſhewing Imprimis, that ſome things he had done according to the decrees & awards of the Roman Delegats and commiſſioners. Item, Wheras he had left ſomwhat undone, the default was not in him but in the very parties that accuſed him. He had interlaced between, certain grievances and complaints, as touching the iniquity and hard penning of thoſe decrees; and how matters were not ſcanned and debated before Cæcilius with that indifferency and equity as was meet and requiſit: and namely that without deſert of his part, all men were ſet againſt him and inſulted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the heart of Philip was wounded and galled againſt the Romans. But when the yong Prince excuſed ſome of theſe matters, and for the reſt promiſed and undertook, that all ſhould be done to the uttermoſt as it pleaſed the Senat to order and ſet down; then it was thought good to deliver this anſwer unto him, That his father had in nothing done better nor more to the contentment of the Senat than that he ſeemed willing (howſoever matters were paſſed already) to make ſatisfaction to the Romans by the means of his ſon Demetrius. As for the Senat, they could diſſemble, forget, put up and endure many things done and paſt; yea, and were perſwaded verily in their hearts, that they might believe and truſt Demetrius: as knowing aſſuredly, that although they ſent his body again to his father Philip, yet they had his heart and affection with them ſtill, as a ſure pledge and hoſtage: and that he was a friend to the people of Rome, ſo far forth as his reverent duty to his father would permit and give him leave: letting him withal to underſtand, that for to do him honor, they would ſend Embaſſadors into Macedony: to the end that if ought had not been ſo fully effectuated as it ſhould have been, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame, or pœnal ſatisfaction to be made for any thing hitherto omitted: yea, and deſirous they were, that Philip ſhould underſtand, that by the

A the mediation of Demetrius and for his ſake, he ſtood yet in good terms of peace and friendſhip with the people of Rome. Theſe things intended and done for the increaſe of credit and reputation, preſently turned to the diſpleaſure of the yong Gentleman, and in the end to his utter ruin and overthrow.

Then were the Lacedæmonians admitted to audience in the Senate. They moved many petty matters and trifling controverſies; but thoſe that principally touched the main point were theſe; to wit, Whether they ſhould be reſtored again whom the Achæans had condemned, or no? Item, Whether they were juſtly or unjuſtly killed, whom they murdered? Moreover, they put to queſtion, Whether the Lacedæmonians were to be compriſed within the general aſſembly and Councel of Achæa; or, that this State (as before-time) ſhould have their rights and franchiſes apart by B themſelves from all others in Peloponneſus? The Senat ordained and awarded: Imprimis, That they ſhould be reſtored. Item, That the ſentences pronounced againſt them, ſhould be reverſed. Item, That Lacedæmon ſhould do ſervice to that high court and publick Diet of Achæans and finally, that this accord and award ſhould be engroſſed, ſubſcribed, and ſigned as well by the Lacedæmonians as Achæans.

Q. Martius was ſent Embaſſador into Macedony: who alſo had direction and order given him by the ſame commiſſion, to viſit the ſtate of the allies in Peloponneſus: for there alſo remained ſome troubles after the old quarrels and variance; yea, and the Meſſenians refuſed to appear at the general councel of Achæa. Now if I would ſet in hand to record the cauſes and circumſtances of that war, I ſhould forget my purpoſe in the beginning of my work, wherein I reſolved not to touch at C all any diſcourſe of forain hiſtories, no farther than they were linked to the Roman affairs. Howbeit one memorable occurence there hapned, which I cannot paſs by, namely, that albeit the Achæans had the better hand in war, yet it chanced that Philopæmen their Pretor was taken priſoner by the Meſſenians, as he made an expedition to ſeize upon Corone by prævention, which the enemies were deſirous to be maſters of. Surpriſed he was in a valley of great diſadvantage, and ſome few horſmen with him. It is reported, that by the help of the Thracians and Candiots, he might have fled and eſcaped: but for very ſhame to abandon thoſe men of arms, which were the nobleſt Gentlemen of that nation, & whom he lately had made choice of, he had not the power to do otherwiſe, but ſtay to ſee the laſt. For whiles he came himſelf behind in the rereward, becauſe he was deſirous to make means for their evaſion through the ſtreights of that paſs, and to that purpoſe va-
D liantly received the charge of the enemies, his horſe fell and caſt him at once; ſo as with his own fall and his horſe lying upon him, he had like to have gone away in a ſwoon: a man now threeſcore years old and ten; and withal, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering diſeaſe, which had mightily waſted and conſumed the ſtrength of his body. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him; and ſo ſoon as they knew who he was, they reared him upon his feet from under his horſe, no leſs reſpective than if he had been their own General in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himſelf; and forth of that by-valley ſtanding out of the paſs, they carried him into the high way: and were ſo far poſſeſſed and overcome with joy ſo unexpected, that they could not well believe their E own eyes that they had gotten him. Some diſpatched van-courriers to Meſſene with the news hereof; namely, that the war was brought to an end, conſidering that Philopæmen was taken and was their priſoner. At firſt the tidings ſeemed ſo incredible, that the formoſt meſſenger was held not only for a vain liar, but alſo for one not well in his wits: but after that there came one after another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the ſame at length it was believed. And then, ſee what they did! before they knew for certain that he approached neer unto the City; they all ran forth of the gates by heaps to ſee the man: all (I ſay) bond as well as free, women and children one with another. In ſo much, as the gates were choaked up with the thruſt and throng of F the preſs: for no man could believe aſſuredly it was true, the thing was ſo ſtrange unleſs he might ſee him with his own eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him, found much ado to put by the multitude whom they encounted, and to enter in at the gate: and ſo thick they ſtood in the preſs, that they took up all the wayes beſides, ſo as he could not be brought forth to be ſeen. Now becauſe the moſt part of the people might not poſſibly have a ſight of him, they gat up all at once into the Theatre, which ſtood neer unto the way, and peſtered it full; and with one voice they cried aloud, That he might be brought thither and preſented unto the view of the whole people. The Magiſtrats and principal citizens, fearing leſt the compaſſion that might ariſe in mens hearts upon the beholding of ſo worthy a perſonage, would raiſe ſome trouble and commotion; whiles G ſome comparing the reverence of his former authority and Majeſty, with his preſent condition and calamity: and others calling to remembrance his manifold deſerts and paſſing good turns, might haply be touched with pity; ſet him a far off in the open ſight of them all, and then at once took him haſtily out of their view: for their Pretor Dinocrates gave out openly and ſaid, That the Magiſtrats were to enquire and demand certain points of him as touching the main ſum of the totall war. Then he was brought into their Councel-Chamber, where their Senate aſſembled and began to conſult about him. It was now well toward evening; and ſo far off they were from reſolving in other matters, that they could not bethink themſelves and agree, in what place they might keep him that one night in ſafeguard. Aſtonied they were and amaſed, to conſider and think upon the greatnes of his eſtate paſt, and of his noble vertue and valour: and no man durſt receive the charge and cuſtody of him in his own houſe, nor truſt any one beſides with his keeping. At length ſome there were, that put them in mind of the publick treaſury of the H City, vaulted under the ground like a dungeon, and walled all about with ſtrong ſquare ſtone.

Into it was he let down bound as he was, and a mighty huge ſtone (being the cover of the vault) was by an engin laid over, to encloſe him ſure. Thus repoſing more truſt for his ſafe cuſtody in that place than in any perſon, they waited and attended the next morning. When morrow day was come, the whole entire multitude in general, recommending the benefits and good turns done of old by him to their City, were of mind to pardon and ſpare him, and by his means and mediation, to ſeek for remedies and redreſs of their preſent diſtreſſes and calamities. But thoſe perſons by whoſe motive and inducement the Meſſenians had revolted (and ſuch were they as ruled all the common-weal) conſulted apart in ſecret, and concluded with one conſent to put him to death: only the doubt and queſtion was, whether they ſhould do the thing with ſpeed, or by I delay. But thoſe prevailed in the end, who were more greedy of preſent revenge, and ſo they ſent one unto him with a draught of poiſon. When he had taken the cup in his hand (by report) he gave not a word, but only asked, whether Lycortas (the other General of the Achæans) were eſcaped alive, and the foreſaid horſmen ſafe? When anſwer was made, that they were in ſafety; That is happy, (quoth he) and therewith drunk off every drop in the cup right heartily, and a while after yeelded up his vital breath. But long joyed they not of his death who were the bloody authors of this cruelty: for the City of Meſſene being conquered by force of arms, among other capitulati-ons, delivered theſe malefactors into the hands of the Achæans, who demanded preſently to have them. The bones and reliques of Philopœmen were likewiſe rendred unto them, and interred he was by the general Councel of all Achæa, in ſuch ſolemn wiſe, that in heaping upon him all ho- K nours that could be deviſed for an earthly man, they forbare not alſo to adore him as a God immortal. The Hiſtoriographers, as well Greek as Latine, attribute ſo much unto this man, that ſome of them have recommended to poſterity (as a memorable thing of all others that hapned this year:) to wit, that in this one year there died three renowned Captains, Philopœmen, Annibal, and P. Scipio. See how they have matched him in equality with the greateſt warriors and nobleſt Generals of the two moſt puiſſant nations in the whole world!

Then came T. Quintius Flamininus in embaſſage to King Pruſias, whom the Romans had in ſuſpition and jealouſy, both for that he had received Annibal after the flight of Antiochus, and alſo becauſe he made war upon Eumenes. Now, were it that among other matters Flamininus charged Pruſias, that he entertained in his court the moſt ſpightfull enemy of all men living, unto the L people of Rome; who firſt ſollicited his own native countrey to take arms againſt the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, perſwaded King Antiochus to do the like: or rather that Pruſias of his own accord to gratify Flamininus there preſent, and to do the Romans a pleaſure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Annibal, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon the firſt communication and conference between them, there were ſouldiers ſent incontinently to beſet and guard his houſe. Anni-bal evermore forcaſt in mind ſome ſuch iſſue and end of his life, ſeeing the deadly and inexpiable hatred that the Romans bare unto him; repoſing beſides no confidence at all in the fidelity of theſe Kings, and having withal ſome experience already of the inconſtancy and levity of King Pruſias. Moreover, he had in horrour this coming of Flamininus, as fatal unto him, and a mean to M work his final deſtruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided aforehand againſt thoſe inconveniences and dangers, wherewith on all ſides he was encumbred, and have a ready way of evaſion to ſave himſelf, he had deviſed and cauſed to be made ſeven dores for egreſs out of his houſe, whereof ſome were very privy and ſecret vaults, becauſe they ſhould not be environed with guards. But Kings commandments are of that force, that whatſoever they would have to be ſearched out and diſcovered, cannot lie long hidden. For the guards ſo compaſſed and encloſed the whole circuit of the houſe, that it was unpoſſible for any to get forth and make an eſcape. Annibal being advertiſed that the Kings ſouldiers were at the gate, aſſaied to ſteal away at a poſtern, which ſtood furtheſt out of the way, and whereof the conveiance was moſt ſecret, but perceiving that the ſouldiers had beſet it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, N and that every place was inveſted with a ſet guard, he called for the poiſon which he had of long time before ready prepared for all ſuch occurrent occaſions, and uttered theſe words withal, "Let "us rid theſe Romans of this their continual fear and pain wherein they have been all this while,
"ſince that they think it ſo long to ſtay for the death of one old man. Flamininus ſhall obtain no "great nor memorable victory of me, diſarmed thus as I am, and betraied into his hands. But this
The end of Annibal. "very day ſhall prove and teſtify, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from "their ancient manners. Their foreſathers (qd. he) advertiſed King Pyrrhus their enemy armed "in field, and lying with an hoſt of men againſt them in Italy, they gave him warning I ſay to take "heed of poiſon: but theſe living at this day, have ſent their Embaſſador, even one that hath
"born the dignity of a Conſul, to adviſe and counſel Pruſias wickedly to take the life away of his O "own gueſt. Then after he had curſed the perſon of Pruſias and his whole realm, and called upon "the Gods, protectors of the law of hoſpitality, to bear witneſs how he had violated his faith "and broken promiſe with him, he ſet the cup of poiſon to his mouth, and drank it off. This was the end of Annibal, Polybius and Rutilius write, that Scipio alſo died this year. But I, accord neither with them nor with Valerius. From them I ſquare, becauſe I find that when M. Porcius and L. Vale-rius were Cenſors, the ſame L. Valerius being Cenſor, was elected Preſident of the Senat, where-

A as Africanus had been Preſident for ten years ſpace together, during the time of two reviews by Cenſors next before. And ſo long as the ſaid Africanus lived, there would have been no other choſen Preſident in his room, unleſs himſelf were to have been caſſed and deprived of the Senators dignity, of which diſgrace and note of infamy, there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for Valerius Antias, he is ſufficiently refuted by M. Nævius a Tribun of the Commons, againſt whom there is an Oration extant, and the ſame penned by P. Africanus, and bearing his name. This Nævius is recorded in the rols and regiſters of Magiſtrats, by the title of Tribun of the Commons, in that year when P. Clodius and L. Porcius were Conſuls, but he entred into his office during the Conſulſhip of App. Claudius and M. Sempronius, the tenth of December. From which time to the fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Pub. Clodius and L. Porcius be-
B gan their Conſulſhip. So, it ſeemeth that he was living during the Tribunſhip of Nævius, and that he might well commenſe an action againſt him, and call him to his anſwer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porcius were Cenſors. But in my conceit the death of theſe three (the moſt renowned perſonages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with the other in this regard, that they hapned all juſt at one time, more than for this, that none of them all had an end correſpondent and anſwerable to the portly ſtate and glorious luſtre of his life. For firſt and formoſt in this they all jumped together, that they neither died nor were entered in their native countrey. Again, Annibal and Philopœmen were both poiſoned. Annibal was baniſhed and betraied by his own friend and hoſt, Philopœmen was taken priſoner, and left his life in priſon and irons. As for Scipio, although he was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of appa-C rance at the day aſſigned unto him, and being cited to his anſwer in his abſence, willingly baniſhed not himſelf only for his life time, but his corps and funerals alſo after his death.

Whiles thoſe affairs paſſed in Peloponneſus (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and digreſſed) the return of Demetrius and the Embaſſadors into Macedon, diverſly wrought in mens minds, and amuſed them ſome in one thing, and ſome in another. The common people of Macedony, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and caſt a favourable aſpect upon him as the author of peace, and withal they deſtined him without all doubt to the Kingdom, after the deceaſe of his father. For albeit he were yonger than his brother Perſeus, yet men thought and ſpake, that he was begotten in matrimony by Philip of his lawful wife, whereas he had Perſeus by a concubin, who carried no token and mark of D a certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius reſembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be. Moreover, men ſaid, That the Romans would place and eſtabliſh Demetrius in the Royal throne of his father, but Perſeus was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folk ſtuck not to give out abroad in their common talk. Whereupon not only Perſeus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age only would little boot and advantage him, conſidering in all reſpects elſe he was inferiour to his brother, but Philip alſo himſelf, ſuppoſing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleaſed, thought that his yonger ſon was a mote in his eye, and troubled him more than was for his eaſe. Offended otherwhiles he was, that the Macedonians reſorted unto him ſo much as they did, and highly diſpleaſed that there ſhould be E any more royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to ſpeak a truth, the young Prince himſelf returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt, with pride, than was beſeeming; as who preſumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted thoſe things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but look how much favor and honor (in reſpect of the Romans) he won among the reſt of the Macedonians, ſo much envy and ill will he procured himſelf thereby not only with his brother, but with his father alſo: and eſpecially after that other Roman Embaſſadors were arrived and that Philip was forced to part with Threcia and withdraw his garriſons, and to do other things either by vertue of the old award of the firſt commiſſioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senat. Well, he per-F formed all, but with an heavy heart and many a deep ſigh and grone, and ſo much the rather, becauſe he obſerved and ſaw how his ſon Demetrius converſed more with the Embaſſadors, and frequented their company oftner than his. Howbeit he obeied, and did whatſoever was enjoined him by the Romans, becauſe he would miniſter unto them no occaſion of levying war againſt him out of hand. And ſuppoſing it was good policy to avert their minds from all ſuſpition that he minded any ſuch deſigns tending that way, he led his army into the midſt of Threcia againſt the Odryſians, Danthelets, and Beſſians. He won the City Philoppopolis abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled, and had retired themſelves with their whole families to the high mountains next adjoining: and after he had waſted the Lands and territories of the Barbarians that inhabited the champain countrey, he received them under his ſubjection by compoſition. Afterwards, having left a garriſon at Philippopolis, which ſoon after was chaſed and expelled by the Odryſians, he de-G termined to build a Town in Deuriopus, a region of Paonia neer the river Erigonus, which iſſueth out of Illyricum, and keeping his courſe through Paonia diſcharged it ſelf, and falleth into the river Axius. Not far from Stobæ the old City, he built a new, and cauſed it to be called Perſeis, thereby to do honour to his eldeſt ſon Perſeus.

During the train of theſe affairs in Macedony, the Conſuls took their journey into their ſeveral Provinces. Marcellus ſent a meſſenger before him to L. Porcius the Pro-conſul, to give him to underſtand that he ſhould preſent his legions before the new Town of the Gauls. But at the firſt

approach of the Conſul, the Frenchmen yeelded the place. Twelve thouſand they were that bare H arms and moſt of them had by force gotten their armour out of their country villages, which was taken from them maugre their hearts, with all things elſe, that either they had gotten out of the country by pilling and robbing, or brought with them of their own. Whereupon they addreſſed their Embaſſadors to Rome, for to make complaint of theſe abuſes and wrongs: who having audience given in the Senat by C. Valerius the Pretor, declared, how by occaſion that Gaul was ſur-charged with a multitude of people, they were conſtrained as well for want of ground and poſſeſ-ſions, as alſo for need and poverty, to paſs over the Alps and ſeek themſelves ſome place of habitation. And where they ſaw any quarters forlet, deſart, and unpeopled, there they had planted themſelves, without offering injury to any perſon: where alſo they had begun to build a Town, which might be a good proof and argument, that they came not to do violence upon any City or I country Village. And now of late M. Claudius had ſent unto them a meſſage, that unleſs they ſubmitted and yeelded, he would war upon them: whereupon they preferring certain peace (although it were leſs honorable) before the doubtful hazard & adventures of war, ſurrendered, rather to be in the protection and ſafeguard, than under the ſubjection of the people of Rome. But a few daies after, they were commanded to quit both City and Country. And thereupon reſolved in their mind to depart in ſilence and ſaying never a word into what place ſoever they could, there to ſeek their fortune: but then they were diſarmed, yea, and ſpoiled and ſtript of all that ever they had, and nothing left, that either they drave before them, or carried about them. In regard whereof, they were humble ſuppliants to the Senat and people of Rome, that they would not proceed in more rigour and cruelty againſt them, harmleſs perſons as they were, and ſubmitting themſelves K unto them, than againſt profeſſed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senat cauſed this anſwer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italy, and preſuming to build them a City upon other mens territories without permiſſion of the ſoveraign Roman Ma-giſtrat, who had the government of thoſe parts: nor yet the Senat was well pleaſed, that they ſhould be thus deſpoiled, conſidering they had yeelded. And therefore minded they were to ſend with them their Embaſſadors to the Conſuls to command them in their name, to ſee that all their own goods ſhould be reſtored again unto them, ſo that they made return thither from whence they came: who alſo ſhould go forward immediatly over the Alps, to give the States of France warning to keep in their people with them, and hold them in their native country: for aſmuch as the Alps were the frontier limits ſtanding in the mids to confine between them, and therefore L thoſe mountains neither ought nor might be paſſed of one ſide or the other: and to make account of this, that they ſhould ſpeed no better now in tranſgreſſing their bounds, than at what time as they firſt made a way and paſſage over them into Italy. The Embaſſadors emploied about this buſineſs were L. Furius Purpurio, Q. Minutius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. Thus the French, after reſtitution made unto them of all that was their own by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italy. Now when theſe Roman Legats were come, they had good words and courteous anſwer from the Tranſalpine nations. And thoſe amongſt them that were more ancient than the reſt, blamed the people of Rome for their overmuch lenity, in that they let thoſe perſons go, who without warrant from the whole State, durſt be ſo bold as to take a voyage to ſettle upon any lands belonging to the Signory of Rome, and were ſo hardy as thereon to build a Town. For M ſurely they deſerved not leſs than to abide grievous ſmart for their raſh demeanor. Moreover and beſides, whereas the Romans have given them their own goods again, they feared much that ſo great indulgency of theirs, would induce and encourage others to enterpriſe the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the Embaſſadors, yea, and liberally preſented them with rewards.

M. Claudius the Conſul having thus expelled the Gauls out of his Province, began to lay the ground of the Iſtrick war, and for this purpoſe wrote his letters unto the Senat, for a warrant and commiſſion to paſs with his legions into Iſtria. The Senat was therewith contented. But whereas they were in queſtion and conſultation about conducting a Colony to inhabite Aquileia, they could not agree whom to ſend, whether Latins or Roman citizens. But in concluſion the LL. N thought it better to plant there a Colony of Latins. The Triumvirs for to effect this, were created
P. Scipio Naſica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus.

The ſame year were two Colonies of Roman citizens erected at Mutina and Parma: and two thouſand perſons were to either place tranſlated out of the territory which lately was occupied by the Boians, and before time had been in the tenure of the Tuſcans. They of Parma were en-dued with eight acres of land, and thoſe of Mutina with five a peece. The Triumvir-Commiſſioners who had the diſpoſing and managing of the buſineſs, were M. Æmylius Lepidus, T. Ebutius Carus, and L. Quintius Criſpinus. Likewiſe the colony Saturnia conſiſting of Roman citizens, was brought into the territory of Caletra, by the conduct of Q. Fabius Labeo, C. Afranius Stellio, and T. Semp. Gracchus, deputed Triumvirs therefore: who ſet out for every man ten acres of ground. O

The ſame year A. Terentius the Pro-pretor, not far from the River Iberus in the Auſetans country, fought fortunatly againſt the Celtiberians, and forced certain Towns which they had fortified. Baſe Spain beyond Iberus was quiet this year, becauſe both P. Sempronius the Propretor lay ſick of a long diſeaſe, and alſo the Luſitanians (as good hap was) reſted ſtill and quiet, as being by not man provoked to ſtir. Neither was there any memorable exploit atchieved in Liguria by *Q.
Fabius* the Conſul. M. Marcellus was called home out of Iſtria: and after he had diſcharged his army,

A army, returned to Rome for to hold the election of the Magistrats. For Consuls he created Cn. Babius Tamphilus and L. Æmylius Paulus. This man had been Ædile Curule together with M. Æmylius Lepidus, who was Consul five years before; and yet the same Lepidus suffered the repulse twice ere he was created Consul. Then were Pretors chosen, to wit, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, M. Valerius Levinus, L. Manlius the second time, M. Ogulnius Gallus, L. Cæcilius Denter, & C. Terentius Istra. In the very end of the year there was a solemn supplication holden by occasion of certain prodigies: for men believed verily that in the court yard of the goddess Concordia it rained blood for the space of two daies: and reported it was not far from Sicily, that a new Land was discovered out of the Sea, where never any was before seen. Valerius Antias writeth that Annibal died this year: and that to compass and work his death, there were sent in embassage to Prusias, L. Scipio Asiaticus, and P. Scipio Nasica, besides T. Quintius Flaminius, who in that action is named most.

The fortieth Book
Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fortieth Book.

C When Philip had given commandment to make streight search for the children of those whom he kept in prison (and personages they were of most noble birth) for to put them to death: Theoxena fearing the King his malicious intent and wicked lust, in the behalf as well of her own children as of her sisters, little ones (God wot) and very yong infants, brought forth and offered unto the said children naked keen swords, and a cup of deadly poison, perswading with them to avoid the imminent shame and dishonour, by present death: which after she had obtained and seen effected, she likewise plaied her own part, and slew her own self. Moreover in this book are related the debate and variance between Perseus and Demetrius, the two sons of Philip King of Macedony: and how Demetrius came to his death by poison, through the mischievous practise of his brother Perseus: who devised false crimes and raised slanders against him: and principally among the rest, charged him that he intended to kill his own father, and meant to usurpe D the Kingdom; & last of all, because he was a friend to the people of Rome: by which means after the death of Philip Perseus obtained the crown. Also it containeth the happy exploits atchieved by many and divers commanders in Liguria, and in Spain against the Celtiberians. The books of Numa Pompilius were by certain husbandmen as they laboured in the ground of L. Petilius a Notary, under the Janiculum, found enclosed within a coffer of stone, and written both in Latine and Greek. And when the Pretor of the City, to whom the books were brought, had perused them, and found therein many points tending to overthrow religion and the divine service of the Gods, he swore before the Senat, that it was dangerous for the State and Common-wealth, that they should be read and preserved: in such sort, that by an Act of the State, they were burned within the Comitium or Hall of publick assemblies. The Colony Aquileia was now erected. Philip exceedingly displeased with himself and pricked with remorse of conscience for that E he had caused his son Demetrius to be poisoned, upon the false suggestions and accusations of his other son framed against him, devised to punish Perseus, and rather to confer the Kingdom upon Antigonus his friend, than that his son should succeed him: but in this designment and purpose of his he suddainly died: and so Perseus took the crown and Kingdom upon him.

The fortieth book of T. Livius.

IN the beginning of the year next ensuing, the Consuls and Pretors cast lots for their several governments. As for the Consuls, there was no other Province to employ them in but Liguria. The civil jurisdiction among citizens fell to M. Ogulnius Gallus: and the forrein over strangers F to M. Valerius. High Spain was assigned unto Q. Fulvius Flaccus: and the Nether-land thereof to P. Manlius. L. Cecilius Denter had the governance of Sicily, and C. Terentius Istra of Sardinia. The Consuls were enjoyned to take musters: for Q. Fabius had written out of Liguria, that the Appuans inclined to rebellion, and greatly to be feared it was, that they would break out and make rodes into the territory of Pisa. And well they knew already, that of the two Provinces of Spain, the higher parts were in arms, and the war with the Celtiberians was still in train: and as for the lower, the military discipline there, was clean corrupt and gone, by reason of riotous pleasures and idlenes where unto the souldiers were wholly given, by occasion that the Pretor lay so long sick. For these causes thought good it was, that new armies should be levied and enolled: to wit, four legions for Liguria, and every one of them to contain 5200 foot and 300 horse: unto which, G there was an addition of 15000 footmen, and 900 men of arms from out of the Latine allies. And these two armies were to serve the Consuls. But over and besides they were commanded to enrol 7000 foot, and 600 horsemen of Latine allies, and them to send into France to M. Marcellus, who was to continue still in place of command, after the term of his Consulship expired. Likewise they had in charge to levy of Roman Citizens 4000 footmen and 200 horse, and of allies 7000 of the one, and 300 of the other to be conducted into both Provinces of Spain. And Q. Fabius Labeo had his commission of government renewed for one year longer, with the charge of that army which he had in Liguria.

The

The ſpring ſeaſon that year was very ſtormy and tempeſtuous. On the * even of the feaſt Palilia about noon-tide, ſuddainly there aroſe a mighty bluſtring wind, which overthrew many edifices as well ſacred as profane. It caſt down the braſen ſtatues and images in the Capitol: it caught up the wicket of the dore belonging to the Temple of the * Moon, (which is in the Aventine) caried it away and ſet it faſt to the back wall of the Temple of Ceres. It overturned and laid along other ſtatues in the great cirque or ſhew-place called Circus Maximus, together with the pillars upon which they ſtood. The lanterns and pinnacles it rent and tare after a ſtrange ſort from the roof and top of certain Churches, and carried them clean away. And therefore this tempeſt was held for a prodigious token, and the Aruſpices gave order for the expiation and ſatisfaction thereof. Likewiſe the ſame proviſion was made in regard of a report from Reate, that a mule was foled with three feet: and from Formiæ, that the Chappel of Apollo (and namely at C j ta) was ſtriken I with lightning. For theſe prodigies, there were twenty greater beaſts killed for ſacrifice; and a ſupplication holden one whole day. And about the ſame time, intelligence was given by letters from A. Terentius the Pretor, that P. Sempronius having continued above a year ſick was departed this life in the farther Province of Spain; which was the cauſe that the Pretors were willed to make more haſt, and ſo much the ſooner to paſs into Spain.

* 19 of April: for the feaſt unto the goddeſs Pales was ſolemnized an. XI. calend. Mai. which was, Natalis dies urbis Romæ; the birth day (as it were) of Rome.

* Luna.

After this, the embaſſages from beyond the Sea had audience given them in the Senat. The firſt was that of the two KK. Eumenes and Pharnaces, and alſo of the Rhodians, who complained for the great loſs and overthrow by the Sinopians received. And about the ſame inſtant arrived alſo Embaſſadors from Philip from the Achæans and Lacedæmonians who had their anſwer and diſpatch, after a ſpeech made by Martius, who had been ſent to viſit the eſtate and affairs of Greece K and Macedony. But as touching the foreſaid Kings of Aſia, and the Rhodians this ſtood for their anſwer; namely That the Senat would ſend their Embaſſadors and Commiſſioners to take knowledge and ſee to all things there in place. But as concerning Philip, Martius had ſo told his tale, that he put the LL. of the Senat in more fear and perplexity: for in his declaration he confeſſed, that Philip indeed had accompliſhed the will and pleaſure of the Senat, but in ſuch ſort, as it was evident to be ſeen, that he would do ſo no longer than he were held thereto and compelled of neceſſity; for apparant it was, that he minded to make war again, conſidering that what ever he either did or ſaid, tended to no other end. For firſt and formoſt he cauſed all the multitude to be removed and tranſlated (with their whole families) out of the cities by the Sea-coaſt, into that quarter which now is called * Emathia, and in times paſt was named Paonia; and gave thoſe L Cities aforeſaid to the Thracians and other barbarous nations to inhabit; ſuppoſing that this kind of people would be more faſt and faithful unto him in his wars againſt the Romans. And verily this deed of his bred a great diſcontentment and murmuring throughout all Macedonia: inſomuch, as few there were of them, who thus left their native habitations together with their wives and children, that could bite in and contain their ſecret grief and heart-burning, and ſay nothing: but being pricked and netled more to anger than curbed and bridled with fear, they brake out, and were heard to curſe and cry out upon the King as they went along the way in troops and companies. Hereupon his fell ſtomack by nature was ſo galled that he had all men in jealouſy, and no time nor place there was, but he ſuſpected. In the end he began to give it out openly, that he could not make account to be in ſafety and ſecurity unleſs he apprehended and kept in priſon the M children of thoſe perſons whom he had before-time killed, for to diſpatch and make away them alſo (in time) one after another. This cruelty in it ſelf hainous enough and enormous, the calamity and woefull miſery of one houſe made more odious and deteſtable. Murdered he had many years before Herodicus, a noble man and a Prince of the Theſſalians: and ſome time after, he ſlew alſo his ſons in law, who had married his daughters. Theſe Gentlewomen being left Widows, had each of them by their Husbands a little Son: and the names of theſe women were Theoxena and Archo. As for Theoxena ſhe would in no wiſe marry again, albeit ſhe had many ſuiters that woed her: but Archo was wedded to one Poris, the very principal and nobleſt perſonage of the Ænean Nation: and when ſhe had born him many children ſhe died, and left them all very yong. Then afterwards Theoxena likewiſe was married to the foreſaid Poris, to the end, that ſhe might N have the bringing up of thoſe her ſiſters children with her own hands: and in truth ſhe was not more kind to her own pretty ſon than to thoſe her ſiſters children; but ſo tenderly regarded them all alike, as if ſhe had born them of her own body. Now when ſhe heard once of the Kings edict and proclamation which was gone forth, for the apprehenſion of all thoſe infants whoſe fathers before had been put to death; ſuppoſing that theſe children ſhould be expoſed not only to the abuſe and ſcornful mockery of the King but alſo to the luſt and villany of his guard ſhe conceived in her mind an horrible deſignment: yea, and ſhe ſtuck not to ſay, That with her own hand ſhe would rid them of their lives, rather than they ſhould come within the clutches of Philip. But Poris her husband (who abhorred the very naming of ſo abominable a fact) ſaid that he would conveigh them out of the way as far as Athens, to certain truſty friends of his there, and O would himſelf in proper perſon accompany them all the way thither, and take part with them of that exile and baniſhment. So they put themſelves in their journey all together [he and his wife and children] from Theſſalonica toward Ænea, unto a ſolemn ſacrifice and feaſt which yearly they uſe to celebrate with much ceremonious pomp, in the honor of Æneas their firſt founder. Now when they had ſpent that day in feaſting full ſolemnly, about the third watch of the night (when all others were found aſleep) they were embarked in a ſhip prepared aforehand by Poris;

* Petiotidia.

A making ſemblance, as if they would return to Theſſalonica; but indeed purpoſing to cut over to Eubœa. But when they had laboured and wrought to no purpoſe upon the wind, which was full againſt them, they were overtaken and prevented by the day-light before they were far from the Land, and paſt ſight. And being diſcovered by the Kings officers who had the charge and keeping of the haven, there was a pinnace or foiſt (well appointed with armed men) ſet out to fetch in that veſſel, with expreſs commandment (as they would anſwer to the contrary at their utter peril) not to come again without it. Now as they approached neer, Peris verily for his part was very earneſt with the rowers, mariners, and ſailers, to plie their buſineſs and make way from them; otherwhiles ſtretching out his hands up to heaven, calling and praying unto the Gods to help them in this their hard diſtreſs. But the couragious lady his wife all the while (turning again B to execute that deſignment of hers long before purpoſed) tempered and mixed a potion of poiſon, and brought forth certain ſwords withal. Now when ſhe had ſet the poiſoned cup before the children in their very eye, and drawn the ſwords naked: Death (quoth ſhe) is the only means we have to ſave our liberty; lo here the wayes that lead to death: now as every ones heart ſtandeth to this or that, take thereto, and avoid the cruelty and pride of the King. Come on lads and jolly ſtriplings, lead you the way firſt that are the bigger and elder; take ſword in hand, fall thereupon and work the feat at once: or if ye liſt rather to be long a dying, drink here of this cup. What ſhould they do? the enemies were faſt upon them ready to boord their veſſel, their mother on the other ſide, encouraging them inſtantly to take their death. In ſuch wiſe, that to conclude, ſome dying the one way and ſome the other, were all caſt headlong over ſhipboord, when they
C were but half dead. Then ſhe for her part embracing her husband about the middle (becauſe ſhe would dye with him for company) threw her ſelf and him both together into the Sea. Thus the Kings men ſeized upon the ſhip, when the maſters thereof were gone.

The horrible example of this fact kindled more coals, and ſet the malice and hatred kindled againſt the King as it were on a light and flaming fire anew, inſomuch as now commonly in al places they fell to open curſing of him and his children. Which maledictions and execrations it was not long but all the Gods liſtned and gave ear unto, and cauſed that he likewiſe exerciſed cruelty even upon his own fleſh and blood. For Perſeus ſeeing his brother Demetrius to ariſe every day more than other in favour, greatneſs, and reputation with the whole Macedonian people, and to grow alſo in credit and grace among the Romans, ſuppoſing with himſelf how he had
D no other hope left him of attaining to the crown, but by the means of ſome wicked practiſe bent all his thoughts and ſtudies that way, and aimed only at that mark. But believing verily that he was not ſtrong enough and ſufficient alone, to execute and bring forth ſo much only, as within that unmanly and womaniſh mind of his he had deviſed and conceived, he practiſed with his fathers friends, and eſtſoons ſounded their hearts one by one apart, caſting out ambiguous and doubtful ſpeeches. And at the firſt verily ſome of them ſhewed countenance, as if they could not abide to hear of any ſuch thing, becauſe they repoſed more hope in Demetrius. But afterwards, as the hatred of Philip grew daily greater againſt the Romans, which Perſeus ſtill foſtered and maintained, whereas Demetrius with all his might laboured againſt it; they fore-ſeeing in their mind the unhappy end of Demetrius, who lay too open and was not heedful enough to guard himſelf
E againſt the fraudulent and miſchievous plots of his brother, ſided with Perſeus; making this account in policy, to ſet that agoing and help it forward, which in the end would take effect, and namely to entertain and advance the hope of the mightier. For the execution of the reſt they reſerved every thing to a meet and convenient time therefore. As for the preſent, the beſt courſe they thought upon was this, to incenſe the King all that ever poſſibly they could againſt the Romans, to induce and put him forward ſtill to think of nothing but war, whereto of his own accord his mind ſtood well enough and was enclined. And withal (to the end that Demetrius might be from day to day more and more ſuſpected) they entred of purpoſe (as before they were agreed) into ſpeech, as touching the hope and great port of the Romans: whereat when ſome of them would ſeem again in ſcornful wiſe to debaſe their manners and faſhions, others to de-F prave their deeds and acts, ſome ſcoffing in general at the very form and making of their City, how it was not yet embeliſhed & beautified either with ſtately edifices in publick places, or with fair houſes of private men; others mocking and having in deriſion the principal and chief perſonages of the City in particular; the inconſiderat yong Gentleman, carried away as well with an affectionat love to the Romans, as with a deſire to croſs his brother, would anſwer to al thoſe points in the defence and maintenance of the Romans: by which means he brought himſelf both into more jelouſy with his father, and alſo to be ſubject & expoſed to ſlanderous imputations. Whereupon his father acquainted him no more with any counſel as touching the Roman affairs, but wholly relied upon Perſeus, and with him conferred thereabout, imparting unto him both day and night all his projects and deſigns whatſoever. By this time were they returned whom he chanced
G to ſend to the Baſterns for to levy ſuccors and aid-ſouldiers, and brought they had with them from thence certain noble yong Gentlemen, and ſome among of royal blood. One of them promiſed to give his ſiſter in marriage to one of Philip ſons, inſomuch as the aſſociation by way of affinity with that nation ſet the Kings heart alſo aloft. But Perſeus brake out into theſe words: "What ſerves "all this for (qd. he) ſince we have not ſo much help and ſafety by aids from abroad, as harm and "danger by a miſchief and malady at home. We keep here and foſter in our boſome, I dare not ſay "a traitor, but I aſſure you a very dangerous ſpie and no better; whoſe body verily the Romans

" have ſent us again, but his heart and ſoul they are poſſeſſed of, ever ſince he was an hoſtage at H
" Rome. All the Macedonians in a manner have their eies upon him ſet, him they court, and give " out in plain terms, that they will no other King than whom the Romans ſhall ſet up. Old Philip was of himſelf badly enough affected in his mind, but upon theſe ſuggeſtions buzzed into his head, he was the worſe, and more diſquieted and ſet out of frame: he entertained theſe ſurmiſes, and ſet them neerer to his heart than he made fair in outward ſhew and countenance. Now it fortuned that the time was come of the ordinary review of his army, the ſolemnity wherof was uſually performed in this manner. They cut a dog overthwart the midſt in two halfs, the head and foreparts together with the entrals were ſet on the right hand of the high way; the hind parts on the left.
Between this ſacrifice thus divided, the companies in their armour paſſed in a ſhew. Before the front of the vanguard were carried the coats of arms and royal enſigns of all the Macedonian Kings I that ever had been from the beginning. Then followed the King himſelf in perſon with his children. Next marched the Kings guard and cohort, with the ſquires of his body. And laſt of all, in the reregard behind came the reſt of the multitude and commons of the Macedonians. Of either ſide of the King went his ſons, two luſty Gentlemen. Perſeus was about 30 years old, and Demetrius five years yonger; the one in the mids and beſt of his age and ſtrength, and the other in the very prime and flour thereof. An happy father had he been for ſo fair iſſue, ſeeing this proof, this maturity and perfection of theirs, if the grace of God had gone withal, and that they had been well diſpoſed and affected in mind. The manner and cuſtome of this review and ſolemn ſight was (after the ſacrifice duly accompliſhed) for the whole army to jouſt and tourney in this wiſe, that being divided into two battailons, they ſhould one charge the other, and repreſent the ſhew of a very K conflict and ſet field. And who ſhould be the chief leaders and captains in this brave paſtime, but the Kings two ſons? But believe me they jeſted never a whit, nor made a vain ſhew for diſport, but went to it roundly in good earneſt, as if they would determine now who ſhould be King another day? Foul work they made with their woodden waſters and headleſs pikes; many were wounded, and nothing wanted there but ſharp iron, of a very bloody battel indeed. That regiment which Demetrius commanded, had the upper hand by ods. Perſeus ſhewed himſelf highly diſpleaſed and angry thereat; but contrary-wiſe his friends and favourits of the wiſer ſort rejoyced at it, and made remonſtrance, That this was the only thing to miniſter juſt occaſion unto him for to challenge and accuſe his yonger brother. Now the ſame day, the one as well as the other feaſted their companions, who had thus performed the jouſts and tournaments of either ſide with them. L Perſeus was invited by his brother to ſupper, but he refuſed and denied to come. Howbeit ſuch was the good fellowſhip amongſt them, and ſo merry were the yong gallants and luſty Cavaliers, that they paſſed the feaſtival day in all joy and mirth, either part with their Captain, and plied the wine full liberally. Then in their cups they fell to diſcourſing freely of their running and paſtime, and began to caſt out merry conceits and broad jeſts at their adverſaries of the contrary ſide, inſomuch as they forbare not to glance at the very Captains themſelves. Now had Perſeus ſent a privy ſpie, one of his gueſts, to liſten what good talk there was at his brothers boord, but he demeaning himſelf & walking not ſo circumſpectly as he ſhould, was encountred by certain youths, that chanced to come forth of the hall or parlor where they ſate at ſupper, and was evil entreated and well beaten for his labour. Demetrius nothing aware thereof, among other table talk, Why M go we not (qd. he) and banket with my brother? and if there remain any anger and diſpleaſure behind after our jouſting in jeſt, appeaſe and mitigate the ſame in ſimplicity of heart and mirth-mak-king? Mary, no better, cried they all again with one voyce, ſave only thoſe that feared to be met withal preſently and ſerved alike for miſuſing & knocking the forſaid ſpie. Demetrius would needs draw even them alſo with him; whereupon they carried weapons hidden under their apparel, for fear of the worſt, that they might defend themſelves, if any violence were offred. But what can be carried ſo ſecret, but out it will, where there is inteſtine diſcord in one family? All was full of ſpies and falſe knaves, as well in the one houſe as the other. For there ran a pick-thank and tale carier before unto Perſeus, and declared unto him that there were coming with Demetrius four yong men with privy skeins by their ſides. And albeit he wiſt well enough what was the cauſe thereof (for N he had heard that one of his gueſts was by them beaten) yet to aggravate the matter and make it more odious, he commanded the dore to be faſt locked, and from the upper rooms and loſts of the houſe and out of the windows to the ſtreet ſide, he kept off and repelled thoſe (that came to ban-ket and be merry with him) from approaching the dore, as if their coming were for no other purpoſe but to murder him. Demetrius after he had for a time cried out in the ſtreet and taken on for this diſgrace and indignity, ſaying it was long of the wine and nothing elſe that he was thus excluded, returned again to his own houſe to make an end of the banket there: and all this while knew nothing what the matter was. The morrow after, Perſeus, ſo ſoon as ever he thought he might have acceſs to the ſpeech of his father, came to the court; and in the ſight of the King, ſtood afar off with a troubled countenance and heavy cheer, and not a word with him. How now (qd. O " his father) what is amiſs with you? is not all well? Ah, my good lord and father (qd. he) I would " you knew, that it is the fair giſt & grace of God that I am a liveſman at this hour. That brother " of mine, goeth not about us any more by way of ſecret practiſes and hidden ambuſhes: for the " night that was, he came with armed men to ſet upon me in mine own houſe, and to take away
" my life. I was driven (father) to ſhut the doors againſt him, and to ſave my ſelf from his furious " rage, within the defence of the walls thereof. When he had thus poſſeſſed his father with fear

and

A and aſtoniſhment together: Nay (qd. he) I will prove all plainly before your face, that you ſhall know it is a truth that I ſay, if your grace can be content to give me audience. Audience? (qd. he) yes mary will I and that with patience: and immediatly he commanded Demetrius to be called before him. And withal, he ſent for two of his old friends to aſſiſt him, and to take their adviſe, to wit, Lyſimachus and Onomaſtus, who wiſt nothing of the quarrel and variance between the two brethren, for that they had been ſtrangers a long time at the court. In the mean while, he walked up and down alone, attending their coming, courſing and diſcourſing many matters in his head, and his ſon Perſeus ſtood ſtill aloof. After word was brought that the parties were come, he retired aſide with thoſe two friends, and as many of his guard into an inner room, and permitted his ſons to bring with them into the place, three friends a piece unarmed. And when he was ſet, thus be-

B gan he to ſpeak.

"Here ſit I a moſt wretched father, to be a judg between my two ſons, the one plaintif, the other "defendant in the caſe of parricides: and to find among thoſe of mine own houſe and blood, the "foul ſtain of that felonious crime, either falſly forged or indeed committed. Certainly long a- "go I feared ſuch a ſtorm and tempeſt toward: and I ſaw it riſing afar off, when I perceived your "unbrotherly looks one toward another: when I over-heard ſome unhappy words to paſs be- "tween you. Yet other whiles I was in good hope that the heat of your anger might evaporate "and ſlake, and the ſuſpicions and jealouſies be cleered and paſs away: conſidering that even pro- "feſſed and mortal enemies, have laid down arms, concluded peace, and become friends at laſt: yea, "and great quarels and enmities between private perſons have had their end. I hoped that one C "time or other, ye would remember how ye were natural brethren, that ye would call to mind, "how ye were little children together, and had conferred with all ſimplicity & ſingleneſs of heart "familiarly in your infancy: and finally, that ye would think upon my good leſſons and precepts "unto you which now I fear me much that I have ſounded to your deafears in vain. How often "have I blamed and deteſted in your preſence and hearing the examples of brethren at diſcord and "variance, recounting unto you the ſtories of the fearful ſequel and horrible iſſue thereof? namely, "how they have thereby undone themſelves and their race, overthrown their own houſes, yea & D "utterly ſubverted whole Kingdoms? On the other ſide, I laid before you better patterns and pre- "cedents to follow, and namely of the concord agreement and unity between the Lacedæmonian "KK. that raigned two by two together to their own good and the publick weal of their country "for many hundred years: but the ſame City fell ſoon to decay and ruin, when the faſhion once "was taken up, to uſurp the tyranny and ſoveraign rule every man for himſelf alone. Moreover, I "ſet before your eyes theſe two brethren hereby Eumenes and Attalus who at the firſt began with "ſo little that they were in manner abaſhed and aſhamed to take upon them the title and ſtyle of "Kings: and at this day are equal in graundeur of dominion to my ſelf to Antiochus, and to any E "Kings of this age living: and that by no other means in the world, more than by brotherly love "and mutual concord. Nay, I ſtaid not ſo but diſcourſed unto you and recited ſundry examples of "certain Romans which either I had learned by hear-ſay, or obſerved by mine own eye-ſight and "experience: and namely, the two Quintii, T. and L. who warred both againſt me. The Scipios "likewiſe, P. and L. who vanquiſhed and ſubdued Antiochus: their fathers alſo and uncles, who "were brethren, and whoſe concord and unity all their life long was ſuch, as it was not disjoyned "in their very death. But neither the wickedneſs of thoſe firſt recited, and a ſemblable end corre- "ſpondent to their ungracious life, was able to ſcare you from outragious diſcord; nor yet the "good heart & meaning of the later ſort together with their happy fortune draw & induce you to "be wiſe. During my natural life, whiles my breath is within my body, both twain of you, ſeduced "by fooliſh hope & diſordinat deſire, are ready to take poſſeſſion of my Kingdom over my head. "And ſo long only would ye have me to live, until that I ſurviving the one of you, might preſent- "ly by my death put all out of queſtion, and make the other (as ſole heir apparant) undoubted "King. Sick ye are I ſee well of father and brother, ye can abide neither the one nor the other. "There is no goodnes in you at all: nothing is there that ye hold deer, nothing that you count holy F "and inviolable: but in lieu and ſtead of all, there is crept and entred into you an unſatiable deſire "to raign, and that hath wholly poſſeſſed your hearts. Come on therefore now grieve and wound "your fathers ears with your ungracious tales and wicked words; debate and diſpute the matter "with reciprocal accuſations, you that ſhortly will decide and determine it by dint of ſword: ſay "on and ſpare not; ſpeak out all that either you can alledge truly, or liſt to deviſe & invent falſly. "Mine ears are now wide open, but ſhall hereafter for ever be cloſe ſhut, againſt all ſecret ſlanders "that ye ſhall whiſper and report one againſt the other. When he had breathed out theſe words with great indignation the aſſiſtants there began all to weep much and ſhed tears, and for a good time there was ſad cheer and not a word: until at length Perſeus began and ſaid: "I ſhould belike "have opened the dore in the night that I ſhould and received into my houſe armed gueſts to G "banquet with me, yea and held out my throat unto them for to be cut: ſince that nothing is be- "hoofful unleſs the deed had been done and diſpatched: ſince that the ſame is ſaid unto me (who "have been forlaid and whoſe life hath been ſought) which were more beſeeming to ſpeak unto "a wood-keep and robber by the high way ſide: It is not for nought I ſee well that theſe here, "give out abroad and ſay That you have no more ſons but Demetrius and call me a baſtard and a "ſuppoſed ſon of yours as begotten of a concubine. "ſmall account of my life, as to be moved neither for the danger paſt wherein I was, nor at the

"muſt die and ſay nothing, let us hold our tongue and be mute: let us only pray to the Gods be"fore that this intended miſchief begun in me, may alſo take an end in me alone, and that you be "the naked ſword drawn upon me: then I beſeech you for your own love, even for the love of I

"your good ſelf, and the name of a father (which whether of us twain have more eſteemed and "regarded, you have full well known long ago) to give me audience, and to hear me, as if you had "been awakened at my cry and pittiful lamentation in the laſt nights riot, and came in the way
"where I was forced to call, Help, Help: and as if you had taken Demetrius in the manner, with-
"in my gate, in the very entry of my dore, accompanied with armed men at an undecent and un"due hour of this night paſt. Thoſe plaints and mones which then I would have uttered by way "of diſordered and confuſed cries in that ſuddain affright of mine upon the deed doing the ſame
"I now make the morrow after. Ah brother, we have lived now a good while, not (I wot) as "brethren that ſhould banket and make merry one with another. It is the crown that you look
"after, that is certain and paſt peradventure: but your hope to attain unto it, is croſſed divers K
"waies. My birthright and mine eldership is a block in your way between you and it: the law of "nations is againſt it; the ancient cuſtome of the Macedonians checketh it; and finally, the will,
"pleaſure and judgment of our father is oppoſite unto it. Mount you cannot poſſibly ſo high, but "by the effuſion of my heart blood. You go to work, you aſſay all means, you leave no ſtone un-
"rolled, and nothing unattempted to effect that: but to this day either mine own wary diligence "or happy fortune hath guarded me and withſtood your wicked parricide. Even yeſterday, du"ring the time of the ſolemn review and purging of the army, during the time of running at tilt
"and jouſting in time of the ſhew and paſtime reſembling a skirmiſh, you miſſed very little of ma"king a bloody battail of it and a deadly conflict indeed; and nothing elſe ſaved me from death,
"but this, that I ſuffered my ſelf and my men to go by the worſe and be overcome. From this mar- L
"tial combate, as if it had been no more but a game and ſport among brethren, you would needs "have trained and drawn me to a ſupper. Why? think you father, that I ſhould have ſupped a"mong thoſe gueſts unarmed, who came in arms to banket with me? Do you believe, that I ſhould
"have been in no danger of their naked ſwords of ſteel at night; who in the day time and within "your ſight, laid on ſuch load with * wooden ſwords and baſtons, that they had like to have kil"led me? To what end elſe came you, brother at that time of the night? why came you as an ene"my, conſidering I was in choler and my blood was up? or, wherefore came you accompanied with
"tall fellows privily armed and with ſhort ſwords under their garments? I durſt not venture to ſit
"at ſupper with you: ſhould I have received you then, coming as you did with armed men to ban"quet with me? Father, if the dore had been opened; whereas you hear me now to make my com- M
"plaints, you ſhould have been by this time buſied about my winding-ſheet, herſe, and funerals.
"I lay not forth and urge matters in ſlanderous manner, after the faſhion of theſe accuſers at the "bar: neither collect I bare conjectural preſumptions to enforce & conclude any doubtful points:
"for what need I ſo to do? Denieth he that he approached my dore with a troop of men? or that "he had in his train a company, ſuch as wore weapons covertly under their apparel? Do but ſend
"for them whom I ſhall name. But in faith, what will not they dare to do, that can do this? and "yet I trow, they will never be ſo hardy and ſhameleſs as to deny it. If I had taken them in the "manner with their weapons about them within mine entry, and ſo brought them before you,
"then you would ſay it were a plain caſe and out of all doubt. If then, they confeſs as much with "their mouth, hold them as culpable as if they had been ſurpriſed in the act doing. Now curſe N
"(and ſpare not) the greedy appetite and thirſt after a Kingdom; now fall to raiſe and call up the "furies out of hell to ſet brethren together by the ears: but good father, let not your curſes and "execrations thus flie at blind random: make ſome diſtinction yet and difference, between him "that lyeth in await, and the party who is forelaid. Let him be holden guilty that ſought to kill
"his brother, let him feel withal the gods of his father to be his enemies and angry againſt him.
"But as for him who was in danger to loſe his life through his brothers miſchievous practiſe, let "him have his refuge and recourſe to the mercy and juſtice of his father. For alas, whither elſe
"ſhould I flie for ſuccour? ſeeing that neither the ſolemn review and purging of your army, nor the "running and jouſting of the men at arms, neither mine own houſe nor my table, nor yet the very "night ſeaſon (which nature hath given to mankind for covert & repoſe) affordeth me ſafety and "ſecurity? If I go to my brother (being bidden to ſupper) die I ſhall: if I receive my brother with"in my dores (coming to banquet) die I muſt. So that whether I go or ſtay all is one; I cannot a"void but fall into trains and ambuſhes, laid for to take away my life. To what place ſhall I retire
"and betake my ſelf? None have I regarded nothing have I relied upon, but the gods & your good
"ſelf, father. As for the Romans I ſtand in no ſuch terms with them of grace and favour as to truſt "upon their ſuccour: nay, they all wiſh me hanged, becauſe I take the wrongs done unto you by them,

* Sudibus, or Rudibus. The ſame I ſuppoſe that μαχαίρας ξυλίνας, Polyæn. Like as in the end of the 26 book, where, Præpilatis miſſil bus jacular, I take to be all one with ἐσφαιρωμένοις γέισοις ἀκοντίζειν, in Polyæn, when either ſome round ball of wood is faſtned to the end of the dart or javelin, after the manner of foils: or elſe it is turned round in the head like a bird-bolt. For ſo Xenophon meaneth in his book of Horſmanſhip, ἐσφαιρωμένα τὰ ἔχων ἀκόντια: of σφαῖρα, even as Præpilata, of Pila, a ball.

A "them, to the heart; because I shew my self discontented and touched with the indignity that so "many Cities, so many nations are plucked from you; and namely, that of late they have despoiled
"and bereaved you of all the maritime parts and sea coasts of Thrace: and so long as either you or "I live, they never look to enjoy Macedony. But if by the mischievous practise of my brother, I "might once be rid out of the way; and withal, if old age had made an end of you, yea, and peradventure before that day came, (which they would never stay so long for) then they know well
"and make full account, that both the King and Kingdom of Macedony, will be theirs sure enough.
"Indeed if the Romans had spared any piece at all without Macedony, I should have thought and "made reckoning, that it had been a place of retreat and refuge left for me. But what need that, so "long as I have strength enough among the very Macedonians. You saw your self yesterday how B "violently the souldiers charged upon me: what wanted they but the sharp sword and edged
"weapons? well, that which they failed and missed of in the day time my brothers banquetters met
"within the night. For to what should I speak of the greater part of the nobility? they have grounded and built all their hopes of dignity, promotion, and advancement, in the Romans, and namely, in him who now can do all in all with them and is of greatest reputation. And surely, to "speak a truth, him they prefer not only before me his elder brother, but also they go within a "very little to set him before your self, his liege King and natural father. For this is he, for whose "love and in favour of whom the Senat hath remitted and pardoned you that penalty which you
"had incurred. This is he, who now protecteth you from the force of Roman armies; who deemeth it meet and reason that your old age should be obliged and beholden to his youth. For him C "stand all the Romans with him take part all those Cities which are delivered and free from your "subjection: of him hold the Macedonians that wish for peace with the Romans, and take contentment therein. Now for me, father, what hope or help can I have elsewhere, but in you alone?
"Whereto think you send those letters of Quintius sent lately unto you; wherein he writeth, That "you did passing well for your own estate, in sending Demetrius to Rome: and exhorteth you withall, to send him again the second time, accompanied with more Embassadors, and those the very "principal and best of all the Macedonians? This T. Quintius (if you will needs know the reason)
"is the man, who leadeth, induceth, and directeth him at this present in all things: he is his counsellor and school-master. And Demetrius hath rejected and cast you off his own father, & hath "put him in your stead. There it is, where all these privy plots have heretofore been first contrived D "and set a hatching: and at this present in willing you to send more in embassage, and those the "chief personages of the Macedonians with him, he seeketh nought else but helpers and assistants
"to put those designs in execution. As many as go from hence to Rome, be they never so sound &
"uncorrupt at their setting out, be they loyal subjects and acknowledging no other but Philip for "their King, return from thence tainted and infected with the alluring enticements of the Romans. Demetrius alone is altogether in their books. They are all for him, and pass for none else.
"Him they call their King, during the life of his own father. Now if I seem to be touched, offended and grieved herewith, by and by I am sure to have it charged reproachfully on both sides of "mine ears, not only from others, but also from your mouth father, that I aspire and seek to be "King. For mine own part, I would both they and you knew, that if the diadem and crown were E "here set between us both, I would none of it. For who is he, that I should need to undermine & "supplant, for to step into his place and succeed? None there is at all but my father before me, and "long may he so be, I pray God, and I wish to survive him no otherwise, but if I be worthy and "deserve that he should likewise desire the same. If my father will make me his heir and inheritor
"of the Kingdom, I will accept thereof. He indeed coveteth to be a King, yea, and ungraciously coveteth it, who hasteneth to make pace forward, and to step before the course of nature, the order "of age, the custom of the Macedonians, and the law of nations. But what imagineth Demetrius, "suppose ye? Mine elder brother (thinketh he) stands in my way between me and home: to him
"appertaineth the Kingdom by right and by my fathers will: Let us rid him out of the World.
"What? I am not the first that sought to be a King by murder of a brother. As for my father, he is F "aged, he is desolat, and bereaved of a son; he will have more care to look to his own person, than "mind to revenge the death of his son. The Romans, they will rejoyce, they will approve and "maintain my fact. These be nice points, and these be tickliſh and doubtful hopes, but believe me
"father, they are not altogether vain and frivolous. For thus stands the case, and this is the sum of "all: Well may you preserve me out of danger, now whiles I am alive, by inflicting punishment
"upon those who take weapon in hand to kill me; but let their enterprise speed once, and take ef"fect, you shall never be able to pursue them to the purpose and revenge my death.

When Perseus had made an end of his speech, they that were present in place cast their eyes wistly upon Demetrius, as if he would have made answer immediatly, and so were all silent a long time, and said not a word: for they perceived evidently that he could not for weeping open his mouth:
G but in the end he was urged by them to speak, and then after that necessity had surmounted his grief, thus he began; "My father, all those means of help which were ever wont to serve the defen- The Oration of Demetrius in his own defence, before his father.
"dant in good stead, I am prevented and disappointed of, by the plaintif my accuser. By those false "and fained tears of his, wrung out and shed to work the ruin and undoing of another, he hath "made my true tears suspected, which gushing out of mine eyes, proceed from a melting & wounded heart within. And whereas himself hath not ceased, (ever since that I returned from Rome)
"to practise secretly with his consorts and complices both night and day to lay wait for my life,

" now he begins first with me, and will needs put upon me the visor, and have the world believe H
" that I play the part not only of a secret and cunning wait-laier, but of an open thief and a noto" rious murderer and cut-throat. He seemeth to fright you with his own danger, that he might " make even you the very means and instrument to hasten forward the death of his innocent bro" ther. He saith that he hath no place of refuge in the whole world: to the end that I might have " no parcel at all of hope left, so much as in you. Thus circumvented as I am, left alone forlorn, de" stitute and void of all succour, he chargeth me with being in favour and grace with forrain stran" gers: a thing I wis, that doth me more harm than good. Moreover, see how he proceedeth like a
" practised and cunning barrister, in that he inserteth and mingleth the last nights work together " with the blame of my former life: to the end that he might make more suspitious by the course " of mine other years passed, this criminous matter also (the simple truth whereof you shall know I
" anon) and withal confirm and maintain this vain surmise and slander, of my hopes, my will, and
" intended designs by this subtile invention of his, by the fained & forged fable I say of that which " was pretended the night that was. He hath not failed moreover to make you believe that this " accusation of his was not premeditat and studied upon beforehand, but framed ex tempore, and " occasioned only upon the suddain fright and trouble overnight. But in good faith, Perseus, if I " had been a traitor to the King my father & the realm if I had complotted with the Romans and
" other of my fathers enemies, me thinks you shold not have waited for this nights devised fable,
" but you ought to have accused me before this time, of treason. And if that imputation were vain
" and frivolous without this surmise, and served to discover and bewray your envy & spight which " you bear against me, more than it detecteth any crime which is in me: yet you should have let K
" me alone and forborn this day, or put it off until another time; that it might have been cleerly
" seen whether of us twain laid wait for the other, you or I, upon a strange & extraordinary man" ner of hatred. As for me (so far forth as I possible can, in this suddain trouble of my spirits) I will " endeavour to speak severally of each point, which you have heaped up together so disorderly,
" and reveal I will the ambushes and trains of this night, yours or mine, fall out as it shall. He " would have it thought that I practised to kill him, for this intent forsooth, that when mine elder
" brother were once made away, unto whom the inheritance of the crown appertained by the law
" of nations, by the custom of the Macedonians, and also, as he saith, by your judgment; I the yon-" ger might step into his place, and succed him whom I had killed. What meaneth then, and " whereto serveth that other part of his Oration, wherein he saith, that I have been so respective to L
" the Romans, and that upon the affiance that I have in them, I hoped to be King? For if I were
" perswaded thus of the Romans, that they could set up whom they pleased to be King of Mace-
" donie, & if withal I presumed so much of their good grace and favor to me-ward, what need had
" I then to commit a parricide? Was it because I had a mind to wear a diadem embrued with my " brothers blood by me murdered? and was I desirous to make my self odious & execrable among " them, with whom either for mine honesty indeed, or at least-waies for a counterfeit shew ther-
" of, I have won some credit, such as it is, if haply it be any at all? Unless perhaps, you think that
" T. Quintius (by whose vertue and counsel, you reproach me that I am ruled) advised me to kill
" my brother, Quintius, I say, who is so kind unto his own brother, and liveth with him so loving" ly. This plaintif & accuser of mine hath collected not only the affection of the Romans which M
" they bear unto me, but also the opinion which the Macedonians have of me, yea, and in a manner
" the consent of all Gods and men in my behalf; in which regards all, he took himself not able to " match me in this quarrel and difference about the Kingdom: and yet see, how the same man
" laieth to my charge, that as if I were in all other respects, inferior unto him, I was fain to have " recourse to this last shift of practising mischief and wickedness. Will you have this to be the case?
" Will you be content to join issue in this point? That whether of us twain feared the other to be
" reputed worthier of the Kingdom, he should be judged & condemned to have sought and con" ceived the death of his brother? But let us discuss and examine in some sort or other, the order " and manner of this pretended and devised crime. He hath burdened me, that I have laid for him
" many and sundry waies: yet hath he knit up all these means and conched them together in one N
" daies work. I purposed to kill him (saith he) in the open day-light, after the solemn review and " assoiling of the army, even when we jousted together, and seemed to charge one another in bat-
" tel-wise: yea, upon the very day (God he knoweth) of the said solemnity. I intended I wis (be" lieve him if you will) when I invited him to supper, to make him away with a cup of poison. I " would have stabbed him (what else?) or run him through with my sword, when I came to ban-
" ket with him, & was accompanied with some of my train armed and having weapon about them.
" You see, father, what proper and choice opportunities I had picked out to commit this preten" ded murder; namely, the very day of disports, the time of supper, of banket and collation. As for " the day, let us examine it and the manner thereof: was it any other than that, wherein the army
" was surveied and solemnly purged? when between a sacrifice cut in twain, the royal coats of all O
" the arms of Macedonian Kings that ever had been, were carried aloft in a stately shew; and we " alone your two sons (father) marched on either side of you before the rest, and the whole Ma" cedonian army followed after. When I was thus cleansed and purified by this expiatory sacrifice
" (if haply I had committed any sin before that deserved expiation) and especially at the very " same instant when I beheld before mine eyes (on either side of the way) the parcels of the beast " sacrificed: entertained I then in my thoughts the practise of poison, & the handling of swords pre" pared

A "pared aforehand against the banket, to perform a parricide? that afterwards I might with some "other sacrifices expiat and cleanse my conscience thus stained & defiled with all kind of wicked-
"nes? A likely matter surely. But a spirit corrupt & blinded with the humour of slandering ano"ther, upon a desire to gather matter and make al suspicious, careth not to huddle one thing upon "another confusedly. For if I meant to have poisoned you at supper, what was there more unfit "to set forward that designment, than to provoke you to anger, by running so eagerly upon you &
"fighting with you so roughly, that thereby you might take good and just occasion to refuse be"ing requested, for to come to supper? And when in your choler you had once denied to sup with "me, was it not the next way for me then, to endeavour how to appease you, and seek some other "opportunity, since I had prepared the poison for that present only? But I must leap from that de-B "signment to another, even to the killing of you by the sword, and that upon the very same day,
"under a pretence of banquetting with you? If I thought that for fear of death you forbare my ta"ble at supper time, how comes it that I imagined not semblably, that for the said fear you would "avoid my company at banquet after supper? There is no cause why I should be ashamed, Father,
"if upon such a festival day as it was I drank wine liberally, and took perhaps a cup too much a"mong my companions. Nay, I would it might please your majesty to enquire with what mirth,
"and meriment I feasted yesterday at home in my house, and this joy set us the farther out, be"cause in that warlike pastime of lusty youths, our side went not by the worse. But this misery &
"unhappy fear upon that our mirth, hath well delaied and cooled the wine: spent it hath the "strength thereof fuming up into our heads: which if it had not come between, we as great laiers C "await as we were, had to this hour lien sound asleep in our beds. Well, if I had minded to assail
"and force your house, and that done, to murder you the master thereof, would I not think you,
"have for born for my part one day to bib and quaff wine so freely? and likewise kept my souldiers
"from drinking drunk? But because I should not alone plead my simplicity and make my excuse "thereby, this my good brother also, who God wot is none of these naughty and suspitious crea"tures, comes in with his vie and saith, I know nothing, I charge no body, neither wot I what to "say else, but that they came armed to banquet with me. If I might be so bold as to ask how you "came to that knowledge, you cannot chuse but confess that either my house was full of your
"spies, or those armed men of my train took their weapons so openly, that every one saw them.
"And because he would have you believe, that neither himself made any enquiry before, nor at D "this time pursueth the matter with any accusatory spirit, he willed you to demand of them whom
"he named, whether they had not their swords about them? to the end that after you had sought
"into it as a matter doubtful, and found them to confess it, they might thereby be held convicted.
"But why rather will you not, that examination should be taken in this manner; whether they "took their swords with them to kill you or no? And whether they did so by my warrant, directi"on, and privity? For this is it that you (brother) would make the world believe, this is it which "you would have to appear, and not that which my men confess. But the case is plain, yea, & they "will be known no other, than that they were armed in their own defence. Whether it were well "or ill done, they are of age to make account and render a reason of their doings. Do not you "mingle my cause with that action of theirs, which interesseth it nothing at all. But rather de-E "clare, whether we meant to assail you openly or secretly? If openly, why were we not all armed?
"why was there none of us besides those persons that did beat your spie? If secretly, what was the "train and order of the execution of that design? After the banket ended, and I the setter of the "banket retired from thence, should those four have staied behind to fall upon you when you "were asleep? How could they have caried it so close as not to be spied, for that a litle before, they "had been seen in a braul? And say, they had killed you; by what means could they escape them"selves? Was it possible that your house should be forced and kept with four swords? Fie, fie
"Perseus speak no more for shame of this night, but come again to that rather which galleth you
"at the heart, which kindleth your envy, and setteth you on fire. How cometh it to pass, O Deme-
"trius, that men speak abroad that you shall be King? why should you be deemed of some more F "worthy than my self, to succeed the royal estate of my father? How is it that I am in doubt of my "hope, which, but for you, were sure & certain? These are the secret thoughts of Perseus, although "he saith nothing: these make him of a brother to become an enemy: these cause him to be mine
"accuser: these conceits they be that fill your palace, your court and your realm, with surmises, slan-
"ders, and suspicions. But for mine own part, father, like as I ought neither to hope for your roial
"crown, nor at any time peradventure, to make words and dispute about it; because I am the "yonger, and because it is your will and pleasure, that I should give place unto mine elder bro"ther: so, it became me not heretofore, neither doth it become me yet, so demean my self so in any "action, that I should seem unworthy to have you for my father, but to be capable of all dignities "whatsoever. The one point I should attain unto by indirect courses and wicked vices, in not G "yeelding unto him, as right and reason would: but the other, by my good carriage and sober be"haviour. You reproach me with the Romans, brothers, and those things which in right ought to "turn to my praise and glory, you blame and reprove me for. It was no seeking of mine, that I was "delivered to the Romans as an hostage, or sent to Rome as Embassador: but when I was ap"pointed by you, father, I refused not to go. At both times, such was my demeanor, that I had an "eye still and good regard, not to discredit either your highness, or your Kingdom, or the Mace"donian nation. And therfore you were the cause, father, of that friendship which I have with the "Romans,

"Romans. As long as you and they are at peace, I ſhall be well affected to them: begin war once;
"I that was an hoſtage and Embaſſador among them, and (though I ſay it) not unprofitable for "you my father, even I, will become a moſt ſpiteful and mortal enemy unto them. Neither do I at "this day require, that the favour I have among the Romans might ſtead me any way; only I be"ſeech you, that it may not prejudice and harm me. It began not by occaſion of war, neither is it
"reſerved for the time of war. For aſſurance of peace, I was a pledge and hoſtage: for maintenance "of peace I was emploied in embaſſage. Content will I be, by the one and the other, in caſe I nei"ther purchaſe fame nor incur blame. If I have committed any impiety againſt you father, if I have "done or deſigned any wicked part againſt my brother, I refuſe no puniſhment, I crave no pardon
"or favor. If I be innocent, I deſire only and humbly beſeech your grace, that I be not over-
"weighed with the heavy load of envy and ill will, ſince I can be overthrown by no crime juſtly I "objected unto me. This is not the firſt day, that my brother hath accuſed me: but this is the "firſt day, that he is ſeen to be my accuſer: and full little have I deſerved it at his hands. If my fa"ther had been diſpleaſed and angry with me, I would have thought that you of all others, being
"the elder brother, ſhould have been a mediator and interceſſor for me (the yonger) to my father,
"and a means to purchaſe a pardon for my folly and the error of tender youth: but ſee! where my "ſuccour and refuge ſhould have been, there contrary-wiſe is my ruin and overthrow. From my
"feaſting and banquetting, from my mirth and good cheer, by his means have I been haled hither
"not half waked, but with mine eyes full of ſleep, to anſwer in the caſe of parricide: and forced I "am to plead mine own cauſe without my counſel, without my proctor or advocate. If I had "been to ſpeak in the defence of another, I would have taken time to ſtudy premeditat and frame K
"an oration. And yet, what was I to hazard there, but the reputation of wit and learning. Inſtead "thereof I, not knowing for what cauſe I was ſent for, heard your Majeſty firſt (wroth and angry
"as you were) to command us to plead our cauſes: and then my brother, who hath ſtood up to ac-
"cuſe me. As for him, he hath pronounced an Oration ſtudied for, and deviſed long before hand:
"but I was allowed no longer time (than whiles I heard my ſelf accuſed) to be think me what to "plead or to examine and take knowledg of the matter that he hath laid forth againſt me. In that "preſent moment of time, could I, think you (ſo ſuddainly taken as I was) either give ear to my
"accuſer, or conſider and think duly of mine own plea? ſtonied ſo I was, with that ſuddain trouble
"and unexpected occurrent, that much ado I had, to underſtand what I was charged with: ſo far
"was I from deviſing what to ſpeak in mine own defence. What hope ſhould I have now? and in L
"what caſe were I, if I had not my father for my judge? at whoſe hands (albeit I am not ſo well be"loved as mine elder brother is, yet ſince I am the party defendant, I ought at leaſt wiſe to find as "much pitty and compaſſion. For I beſeech you (O father) to ſave me, in regard of my ſelf and
"you: but he requireth you to take away my life, only for his own aſſurance and better ſecurity.
"And what will he do againſt me think you, after you have made over the crown and ſcepter
"into his hands; who now already thinketh it meet and reaſon, to diſpoſe of my blood at his good "pleaſure? In uttering of theſe words, the tears guſhed forth ſo abundantly, that they ſtopped his mouth ſo, that he could neither ſpeak or draw his breath. Then Philip after he had commanded them to go apart, and communed a while with his friends, ſpake and ſaid, That he would not decide their cauſe upon theſe words of theirs, nor upon one hours debating, but by enquiry into M both their lives, and obſerving their behaviour in deed and word, as well in great matters as in ſmall. Hereby they all ſaw well enough, that the accuſation of the precedent nights act, was ſufficiently refuted and evicted & the only thing in Demetrius to be ſuſpected, was the over-great favour that the Romans bare toward him. This was the very ſeed of the Macedonian war, ſowed as one would ſay, during the life of Philip, but the war was after to be waged moſt of all againſt Per-ſeus.

The two Conſuls took their journy into Liguria, the ſole conſular Province of them both; and becauſe they had atchieved their exploits fortunatly there, ordained there was a ſolemn proceſſion for one day. It fortuned that there came two thouſand Ligurians or thereabout, to the utmoſt frontier of the Province of Gaul, where Marcellus lay in leaguer, requeſting to be received under his N protection. Marcellus after he had commanded the ſaid Ligurians to give attendance upon him in the ſame place, required by his letters the advice of the Senat. The Senat gave order to M. Ogul-nius the Lord chief juſtice of the City, to write back again unto Marcellus to this effect, That it was more meet that the Conſuls, unto whom that government appertained, ſhould give order and determine (as touching the Ligurians who yeelded and ſubmitted) what was expedient for the common-weal in that behalf, than the Senat. As for them, if they were to give their opinion, they thought it not good to accept of the Ligurians ſurrender: and being once received then to be diſarmed: but they were of this mind and advice, that it was requiſit they ſhould be ſent and referred over to the Conſuls.

The Pretors at the ſame time arrived in their Provinces, to wit P. Manlius in baſe Spain, where he had been Governor before during his former Pretorſhip; and Q. Fulvius Flaccus in the higher where he received the army of Terentius; for that other ſide of Spain beyond Iberus, had been left without a Lord Deputy, by occaſion of the death of P. Sempronius the Pro-pretor. Whiles Ful-vius Flaccus aſſaulted a Town in Spain named Ilibicula, the Celtiberians made head and came upon him; where many and ſundry hot skirmiſhes paſſed, and wherein many Roman ſouldiers were both hurt and ſlain. Howbeit Fulvius held ſtill his reſolution, and by no forcible

A cible means whatsoever, could be brought to levy the siege. The Celtiberians toiled out of heart with divers combats, retired and departed. The City then seeing their succours dislodged and gone, within few daies was forced and ransacked; and the Pretor gave the pillage thereof to his souldiers. Thus Fulvius after he had gained this Town, and P. Manlius, when he had retired and rallied his forces into one place, which had been dispersed, without any other memorable act performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And these were the exploits in Spain, during that summer season. Terentius who was departed out of that Province before, entred the City of Rome in a petty triumph by way of ovation. He carried before him in shew, eight thousand three hundred and twenty pound weight of silver, and fourscore of gold: besides two golden coronets weighing 67 pound.

B The same year the Romans were chosen Arbitrators between the people of Carthage and King Masanissa, as touching their territories: and came personally to see the place in controversy. And thus stood the case: Gala the father of this Masanissa, had won the ground in question from the Carthaginians. Syphax afterward disseized Gala thereof: and consequently to gratify Asdrubal, his wives father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and set them in possession again. Now last of all, even this very year, Masanissa had dispossessed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both sides in the presence of the Romans, with no less courage and fervency of spirit, than at other times when they tried the issue by dint of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claim and put in their plea. For that first it appertained to their ancestors in right of inheritance, and afterwards was conveighed to them by the free gift and dona-

C tion of Syphax. Masanissa counterpleaded again and alledged, that he had both recovered the said territory, as parcel of his fathers realm, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the case was cleer on his side, in regard as well of the just title as also of the present possession wherein he was; saying, that in his cause he doubted nothing else but that the modesty of the Romans should prejudice him, for fear lest they might be thought to be partial in the cause and respective to him, a King their ally and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their award against the common enemies both to him and them. The Commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienat the right of possession, but left all as they found it, and referred the entire decision of the matter to the Senat of Rome.

Nothing was there done after this in Liguria: for first, the enemies were retired for safety into

D their wilds and forrests out of the way: and afterwards they casted their army, and slipt away every man to their own villages and castles. The Consuls likewise were willing to break up and dismiss their forces; and thereupon sent to the LL. of the Senat to know their pleasure in that point; who advised the one of them to discharge his own regiments, and repair to Rome for the election of Magistrats the next year: and the other, with his legions, to winter at Pisa. A rumour there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in arms: but it was not known what quarter of Italy this multitude thus levied would invade. But the Consuls thus agreed together, that Cn. Bœbius should be present at the general assembly at Rome, for the election aforesaid, because M. Bœbius his brother sued to be Consul. Then was the assembly holden for the creation of Consuls, and elected there were, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Bœbius Tamphilus. This done,

E the Pretors also were chosen, namely, the two Quintii Fabii, the one Maximus, and the other Buteo; T. Claudius Nero, Q. Petilius Spurinus, M. Pinarius Posca and L. Duronius. When these were entred into their magistracy, the Provinces were by lot after this manner disposed. The Liguran sell to the Consuls: as for the Pretors, Q. Petilius was Lord chief Justice for the citizens pleas, and Q. Fabius Maximus for the strangers: Q. Fabius Butco had the government of Gaul, T. Claudius Nero of Sicilia, M. Pinarius of Sardinia, L. Duronius of Apulia together with the Istrians; for that the Tarentins and Brundusins had given intelligence, that the sea-coasts were much troubled and annoied by the robberies of pirats and men of war from beyond Sea: and the like complaints were made by the Massilians, of the Ligurian navy. For these causes order was given, and warrants went out for to levy armies: that the Consuls should have four legions between them, containing in every one 5200 Roman footmen and 300 horse: also to enrol 15000 footmen and 800 horsemen of Latine allies. In the Provinces of Spain (both the one and the other) the old Pretors continued still in their government, with the charge of those armies which they had already: and for a supplement to reenforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed 3000 foot and 200 horse of Roman citizens together with 6000 of the one and 300 of the other, from out of the Latine nation. All this while they forgat not their navy at Sea. And the Consuls had in charge to chuse for that purpose, two wardens called Duumvirs, who after they had out of the Arsenal shot into the Sea twenty ships, and set them aflote, should furnish them with mariners, and those Roman citizens, such as had been slaves and were enfranchised: and that natural Romans free-born should only be Captains and have the conduct of the said vessels. These two

G Duumvirs so parted and ordered betwixt them the defence of the maritime coasts with ten ships apeece; that the Cape of Minerva should be as it were the middle point and mark between them: so as the one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Massilia; and the other the left side, even to Barium.

This year were seen at Rome and reported from forrain parts many uncouth and strange prodigies. In the Church-yards belonging to Vulcan and Concordia, it rained sheer blood: and the Bishops made relation, that the Spears [of Mars] shook and moved of their own accord.

Also

Alſo at Lanuvium the image of Juno Sospita ſhed tears. Moreover, the plague reigned ſo hot in H the contrey villages market Towns marts and places of frequent reſort yea, and within the City of Rome ſo that they were not able to furniſh the funerals accordingly and inter the dead. The LL.
of the Senat, being in great anguiſh and trouble, in regard of thoſe tearful tokens and the loſs of their people, ordained, That as well the Conſul ſhould kil greater beaſts for ſacrifice unto what Gods they thought good, as alſo the Decemvirs ſhould viſit and peruſe the prophetical books of Sybylla. And by vertue of their decree there was publick ſupplication proclaimed at Rome for one whole day, at all the altars and ſhrines of the gods and goddeſſes. By their counſel alſo and direction both the Senate adviſed and the Conſuls alſo publiſhed throughout all Italy for three daies ſpace, ſolemn litanies and devour holy-daies. The rage of this peſtilence was ſo great, that whereas there paſſed an act by the Senate to enrol 8000 footmen and three hundred horſe from I out of the Latins (in regard that the Ilanders of Corſica were revolted and the Iolians up in arms within Sardinia) with which power M. Pinarius the Pretor was to ſail over into Sardinia: the Conſuls made report again unto them, that ſuch numbers of people were dead already, and ſo many lay ſick, that it was not poſſible to levy that proportion of fighting men. So the Pretor had commiſſion to furniſh out that defect of ſouldiers, with a ſupply which he was to receive of Cn.
Fabius the Pro-conſul, who then wintered at Piſa; and from them directly to take the ſeas and paſs over into Sardinia.

L. Duronius the Pretor (unto whom the Province of Apulia was allotted) had a commiſſion be-ſides to make inquiſition for the Bacchanals, for there remained yet ſome ſeeds of the former enormities which began already the former year to ſprout and bud forth. But L. Pappius the Pretor K laſt before had entred into the enquiry and ſearch of the matter, rather than effected ought and brought it to a final end: and therefore the LL. gave order to this new Pretor to cut off this miſchief in the ſpring and breeding thereof before it gat more head a ſecond time. and upon growth ſpred ta ther. Moreover the Conſuls by the advice and authority of the Senat, preferred certain * Lex de am- laws unto the people, as touching the * inordinat ſuit and ambitious ſeeking after offices of go*bitu.* vernment. After all this they brought into the Senat the forrein embaſſages; and gave audience firſt to them that came from the KK. to wit Eumenes, Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and Pharnaces of Pontus. But no other diſpatch and anſwer they had than this That they would tender certain Delegats and commiſſioners to hear decide and determine their controverſies. After them the Embaſſadors of the Lacedæmonian exiles, and of the Achæans were admitted into the Senat L houſe. The baniſhed perſons aforeſaid were put in ſome good hope, that the Senat would write their letters to the Achæans for their reſtauration. The Achæans declared as touching the recovery of Meſſene and the pacification of all troubles there, with the great contentment of the LL. of the Senat. There arrived moreover two Embaſſadors from Philip King of the Macedonians, namely Philocles and Apelles, about no ſuit that they had to the Senat, but ſent rather as ſpies to under-prie and to learn ſomwhat as touching thoſe points that Perſeus had charged Demetrius with, and namely of certain ſpeeches that he ſhould have with the Romans, and eſpecially with T. Quin- tius, againſt his brother about ſucceſſion in the Kingdom. Theſe twain were choſen by the King as indifferent perſons, and nothing affectionat either to the one brother or the other: howbeit they were the miniſters, conſorts, and complices of Perſeus, in his intended miſchievous plot a- M gainſt his brother. Demetrius (as one ignorant of all deſignments againſt him but only of the late wicked prank of Perſeus which laſt brake out) at the firſt was neither in great hope, nor yet in utter deſpair to be reconciled unto his father. But afterwards, he had leſs confidence every day than other in the good affection of his father toward him, ſeeing his brother continually to buz into his ears many matters, and poſſeſs his head with tales againſt him. And therefore he looked circumſpectly about him that he trode not awry and namely, that he let no words fall or did any thing that might be offenſive and breed more jealouſy: and above all, he wholly forbare conference and commerce with the Romans; in ſuch ſort that he would not have them ſo much as to write any letters unto him: knowing full well, that his fathers heart would be exaſperated againſt him by ſuch imputations and informations eſpecially. N

Philip becauſe he would provide that his ſouldiers and men of action ſhould not degenerate and wax worſe through idlenes and diſuſe of arms and that under one he might avert from himſelf all ſuſpition that he intended any war againſt the Romans, appointed the City Strobi for the Rendez- vous of his army and marched into the quarters of Medica. A great deſire he had to mount up the * Catena mundi, creſt & top of the hill * Æmus becauſe there was an opinion commonly received & which he had or, Mane ar- given credit unto that from thence a man might diſcover within one proſpect the * Pontick and gentato. Adriatick ſeas, the river * Iſter alſo, and the Alps: for thus he thought, that the view of theſe places
* Mar. mainre. would ſtand him in no ſmall ſtead in projecting & plotting the war againſt the Romans. When af-* Danubius, Do- ter diligent inquiry of them that knew thoſe quarters well, as touching the aſcent of that moun-naw. tain, he had learned and found it cleer and certain, that there was no way at all for to conduct an O army thither and that a few men & thoſe nimble and lightly appointed, ſhould find enough to do and exceeding much difficulty to paſs, he taketh his yonger ſon apart, whom he was reſolved not to have with him in that expedition; and becauſe he would ſeem to dulce and mollify his diſcontented mind with ſome familiar and private ſpeech, firſt he demanded of him conſidering ſo great difficulties of the journey preſented unto them, whether he were better to hold on the way ſtil and " follow his deſign, or give over? But if I ſhould go forward (qd. he) I cannot forget that which

" befel

A "befell to Antigonus in the like caſe, who being upon a time much toſſed at Sea in a boiſterous
"tempeſt, and having with him in the ſame ſhip all thoſe that were of his bloud, is reported "to have given this good advertiſement and leſſon to his children, that they ſhould alwayes re"member; and alſo give their poſterity warning, never to venture all their goods in one bottome,
"nor to engage themſelves together with their whole race and off-ſpring in any peril and danger.
"Remembring therefore (qd. he) this good precept and counſel of his, I will not hazard both my
"ſons at once in this preſent jeopardy which I ſee before mine eyes: but for aſmuch as I propoſe
"to take mine elder ſon with me, I will ſend my yonger back into Macedony, for to uphold and "maintain the hope of my poſterity, and for the defence of my Kingdom in the mean while. De- metrius found him ſtreight, and wiſt well enough that he was ſent away for no other intent but B that he ſhould not be preſent in counſel, when upon the view of thoſe places aboveſaid, he was to deviſe and conſult in what coaſt lay the neereſt and ſhorteſt way to the Adriatick Sea and to Italy, and what courſe they ſhould plot for the management of the war. But there was no remedy: he muſt not only then obey his father, but alſo ſooth him up and ſeem to approve and like well of that which he ſaid, for fear leſt it might be thought, that it went againſt his ſtomack to yeeld obedience unto him: and ſo be held in more jelouſy and ſuſpition than before. Howbeit, to the end that he might paſs into Macedony with ſafety, Didas one of the Kings Deputies and L. Governor under him of Paonia, was commanded to accompany and conduct him with a mean guard and convoy. Now was this Didas one of thoſe conſpirators that had ſworn the death of Demetrius, whom Perſeus had made ſure to his part, like as he had many other of his fathers friends, even ſince C that men began to make no doubt, unto whom Philip in affection was enclined, and whom he meant to make the heir apparent of the crown. And at this very inſtant Perſeus had charged him and given him inſtructions, by all obſequious ſervices to inſinuate and wind himſelf into moſt familiar talk, and to come ſo neer within him, that he might draw from him all his ſecrets, & diſcover the very inward and hidden thoughts of his heart. Thus departed Demetrius attended with a train about him more dangerous to his perſon, than if he had travelled alone without any company. Philip firſt paſſed through Mædica and then forward over the deſarts lying between Mædica and Æmus, and at the ſeventh daies march was come as far as to the foot of the mountain. Where after he had reſted and ſtaied one day, to make choice of thoſe whom he minded to take up with him: the morrow after he ſet forth & put himſelf in his way. At the firſt, the labour was not great, D nor the pains much to overcome the nethermoſt hills; but the farther they went and the higher that they advanced, the more wild and woody ſtill they found every place; yea, and they met with many that had no paſſage at all. At length they were mounted to a paſs or way ſo ſhadowed and dark, that for the trees ſtanding ſo thick together, and their boughs plaited and interlaced one within another, ſcarcely or hardly could a man ſee the skie through them. But when they approched once the pitch and creſt of the mountain, behold (a thing not lightly ſeen in other parts) they light upon ſo groſs and thick a miſt, which overſpread and covered all, that they had as much ado to march forward, as if they had travelled in the dark & mid-night. At laſt by the third daies end, they gained the very top of the mountain. Now when they were come down from thence again, they made no leſs report thereof than the common opinion was that went of it; which I believe E verily they did of purpoſe, becauſe they would not be mocked and ſcorned for this their fooliſh and vain voiage, rather than for that they could indeed within the ſame proſpect and from one place, view ſeas, mountains, and rivers, ſituat and diſtant ſo far aſunder. Much moiled they were all, and ſore toiled in this untoward way; but the King above the reſt, by reaſon that he was far ſtept in age, and unweldy of body. Well, after he had done ſacrifice there upon two altars conſecrated to Jupiter and the Sun, he deſcended in two daies, whereas he had made three of it in aſcending: and that which he feared moſt, was the cold nights, which there in the beginning of the dog-daies were like to thoſe of midwinter in other places. Many difficulties he wreſtled and ſtrove withal during thoſe daies, and being returned into his camp, he found no better. Nothing was there but extream want & penury, as being pitched in a place compaſſed about on every ſide with deſarts and F wilderneſs. And therefore when he had ſtaied there but one only day to reſt and repoſe his men, whom he had taken with him in that journey, he haſtned away, and in a running march, as if he had fled in rout, entred the countrey of the Denthelets. Theſe Denthelets were his own confederat allies, but the Macedonians (ſuch was their need and neceſſity) pilled and ſpoiled their confines, no leſs than if they had been profeſſed enemies. For firſt they waſted & deſtroied their holts, granges, and farm houſes, afterwards certain wicks and villages alſo, robbing and rifling as they went, to the great diſhonor of the King; who could not chuſe but hear the piteous complaints & mones of his aſſociats crying to the Gods, Patrons of alliances, and calling upon his name for help, but could have no redreſs and remedy. When he was purveyed of corn from thence, and returned into the countrey Mædica, he began to aſſail a City which they call Petra. Himſelf in perſon lay encam-G ped in the avenue and ready way upon the plains, but he ſent his ſon Perſeus with a ſmall company to fetch a compaſs and give the aſſault from the higher places that commanded the Town. The Townſmen thus hard beſted with terror on every ſide for the preſent yeelded upon compoſition, and gave hoſtages: but after the army was rerired, they forgetting their pledges, abandoned the City and fled for refuge into certain forts, fenced places, and high mountains. Philip having wearied his ſouldiers with all manner of travel to no effect, and withal entertained more jelouſie and ſuſpition of his ſon Demetrius, by the lewd practiſe and falſe ſuggeſtions of Didas (the Governor of Paonia) returned into Macedony. This Didas (as hath been ſaid before) ſent to conduct Demetrius home, abuſed the ſimplicity of the yong Gentleman, who was nothing circumſpect and wary, but ſeemed diſcontented and complained to him (as good cauſe he had) of thoſe that were neereſt in nature and blood unto him; he, I ſay, by flattering, by ſoothing him up, and ſeeming withal to be offended and grieved for his part at ſuch hard vſage, laid ſnares and grins, and ſet traps for him; and in concluſion, by his double diligence, and offering his voluntary ſervice to do him pleaſure, proteſting alſo to be true and faſt unto him, yea, and to keep his counſel, fetched out of him the very ſecrets of his heart. Now had Demetrius a purpoſe with himſelf to flie to Rome, and to effectuate this deſignment of his, he was perſwaded, that of a ſpecial grace and favour the Gods had ſent and offered unto him this Didas the Pretor of Paonia to be his helper and aſſiſtant; for through his Province he conceived ſome hope to paſs and eſcape with ſecurity. This intent and plot of his was both immediately diſcloſed to his brother Perſeus, and alſo by him declared to his father. And firſt were letters hereof brought unto him, whiles he lay at the ſiege of Petra. Afterwards Herodorus (the principal friend that Demetrius had) was committed to ward, and withal, order was taken to watch and obſerve Demetrius that he ſtarted not aſide; but all underhand and cloſe, without ſemblance of any ſuch matter. Theſe occurrents above all others, cauſed the King to have a dolorous and heavy return into Macedony. Theſe new accuſations thus preſented, troubled him much: howbeit he thought good to expect the return of thoſe whom he had ſent to Rome as ſpies to hear all and find out the truth. In the anguiſh and agony of theſe cares and perplexities, when the King had continued certain months, in the end thoſe Embaſſadors came home; who at firſt ere they ſet foot out of Macedony, had deviſed and framed before hand what reports they would make from Rome. Theſe meſſengers, to make up the full meaſure of all their wicked and divelliſh practiſes, delivered alſo into the Kings hand a falſe and forged letter, ſealed with a counterfeit ſignet of T. Quintius. The ſaid letter was indited to this tenor and effect, That Quintius ſhould ſeem for his own excuſe to ſay, that albeit yong Demetrius, carried away with an inordinat deſire to be King, had ſlipped a little, and treated with him about ſome ſuch matter, yet would he do nothing to prejudice any one about K. Philip, neither would he be thought or found a man, to give any ungodly and ungracious counſel. Theſe letters ſtruck it dead ſure, and made the King believe, that all the former imputations faſtned upon Demetrius were true and paſt all peradventure. Whereupon Herodorus preſently was put to the rack and examined, but after he had endured intolerable pains a long time, and confeſſed nothing, he died in the end under the tormentors hand. Perſeus accuſed Demetrius again before his father, for that he intended and provided to take his flight through Paonia. And there came forth certain to teſtify againſt him, ſaying, that he had corrupted, inveigled, and induced them to accompany him in that journey. But that which made moſt of all againſt him, was that ſame deviſed letter of T. Quintius. Howbeit there was no grievous ſentence pronounced openly againſt him, to the end, that rather by ſome covert and cautelous practiſe, he might come to his death: and this, not for any fear that he had of him, but doubting leſt ſome open puniſhment executed upon him, might reveal and diſcover his ſecret deſignment, of making war upon the Romans.

Philip himſelf taking his journy from Theſſalonica to come to Demetrias, ſent Demetrius his ſon to Æſtreum, a City in Paonia, and the ſame Didas ſtill to accompany him: but Perſeus he addreſſed to Amphipolis, for to receive the hoſtages of the Thracians. Now it is reported, that when Didas took his leave of him and departed, the King gave him in charge to kill his ſon Demetrius. Didas then, either purpoſing indeed or making ſemblance to ſacrifice, invited Demetrius to the celebration and feaſt thereof, whereupon he came from Æſtreum to Heraclea. And (as men ſay) at this ſupper he met with a cup of poiſon. He had no ſooner drunk it, but immediatly he felt that he was ſped; for within a while it began to work extreamly, and for very dolour and pain, he was forced to riſe from the Table and retire into his bed-chamber: where he pitiouſly complained of the hard heart and cruelty of his father, of the murderous mind of the parricide his brother, and of the trecherous villany of Didas: and all this while endured deadly wrings and torments in his belly. But afterwards there were ſent into the chamber, one Thyrſis a Stuberæan, and Alexander of Berrhæa, who enwrapped his head and throat with the bed-cloaths, carpets and counterpoints of tapiſtry, and held them ſo hard, that they throtled and ſmothered him, and in the end ſtopped his breath that he died. Thus was this poor innocent yong man piteouſly made away; whoſe enemies one ſingle kind of death could not content and ſatisfy, but needs they muſt kill and murder them twice.

Whiles theſe things hapned in Macedony, L. Æmylius Paulus, who continued ſtill in government after his Conſulſhip expired, marched with his army againſt the Ligurians Ingaunes in the beginning of the ſpring. So ſoon as he was entred into the confines of his enemies country, and there encamped, there came Embaſſadors unto him under colour of ſeeking peace, but indeed only to eſcout and ſpie. Paulus made them anſwer, That he could contract no accord with them, unleſs they yeelded firſt: which they ſeemed not ſo much to refuſe, but ſaid, That they needed ſome time to perſwade their nation unto it, being a rude and uncivil kind of people. And when they had ten daies truce allowed to effect this, they requeſted moreover, that the Roman ſouldiers might not paſs over the next hills adjoyning, either for fewel or forage, for aſmuch as thoſe lands were the only tilled and well manured grounds of their appurtenances and territory. When they had obtained ſo much, they aſſembled all their forces on that ſide of the hills, from whence they had

A had averted the enemies, and ſuddainly with a mighty multitude charged upon the Roman camp, and aſſaulted all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible means they continued the aſſault in ſuch ſort, as the Romans had not ſo much as either time enough to ſet forth and diſplay their enſigns, or room ſufficient to put their army in order of battel: but were compelled to defend their camp more by ſtanding thick thronged together againſt the enemies in the very gates then otherwiſe by hardy fighting. But about the going down of the ſun, when the enemies were retired, Paulus diſpatched two light horſemen with letters to M. Babius the Conſul, as far as Piſa, that he ſhould come away with all ſpeed to ſuccour him, being in time of truce beſieged. But Babius had delivered up his army before to M. Pinarius, the Pretor, as he went into Sardinia. Howbeit he both certified the Senat by his letters, that L. Æmylius was inveſted by the B Ligurians, and he wrote alſo to M. Cl. Marcellus, whoſe province was next adjoining, to bring over his forces (if he thought ſo good) out of Gaul in to Liguria, and deliver L. Æmylius from ſiege. But alas, theſe ſuccours ſhould have come all too late; for the Ligurians the very next day returned and advanced againſt the camp Æmylius, albeit he not only knew that they would come, but alſo might have brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept himſelf ſo cloſe within the ſtrength of his rampiar, minding to hold off and not to fight, untill Babius might with his army come from Piſa. Now the letters of Babius cauſed great fear at Rome: and ſo muce the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the City, ſome few daies after he had made over his army unto Fabius, put them out of all hope, that the army which was in France could not poſſibly paſſe into Liguria, by reaſon of the war with the Iſtrians, who impeached the planting C of the colony at Aquileia; againſt whom Fabius was gone, and might not poſsibly retire from thence, now that the war was once begun. The only hope they had therefore of aiding Æmylius was this, (and yet the ſame ſeemed to be with the lateſt, conſidering the urgent neceſsity of the time) in caſe the Conſuls made haſt to go into their privinces: which to do all the LL. of the Senat called aloud and earneſtly unto them. But the Conſuls denied flatly to ſtir one foot before the levy of ſouldiers was fully finiſhed; alledging that it was not their ſlackneſs, but the violence of the plague, which cauſed it to be ſo late ere it were performed. Yet for all this, ſuch was the general accord and conſent of the Senat, that they could neither will nor chuſe but go forth of the City in their rich coats of arms, and by proclamation to aſsigne a certain day, upon which all the ſouldiers whom they had enrolled ſhould ſhew at Piſa: and commiſsion they had to take up D ſubitary ſouldiers, all the country over as they went, to preſſe them forth preſently and have them away. Moreover, the Pretors, Q. Petilius and Q. Fabius were both of them commanded, the one, namely, Petilius, to enrol in haſt two tumultuary legions of Roman citizens, and tender the military oath to all that were not above fiftie yeers old: and Fabius, to levy of the Latine allies fifteen thouſand foot, and eight hundred horſemen. The two Duumvirs or Wardens for the navy and the ports were created, namely, C. Matienus and C. Lucretius, who were ſoon provided of ſhips ready rigged, trimmed and furniſhed to their hands. And Matienus, who had the charge of the coaſts upon the gulf of Gaul, was commanded to bring his fleet with all ſpeed poſsible along, to to the tract of the Ligurians, if haply he might any way lead L. Æmylius and his army. Æmylius after he perceived that no aid appeared from any place, ſuppoſing verily that the two horſe men E above-ſaid, were intercepted and ſtaied by the way, thought good to put off no longer, but alone with his own forces to trie the fortune of a fight. And thereupon before the enemies came (who now already began more coldly and heavily to aſſail them then before) he put his men in battell array at the four gates of the camp, to the end that upon the ſignall given, they ſhould at once from all parts ſally forth. To the four extraordinary cohorts, he adjoined two other, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, and commanded them to break forth at the falſe poſtern gate called Extraordinaria: within the gate Principalis on the right hand, he embattelled the Haſtati or Iaveliners of the firſt legion, and the principes of the ſame legion in the rearguard to ſecond them, commanded both by M. Servilius and L. Sulpitius, Knights marſhals, or Tribunes military. The third legion he marſhalled full againſt the other gate Principalis on the left hand. This change F only was here, for that the Principes were ſet in the front, and the Haſtati behind in the tail of them. Sex. Iulius Cæſar and L. Aurelius Cotta, two military Tribunes had the leading of this legion. Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Lieutenant, having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Queſtoria. Two cohorts and the Triarii of two legions had commandment to ſtay behind for the defence of the camp. The Generall himſelf in perſon rode all about from gate to gate, exhorting and encouraging his men: uſing all the forcible means he poſsibly could deviſe, to provoke and whet the ſtomacks of his ſouldiers, and to give a poinant edge to their courage and choler: one while reproaching his enemies for their falſhood and treachery, who having craved peace and obtained truce; during the time of the ſaid truce, againſt all law of nations were G "come to aſſail the camp: another while ſhewing and declaring unto them what ſhame and "indignity it was for the Roman army to be beſieged by the Ligurians, who more truly may "be accounted theeves and robbers, then go for warlike enemies. If (quoth he) you ſhould eſcape "from hence, not by your own vertue and valour, but through the help and ſuccour of others, "with what face ſhall any of you be able to meet. I ſay, not thoſe ſouldiers who have vanquiſhed "Annibal, defeated Philip, and ſubdued Antiochus, the mightieſt King, and greateſt comman- "ders of our age: but even them who many a time have hunted and chaſed the very ſame Liguri- "ans like bruit beaſts, over the wilds and forreſts as they fled, and hewed them in peeces in the end?

" That which the Spaniards, that which the Gauls, that which the Macedonians and Carthaginians H " dare not enterprise, namely, to approach and enter upon the rampier of the Roman camp; shall
" a Ligurian enemy adventure to do? shall he of his own accord presume to besiege and " assail our camp, whom heretofore when we beat all the blind bushes, by-woods and thickets,
" to start him out, we had much ado to find, he lay so close and lurked so covertly? At these words the souldiers set up a consonant crie in token of applause, and answered him with a general shout, saying, there was no fault on their part, seeing that no man had given them the signal to issue forth and make a sally. For let him but once say the word to sound the trumpet, he should see and find, that both Romans and Ligurians were the same still as before-time. Now the Ligurians kept two camps on the neer side of the mountains affront the Roman leaguer; from whence (for the first daies so soon as the sun was up) they used to advance their ensigns, and march forward I well armed and ranked in battell array: but then they put no armor upon their backs, nor took weapon in hand, before they had filled their bellies well with meat and their heads with wine: they came forth (I say) dispersed and out of order; as who hoped and trusted assuredly, that the enemies would not march under their ensigns without their rampier. Against them (coming thus in disarray) the Romans issued forth at once, out of all the gates in one instant with a mighty shout, which not only they who were within the camp set up, but also the lackies, scullions, lan-derers, and other drudges that follow the camp redoubled. This was such an unlooked for occurrent to the Ligurians, that they were set in as great an affright therewith, as if they had been surprised & beset all about with suddain ambushments. For a smal while there was some shew of a conflict, such as it was; but anon they took their heels and fled for life; but as they fled, they left their lives K behind them in every place. Then the men of arms had the signall given to mount on horseback, to pursue them & not suffer one to escape alive: & so in this fearful rout they were driven to take their camp for safety: but in the end were disseized and turned out of it also. That day were slain of the Ligurians not so few as fifteen thousand, and 2500 taken prisoners. Within three daies after, the whole nation of the Ligurian Ingaunes, yeelded absolutely, and put in their hostages. A search was made for all the pilots and mariners, who had exercised piracy on the sea, and they were all laid up fast in prison. Sembably C. Matienus one of the Duumvirs or wardens of the navy met with two and thirty ships of that sort, belonging to men of war upon the coast of Liguria, and boorded them. To carry these news to Rome, and letters to the Senat, L. Aurelius Cotta, and C. Sulpitius Cotta were sent to Rome: who also were to require that L. Æmylius (when L his time was expired) might depart out of his province, and bring his souldiers from thence with him, and so discharge them of service. Both these demands were granted by the Senat, and a solemn procession besides was ordeined in all churches and chappels, and at every shrine and altar for three daies space. The Pretors also were commanded, Petilius, to casse and dimisse the legions of the City; and Fabius, to remit the Latine allies the levying and mustering of their soul-diers. Also there was order given to the Pretor of the City, for to write unto the Coss. and give them to understand, that the Senat thought it meet and reason, that the subitary souldiers (who were enrolled in hast for the suddain tumult and alarm) should with all speed be licensed to depart.

The same yeer the colony of Graviſca was planted in the territory of Tuscany, which in times past was conquered from the Tarquinians; and five acres of land was set out to every man. The M Triumvirs who had the charge thereof to distribute these lands, were C. Calpurnius Piso, P. Clau- dius Pulcher, and C. Terentius Istra. A yeer it was of note, in regard of the drought that hapned, and the dearth of corn and all other fruits of the earth. For recorded it is, that in six month space it never rained one drop.

The same yeer it fortuned, that as certain plow-men and labourers plowed and digged somewhat deep within the ground, in the lands of L. Petilius a secretary, (which lands lay under the hill Janiculum) there were found two coffers of stone, each of them about eight foot long and four foot broad, the lids and covers whereof were bound and sodered with lead. Both these chests had a superscription upon them in Greek and Latine letters to this effect, That in the one of N them lay buried Numa Pompilius the son of Pompo, sometime King of Rome: and in the other, were bestowed the books of the said Numa. The owner of this ground opened these coffers by the advice and counsel of his friends: and that which carried the title and inscription of the Kings sepulture, was found empty, without any shew or token of the reliques of a mans body or any thing else, by reason the bones and all were rotten and consumed, in continuance of time after so many yeers past. In the other were found two fardels, wrapped within wax candles (or cear-cloths) conteining either of them seven books; which were not only whole and sound, but also seemed very fresh and new. One seven of them were written in Latin, as touching the Pon-tificiall law: the other seven in Greek, entituled, The discipline or doctrine of Philosophie, such as those daies might afford. Valerius Antias saith moreover, That they were the books of Pythagoras; O according to the common received opinion of Numa, that he was the disciple of Pythagoras; herein giving credit to a probable lie, resembling a truth. These books were first read by those friends of his who were present at the place where the chests were opened; but afterwards as they came into more mens hands to be read, it chanced that Q. Petilius the lord chief justice of the City, desirous to peruse those books, borrowed them of L. Petilius, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, by reason that the abovenamed Quintus Petilius had chosen the foresaid Lucius into the decury of the Scribes and secretaries. Who after he had read the titles with the summaries

and

A and contents of every chapter, and finding the moſt part thereof, tending directly to aboliſh the ſtate of the religion then eſtabliſhed, ſaid unto L. Petilius, that he purpoſed to fling thoſe books into the fire; before he did ſo, he would permit him to uſe what means he thought by order of law, or otherwiſe would ſerve his turn to recover the ſaid books out of his hands, and good leave he ſhould have to take that courſe without his diſpleaſure, or any breach of friendſhip between them. The Scribe or notary aforeſaid goeth to the Tribunes for their aſsiſtance, the Tribunes put the matter over to the Senat, before whom the Pretor ſaid plainly, that he was ready to take his corporall oath, if it were to put to it, that thoſe books ought neither to be read nor kept. Whereupon the Senat judged, that for ſuch a matter the offer only of the Pretors oath was ſufficient, and that the books ſhould be burned with all ſpeed poſſible in the open place of aſſemblies called B Comitium: but they awarded withall, that they ſhould be paied unto Q. Petilius the right owner as much mony for the books, as the Pretor and the more part of the Tribunes of the Commons eſteemed them worth. The Scribe would touch none of mony: but his books were burnt in the foreſaid place before all the people in a light fire, made by the ordinary ſervitors attending upon the ſacrifices.

The ſame ſummer there aroſe ſuddainly a great war in the higher Spain. The Celtiberians had gathered a power of five & thirty thouſand men, a number more then lightly at any time before they had levied. Now was Q. Fulvius Flaccus lord Deputy of that province. He for his part, becauſe he was advertiſed that the Celtiberians put their youth in arms, had raiſed and aſſembled as great aids of the confederats, as he could, but nothing came he neer to the enemie in numbers C of ſouldiers. In the beginning of the Spring he led his army into Carpetania, and encamped before the town Ebura, after he had plainted a mean garriſon within it. A few daies after the Celtiberians pitched their tents within two miles from thence under a little hill. When the Roman Pretor perceived they were come, he ſent his brother Marcus Fulvius with two companies of the horſemen of allies in eſpial, to view the enemies camp, willing him to approach as neer to the trench and rampier as he could, and to ſee what compaſſe the camp took, but to forbear skirmiſh, and in any hand to retire, in caſe he perceived the Cavalry of their enemies made out againſt him. According to this direction, in did in every reſpect. And ſo for certain daies together, there was nothing done, but only theſe two companies of horſemen ſhewing firſt, and afterwards retiring backſo ſoon as the Calvalry of the enemies iſſued out of their camp. At length the Celtiberians D alſo came forth and advanced forward withall their power, as well horſe as foot, and having ſet them in ordinance of battell, ſtaied as it were in the midſt between. The whole ground was a ſmooth and even plain, fit to join a battell in. There ſtood the Spaniards (I ſay) expecting their enemies: But the Roman Pretor kept his men within the rampier four daies together; and they likewiſe of the other ſide held the ſame place ſtill in battell array. The Romans all that while ſtirred not a foot. The Celtiberians then ſeeing the enemies refuſed fight, held themſelves quiet alſo within their camp: only the horſemen rid forth; and they kept a corps de guard, to be in readineſs if peradventure the enemies ſhould be buſie and come abroad. Both of the one ſide and other, they went out of the back ſide of their camp to purvey forage and fuel, and impeached not one another. The Roman Pretor, ſuppoſing now that after ſo many daies reſt, the enemies were E born in hand and hoped fully, that he would never begin firſt, commanded L. Acilius to take with him the left wing of the Cavalry, and ſix thouſand of the provincial auxiliaries, and to fetch a compaſſe about the hill which ſtood behind the enemies; and from thence ſo ſoon as they heard a Cry, to run down amain and charge upon their camp. And becauſe they might not be diſcovered, in the night time they departed. Flaccus the next morning by peep of day, ſent out C. Scribonius (a colonel of the allies) againſt the enemies camp, with the extraordinary horſemen of the left wing: whom when the Celtiberians beheld both approaching neer toward them & alſo more in number then uſually they had been, they put forth all their Cavalry at once out of the gates: & withal, gave the ſignal to the Infantry alſo to come abroad. Scribonius, according to the direction given, ſo ſoon as ever he heard the firſt noiſe and ſhout of the horſemen, turned the head of his F horſe and retired back full upon the camp: therewith the enemies followed more freely: firſt the horſmen, and within a while the footmen alſo, making full account to be maſters of the Roman leaguer that day, and verily now were they put paſt half a mile. When Flaccus ſuppoſed that they were trained far enough from their camp, for ſuccouring it, he iſſued forth at once in three places, with his army arranged before in order of battell within, and cauſed them to ſet up a mighty cry, not only to animat the ſouldiers to the combat, but alſo that their fellows behind the hill might hear it. Who made no ſtay, but preſently ran down and ſet upon the enemies camp as they had in charge, where there were left in guard not above five hundred armed men. By reaſon therefore, that they within were ſo few, the enemies without ſo many, and G the enterpriſe ſo ſuddain and unlooked for, they were mightily terrified, and ſo in manner without any skirmiſh and reſiſtance at all, their hold was forced and won. Acilius ſet on fire that part alſo, which might eaſieſt be ſeen of them that were fighting in the plain. Now the Celtiberians which ſtood behind in the rereguard, were the firſt that diſcovered the flame, but afterwards it was noiſed and went current through the main battel, that their camp were loſt and all on a light fire. The enemies were greatly amated, but the Romans much more animated. For now they might hear the ſhout of their fellows, having the upper hand, now might they ſee the tents of their enemies burning with bright flames. The Celtiberians for a while ſtood in ſuſpence, doubtfull what to do ; but afterwards, perceiving they had no place of safe retear, if upon their H discomfiture they should fall to running away, they saw no other hope but in fighting it out, and so they began to renew the skirmish afresh, with more resolution then before. Fiercely they were encountred and charged in the midst of their battel by the fist legion : but against the left flank and wing, where they saw the souldiers of their own nation ranged (who came to aid the Romans) they made head, and advanced their ensignes with more boldnesse and confidence. And verily that left wing of the Romans was at the point to have retreated, but that the seventh legion seconded and succoured them : and withall they that were left within Ebura in garrison, came from the town in the very midst and hottest of the conflict ; and Acilius from another part plaied on their backs. Down went the Celtiberians along time, and were cut in peeces between. As many as remained, made shift to flie and escape on all hands into every quarter. The Cavalry was I sent out after them two waies in severall bands : who also committed great slaughter and execution. That day were slain of the enemies about 23000. 4800 taken prisoners, with five hundred horse and above ; besides 88 military ensignes gotten from them and carried away. A great victory this was, but not without bloudshed of the Romans part : for of two legions there died somewhat more then two hundred, but of Latine allies 830 ; of forrein aids, much about 2400 lost their lives in the field. The Pretor then retired with his victorious army into his own camp. Acilius was commanded to abide still in that of their enemies, which he had forced and won. The next morrow they fell to gather up the spoils of their enemies : and those who had born themselves valiantly in that service among the rest, were rewared with gifts in a full and frequent assembly of the whole army. After this, when the hurt and maimed were brought back into the town Ebura, the K legions were led through the countrey Carpetania, towards Contrebia. This City when it was once besieged sent to the Celtiberians for succour ; but they came not in time : not for any slacknesse of their part, but because after they were departed from home, & had entred on their journey, the foul waies hindred and staid them, which they were not able to pass for the continuall rain that fell : over and besides, the waters were out and the rivers swelled so high, that possibly they could not come forward : whereupon the besieged inhabitants being in dispair of help, from their friends, rendred the town. Flaccus likewise was forced by the storm and tempestuous waether to put his army into the same City. Now the Celtiberians, who were on foot in their journey, and not aware that their friends had surrendred, at length having passed over the rivers (when the rain gave over and the weather took up) came to Contrebia ; but seeing no camp without the L wals, and supposing that it was either removed to the other side, or the enemies dislodged and gone, they approached the town, and marched loosely and retchlesly forward in disarray. The Romans sallied out upon them at two gates, fell upon them (disbanded as they were) and put them to the rout. But see what hapned ! that thing which hindred them that they could not make head, resist, and settle themselves to begin fight (namely, because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies about their colours) the same stood them in good stead to save many of their lives that fled. For they ran so scattering, and were so spread all over the plaines, that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thick together, to compass them about on every side. Howbeit 12000 of them were killed, & above 5000 taken prisoners, besides 400 horse, 62 ensigns of war won from them. Those who after their straggling flight re- M tired homeward, met with another troop of Celtiberians coming forward, unto whom they recounted the yeelding up of Contrebia and their own misfortune : by which means they caused them to turn and goe back againe, who immediately slipt away in their villages and forts.

Then Flaccus departed from Contrebia, and conducted his legions through Celtiberia wasting and spoiling as he went : where he forced many castles untill the greater part of that countrey was reduced under his obedience. These affairs passed in high Spain that year. As for the lower province, Manlius the Pretor fought fortunatly in certain battells against the Portu-gals.

The same yeer a Colony of Latins was planted in Aquileia, within the territory of the Gauls, N and thither were conducted three thousand footmen, and every one of them were endowed with fifty acres of land. The Centurions besides had a hundred, and the horsemen a hundred and forty acres apeece given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. In which year also two Temples were dedicated, the one to Venus Erycina neer the gate Collina (which L. Porcius Licinius the son of Lucius dedicated, being a Duumvir deputed for that purpose, and had been vowed before by L. Porcius the Consul in the Ligurian war) the other to the goddesse Piety, in the herb market : and of this chappell M. Acilius Glabrio the other Duumvir, had the dedication ; where, he erected and set up in the honor of his father Glabrio, a guilt statue, which was the first gilded image that ever was made in Italy. This Glabrio the father was he, who had vowed to edifie the said Temple that very day on which he fought the battell against K. Antiochus, at Ther- O mopylæ, and by warrant from the Senat, had bargained for the building thereof at a price. In those daies wherein these holy houses were consecrated, L. Æmylius Paulus the Proconsul, triumphed over the Ligurians Ingaunes. He had born before him in shew five and twenty golden Coronets, and besides them there was no gold or silver else carried in that triumph. But many principal Ligurians, men of mark, whom he took captive ; were led before his chair. He dealt among his souldiers, 300 Asses apeece. The fame of this triumph of his, was much more renowned by

this occasion, that the Ligurian Embassadors craved to have a perpetuall peace with the Romans
A "saying, That their whole nation were resolved, never to take arms again, but by commandment "and licence of the people of Rome. Q. Fabius the Pretor, returned this answer unto them by the "advice of the Senat, That it was no news to hear this language from the Ligurians; but it stood
"them upon and was beseeming rather, to carry a new mind, and the same agreeable to their "speech: and therefore they should go to the Consuls, and do by them which they were enjoined:
forasmuch as the Senat would beleeve none but the word only of the Consuls in the behalf of the Ligurians, as touching their true and sincere meaning to observe peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians: but there was a battel fought in Corsica with the Islanders there; in which M. Tinarius the Pretor slew 2000 of them in the field: which defeat compelled them to give hostages, and besides 100000 pound weight of wax. From thence the army was conduct-B ed into Sardinia, where passed some fortunat battels against the Ilians, a nation at this day not fully quieted & appeased. In this very yeer also were the hundred hostages rendred back again to the Carthaginians; with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their own part, as in the behalf of K. Massinissa, who at that time with an armed garison, held the possession of that territory which had been in question. The Consuls in their province sat still and had nothing to do. M. Bœbius was sent for to Rome, against the generall assembly for the election of magistrates: who created Consuls, A. Posthumius Albinus Luscus and C. Calpurnius Piso. After this, were elected Pretors Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, A. Posthumius Albinus, P. Cornel. Mamercus, T. Minutius Mollicubus, A. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Manius; and they all entred into their magistracy upon the 15 day of March.

C In the beginning of that yeer wherein A. Posthumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls: A. Posthumius the Consul brought into the Senat those persons who were come from Q. Fulvius Flaccus out of the hither province of Spain; to wit L. Minutius his Lieutenant generall, and the two colonels, T. Manius and L. Massaliota. These men after they had made report of two fields fortunatly fought against the Celtiberians, of their countrey yeelded and brought under their subjection; and that the term of government in that province was expired, and no more left to to be done there; so as there was no need either of the ordinary mony which was wont to be sent for souldiers pay, or of corn to be caried unto the army for that yeer: requested of the Senat first, in regard of their happy successe, to yeeld honor and praise to the immortall gods:
and then, that Q. Fulvius might depart and come his waies out of the province, and bring with D him that army of his from thence, whose valiant service, both himself and also many Pretors before him had used: which (say they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisit and needfull in a manner to be done: forasmuch as the souldiers were so stiffnecked and obstinat, that it seemed unpossible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dimissed: or else break out into some dangerous fire of a mutiny, if a man should go about to keep and hold them back by strong hand. The Senat gave order that Liguria should be the province for both Consuls: which done, the Pretors also cast lots for theirs. To A. Hostilius fell the civill jurisdiction over the citizens: and to Minutius over the forrainers; P. Cornelius had the government of Sicily: C. Manius of Sardinia. Unto L.
Posthumius was allotted the farther part of Spain, and to Tib. Sempronius the hither. This Sem- E pronius (because he was to succeed Q. Fulvius) fearing his province should be left naked and disfurnished of the old souldiers, "I demand (qd. he) of you, O L. Minutius, since you bring word
"that there is no more trouble behind of that province, whether you think that the Celtiberians
"will continue fast in their allesgeance for ever, so as, that province may be protected and held "in obedience without any army at all? And if you cannot undertake to assure us of the faith and "loyalty of these Barbarians & do advise us in any hand to maintain an army in those parts, whe"ther you will give counsell to the Senat, for to send a supply into Spain, that they only should be
"cassed and discharged, who have served out their full yeers required by law, and so that new and
"raw souldiers be mingled with the rest of the old? or that the old legions should full and whole
"be removed out of the province, and new legions enrolled, and sent thither in their stead? con-F "sidering that the small account that usually is made of such fresh and untrained souldiers, were "enough to induce and move even the more quiet and peaceable sort of Barbarians to rebel and "make war again? Soon said it is, but not so easily done, to have made an end of all troubles in "such a province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to war, and prone ever and "anon to make insurrections. Some few Cities, as far as I can hear, and namely, those which be"ing neer unto the souldiers lying in winter garison, were by them held in aw and kept down,
"have yeelded and are become subject: but they that were farther off, be in arms still and have "weapon in hand. Which being so, I tell you (my LL) even now before hand, that I will per"form my service to the Commonweal, with the help of that army which is there already at this G "present: but in case Flaccus bring away those legions with him: I will chuse those quarters which "are in peace, to winter in, and not hazard my yong and new souldiers among them, to be pre"sented to the devotion and mercy of most fierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answer"ed to these demands in this maner, That neither himself nor any man else was able for his life, to "divine and foredeem what was in the hearr of the Celtiberians now, and what they would
"mind and intend to do hereafter: and therefore he could not deny, but the better policy it was "to send an army among these Barbarians (peaceable though they seemed to be at this present) be-

"cauſe as yet they are inured to government, and cannot well skill of being ſubjects. But whether H "it be more expedient to employ new forces, as the old, it is for him to ſpeak and ſet down, who "upon his knowledg can ſay, how loyally the Celtiberians wil carry themſelves in time of peace,
"and is withall aſſured, that the ſouldiers will hold them content and quiet, if they be detained "any longer in the province. But if a man may conjecture and give a gueſſe what they think in "their heart, either by their grumbliug words ſecretly one to anorher; or their ſpeeches uttered
"in the preſence and hearing of their General, when he maketh orations to them in publick audi"ence: I tell you truly they have cryed out with open mouth, that either they will keep their Generall with them in the province, or home they will with him into Italy. This debate between the Pretor and the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter propounded before the Senat by the Conſuls, who thought it meet and reaſonable, that order ſhould be taken for I their own furniture and ſettn g forth with men, mony, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were ſpoken or treat of as touching the Pretor his army. So, ordained it was, that the Coſſ. ſhould have their entire army of new ſouldiers, to wit, each of them two legions of Rom.
citizens with their cavalry, together with the uſuall and accuſtomed number at all other times of Latine allies, namely, 15000 foot and 800 horſe. And with this power they had in charge to make war againſt the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Bæbius, they continued ſtill in place of command: and were willed to hold their provinces, untill the Conſuls were thither come. Then they were commanded to diſcharge the army which they had, and ſo to return to Rome. After this, ſpeech there was concerning the army of Tib. Sempronius; and the Conſuls had warrant to enroll one new legion, conſiſting of five thouſand and two hundred foot and 400 K horſe: ove: and beſides, 1000 footmen, and 50 horſe of Roman citizens. Likewiſe the Latine nation was charged with a levy of 7000 foot and 300 horſe. With which army it was thought good, that Tib. Sempronius ſhould go into the higher province of Spain. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all thoſe ſouldiers, as well Romans as allies, which had been tranſported over into Spain before the Conſulſhip of Sp. Poſthumius and Q. Martius: and more then that (after a new ſupply was come) the ſurpluſage in two legions above 1400 foot, and 600 horſe, and the over-plus of 12000 footmen of Latins, and ſix hundred horſemen; and namely, thoſe whoſe valorous ſervince C. Fulvius had tried and found in two bat-tels againſt the Celtiberians. Moreover, ſolemn proceſsions and thanksgiving were by authority ordained, for his happy managing of the affairs of the Common-weal; & then the reſt of the Pre- L tors were ſent into their provinces, Q. Fabius Buteo had his commiſsion renewed to govern Gallia ſtill. Thus it was agreed in the Senat-houſe, that there ſhould be eight legions maintained and kept in pay that yeer, over and above the old army in Liguria, which was in good hope ſhortly to be diſmiſſed. Howbeit even th ſe forces (being no greater then they were) hardly could be made full and compleat by reaſon of the peſtilence which now three years had raigned, and diſpeopled the City of Rome, and all Italy. During which plague the Pretor T. Minutius, and not long after him, the Conſul C. Calpurnius died: with many other brave and famous perſons of each degree and quality. So, as at length theſe men began to hold this depopulation and calamity for a prodigious token and ſtrange wonder. Whereupon C. Servillius the Arch-biſhop was charged, to ſearch out means for to appeaſe the wrath and anger of the gods; and the Decemvirs likewiſe to peruſe M the books of Sibylla: the Coſ. to vow certain preſents and oblations, to Dan Apollo, Æſculapius and Lady * Salus, and to ſet up their images garniſhed with gold: which he vowed and erected accordingly. The Decemvirs proclamed ſupplications & praiers two daies together for the health of the people, throughout the City, and in all market towns and places of frequent reſort and aſ-ſembly. Al above twelve yeers of age, wore chaplets & garlands of flours upon their heads, & bare branches of lawrell in their hands, whiles they were at their praiers & devotion. Moreover, there was crept into mens heads a ſuſpicion that ſome deviliſh and wicked hand might be the cauſe of all this. Wherupon by an act of the Senat, a commiſsion was granted out unto C. Claudius the Pre-tor (who was ſubſtituted and choſen in the room of T. Minutius) to make ſearch and diligent inquiſition after all confections of poiſon, & the practiſers therof, within the City, & for the compaſs N of ten miles about it every way: In like maner, to C. Manius, for to ſit in the enquiry therof (before he croſſed over-ſea into his province of Sardinia) in all the mart-towns and places of aſſembly which were more then ten miles off, from Rome. Of all others, the Conſul his death was moſt ſuſpected. For given out it was, that Quarta Hoſtilia his wife, had murdered him: but when he was ſeen once, that her own ſon Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was declared Conſul in place of his father in law and mothers husband, the death of Piſo the Conſul began to be more infamous and ſuſpicious a great deal then before. And witneſſes there came forth ready to depoſe, that after Albinus and Piſo were pronounced Conſuls (in which election the ſaid Flaccus was rejected and ſuffered a re-pulſe) his mother reproached him therewith, and laid it in his diſh, that this was the third time that he ſued for the Conſulſhip and gone without: adding moreover, and willing him to be rea- O dy to ſtand for it again, for that ſhe would work and bring it about, that within two months he ſhould be Conſul. Among other teſtimonies and depoſitions making for the cauſe and tending to the tame, that ſpeech of hers alſo, taking effect too truly and ſo juſt within the time, was thought ſufficient to condemn Hoſtilia.

In the beginning of this ſpring, whiles the levy of ſouldiers ſtaied the new Conſul at Rome, whiles the death of the one and the chooſing of the other into their place, cauſed all thing there

A to go more ſlowly forward; in the mean time P. Cornelius, and M. Babius who had done nothing worthy of the remembrance during the Conſulſhip, led their armies againſt the Ligurian Apuans. Theſe Ligurians, who before the coming of the Conſuls into the province looked for no war, were ſurprized at unawares, and to the number of 12000 of them yeelded: whom Cornelius and Babius reſolved (upon advice had firſt with the Senat by letters) to tranſport from the mountains, into plains and champian countrey from their own home; to the end they ſhould have no more hope to return, for otherwiſe they ſuppoſed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samnits country a certain territory belonging in common to the people of Rome, which ſometimes had been in the tenure and poſſeſsion of the Taurаſins. In which place they being deſirous to plant the Ligurian Apuans, publiſhed an edict, That they ſhould deſcend down B the mountains Anidos, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that ever they had. But the Ligurians ſent their Embaſſadors oftentimes to intreat, that they might not be forced to abandon their domeſticall gods, the place of their nativity, and the ſepulchres of their anceſtors; and therewith promiſed to deliver up their armor, and to put in hoſtages. Howbeit, ſeeing they could not prevail, and having not ſtrength and power enough to wage war again, they obeyed the edict and proclamation. So there was tranſlated from thence at the publick charges of the City, to the number of four thouſand perſons free born, together with their women and children: and unto them was allowance made of 150000 Seſterces, toward the building of new houſes. And for to diſtribute and divide land among them, the ſame men (to wit, Cornelius and Babius) had commiſsion; who alſo removed them into thoſe parts. Howbeit at C the requeſt of theſe twain, there were Quinquevirs or five commiſsioners aſsiſtants granted unto them by the Senat, by whoſe advice they might manage all. Theſe affairs being finiſhed, after they had brought with them to Rome their old army, they obtained of the Senat a grant to triumph. And theſe were the firſt that ever triumphed & made no war before. Only the enemies were led in ſhew before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and won for to be caried or led in pomp; neither was there ought to be ſeen in their triumphs, which might be dealt and given among the ſouldiers.

The ſame yeer Fulvius Flaccus the Pretor in Spain, by occaſion that his ſucceſſor ſtayed long ere he came into the province, brought forth his army into the field out of his wintring camp, and began to waſt and ſpoil the farther parts and territories of Celtiberia: from whence the inhabi-
D tants came not in to ſubmit and do their homage and fealty. By which deed of his, he rather provoked and angred the barbarous people, then terrified them: for when they had ſecretly gathered together certain forces and companies, they beſet and barred the paſſage Manlianum, by which they were aſſured that the Roman army would paſſe. As L. Poſthumius Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spain, Gracchus his colleague charged him to advertiſe Quintus Fabius for to bring his army to Tarracon, for that he propoſed there to diſcharge his old ſouldiers, to diſtribute the ſupply which he brought, & to range in order all his army by companies. Notice alſo was given to Flaccus of the very day (which was neer at hand) upon which his ſucceſſor would come. This new occurent cauſed Flaccus to lay aſide thoſe enterpriſes which he intended, and in all haſt to withdraw his forces out of Celtiberia. The barbarous people knowing not the E cauſe hereof, but ſuppoſing that he had ſome inkling of their revolt, and how they had in ſecret taken arms, and that thereupon he was ſore affraid, guarded and ſtopped the paſſage ſo much more ſtreightly. Now ſo ſoon as the Roman army was entred into the paſſe one morning betimes at the break of day, the enemies aroſe ſuddainly at once out of two parts, and charged the Romans: which when Flaccus perceived, he gave commandment by the miniſtery of the Ceturions, that every man ſhould keep his place and ſtand his ground, to have his arms and weapons in readineſſe; by which means he appeaſed the tumult and affright in his hoſt. Then after he had brought all his labouring beaſts with the baggage, unto one place, he embattelled and put in array all his bands and companies, partly by himſelf in perſon, and partly by his Lieutenants and colonels, according as the ground and the time required, ſhewing no ſign at all of fear, but putting F his men in mind of the enemies, in theſe terms: "Ye have (quoth he) to do with thoſe that "twice already yeelded have yeelded unto us, who are inured and practiſed ſtill in wickedneſs & "perjury; not bettered in vertue and courage: thoſe (I ſay) who are like to make our return home "honorable and glorious, which otherwiſe would have been obſcure and nothing memorable: ſo "as we ſhall carry to Rome for a triumph, our ſwords all bloudy and newly bathed in the green "wounds and freſh maſſacre of our enemies; and beare away the ſpoils of their bodies, all em-"brued and ſtill dropping with their bloud. Time would not permit him to ſay any more, for now the enemies advanced forward, and the charge was already given in the utmoſt skirts of the army, and anon the main battels encountred and joyned conflict. The fight was hot and cruell alike in all G parts, but the fortune divers: for the Roman legions in the main battell fought valiantly, and the two wings of either hand did their devoir as bravely. The auxiliary ſtrangers had to deal with enemies armed in deed at all points like to themſelves, but better ſouldiers by ods then they were; in ſuch ſort, as they were over-charged by them, and could not make good their ground. The Celtiberians perceiving they were not able to match the legions in ranged battell and cloſe hand-fight, caſt their companies into a pointed and coin-formed battaillon, for to pierce perforce and enter upon their enemies: in which maner of fight they are ſo ſtrong, that it is not poſsible to withſtand them, whereſoever they give their violent charge. And then the legions alſo were put in diſarray,

and the whole main battel after a ſort, was disbandoned and broken. Which diſorder and fear- H full trouble when Flaccus perceived he rode a gallop to the legionary men of arms: What? (qd. he unto them) is there no help at all in you? and ſhall this army here be thus defeated utterly and come to nought? Whereat they cryed on all hands to him to give direction and ſpeak only the word what he would have done, & he ſhould ſee how they would beſtir themſelves in the execution of his command. "Mary (quoth he) double your troops, you that are the horſemen of two "legions, and run your horſes with full carrier againſt that wedge-formed battailon of the ene- "mies, wherewith they preſſe upon our men; and this ſhall you perform with the more violence of your horſes, if you disbridle them and let them have full head, and ſo let ſpurs and ruſh in a- "mong them: which we have read in ſtories, that the Romans many a time have practiced to "their great praiſe and honour. No ſooner ſaid, but done it was; pluckt were the bridles over I their horſe heads; twice they ran through the mids of them to and fro from one ſide to another, brake all their lances upon the enemies, overthrew them, and made foul work and ſlaughter among them. When this pointed battaillon of the Celtiberians was once broken, (even the whole and only hope they had;) then they began to fear and tremble, then were they at the point to quit the fight, and to look about them which way to take their flight. The extraordinary Cavalry in the out-wings (ſeeing ſo brave a ſervice performed by the Roman horſmen) were enkindled and incenſed by their valorous example, and of their own accord without attendance of any mans commandment, charged upon their enemies, thus diſordered and in diſarray already. Then the Celtiberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Roman General ſeeing them once turn back and ſhew their hin-parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna equeſtris, and to exhibit games K in the honor of Iup. Opt. Max. The Celtiberians, thus disbandoned and ſcattered in the rout all over the length of the ſtreight paſſage, were killed and cut in peeces. It is recorded that there died that day ſeventeen thouſand enemies, and were taken priſoners alive more then three thouſand, together with 27 field enſigns, and well neer eleven hundred horſes. For that day, the victorious army lodged within no camp at all: yet was not this victory ſo cleer, but it coſt them the loſſe of ſome ſouldiers: for of the Romans were ſlain four hundred ſeventy and two; of allies (and namely of Latins) 1019; and together with them, aid ſouldiers three thouſand. Thus the army having by this good hand recovered their ancient honor and glory, was conducted to Tarracon. Tib. Sempronius the Pretor, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius in the way as he came, and ſhewed how he rejoyced on his behalf, for this good man ging and L happy atchieving the affairs of the commonweal: which done, they agreed together with great accord as touching the ſouldiers, namely, whom to caſſe and ſend away, and whom to retain ſtilin ſervice. Then Fulvius having ſhipped the ſouldiers that were diſcharged, took his journey to Rome: and Sempronius conducted the legions into Celtiberia.

Both the Conſuls led their forces into Liguria, and entred the countrey in two divers quarters. Poſthumius with the firſt legion and the third, beſet and inveſted the two mountains Baliſta and Suiſmontium, and ſo ſtreightly he kept the narrow paſſes of thoſe parts with his garriſons, that he cut them off from all victuals, and tamed them with extream ſcarcity and want of all things. Fulvius with the ſecond legion and the fourth, after he had aſſailed the Apuan Ligurians from the coaſt of Piſa, received ſubmiſsion and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the river M Macra; and when he had embarked upon ſeven thouſand of them, he ſent them over to Naples, coaſting along the Tuſcan ſea. From whence they were brought into the Samnits countrey, and a certain territory aſsigned them to inhabit amongſt the reſt of thir countrymen. As for A. Poſthumius, he cut down the vineyards, and burnt the corn of the Ligurian mountainers, ſo long untill they were driven by all maner of calamities following war, to come in and ſubmit, yea, and to deliver up their armor and weapons. From thence Poſthumius departed and took the ſea, becauſe he would viſit the coaſts of the Ligurian Ingaunes and Intemelians. Now, before that theſe Conſuls came to the army which was appointed to meet at Piſa, it chanced A. Poſthumius & M. Fulvius Nobilior, the brother of Q. Fulvius, were the commanders, and had the conduct thereof. N
This Fulvius was a Colonell of the ſecond legion, who during the time of thoſe months, wherein by turn he had the command and charge thereof, dimiſſed that legion, having bound the Centurions by an oath, that they ſhould make paiment back of their wage-mony well and truly to the Queſtors in the chamber and treaſury of Rome. Notice hereof being given to Au. Poſthumius at Placentia, (for thither it hapned that he was gone) he rode after thoſe caſſed ſouldiers, and purſued them with a company of light horſemen. As many of them as he could overtake, after he had checked and rebuked them for their fault, he brought to Piſa; of the reſt he gave information to the Conſul. Who put the matter to queſtion, and after it had been debated in counſel, an act of the Senat paſſed againſt the ſaid M. Fulvius, that he ſhould be confined and ſent into Spain beyond new Carthage. And letters he had given him to carry from the Conſul to P. Manlius into the far- O ther province of Spain. As for the ſouldiers, they were commanded to return again to their colours, and for an ignominious diſgrace of that legion, ordained it was, that for a full years pay they ſhould be content and take up with ſix months wages. And look what ſouldiers repaired not to the army accordingly, the Conſul had warrant and commiſsion to make ſale of him and all that he had.

The ſame yeer L. Duronius, who was returned with ten ſhips to Brunduſium from out of Illyricum (where he ſat as Pretor the former yeer) leaving his ſhips there in the rode, came to Rome: where

A where, in discoursing of the acts by him done, he laid the whole fault of all the recovery and piracy at sea upon Gentius the King of the Illyrians, saying, that all the ships which had lien upon the coast of the Adriatick sea, came out of his realm. For which he had sent Embassadors to complain, but they could never find means to speak with the King about it. Now they were Embassadors arrived at Rome from Gentius, who avouched, that when the Romans came for to parle with the King, he hapned to be sick in the most remote parts of his kingdome: and therfore Gentius their King and master requested the Senat, not to give credit to those false accusations and forged slanders which his enemies had raised and informed against him. But Duronius alledged moreover, that divers and sundry persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his dominion, had received many wrongs: yea, and by report certain Roman citizens were staied and B detained at Corcyra. Whereupon it was in councell thought good that they should be brought to Rome, and that C. Claudius the Pretor should have the hearing of the matter, before such time no answer would be given unto King Gentius or his Embassadors.

Among many others that the plague this yeer consumed, certain priests and prelats also died, and namely, L. Valerius Flaccus, a bishop, in whose room was chosen Q. Fabius Labeo. Also P. Manlius one of three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feasts. In whose stead Q. Fulvius the son of Marcus was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very* young, and not out of his embrodered Prætexta. But as touching the King of sacrificers, who was to be chosen in place of Cn. Cornelius Dolobella, there was debate between C. Servilius the Archbishop, and Cornelius Dolobella one of the Duumvirs for the navy. For when the bishop would have had him to resign that office, that he might consecrate and inaugurat him the King sacrificer, he refused so to do. For C which cause the bishop set a round fine on the Duumvir his head. Then Dolabella appealed to the people; and before them it was to be tried, whether the said fine should be taken off or paied? Now when most of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advised the Duumvir to obey the bishop, and warded the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that office which he had, behold it lightned at the very instant from heaven, which is the only ominous sign that interrupteth the assemblies of the people. Whereupon the Colledg of the bishops made scruple of conscience to inaugurate Dolabella, but they consecrated P. Clælius Siculus, who had been sacred in the second place. In the end of the year C. Servilius Geminus likewise the Archbishop himself departed this world, who also was one of the ten Decemvirs deputed for the holy ceremonies. And Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was by the colledg of the bishops, elected bishop in his D room. But M. Æmylius Lepidus was created the sovereign Pontifee, notwithstanding many noble persons made suit therfore. Likewise Q. Marcius Philip a Decemvir for the holy mysteries, who chosen in his place. Moreover, there deceased Sp. Posthumius an Augur, in whose stead P. Scipio the son of Affricanus was elected by the Augurs. The same year granted it was to the inhabitants of Cumes, at their own request and petition, that they might commonly speak Latine: as also to the publick criers, to make port sale of goods in the Latine tongue. The Senat gave thanks to the Pisans for the offer they made of lands, wherein to plant a Colony of Latins. And three Triumvirs or Commissioners for that business were created, namely, Q. Fabius Buteo, Marcus and Publius, both named Popilius, and both surnamed Lanas. Letters were brought from M. Mœnius the Pretor (who having the government allotted unto him of Sardinia, had commission also to E enquire after the practise of poysoning in all places, not within ten miles of the City of Rome) importing thus much, that he had condemned already 3000 persons, and that the informations and presentments multiplied daily, by reason of new matters discovered still, and therfore either he was to give over that inquisition, or to resign up his province Sardinia.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus returned out of Spain to Rome with great honour for his acts there atchieved. Who remaining yet without the City, because of his triumph, was created Consul with L. Manlius Acidinus, and within few daies after, rode triumphant into Rome, accompanied with his souldiers, whom he had brought home with him. He carried in triumph a 120 * golden coronets. Moreover in gold 31 pound weight, besides 173200 peeces of coin in Oscan silver. He dealt to his souldiers fifty Denarii peeces out of the booty and pillage which he had gotten. To F every Centurion he gave it double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that served on horseback, triple. The like he did by the Latin allies, and to all in general he paied double wages. This year was the law first proposed by L. Iulius a Trib. of the Com. as touching the yeer of the age requisit and meet for to sue for any publick office, or to exercise the same. And hereupon it came, that the whole race of that family was surnamed * Annales. Many yeers after there were created four Pretors according to the law Bebia, which provided that there should be each other year four chosen. And these were they who were first elected, namely, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, L. Valerius Lævinus, Q. and M. both named Mutii, and both surnamed Scævola.

Unto the Consuls Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius the government of the same provinces was or-G dained, which to those of the former years, with like numbers of horse and foot, as well citizens as allies. In both provinces of Spain, Tib. Sempronius and L. Posthumius continued still to have the command and conduct of the same armies which they had. And for to furnish them out, the Consuls were enjoined to enroll three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen of Romans, likewise five thousand foot of Latin allies and four hundred horse. P. Mucius Scævola by lot had the civil jurisdiction within the City of Rome, and commission to enquire into the devillish art of poysoning both within the City, and within the compasse of ten miles, Cn. Cornelius Scipio was lord chief justice in forrain pleas and causes, Q. Mutius Scævola was lord deputy of Sicily, and

* Prætextatus. It appeareth that he was under 17. yeers of age, and so Livy useth this word in the end of the 22 book: for Pretexta was Puerile habitus Tacitus 12. lib. and upon this it should seem Lex Iulia annalis, or annua for the redresse of the that disorder.

* Which were sent unto him from princes and Cities, to set his triumph these were called Corona triumphales, & hereof cometh the gold Coronarium.

The law it selfe called Annaria or Annalis.

and C. Valerius in Sardinia. Q. Fulvius the Conſul, before that he went in hand with any af- H fairs of State, ſaid he would both diſcharge himſelf and alſo the City of the duty to Godward, in performing the vowes which he had made. He declared that on that very day wherin he fought his laſt battell with the Celtiberians, he had made a vow to exhibit games to the honour of that moſt mighty and gracious god Jupiter, and likewiſe to build a temple to Fortuna equeſtris: and how thereto the Spaniards had contributed certain ſums of mony. So a decree paſſed, that thoſe plaies ſhould be ſet forth: and two Duumvirs choſen, to give order and bargain for the edification of the ſame temple. Likewiſe there was ſet down a certain ſtint of mony to be diſburſed for the defraying of the charges: to wit, not exceeding that ſum in the ſolemnity of the plaies, which was allowed unto Fulvius Nobilior, when he exhibited the like ſports after the end of the Ætolian war. Item, that for theſe games he ſhould not ſeek or ſend for, gather and raiſe, receive or do I any thing, contrary to the Act of the Senat, which in the time of L. Æmylius and Cn. Babius Conſuls was made as touching ſuch paſtimes. This decree the Senat ordeined, by occaſion of the ſuperfluous and exceſsive expenſes employed about the plaies of T. Sempronius the Ædile; which were very chargeable not only to Italy and the Latine allies, but alſo to forrain provinces. The winter this year was very ſharp, by reaſon of ſnow, and all manner of tempeſtuous weather. The trees that were tender and ſubject to froſt and cold, were all blaſted and killed: beſides the winter ſeaſon continued much longer then ordinary in other yeers. And thereupon the feſtivall ſolemnity of the Latine holidaies were ſo troubled and diſordered by a ſuddain and inſupportable ſtorm and tempeſt upon the hill [Alba] that by an ordinance of the Biſhops, it was celebrated again the ſecond time. The ſame tempeſt caſt down certain images in the Capitol, and diſfigu- K red very many places with thunderbolts and flaſhes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of Jupiter in Tarracina, the white temple at Capua: Item. the gate there called Romana, and the battlements of the wals in divers places. Among theſe wondrous prodigies it was reported alſo from Reate, that a mule was foaled with three feet. For this cauſe the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the books of Sibylla: and out of that learning they ſhewed to what gods ſacrifice ſhould be made, & what number of beaſts was to be killed. And becauſe many places were with lightning defaced, they ordained that a ſolemn ſupplication ſhould be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the foreſaid games and plaies which Q. Fulvius the Conſul had vowed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten daies together. After this followed the election of the Cenſors, wherein M. Æmylius Lepidus the Arch-biſhop, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, who had triumphed over the Ætolians, were created. Now between theſe two men, there L had been notorious enmity, oftentimes teſtified and ſhewed in many ſharp and bitter debates, both the Senat, and alſo before the people. When this election was ended, the two Cenſors according to the ancient uſe and cuſtome, ſat upon their ivory chairs of eſtate in Mars field, neer the altar of Mars. To whom there ſoon repaired thither, the principal Senators, accompanied with a troop beſides of citizens: and among the reſt, Q. Cæcilius Metellus made a ſpeech to this effect.

The Oration of Metellus, to the Cenſors.

"My maſters, you that are Cenſors, we have not forgotten that you ere-while were choſen by "the univerſal body of the people of Rome, to be ſuperintendents and wardens over us for our man- "ners and behaviors and that it becometh us to be taught, admoniſhed, & directed by you, and not "you by us. Howbeit we ought to tell and declare, what there is in you, that either is offenſive M

Fulvius*, we have not this day in the "City of Rome any men, whom if were called to a new ſcrutiny for to paſſe our voices again, we "would prefer before you to this office and place of dignity. But when we ſee you both together, "we cannot chuſe but much doubt and fear that ye are very badly matched and coupled as com- "panions in government: & that the common-weal ſhall not receive ſo much good by this, That "ye pleaſe and like us all ſo well; as ſuſtain harm in this, That you diſpleaſe and diſlike one ano- "ther. Theſe many yeers together, there hath been great heart-burning and much malice be- "tween you and the ſame muſt needs be grievous and hurtfull unto your ſelves: but now it is to "be feared that from this day forward, that rancor will be more prejudicial to us & the common- N

Vpon what motives and cauſe we are thus fearfull, much we could ſay, "but that peradventure your irreconcible anger is ſuch, as hath ſnared and poſſeſſed wholly your "ſpirits and minds already. Theſe quarrels, jars, and grudges of yours, we all in generall would "requeſt you heartily to end this day, and in this very temple wherin we are aſſembled: and "ſince the people of Rome by their voices have conjoyned you in one office; ſuffer your ſelves "by us to be linked & reconciled in perfect atonement. With one mind and accord, with one heart "& counſel chuſe the Senat; review the Cavalry and Knighthood of Rome; number the citizens; "aſſeſſe their goods; purge and cleanſe the City; & finally conſummate the ſolemnity of the cenſe "with a ſacrifice. And whereas in all your praiers well-neer, ye ſhall uſe this ordinary form of O
"words, That this thing, or that, may fall out in the end well and happily, to my ſelf and to my co- "league, See that you wiſh the ſame truly, ſincerely and from the very heart, that whatſoever ye "ſhall pray unto the gods for, we men may beleeve and all the world ſee, that you deſire the ſame "to be effected indeed. T. Tatius & Romulus in this very City reigned together with great unity & "concord, in the midſt whereof even in the very market place, they had encountred and joined "battell together as mortal enemies with their cruell armies. What! not enmities only have an "end, but wars alſo. And many a time moſt venemous and ſpiteful foes become faithfull allies, yea,

A "yea, and otherwhiles neer neighbors and fellow citizens. The Albans after their ſubverſion and "and utter ruin of their City, were brought over to inhabit Rome. The Latins & Sabins both, were "endenizen'd Romans. An old ſaying it is, and not ſo old as true, and for the truth become a "common proverb, that enmities ought to be tranſitory and ſoon die, whereas friendſhip ſhould "continue & live for ever. At theſe words, there aroſe a confuſed bruit, among them there aſſembled, in token of their conſent and approbation: and anon were heard the diſtinct voices of them all in general, craving and requeſting of the Cenſors the ſame; which making one entire ſound, brake off the ſpeech of Metellus. Then Æmylius among other matters complained that M. Fulvius had twice put him beſides the Conſulſhip, which otherwiſe he was ſure of. And Fulvius on the other ſide found himſelf grieved, that he evermore by Æmylius had been provoked, and that he B had waged law by ſtipulation againſt him to his dihonor and diſgrace. Yet both of them made fair and ſhewed, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would relent and be over-ruled by ſo many honorable perſonages of the City. So, at the inſtant requeſt of all them that were preſent, they ſhook hands and thereby aſſured one another to forgive and forget all matters paſt, and truly to make an end of malice, and be perfect friends again: whereupon they were much commended by the whole aſſembly, and conducted by them into the Capitoll. Where the Senat approved and highly praiſed, as well the careful induſtry of the principal citizens, in effecting this ſo weighty a matter, as alſo the good nature and flexibility of the two Cenſors. Who afterwards when they required to have a certain ſum of of mony aſsigned unto them for to employ in the publick edifices and other works of the City, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one whole yeer.

C The ſame yeer L. Poſthumius and Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Pretors in Spain agreed ſo together that Albinus ſhould make an expedition againſt the Vaccei through Luſitania, and ſo return from thence into Celtiberia. But Gracchus went as far as the utmoſt quarter of Celtiberia, for that in thoſe parts there was the greater war. And firſt he forced the City Munda, which he ſurpriſed ſuddainly in the night at unawares. Then, after he had received hoſtages, and put a garriſon there, he went forward aſſaulting forts and burning the villages, untill he came to another City of exceeding ſtrength, which the Celtiberians call Certima: where, as he was about to approach the wals with his engins of battery, there came unto him orators out of the City; who like good plain men of the old world, made a ſpeech unto him, nothing diſſembling but that they would war and be revenged, if their ſtrength and forces were ſufficient. For they requeſted leave to paſſe D to the Celtiberian camp, there to receive aid and ſuccour: but if they could not ſpeed, then they would conſult apart by themelves what to do. Good leave they had of Gracchus; and ſome few daies after, they brought with them ten Orators more. About noone-tide it was of the day, and the firſt thing that they craved at the Pretor his hand was this, That he would make them to drink before they parled. When they had once quaffed and carowſed round, they called again for more: whereat, all that were preſent and ſtood about them, laughed heartily, to ſee them ſo rude and uncivil, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldeſt man of the company began in this wiſe: We are ſent (quoth he) unto you from our nation, to know what aſſured means hath induced you to levy war againſt us? To this demand Gracchus anſwered, That he came with the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant army; which (if they were ſo deſi- E rous) he would do them the favour to ſee, that they might be able to make more certain report to their countrymen upon their own knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and knight marſhals, to put in arms and embattell all the bands and companies, as well foot as horſe; and then armed as they were to charge one upon another in manner of a battel. Theſe Embaſſadors after they had once ſeen this ſight, were ſent away: who went directly to the Celtiberians their neighbors, and frighted them for ſending any ſuccour to the City beſieged. The townſmen within having in vain ſet fire-lights in the night time aloft upon their turrets (which was the ſignal agreed upon between them) and ſeeing themſelves deſtitute of the only hope they had of aid, yeelded by compoſition. So they were enjoined to make paiment of four and twenty hundred thouſand Seſterces; and to deliver forty of their nobleſt gentlemen and beſt men of arms; not by way F of hoſtages (for commanded they were to ſerve in the wars); and yet in truth, they ſtood for a pawn of aſſurance for their fealty. From thence anon he marched to the City Alco, where the Celtiberians lay encamped, and from whom of late the Embaſſadors aforeſaid came: whom, for certain daies he provoked to fight, making ſmall skirmiſhes, by ſending out againſt their corps de guard his light-armed vancurriers, to the end that ſcuffling together every day more then other he might train them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his deſign had taken effect, he commanded the captains of the auxiliary ſouldiers, that after ſome ſhort skirmiſh, they ſhould make ſemblant as if they were overcharged with numbers, and ſo at once turn their backs, and flie as faſt as they could to their own camp: himſelf in the mean while G put his men in battell array within the rampier at every gate. Long it was not, but he might ſee his own bands and companies retiring back on ſet purpoſe, and running away, and after them the barbarous enemies following as hard as they could in chaſe. Now had he his army embattelled for the purpoſe, and ready to receive them: and therefore he made no longer ſtay then only to ſuffer his friends and allies to enter at liberty into the camp, but he ſet up a loud cry, and at one inſtant iſſued forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to endure this unexpected violent charge: and ſo they that were come to aſſail the camp of others, could not ſo much as de-

ſend their own: for preſently they were diſcomfited and put to flight; and within a while driven for very fear into their hold, and in the end turned out of it alſo. That day 9000 of the enemies left their carkaſes in the field, 320 were taken priſoners, together with 112 horſe, & 73 field enſigns. Of the Roman army, there died not above 109. Preſently after this battel, Gracchus marched with his legions to waſt and ſpoil the country of Celtiberia: and as he made havock in all places as he went, with driving booties, & with harrying & carying all that ever he could come by; the Cities and States of the country, ſome ſubmitted willingly of their own accord; others for conſtraint & fear received the yoke of ſubjection; ſo as in few daies ſpace he became maſter of an 103 towns that yeelded unto him. A mighty rich pillage he gat in this expedition. After this, he marched back again towards the City Alce from whence he came, and began to beſiege and aſſail the town. The inhabitants endured the firſt aſſault of the enemies, but afterwards ſeeing their town not only aſſailed by force of arms, but alſo ſhaken with engins and inſtruments of battery, diſtruſting the ſtrength of the City, they retired all within their fortreſſe: from whence alſo to the end, (having ſent their Orators before-hand) they & all that ever they had, were at the devotion of the Romans. A great booty there was gotten, and many noble gentlemen taken priſoners: amongſt whom were two ſons and one daughter of Thurrus. This Thurrus was a prince and great lord of thoſe parts, and ſimply the mightieſt potentat of all the Spaniards by many degrees, who being advertiſed of the hard hap and calamity fallen upon his children, ſent unto Gracchus into the camp for a ſafe-conduct, and thither he came himſelf in perſon. And firſt he demanded, Whether he could grant unto him and his their lives? The Pretor anſwered, That they ſhould live. Then he demanded again, if he might bear arms and ſerve under the Romans? and when Gracchus permitted that alſo; Then will I follow you (quoth he) againſt mine old friends and allies, ſince they diſdain to reſpect and regard me. From this time forward he took part with the Romans: and in many journies he bare himſelf loially and valiantly in their wars, and much advanced the Roman State. After this, Ergavica (a noble, rich and mighty City) affrighted at the calamities of other neighbor towns and States about them, ſet the gates open for to receive the Romans. Some Authors have written, that theſe towns and Cities yeelded not bona fide and in ſincerity of heart: but that ſo ſoon as he had withdrawn the legions out of any quarter, ſuddainly from that part they revolted: alſo, that afterwards, he fought a cruell battel neer the mountain Cannus with the Celtiberians, from the break of day untill noon: in which conflict there were many ſlain both of the one ſide and the other: neither did the Romans any other great deed (as they ſuppoſe) at Ergavica that day to teſtifie their victory, but kept the field, and challenged them out of their camp to fight. Moreover, that the next morrow all the day long, they gathered up the ſpoils of the dead: & on the third day ſtrook a ſecond battel, which was greater than the other: & then at length, the Celtiberians without all doubt loſt the field cleer; inſomuch as their camp was ranſacked. Furthermore, that there died of the enemies that day 22000, and not ſo few as 300 taken priſoners, and wel-neer as many horſe, beſides the winning of 72 military enſigns: and ſo the war came to a ſmall end, the Celtiberians made peace indeed, continued faſt and firm therein with all loyalty, and were not ſo fickle & unconſtant as before. They write moreover, that the ſame ſummer L. Poſthumius fought a brave battell with the Vacces in the farther province of Spain, where he put to the ſword 35000 enemies, & forced their camp. But it ſoundeth more like a truth, that he came not timely enough into that province, for to perform any ſuch exploits during that ſummer ſeaſon.

The Cenſors made a review and new choice of Senators in good concord and faithfull unity: for the preſident of the Senat was choſen, M. Æmylius Lepidus the Cenſor himſelf, who alſo was the high prieſt or Arch-biſhop. Three Senators were caſſed and deprived their places: but Lepidus held ſome in, whom the colleague over-paſſed and left out. Of that portion of mony, which out of the main allowance was divided between them, they cauſed theſe works following to be made. Lepidus for his part raiſed the great cauſey or wharf at Tarracina, which was a peece of work nothing acceptable to the people, for that he had himſelf lands and poſſeſsions there of his own, and ſeemed to eaſe his privat expenſes, under colour of doing a publick work with the Cities mony. He built a Theatre, a fore-ſtage or a vant-ſcaffold neer the temple of Apollo. He bargained with the Publicans or Undertakers for the poliſhing, blanching and whiting of the temple of Iupiter in the Capitol, and likewiſe of the pillars about it. From theſe pillars he removed the Images and Statues, which ſeemed to have been unhandſomly ſet one againſt another, and out of all order. Likewiſe he took from thence, the targets and field-enſigns of all ſorts, that were there ſet up and faſtned. But M. Fulvius put forth to making more works in number, and thoſe of better and greater uſe; To wit, a peer, and certain main piles within the river Tyberis; upon which piles, certain yeers after P. Scipio Africanus and L. Mummius being Cenſors, took order for arches to be founded and erected. Item, a ſtately hall or place behind the new ſhops of the banquers. Item A fiſh market, with others ſhops round about him, which he ſold to particular perſons. Item, a market place, and a porch or gallery without the gate Tergemina, and another behind the arſenall, and neer the temple of Hercules. Item, neer Tyber, and behind the church of the goddeſſe Hope, he cauſed to be built the chappell of Apollo the Phyſitian. Now they had beſides another ſtock of mony in common, which they employed in taking order for water to be conveighed into the City; and certain vaults to be made. But this work was impeached by M. Licinius Craſſus, who would not ſuffer the water to paſſe through his ground. Over and beſides theſe ſame Cenſors, inſtituted certain rents for portage, & pondage, & divers other impoſts. Many chappels & publick places

A places in the tenure and occupation of privat persons, they took order to be reduced to the use of the people in common, and to be set open for all comers. They changed the order of giving voices, and caused to enroll the tribes according to sundry quarters and divisions, having regard withall of the degrees of men, of their trades, mysteries and occupations. Also the one of the Censors M. Æmylius sued unto the Senat, that allowance should be made unto him of money for the games and plaies at the dedication of the Temples of Queen Juno and Diana, which in the Ligurian war he had vowed eight years before; and assigned there was unto him twenty thousand Asses. So he dedicated both those Temples within the cirque or shew-place of Flaminius. Also he exhibited Stage plaies three daies together after the dedication of the Temple of Juno, and two daies after the other of Diana: and every of those daies within the cirque Flaminius.

B The same Censor dedicated in Mars field a Chappell to the sea-gods, vowed by L. Æmylius Regillus, eleven years before, in a navall battell at sea against the Captains of K. Antiochus. Over the gates of which Chappel there was fixed a table with this title. [*For the appeasing and composing of a great war between two Kings, * the head, * to subdue * * for to make peace * *. This conflict, * when* L. Æmylius Regillus the Prætor, the son of M. Under the charge, command, and government, happy fortune, and conduct of him between Ephesus, Samos, and Chios, the fleet of King Antiochus the eleventh daies before the Kalends of February was vanquished, discomfited, shaken, battered, and put to flight, and there upon the same day two and forty Gallies were taken, with all the mariners and servitors within them. After which fight King Antiochus *and his Realm * * * . In consideration hereof vowed a Temple to the Sea-gods, assistants unto him in atchieving the navall victory.] Another table likewise, Antiochus and Enmenes. This place is defective in the Latine.

C with the very same inscription, was set up and fastned over the gates of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll. Within two daies after that the Censors had chosen a new Senat, Q. Fulvius the Cos. made an expedition against the Ligurians: and after he had passed with his army over wilds and mountains, where no tracts led them, through straights and passes of forrests, he fought a pitcht battell with the enemies, and not only won the field, but also in one and the self-same day forced their camp. Whereupon three thousand and two hundred of the enemies, and all that quarter of Liguria yielded unto him. Then the Consul placed these that had surrendered, in the plains and champain country, and planted garrisons upon the mountains. Letters hereof with great speed came to Rome: whereupon there were ordained processions for three daies. During which time of procession the Prætors celebrated sacrifices, and killed forty greater beasts. But the other Consul

D A. Manlius did no exploit worth remembrance in Liguria. Three thousand Transalpine Frenchmen passed over the Alps into Italy, in peaceable manner marching without any hostility or harm doing, and requested of the Consul and the Senat a territory to inhabit, where they might remain quietly under the seignory of the Romans. But the Senat commanded them to avoid out of Italy; and gave the Consul Q. Fulvius in charge to make search and enquiry into this matter, yea, and to proceed against them who had been the captains and counsellers to perswade them to pass over the Alps.

This very year died Philip King of the Macedonians, worn away to nothing, partly, for age, and partly, with grief of heart after the death of his son [Demetrius.] It fortuned that he kept his winter in Demetrias, tormented with anguish of mind for the loss and miss of his son, disquieted with

E remorse and repentance for his cruelty against him, which stung and pricked his guilty conscience. Besides, he saw his other son (who now was the undoubted heir apparant of the Crown, as well in his own opinion as in the conceit of others) how all men turned their eyes and courted to him. He considered withall, how his old age was despised and forlorn; whiles some expected his death, others did not so much as look for it; which was the greatest grief and trouble of all other. And together with him, there was Antigonus the son of Echecrates, bearing the name of his uncle Antigonus by the fathers side, who had been guardian to Philip. This Antigonus the elder had been a man of princely port and regall majesty; renowned also for a brave conflict and noble battell against Celomenes the Lacedæmonian. And him the Greeks for distinction sake from other KK. of N that name, surnamed * Tutor. His nephew or brothers son (I say) Antigonus, of all the honourable * Guardian or Protector.

F friends that Philip had, was the only man that continued fast and firm unto him without all corruption. But this his loyall fidelity and truth caused Perseus to be no friend of his, but rather the most mortall enemy that he had in the world. This said Antigonus forecasting in his spirit, in what dangerous terms he should stand, when the inheritance of the kingdom were devolved upon Perseus waiting his first time and opportunity; when he perceived that the Kings mind was troubled, and that now and then he fetched deep sighs for sorrow that his son was dead; one while would give ear only to the Kings words, otherwhiles also would find some talk and minister occasion to speak of the act so rashly and unadvisedly committed. Oftentimes he followed and seconded him in his moans and complaints, and would be thought to lament with him for company. And (as Truth useth alwaies to give many signs and tokens of her self coming to light) he would en-

G force and help forward every small thing what he could, to the end that all might the sooner be discovered and break forth. The chief ministers and instruments of this villanous fact, were Apelles and Philocles, who were the Embassadors sent to Rome, and had brought those pernicious letters, under the name of Flaminius, which wrought the death of Demetrius. For commonly it was given out through all the Kings Court, that those were falsified letters, forged by his Secretary, and sealed with a counterfeit signet. But the thing being rather deeply suspected, than apparantly detected, it chanced that Antigonus upon a time met with * Xychus, and laying hold upon him, * This seemeth to be the Secretary.

arrested his body, and brought him into the Kings house; and when he had left him in the safe H custody of certain persons, he went himself directly to Philip. "It should seem to me, & if it please
"your grace (quoth he) by many words which I have observed, that you would spend a great "deal to know the whole truth as touching your two sons, and be resolved whether of them
"twain it was that laid wait to take away the life of the other. Now the only man of all other
"that can undo the knot and clear this doubt, is in your hands forth coming, and that is Xychus.
Herewith he advised the King to call before him the said party, since that (as it fell out) he was already brought into the Court. Sent for he was and presented before the King; and being asked the question, he denied every thing at the first, but with such inconstancy, as it appeared evidently, that upon some little fear of torture offered unto him, he would be ready to bewray all: for at the very sight of the tormentor and the scourges, he relented. Then he disclosed and shewed in or- I der the whole proceeding and manner of this wicked practice and villany, how it was wrought as well as by the embassadors, as also by his own self their minister. Immediatly there were some of purpose sent to apprehend the said embassadors. And Philocles who was present in the way, they surprised and took of a sudden: as for Apelles (who had been sent to pursue one Chæreas) being advertised how that Xychus had bewraied & told all, sailed over into Italy. As concerning Philocles, there is no certainty known. Some report, that at the beginning he denied the matter stoutly: but after that Xychus was brought to his face and confronted him, he stood no longer in it. Others say again, that being put to torture, he endured the pains, and continued still in the deniall. Phi- lips sorrow and grief was by this means renewed and redoubled, reputing himself more unhappy in his sons, and his misery the greater, in that one of them was now dead and gone. Perseus being K certified that all was discovered, took himself for a greater and mightier person, than to fear and think it needfull for him to flie upon it. And therefore he sought only to keep far enough out of the way, purposing to stand upon his guard all the while that his father lived, and avoid the flaming fire (as it were) of his burning choler. Philip seeing that he could not possibly come by his person for to execute justice, thought upon that which only remained to be done, and studied how Perseus besides impunity, should not be recompensed and rewarded also for that his wickedness.
He called therefore Antigonus before him, unto whom he was bounden and beholden already, for bringing to light the unnaturall murder committed upon Demetrius his son; and of whom he conceived this opinion, in regard of the fresh and late glory of his uncle Antigonus, that the Macedonians should have no cause to be ashamed or repent, if they had had him for to be their K. L And in this wise he brake with him: "Since my unhappy fortune is such (quoth he) O Antigonus,
"that I ought (contrary to all other fathers) to wish my self childless, I have a mind and purpose
"to make over unto you that kingdom, which I received at the hands of your uncle, which he "preserved and kept, yea, and augmented for my behoof during the time of my nonage, & where-
"in (whiles I was under his guardianage) he bare himself not only valiant, but also true and faith-
"unto me. No man I have but you, whom I can esteem worthy to wear the Crown; and if I "knew of none at all, yet had I rather that both it and the Realm perished and were extinct for "ever, than Perseus should enjoy it as the guerdon of his ungracious & devillish fact. I shall ima"gine yet that Demetrius is risen from death to life, I shall think that I have the fruition of him
"again, if I leave you in this place, you, I say, the only man of all others that wept for the death M "of the poor innocent young man, and lamented for my unhappy errour and unfortunat trespass.
After this speech with Antigonus, he never ceased to entertain and grace him in the face of the world with all kind of honour that he could devise. For seeing that Perseus was in Thrace, Philip went in progress to every City of Macedony, and recommended Antigonus to all the Princes and and States thereof. And without all doubt, if God had given him longer life but a little, he would have enstalled him in full possession of the kingdom. Well, to return again unto Demetrias, where he wintered (as before is said) he departed from thence, and sojourned a long time in Thessalo- nica. From thence after he was come to Amphipolis, he was surprised with a grievous malady.
Howbeit, certain it was and very apparant, that he was more sick in mind than body; and that ever and anon the remembrance and object, the apparition and ghost of his son, whom he caused I (innocent as he was) to be put to death, followed and haunted him so continually with care and grief, that he was out of all sleep, and could not lay his eyes together: yea, it drave him into raving, cursing, and execration of Perseus his other son; and so he ended his daies. But although Philip died somewhat with the sooneſt for Antigonus, yet he would have gone very near to have stept into his thron, if either the Kings death had immediatly been divulged abroad, or that Anti- gonus had then been about the Court that he might have had intelligence thereof. For Calligenes the Kings Physician, who had the cure of him, staid not untill the breath was fully out of the Kings body; but so soon as he perceived that his state was desperat, upon the first deadly signs that he observed, sent messengers post to Perseus, who were set of purpose in places convenient, according as it was complotted between them twain: but he concealed the Kings death from all them that were not of the houshold, untill he was come. By which means Perseus surprised them all before they looked for him, or knew abroad that the King was departed, and thus he took the Crown upon him by policy, which he had purchased with mischief.

The death of Philip fell out very well to give some delay and respit, and to gather more forces for the waging of war: for the nation of the Bastarnæ, having been a long time sollicited thereto, departed out of their own country, and with a great power as well of foot as horse, came on this side

A side the river * Ister. Now there were arrived before to advertise the King hereof, Antigonus and Cotto. This Cotto was a nobleman among the Bastarnians. And Antigonus was full against his will joyned in embassage & sent with Cotto to raise the Bastarnians. Howbeit, not far from Amphipolis they met with news (but very uncertain) of the Kings death: which occurrence troubled the whole course of their designs. For thus it was complotted, that Philip should give the Bastarnæ safe passage through Thrace and find them victuals: to the effecting and performing whereof, he had entertained the peers and principall States of those quarters with presents, and assured them upon his fidelity, that the Bastarnians should pass through their country peaceably without any harm-doing. Now his intent and full purpose was, to extinguish utterly the nation of the Dardanians, and to plant the Bastarnians in their country. Hereby he aimed at a twofold commodity: B the one was this; that the Dardanians (a people most malicious ever to the Macedonians, and who alwaies in time of the troubles and adversities of the KK. took their vantage to annoy them) might be rooted out: the other, that the said Bastarnæ leaving their wives and children in Dardania, might be sent to waste and spoil Italy. Now were they to pass to the Adriatick sea and so to Italy by the way of the Scordiscians (for other way there was none to lead an army) and soon would they, thought he, grant passage unto the Bastarnians: for they differed not at all, either in language, or manners & fashions: and more than that, they were like enough to joyn with them in the expedition, seeing they went to the conquest and pillage of a most rich and wealthy nation. These designments were accommodated and fitted to what events soever should happen. For in case the Bastarnians should happen to be defeated by the Romans and put all to the sword; yet C this would be a comfort again; that the Dardanians were consumed from the face of the earth, that he should meet with a booty of that which the Bastarnians left behind them; and finally, have the possession free and entire to himself of all Dardania. But in case their fortune were to have the upper hand, then whiles the Romans were averted from him, and amused upon the war with the Bastarnians, he should be able to recover whatsoever he had lost in Greece. These had been the designs projected by K. Philip. So they entred peaceably and marched without hostility, under the word and promise of Cotto & Antigonus. But shortly after that news came of the death of Philip; neither were the Thracians so tractable and easie to be dealt withall in commerce and traffick: nor the Bastarnians could be content with that which they bought with their money, or be kept in order as they marched, but that they would break their ranks & turn out of the di- D rect way. Hereupon they began to do wrong & injury on both sides one unto another: which encreasing daily more & more to outrages, kindled the fire of an open war. In the end, the Thracians not able to endure the violence & multitudes of these enemies, leaving their villages in the plains beneath, retired to an exceeding high mountain, called Donuca. To which place, when the Bastarnians would have gone: behold notwithstanding they approached to the tops and ridge of the hils, they were surprised with a storm, much like to that wherewith the Gauls (as it is reported) perished at what time as they were a spoiling and pilling the Temple at Delphi. For they were not only drenched first with showers of rain pouring upon them, pelted afterwards with thick storms of hailstones strucken with great cracks of thunder, and blasted with gleams of lightning that dazled their eye-sight: but also the lightning flashed so upon them on every side, that it seemed they E were charged and shot directly against their bodies: so as not only the common souldiers, but also the principal leaders and captains themselves were smitten down therewith and overthrown. Whereupon when they were scattered & would have fled down the hill, from the exceeding steep rocks they tumbled down they knew not how with their heads forward. And albeit the Thracians pursued them thus scared and affrighted, yet they had nothing in their mouth, but That the gods forced them to run away, and that the sky fell upon them. Being thus disparkled with this tempestuous storm, and returned as it were out of a shipwrack into the camp from whence they set forth & most of them but half armed, they began to debate in councill what to do. Hereupon arose some dissention among them: whiles part were of opinion to return back into their own country, and part advised to follow the way still and pierce forward into Dardania. About 30000 F persons went through under the conduct of Clondicus: the rest of the multitude returned the same way they came into the parts beyond * Danubius. Perseus being possessed of the kingdom, commanded Antigonus to be put to death: and whiles he was setting the States in order, and establishing himself in his own seat, he sent embassadors to Rome as well to renew the amity that his father had with the Romans, as also to request that he might be stiled with the name of King by the Senat of Rome. And these were the affairs in Macedony that year.

* Danubium.

* Donaw.

Q. Fulvius the other Cos. triumphed over the Ligurians: and known it was for certain, that this triumph was granted unto him more for favour, than for any great exploit of his that might deserve such honour. He carried in shew a mighty deal of the enemies armor: but little or no money at all. Howbeit he dealt among his souldiers thirty Asses apeece: to every Centurion he gave G twice as much, and to each Gentleman serving on horseback, the same threefold. There was nothing in this triumph more memorable and worthy the noting, than this, that as it fell out, he triumphed now the very same day that he had the year before upon his Prætorship. After his triumph he published the general assembly for the election of Magistrats: wherein were created Coss. M. Junius Brutus, and A. Manlius Volso. This done, when there had been three of the Prætors elected a sudden tempest brake up and dissolved the assembly. The morrow after which was * four daies full before the Ides of March, the other three were chosen, namely, Marcus Titinius

* Ante quartum Idus Martii, i.e. the 11 of March.

Curvus, Titus Claudius Nero, and T. Fonteius Capito. The Roman games were exhibited again the H ſecond time, by the two Ædiles of the Chair Cn. Servilius Capio, and Ap. Claudius Cento by occaſi-on of certain prodigies that hapned: for there was an earthquake; and in the publike pavilions and tabernacles, where the ſacred beds of the gods were ſolemnly ſpread, the heads of the gods which were laid in thoſe beds, turned away of their own accord, and the wooll together with the other coverlets which were laid before Jupiter fell down. It was taken alſo for a prodigious wonder, that the mice and rats had gnawn and taſted before of the olives upon the table [ of Jupiter :] for the ſatisfaction and expiation of which prodigies, nothing elſe was done, but the ſolemnizing of thoſe games and plaies again, as is aforeſaid.

To have armed the ſame, which in peace he had received of his father: and for that cauſe it is ſaid, N That he was paſſing well beloved of the youth and luſty gallants, who deſired nothing more than to ſpoil and raiſe booties.

Now when the Conſul was in deliberation with his councill, as touching war in Iſtria, ſome were of opinion, to proceed thereunto incontinently, before that the enemies could aſſemble their forces; others advifed to conſult firſt with the Senat: but their counſel imported, who were for ſpeedy expedition. So the Conſul diſlodged from Aquileia and encamped near the Lake Timavus which lieth hard by the ſea. Thither came Caius Furius (one of the navall Duumvirs) with ten ſhips: for two ſuch Duumvirs or wardens had been choſen to make head againſt the Illyrian fleet:
who with twenty ſhips in all, keeping the upper ſea, were to guard the ſea-coaſts ſo as they had Ancona (as it were) the middle center between: for L. Cornelius took the charge of all that lay on O the right hand thereof as far as to Tarentum; and C. Furius of the left, unto Aquileia. Theſe ten veſſels (I ſay) were ſent to the next port, againſt the marches of Iſtria, with other ſhips of burden fraughted with ſtore of victuals and proviſion. The Conſul followed after with his legions, and pitched his camp five miles from the ſea. And within a ſhort time there was a good and frequent market kept in the port, from whence there was conveyed all manner of proviſion into the camp.
And to the end that this might hold in more ſecurity, good guards were ſet about the camp on.

A on every ſide. Toward * Iſtria there was one ſtanding frontier garriſon, conſiſting of a cohort of Placentins, levied on a ſudden, oppoſed and lodged between the ſea and the camp. And to the end the ſame might ſerve for a guard to defend them that watered at the river M. Ebutius (a Colonell of the two legions) was commanded to adjoyn two ſquadrons of ſouldiers out of the ſecond legion. T. and C. both Ælii (Colonels likewiſe) had led the third legion, by the way that goeth to Aquileia, which ſhould guard the forragers and fewellers. From which quarter about a mile diſtant was the camp of the French. And a certain petty King there was among them, one Carmelius, having the conduct of three thouſand armed ſouldiers, or ſomewhat more. So ſoon as the Romans were approached, the lake * Timavus with their camp the Iſtrians ſet them down ſecretly in a cloſe place behind a little hill; and from thence followed the Roman army as it marched, B by croſs and crooked waies, eſpying and lying for all advantages that might be preſented: for intelligence they had of all that was done either at ſea, or by land. And when they perceived upon a time the corps de guard before the camp feeble and weak, and that there was a great number of unarmed Merchants between the camp and the ſea, without any defence at all either from land or water, they ran at once upon the foreſaid guards, to wit, the Placentine cohort, and alſo the ſquadrons of the ſecond legion. Now their enterpriſe at the beginning was covered and hidden by occaſion of a morning miſt, which at the firſt warmth of the ſun brake and ſcattered away, and then began ſomewhat to appear through it: but the light was not yet clear and come to the full; by reaſon whereof every thing (as commonly in ſuch a caſe) ſhewed far bigger than it was. And this at that time mightily deceived the Romans, cauſing the army of the enemies to ſeem the C greater by many degrees. At which fight, the ſouldiers of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the camp with a great tumult and alarm, and there cauſed far more fear than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, nor give a ready anſwer to thoſe that asked them the queſtion. Over and beſides, a great noiſe they heard from the camp gates, as where there was no ſufficient guard to ſuſtain the firſt aſſault. Beſides, their running thus in a throng together in the dark, while one tumbled upon another, made ſuch a confuſion, that they knew not whether the enemy was within the rampier or no. No other cry was heard but this; To ſea, To ſea. For by occaſion that one ſouldier at adventure began to ſet up that note, all the camp preſently rung again therewith, from one end to the other. Whereupon at firſt, (as if they had been commanded ſo to do) to the ſea they ran, ſome few ar- D med but the moſt part without any armour or weapons: afterwards more, and conſequently at laſt in manner all; yea, and the Conſul himſelf, ſeeing that he laboured in vain to reclaim them, back he fled, and could prevail neither by command nor authority, nor yet with prayers in the end; only M. Licinius Strabo (a Tribune or Colonell of the third legion, abandoned of his own legion) remained behind with three enſigns and no more. The Iſtrians finding him alone, (for no man elſe was ſeen in arms to make reſiſtance) entred joyntly into the camp, ran upon him (& as he was embattelling his ſouldiers and encouraging them in the quarter about the Prætor his lodging) ſurpriſed, and with numbers over-charged him. The skirmiſh and fight was more cruell, than for proportion of ſo few defendants; and not ended, before that the Tribune himſelf and thoſe about him, were ſlain every man. The Generall his pavilion and all about it, was overthrown: which E when the enemy had ranſacked and rifled of all that was there, they went as far as the treaſurers lodging, the market place, and to the gate * Quintana: where they found abundance of all things ſet out ready for their hands, and within the treaſurers pavilion the tables ſpread and covered with good cates and meat upon them. Then their chief Lord & Leader (the petty King aforeſaid) made no more ado but ſate him down, fell to his victuals and made good chear; and anon all the reſt following his example, did ſo likewiſe, and never once thought of arms, or of enemies; and like to thoſe who were not wont to fare ſo well and feed liberally, they greedily overcharged their bellies with wine and viands: but the Romans all the while ſtood in far other terms. They trembled, they went haſtily to their buſineſs both on land and ſea. Down went the ſhipmen and ſailers with their tilts and booths; and look what proviſion of victuals or other things F were ſet forth to ſale upon the ſtrand and ſhore, they harried and hurried a ſhipboord: the ſouldiers all affrighted ran amain to the ſea-ſide, for to be embarked. The mariners fearing leſt their veſſels ſhould be overcharged, ſome put back the preſs and withſtood them for coming in, others ſhove off from the wharf; and lanched into the deep. Hereupon began a braul and broil, and from that they fell together by the ears, ſouldiers and mariners, one with another: ſome went away with knocks and wounds, and others left their lives behind them; untill at length, by the Conſul his commandment the fleet was retired far from the land. Which done, he began to ſort the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of ſo great a multitude) twelve hundred found with armor about them, and very few horſemen that had brought their horſes with them. All the reſt were a confuſed and diſordered company, reſembling the raſcall ſort of camp- G followers, as victuallers, launders, ſcullions, and lackies: who had been a ready booty to have preyed upon in caſe the enemies could have thought upon any feats of arms. Then at laſt came a meſſenger to recall the third legion and to ſurpriſe the guard of the Gauls; and with that, from all parts they began to return again toward their own camp, for to recover it, and wipe away and blot out the ſhameful ſtain and diſhonour which they had received. The Colonels of the third legion commanded the ſouldiers to throw down upon the ground their forrage and fewell, they charged the Centurions to ſet the elder and unweildy ſouldiers two and two upon the horſes and labouring beasts which they had discharged of their load; and willed the horsemen to take up be- H hind them every one a young lusty footman; shewing what an honour it would be to the third legion, for to regain by their valour the camp, which had been lost by the cowardice and fear of those in the second: and easily (say they) may it be won again, if the Barbarians, whiles they are encumbred with the pillage, might be surprised at unawares, and be taken themselves, like as they overtook others before. This exhortation was received with great alacrity and contentment of the souldiers. Aloft were the ensigns born and advanced apace, neither staid the port-ensigns one whit for the souldiers. Howbeit the Cos. and those companies which were brought from the sea, came first to the rampier. L. Atius a principall Centurion of the second legion, not only encouraged the souldiers, but made remonstrance unto them, That if the Istrians these victories, had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it, they I would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea, so soon as they had turned them out of their tents; and afterwards have set a good corps de guard, at least wise before the rampier and the avenues thereof: but like enough it is (saith he) that with guzling wine they were dead asleep like beasts. And herewith he commanded A. Baculonius his own ensign-bearer, a man of approved valour and singular prowess to advance his banner forward. Mary, that I shall (quoth he) full soon, if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly. With that he forced his whole strength and having flung the ensign over the trench into the camp, he was the first himself that entred at the camp gate. On another part likewise T. and C. both Ælii, and Coloners of the third legion, were come with their Cavalry: then presently followed those also whom they had horsed two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage, and after them the Cos. K with his whole army. But of the Istrians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to run away; the rest were dead asleep indeed, and never awoke again. So the Romans recovered all their goods, save only the wine and victuals which was devoured and consumed. The Roman souldiers who were crazy and sick, and had been left in the camp, after they perceived their own fellows within the rampier, found their hands again, caught up weapons, and made a great slaughter and execution. But above all others C. Popilius, surnamed Sabellus, a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome, bare himself most bravely that day, who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) slew the greatest number of the enemies by far. Eight thousand Istrians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive: for the choler and despiteous indignation of the souldiers was such, as they had no L mind at all of prizes and booties. Howbeit, the K. of the Istrians, drunk as he was, had so good fortune as to be taken from the very boord where he sat, and hastily mounted on horseback by his men, and so fled away and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven souldiers: and of them, more died in their morning flight than in the recovery of their camp. Now it chanced so, that Cn. and L. both named Gavilii, new Coloners and inhabitants of Aquileia as they came with victuals, had like to have stumbled ignorantly upon the camp, when it was taken & possessed by the Istrians. They being retired back in great haste to Aquileia, leaving their carriage behind them, set all on a fright & uproar not only at Aquileia but also at Rome within few daies after: for thither was the rumour run, That not only the camp was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was lost, and the army utterly M defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all sudden tumults and alarms, writs went forth for musters and levies of souldiers extraordinarily, not in the City only, but also throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman Citizens were enrolled, and the Latine allies were commanded to set out 10000 foot with 300 horse. M. Junius the Cos. had commandment to pass over into Gallia, and to levy of the Cities and States of that Province, as many as they were able to make and furnish. It was ordained withall, that T. Claudius the Prætor should make proclamation, that the souldiers of the fourth legion, and of the Latine allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse, should meet together at Pisæ; and that in the absence of the Cos. he should defend that Province: also that M. Titinius the Prætor should appoint the Rendezvouz at Ariminum; that the first legion, and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse, should there assemble. Then N Nero took his journey clad in his rich coat of arms, toward Pisa his Province. And Titinius having to Ariminum Catus Cessius a Colonel, to take the conduct of the legion there, took musters at Rome. M. Junius the Cos. passed out of Liguria into Gaul and arrived at Aquileia, having levied aid-souldiers as he went of all the Cities of Gaul and the Colonies, to be in readiness out of hand. There he was certified that the army was safe and sound: whereupon he dispatched his letters to Rome to advertise them that they should not trouble themselves any more in this false alarm, and himself after he had discharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them, went to his companion in government. Great was the joy at Rome, coming thus as it did unlooked for. The musters were laid aside, the souldiers discharged who were enrolled and had taken their military oath, and the army visited with the plague at Ariminum was dismissed and sent home. The O Istrians albeit they were encamped with a great strength of armed men, not far from the Cos. his camp, after they heard once that the Consul was come with a new army disbanded and slipt every man away on all sides to their severall Cities, and the Consuls retired with their legions to Aquileia, there to winter.

When these troubles of Istria were thus at length appeased, there went forth an act of the Senat, That the Coss. should agree between themselves, whether of them twain was to return to Rome for

A for to hold the assembly for election of Magistrats. At what time as A. Licinius Nerva, and C. Papyrius Turdus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Orations to the people, inveighed bitterly against Manlius in his absence, and promulged a Law to this effect, That after the Ides of March (for the Coss. had their governments already prorogued for one whole year) he should continue no longer in place, to the end that so soon as he was out of his office, he might presently be called to his answer judicially. Quintus Ælius, one of their Collegues, withstood this bill by them proposed, and after much debate and contention prevailed so much, that it passed not.

About the same time Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Posthumius Albinus, being returned out of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Prætor M. Titinius in the Temple of Bellona, there to discourse of the acts by them atchieved, to demand their deserved honours, to the end
B that praise and thanksgiving also should be rendred to the immortall gods. Moreover, at the very same time intelligence was given by letters from T. Ebutius the Prætor, which his son brought and shewed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia: Namely, that the Ilians, joyning unto them the strength of the Balari, had invaded the province standing in peaceable terms: neither was he able to make head against them with so feeble an army as he had; & the same wasted and consumed much with the pestilence. The same news related the Embassadors likewise of the Sardinians, making humble suit to the Senat, to relieve and succour their Cities at least wise, for that their villages and country towns were already past help. This embassage, with all other matters concerning Sardinia, put over to the new Magistrats; as pitifull an embassage also was presented unto them from the Lycians, who complained grievously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had been annexed and C made subjects by L. Cornelius Scipio: "Indeed (say they) we lived sometime under the seignory of "K. Antiochus, but that servitude of ours under the K. compared to this present state and condi-"tion wherein we now are seemed unto us an excellent liberty: for not only are we now yoaked "and kept under publike authority in generall, by taxes, levies, and impositions, but every one in "particular endureth meer bondage and slavery. Our selves are abused, yea, and our wives and "children suffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and sides they work upon "and discharge their humour of cruelty: in our good name (an indignity unsupportable) we are "distained, depraved, and defamed: yea, openly in the face of the world, they cease not to com-"mit outrages against us, even to usurp and extend their authority over us, and to try masteries "upon us with extremity: to the end that we Lycians might be put of all doubt, that there is no
D "difference between us and slaves bought and sold for silver in open market. The Senat moved with these remonstrances by the Lycians addressed their letters to the Rhodians to this effect, that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians: or that any other born free, should be enthralled by any person: but their will was, that the Lycians should in such terms live under the government and protection of the Rhodians, that both States, the one as well as the other, might range and frame themselves like good associats under the Dominion and Empire of Rome.

After this followed two triumphs over Spain, one immediatly upon another: first, Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians: and the morrow after, L. Posthumius [Albinus] over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards of those parts. Tib. Gracchus carried in shew 40000 pound weight of E silver: and Albinus twenty thousand. Both of them divided among their souldiers twenty five Denarii apeece, to each Centurion the same double, and trebble to every horseman. Thus did they also by allies as well as by Romans.

It fortuned about that time, that M. Junius the Consul, came out of Istria to Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden: and when the two Tribunes of the Commons, Papyrius and Licinius, had in the presence of the Senat baited and wearied him with interrogatories, as touching the affairs passed in Istria, they brought him forth also before the body of the people. "To which questions, after that the Consul had answered, how he had not been above 11 daies "in the Province: and as for the things that hapned in his absence, he knew no otherwise than F "they did, only by the common bruit and report: then they went on urging him still, and asking "how it came to pass, that A. Manlius rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, "why he passed out of Gaul (which was his allotted Province) into Istria? and to shew, when it "was that either the Senat decreed, or the people of Rome granted by their voices to enterprise "that war? But haply it may be said (qd. he) that albeit the war was undertaken only upon his own "head alone: yet no doubt, executed it was right worthily with policy and valour. Nay, I wis, but "far contrariwise: and hard it is to say, whether it were begun more lewdly, than managed incon-"siderately. Two entire corps de guards were on a sudden at unawares surprized by the Istrians: the "Roman camp was forced & taken, with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein: the "rest scattered without arms, and the Cos. himself was the formost man that ran away to the sea
G "side unto the ships: and surely he should render an account of all these matters, when he is a "privat person again, since that he should not do it being Cos. This storm past, the generall assembly for the Magistrats election was holden: wherein were created Coss. C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. The next day following were the Prætors chosen: to wit, P. Ælius Tubero the second time, C. Quintius Flamininus, C. Numisius, C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Valerius Lævinus. The civill jurisdiction of the City fell to Tubero, the forrain to Quintius. The government of Sicily was allotted to Numisius: of Sardinia to Mummius. Howbeit, this Province by reason of the great war therein became the charge of the Cos. And by lot it fell to Gracchus:

but

but Istria to Claudius his Collegue. Gaul was divided into two Provinces; whereof Scipio by lot H obtained one, and Lavinus the other.

Upon the Ides of March, on which day Sempronius and Claudius entred their Consulship, moved it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Istria, and the enemies to both those Provinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Embassadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magistrats, and L. Minutius Thermus who had been Lieutenant to the Consul Manlius in Istria, entred into the Senat-house. By them the Senat was informed how dangerous the wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the Senators by the embassies of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had importuned the Censors and Consuls of the former year: the sum of their complaint was this, That their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thither to I dwell: which if it might be suffered, within few reviews and cessings it would come to pass, that their Cities should be dispeopled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and waste, and able to set out no souldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnits and Pelignians complained, that four thousand housholds were gone from them, and retired to Fregellæ; and yet neither the one nation or the other, were set at a less proportion of souldiers in all their levies. Two cautelous means and devices there were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleasure. The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as left issue of their race behind them in their house, That they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, some did injury to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for, both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children, as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen K or other whom they liked of; with condition to manumise and make them free, that they might be Tribes or enfranchised Citizens. And they also who wanted issue to leave behind them, were held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of law and respect of issue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Burgesse and freedom of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practises, the embassadors craved a remedy for the time to come: as also that they would peremptorily command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an expres inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vassall and villain, and so to alienat him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein he lived: and that whosoever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not be counted for a Citizen. These L petitions were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Istria and Sardinia which were in arms; to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousnd and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemen of the Latine allies; and ten quinquiremes or galleaces, with five banks of oars, in case the Generall would warp them out of the arsenall. The like number as well of the Infantry as Cavalry, was assigned for Istria. The Consuls also were enjoyned to send to M. Titinius in Spain, one legion with three hundred horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250 horsemen.

Before that the Consuls cast lots for their Provinces, certain prodigies were reported. Namely, that in the territory of Crustumium, there fell from heaven a stone in the lake of Mars: That in M the territory of Rome, there was an infant born like a very stump, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen four-footed. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were smitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Puteoli two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. Whiles these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf also in the day time at Rome, which having entred at the gate Collina, after much coursing and hunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chace, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquiline gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Coss. killed greater beasts for sacrifice: and for one whole day, a solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the shrines and altars of the gods. These sacrifices done and past, accordingly as it appertained, the Coss. cast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius, befell Istria, to Sempronius, Sardinia. N

After this, C. Claudius published a Law by vertue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of allies; and proclaimed, That those allies, and namely, of the Latine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had been enrolled among the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Marcus Claudius, and Titus Quintius, or any time afterwards, should make return every man into his own City, before the first day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mummius the Prætor had in commission to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To this Law and Edict aboveseid of the Consul, an act also of the Senat was adjoyned, That the Dictator, Consul, Interregent, Censor, and Lord chief Justice in the Common Pleas for the time being, should endeavour and take order, that whosoever were manumised and made free, should take an oath, That he who manumised or enfranchised him, did it not with an intent, for to ex- O change the City wherein he was: and look who would not thus swear, him they thought not worthy to be manumised. But his charge and jurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Claudius the Consul.

Whiles these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having wintered in Aquileia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army into the frontires of Istria. Where, as they made waste and spoil far and near as they went, the

Istrians

A Iſtrians entred into a commotion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to ſee their goods thus pilled and ranſacked, than for any aſſured hope they had of their ſufficience to make head againſt two armies. Having therefore raiſed a concourſe of their able youth from all their Cities and States, they aſſembled in haſte a ſudden and tumultuary army, which at the firſt gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage, than with perſittance of reſolution. In conflict there were ſlain of them to the number of four thouſand; the reſt abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they ſent embaſſadors firſt into the Roman camp to crave peace, and then the hoſtages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of theſe news by the letters of the Pro-Conſuls, C. Claudius the Conſul fearing leſt this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province and the conduct of the army, without ſo-
B lemn prayers and vows made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of arms, departed ſuddenly in great haſte (all of the head) by night towards his Province, and made no man privy thereto, but only his Collegue. His voyage thither was not ſo raſh and inconſiderat, but his carriage there was more fooliſh and undiſcreet: for being thither come, he aſſembled a generall audience; where after he had very unſeaſonably reproached Manlius for his running away out of the camp, (to the great diſcontentment of the ſouldiers, who were the firſt that fled;) and with opprobrious terms ſhaken up M. Junius alſo for taking part in this diſhonour with his companion: in the end he commanded them both to avoid out of the Province. Whereupon the ſouldiers made anſwer again and ſaid, That they would then obey the Conſuls commandment, when (according to the ancient cuſtome of their fore-fathers) he had made his ſolemn vows within the Capitoll;
C and then taken his leave and departed out of the City, accompanied with his Uſhers in their rich coats of arms, warlike. Hereat he was ſo far enraged with anger, that he called upon the treaſurers deputy belonging to Manlius, for chains and gyves, and menaced to ſend Junius and Manlius both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewiſe made as little reckoning of the Conſuls commandment: and the more animated he was to diſobey the Conſul, by reaſon that he was backed by the whole hoſt round about him; who as they ſupported the cauſe of their Captains and Leaders, ſo they hated the Conſul at the heart. In concluſion the Conſul being loaden and wearied with the contumelious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the ſcrumps and taunts of the multitude in generall (for they ſtuck not over and beſides to mock him and make a laughing ſtock of him) he went his waies again to Aquileia, in the ſame ſhip wherein he came.
D From thence he wrote unto his Collegue by an Edict, to charge thoſe new ſouldiers who were enrolled for Iſtria, to meet at Aquileia: to the end that no buſineſs ſhould keep him at Rome, but that with all ſpeed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly. His companion in office was well content, and did all theſe things requiſit full willingly: and a ſhort day was aſſigned for the aſſembling of the ſouldiers at the Rendezvouz abovenamed. But Claudius was at Rome well-near as ſoon as his letters; where, at his firſt coming, he made an Oration in the publike audience of the people, as touching the demeanor of Manlius and Junius: and having ſtaid no longer than three daies at Rome, he ſet out with his Lictors formally in their coat-armour, when he had made his vows ſolemnly in the Capitol, and ſo departed into his Province again with as much celerity and haſte (if not more) as he E came from thence.

Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to aſſault by all forcible means the town Neſtium, into which the principall perſons of the Iſtrians, and Æpulo their King, were retired. Claudius, with his two new legions, preſented himſelf before the town; and after he had diſcharged the old armies and their commanders, laid ſiege unto it, and intended to force it with mantlets and engins of battery. The courſe alſo of the river which ran along beſide the walls, and not only empeached the aſſailants but yielded water unto the beſieged, he diverted into another new channell, and beſtowed many daies work thereabout. This mightily affrighted the barbarous people, to ſee how they were cut off from water. Howbeit, they never thought of peace for al this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children; and when they had ſo done (becauſe they would F preſent to the view of their enemies, ſo horrible a fact and fearfull ſpectacle) they maſſacred them upon the walls openly in their ſight, and then threw them headlong down. Whiles the ſilly women and poor infants (amidſt their pitious and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered, the Roman ſouldiers mounted over their walls and entred into the City. Their King when he once perceived (by the fearfull outcries of thoſe who fled) that the town was loſt; for fear he ſhould be taken alive ſtabbed himſelf with his dagger to the heart. All the reſt were either taken priſoners or killed. After this, two other towns, Mutila and Faveria, were won by aſſault and raſed. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in ſo poor a nation: which was beſtowed every whit upon the ſouldiers. Five thouſand ſix hundred and two and thirty perſons were ſold out-right in port-ſale under the guirland. The Captains of this war were firſt ſcourged with G rods and then beheaded. Thus Iſtria by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was appeaſed: and all the Cities and States thereof from every quarter, came in with their hoſtages, made ſubmiſſion, and did fealty and homage to the Romans.

The Iſtrians war was no ſooner ended, but the Ligurians began to complot for to take arms and enter into rebellion. T. Claudius the Pro-Conſ. (who the former year had been Prætor) was governour and commander at that time of Piſæ with a garriſon of one legion. The Senat being advertiſed thereof by his letters, thought good to ſend the very ſame letters to C. Claudius (for the other Conſul was already paſſed over into Sardinia:) and withall, a decree was granted out to this effect, That conſidering he had performed his commiſſion in Iſtria, ſo as there remained no more for him to do there, he ſhould (if he thought ſo good) tranſport his army into Liguria. Moreover, upon the Conſul his letters, wherein he wrote what exploits he had atchieved in Iſtria, there was ordained a ſolemn proceſſion for two daies together. Semblably, the other Conſul Tib. Sempronius, managed his affairs as happily in Sardinia: he entred with an army into the country of the Sardinian Ilians. Great aids were come from the Balarans to relieve and ſuccour thoſe Ilians: with both theſe nations he fought a battell in pitched field. The enemies were diſcomfited and put to flight, turned out of their camp, and 12000 armed men ſlain. The morrow after, the Coſ. commanded all their armor and weapons to be gathered together and laid on an heap; and this he burned as a ſacrifice to the honour of Vulcan. Which done, he retired with his victorious army into the aſſociat Cities, there to paſs the winter.

C. Claudius likewiſe, upon receit of the letters of T. Claudius, and the commiſſion directed from the Senat, marched with his legions out of Iſtria into Liguria: where, the enemies were come down into the plains, and lay encamped near the river Scultenna. In which place there was a battell fought: 15000 of them were put to the ſword, and not ſo few as 700 taken priſoners, either in the conflict, or within the Camp; for that alſo was forced and won: beſides, 51 enſigns they loſt. The Ligurians, as many as eſcaped the execution, fled on all ſides to the mountains for refuge; and notwithſtanding that the Conſul ſpoiled and waſted their champain country, there was not one man made ſhew of arms. Thus Claudius having in one year vanquiſhed and ſubdued two nations, and in one Conſulſhip (a rare felicity in any other man) reduced other two Provinces into quietneſs and peace, returned to Rome.

Certain prodigious and monſtrous ſights were that year reported, to wit, in the territory of Cruſtumium, a certain ſoul, called Sangualis, with her bill pierced into a ſacred ſtone. In Campain a Beef ſpake: at Syracuſa a bull that ſtraied out of the fields from the herd, lept the brazen cow there in the City, and did his kind. In the territory of Cruſtumium, there was a ſupplication and proceſſion holden one day long in the very place of the foreſaid prodigious ſign. In Campain, the beef or cow aforeſaid, was put out to be kept and fed at the charges of the City. Laſt of all, the prodigy of Syracuſa, was expiat by a purgatory ſacrifice, by direction from the ſoothſaiers to what gods, ſupplications & ſacrifice ſhould be made. That year died M. Claudius Marcellus the Biſhop, who had been Coſ, and Cenſor. In his ſtead M. Marcellus his ſon was conſecrated Biſhop. Likewiſe in the ſame year, there was a Colony of 2000 Citizens of Rome planted at Luca. The Triumvirs or the Commiſſioners who had the conduct and placing of them, were P. Ælius, L. Egilius, and Cn. Sicinius: one and fifty acres of land and an half was ſet out for them apiece to occupy, out of the territory late conqnered from the Ligurians, and which had been ſometime the poſſeſſion of the Tuſcans, before it was holden by the Ligurians.

Then came the Conſul C. Claudius to the City of Rome, where after he had diſcourſed before the Senat, as touching the proſperous execution of his affairs, as well in Iſtria as Liguria, & thereupon demanded a triumph, he ſoon obtained that honour; and during his Magiſtracy triumphed at once over thoſe two nations. In which ſolemnity of his triumph, he carried in ſhew 307000 Deniers and * 85702 Victoriats. He gave to every common [Roman] ſouldier fifteen Denarii apeece, a double proportion to the Centurions, and thrice as much to every horſeman. But upon the allies he beſtowed leſs by the one moity than to natural Citizens: and therefore as they followed his chariot, they were ſilent and ſaid never a word: a man that had ſeen them would have ſaid they were malecontent.

* Victoriatus, the ſame that Quinarius, i. e. half Denarius. It had the Image of Victory ſtamped upon it.

During the time of this triumph, the Ligurians perceiving that not only the Conſul his army was brought home to Rome, but the legion alſo at Piſa diſcharged by T. Claudius: thinking now all fear paſt and overblown, ſecretly levied a power; and having paſſed over the croſs frontiers, by traverſing the waies through the muontains, deſcended into the downs, and waſted the demains of Modena and by ſudden aſſault ſurpriſed the very Colony. The news hereof was no ſooner arrived at Rome, but the Senat commanded C. Claudius the Conſul to hold the high Court for the ſolemn election, with all convenient ſpeed: that ſo ſoon as new annuall Magiſtrates were created, he might return into his Province, and perforce recover this Colony out of their hands. So accoreing to the advice and ordinance of the Senat the ſaid aſſembly was holden: wherein were elected Conſuls Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hiſpalus, and Q. Petilius Spurinus. Then were the Prætors afterwards choſen, to wit, M. Popilius Lenas, P. Licinius Craſſus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Papyrius Maſo, M. Alburius, and L. Aquilius Gallus. The Conſul C. Claudius had his Patent ſealed again for one year longer, to continue in command of the army, and government of the Province Gallia. And for fear leſt the Iliſtrians likewiſe ſhould follow the example of the Ligurians, he had commiſſion to ſend thoſe allies of the Latine nation, whom he had brought out of his Province for to ſolemnize his triumph.

Upon that very day, on which the Conſuls, Cneus Cornelius and Quintus Petilius entered their Magiſtracy, and ſacrificed each of them an oxe as the manner was, in the honour of Jupiter: In that beaſt which Q. Petilius cauſed to be ſlain, the liver was found headleſs. When he had reported this accident unto the Senat, he was enjoyned to ſacrifice another beef for to appeaſe the wrath of the gods. Moved then it was in the Senat houſe as concerning the Provinces, and a decree paſſed, that both Conſuls ſhould be ſent to Piſa, and againſt the Ligurians: but order was given, that

A that whether of them had the charge of Pisæ allotted unto him, he ſhould (when the time came) repair to Rome againſt the election of yearly Magiſtrats. Moreover, there was another branch of this decree, that either of them ſhould enroll two new legions, and three hundred horſemen, and levy of the Latine allies ten thouſand foot apiece, and ſix hundred horſe. And T. Claudius continued ſtill in full command, untill ſuch time as the Conſul was arrived in his Province. Whiles theſe matters were thus debated and paſſed in the Councill-Houſe, Cn. Cornelius was called forth by a bailiff or Uſher. And within a while after he was gone out of the Temple, he returned thither a-B gain with an heavy and diſmaied countenance, and declared unto the LL. of the Senat, that the liver of that oxe which he alſo had killed for ſacrifice, a beaſt of ſix years old and well liking, was conſumed and come to nothing; and when he hardly beleeved the Miniſter attending upon the ſacrifice, who told him hereof, that himſelf cauſed the water to be poured forth of the pot wherein the tripes and inwards were ſodden, where he ſaw the reſt of the tripes and entrales full and whole, but all the liver waſted away, after a wonderful and miraculous manner, not to be ſpoken. The LL. were much terrified and amazed at this prodigious object: and the more perplexed were they, for that the other Conſul likewiſe related unto them, how in regard that in his ſacrifice the liver wanted an head, he had killed three oxen more, one after another, and yet could not procure the favour and grace of the gods. Hereupon the Senat commanded him ſtill to ſacrifice theſe greater beaſts, untill ſuch time as he had his deſire, and the gods were pleaſed again. Now it is ſaid, that all the other gods were well enough contented, and their ire mitigated and appeaſed, only the goddeſs * Salus, Petilius could not be reconciled unto, for all that ever he might do. Then * Health.
C the Conſl. and Prætors committed the diſpoſition of their Provinces to the arbitrement of the lots. Piſæ fell to Cornelius, and Liguria to Petilius. As for the Prætors, L. Papyrius Maſo was Lord chief Juſtice by lot appointed, within the City of all Citizens pleas, and M. Aburius had the juriſdiction over ſtrangers: M. Cornelius Scipio Maluginenſis had the charge to govern the lower Spain, and L. Aquilius Gallus, Sicily. The two Prætors behind, requeſted earneſtly that they might not be ſent into their Provinces, and namely, M. Popilius into Sardinia: alledging, that Gracchus was able to quiet that Iſland; and the rather, for that T. Ebutius the Prætor was by the Senat adjoyned to him for aſſiſtance: neither was it good to interrupt courſes begun, the continuity whereof is the moſt effectuall means to exploit any great important affairs. For what with deli-D vering up the ſword by the old L. Deputy, and receiving it by the new ſucceſſor (whom it were more meet firſt to be trained up in knowledge of the State, than to be put to the managing of State-matters) oftentimes the good opportunities of atchieving brave enterpriſes paſs by and are loſt. This excuſe of Popilius was held for good, and ſo approved. Then comes P. Licinius Craſſus, and he for his part made allegations why he might not go into his Province: namely, by occaſion of the ſolemn ſacrifice, that he was to give his attendance upon. Now the higher part of Spain was allotted unto him. But commanded was he either to go into his Province, or elſe to take oath in a frequent and full aſſembly of the people, that the ſolemn ſacrifice (as he pretended) was the thing that hindered him, and nothing elſe. This order being ſet down and thus paſſed in the behalf of P. Licinius: then ſteps me up M. Cornelius, and required them to take an oath of him likewiſe, that he might not go into the nether Province of Spain. So both theſe Prætors were E ſworn according to one and the ſame form of oath. Whereupon M. Titinius and T. Fonteius were commanded to remain in quality and place of Pro-Conſuls within Spain, and retain ſtill the ſame authority and power of command: and order was granted, that for to ſupply their forces, there ſhould be ſent unto them three thouſand Citizens of Rome with two hundred horſe, and alſo five thouſand Latine allies, and three hundred horſemen.

The ſolemnity of the Latine holydaies began the * third day before the Nones of May: where- * 5. of May.
in, becauſe at the ſacrificing of one beaſt the Magiſtrate of Lanuvium in his prayer left out theſe words [ Populi Romani Quiritium ] and prayed not for the good eſtate of the people of Rome, and the Quirits, it bred a ſcruple. The matter was moved in the Senat, and the Senat referred it over to the Colledge of the Biſhops and Prelats of the Church. And they pronounced this award, That F foraſmuch as thoſe Latine feaſts were not ſolemnized as they ought, they ſhould begin again anew: and that the Citizens of Lanuvium, by whoſe default they were thus to be renewed, ſhould be at the charges of all the beaſts for ſacrifice. Moreover, to breed more fearfull ſcrupulosity in mens minds, it fortuned that Cneus Cornelius the Conſul as he returned from that ſolemnity out of the Alban mountain, fell down in a fit of Apoplexy: which turned into an Hemiplegia or dead palſie all the one ſide of his body, and ſo he was conveyed to the bath and hot waters at Cumes: where, by occaſion that his diſeaſe grew upon him ſtill, he departed this life; from whence he was brought to Rome, and there carried forth in all magnificence of funerall obſequies, and right honourably interred. He had been Biſhop alſo as well as Conſul. Q. Petelius the other Conſul, being commanded to hold an aſſembly for the ſurrogation of a Collegue unto him, (ſo ſoon as poſſi-G bly he might be warranted by the auſpices and approbation of the ſacred birds) and withall, to proclaim and publiſh the Latine feaſts and holydaies aforeſaid; ſummoned the election againſt the * third day before the Nones of Sextilis: and the Latine ſolemnity, the third day likewiſe be- * 3. of Auguſt:
fore the * Ides of the ſame month. * 13 of Auguſt.

Whiles mens minds were much poſſeſſed already with religion, and ſet upon their devotions, word was brought moreover of certain fearfull prodigies: to wit, that at Tuſculum there was ſeen a burning flame in the ſky: that at Gabes, the Temple of Apollo, and many private mens houſes:

houſes: likewiſe at Graviſcæ the town wall and one of the gates were ſmitten with thunderbolts. H
For the procuration whereof, the LL. of the Senat ordained that the Biſhops ſhould give order according to their diſcretion.

Whiles the Conſuls were thus ſtaid, firſt both, by their own ſcrupulous holineſs; then one of them by the death of the other; and afterwards by occaſion of the new election and the renewing of the Latine feſtivall ſolemnity: C. Claudius in the mean time approached with his army to Modena, which the Ligurians the year before had won. He had not continued the ſiege full three daies, but he forced the Colony: and having thus recovered it from the enemies, he reſtored it again to the former inhabitants. Eight thouſand Ligurians died there within the walls upon the ſword: and immediatly he diſpatched his letters to Rome, wherein he not only declared the ſimple news, but glorified him and made his boaſt, That through his fortitude and fortune, I both the Romans had not an enemy that durſt ſhew his head on this ſide the Alps; and that he had conquered ſo much land as might ſerve for to be divided by the poll, among many thouſands. Tib. Sempronius likewiſe at the ſame time, fought many fortunat battels in Sardinia, and utterly tamed and ſubdued the Iſlanders: 15000 enemies he there ſlew: all the States of that nation which had revolted, were reduced to obedience under the people of Rome: the old tributaries had an impoſition and exaction laid upon them of a double tribute, which they ſurely paid: the reſt were put to a contribution of corn. After he had ſet the Province in quietneſs, and received out of the whole Iſland two hundred and thirty hoſtages, he ſent certain Lieutenants as meſſengers to make report at Rome of all his proceedings: who alſo in his behalf ſhould make ſuit unto the Senat, That in regard of the happy ſucceſs in thoſe exploits, under the charge, conduct, and fortune K of Tib. Sempronius, firſt, due honour, praiſe, and thankſgiving might be rendred to the immortall gods; and then, that himſelf might be allowed at his departure out of the Province, to bring away his army with him. The Senat gave audience to the meſſengers aboveſaid within the Temple of Apollo: and upon their relation ordained a generall proceſſion for two daies: commanding the Conſſ. to ſacrifice 40 head of greater beaſts: and withall, enjoyned Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Conſul to continue that year with his army in that Province. Then the election which had been pub-

* The third of Auguſt. liſhed againſt the * third day before the Nones of Sextilis for the ſubſtitution of one of the Conſſ. was the ſame day accompliſhed. And Q. Petilius the Conſ. created for his Collegue, M. Valerius Lævinus, for to enter immediatly into his Magiſtracy. This Lævinus had been a long time deſirous to be employed in ſome Province or other: and fitly it fell out for his longing deſire, that letters L came, importing how the Ligurians rebelled and were gone out again in arms. So after he once

* 5. of Auguſt. heard the contents of theſe letters, he made no longer ſtay, but upon the very * Nones of Sextilis all goodly to be ſeen in his warriors coat of arms, he commanded the third legion (by occaſion of this alarm) to go into France, to C. Claudius the Pro-Conſul: alſo the Duumvirs or two wardens for the ports and navy, to go to ſea, and with a fleet to make ſail for Piſa, & from thence to coaſt about all Liguria, and thus by hovering upon the ſeas, to terrifie the enemies that way alſo. Q. Petilius likewiſe the Conſ. had appointed a day for his army to meet in the ſame place. Moreover, C. Claudius the Pro-Conſul, advertiſed of the Ligurians revolt, over and beſides thoſe forces which he had about him at Parma, levied in haſte a ſtrength of more ſouldiers; and ſo with his compleat army approached the borders of the Ligurians. The enemies upon the arrivall of C. M
Claudius, by whoſe conduct they well remembred how late they had been diſcomfited and put to flight near the river Scultenna, minding to ſeek for defence rather by the ſtrength of advantagious places than force of arms, againſt that power of his which to their coſt they had before tried,

* L'Alpi del Pelegrino. ſeized the two hils, * Letus and Baliſta, about which they raiſed a mure alſo for their better ſafety. But ſuch as lagged behind and quit the champain plaines and lower grounds with the lateſt, were ſurpriſed and cut ſhort, to the number of fifteen hundred. The reſt kept within the mountains: who albeit they were in fear and danger of their own parts, yet forgot not their inbred cruelty; but ran upon the booties and prizes which they had taken at Modena, their poor priſoners whom they held captive they pitiouſly mangled, and killed moſt villanouſly: as for the beaſts in the Temples every where, they rather hacked, hewed, and cut in peeces butcher-like, than ſacrifi- N ced in decent, ſeemly, and religious manner. Thus being ſatisfied with the bloud and maſſacre of living creatures, they took all their breathleſs things they had, and reared and ſtuck them upon the wals; and namely, implements of all ſorts, made rather for uſe and neceſſity than ornament and ſhew. Q. Petilius the Conſul, for fear leſt the war would be ended in his abſence, diſpatched his letters to M. Claudius, to haſte away with his army into France, for he would attend his coming upon the plains called Macri. Upon the receit of which letters, Claudius diſlodged out of Liguria, and delivered unto the Conſul his army at the ſaid plains called Macri. Few daies after came Caius Valerius the other Conſul thither alſo. There they divided their forces, and before they departed one from the other, they both together made a ſurvey and review of their ſeverall armies. This done, they caſt lots into what quarters they ſhould either of them go, for that they O held it not good policy to charge the enemy both of them joyntly in one part. Now certain it is, that Valerius received his lot according to the auſpices, in that he was within the precinct of the Temple or proſpect by the Augur aſſigned. But Petilius herein made default (as the Augurs pronounced afterwards) and namely the error was herein, becauſe he being himſelf without the compaſs aforeſaid, had put the lot into the caſket, which was carried afterwards within the circuit of the ſaid Temple. This done, they went into divers quarters: Petilius encamped affront that

A bank and rising of the hill between Baliſta and Letus, which by a continual ridge uniteth and joyneth the one mountain to the other. There, as he was exhorting his ſouldiers in open audience, he let fall (by report) an ominous word, preſaging his own death, never thinking of the ambiguity and duple conſtruction thereof: ſaying, that he would that very day * capere Letum. In two ſeveral places at once he began to mount up the hills. That regiment wherein he was himſelf, advanced forward couragiouſly: but the other was repulſed and beaten back by the enemies: whereupon the Conſul rode full gallop to help that ſide which went down: and in very truth reclaim his men he did from running away; but whiles without good regard of his own perſon he kept before the enſigns in the forefront, he chanced to be ſhot through with a dart, and ſo fell down dead in the place. The enemies were not aware of the Generals death: but ſome few of his own men who B ſaw him fall, made haſt (as knowing well that in it conſiſted now the main victory) to cover his body. So the reſt of the multitude, as well cavalry as infantry, captainleſs as they were, diſſeized the enemies and were maſters of the mountains. Of Ligurians there were ſlain 3000: of the Roman army not above two and fifty. Now beſides this evident iſſue and event which fell out upon ſo heavy and deadly a preſage by the * omen aforeſaid, the pulletier alſo was heard to ſay, that all was not well in the auſpices of the birds; neither was the Conſul himſelf ignorant thereof.

* capere Letum, thus written with a capital L. ſignifieth, To gain the hill Letus: but with the litle l. (which the ear cannot diſtinguiſh) importeth, To take his death.

* Valerius Maximus reporting the ſame ſtory, calleth this Omen of his (which I commonly interpret [Oſſe] fortuitum vocis jactum; When a man caſteth forth a word at a venture, and ſpeaketh more truly than he is aware. For want of a proper tearm to expreſs the Latine [Omen] all tranſlators hitherto, French, Italian, and Engliſh, have been put to their ſhifts, and help themſelves with [Præſage.] Which in mine opinion is not appropriat to the thing, but common: as comprehending other tokens; of birds, whether they be auguria or auſpicia; of beaſts inwards; of lightning and the reſt: or rather implying εφορμητικὸν, i. the fore-deeming by thoſe ſigns, yea, and extendeth to the fore-giving of the mind. Where-
C as that other word [Oſſe] is very ſignificant, and in analogie æquivalent to [Omen.] I marvel much therefore, why it is thought either ſtrange and new (ſeeing it is Engliſh, uſed no doubt commonly in times paſt, and at this day currant in the North parts, where the people haply are more obſervant of ſuch preſages) rather than many other forrain words, brought into our language, and ranged with the Engliſh: or why it ſhould be condemned as abſonant and not pleaſing to the ear, more than ὄσσα in Greek, which commonly betokeneth (a voice) and more properly in Plato (as Budæus hath well obſerved) is taken for [Omen] like as ὀσσεύειν for ominari, & ευμαντικὸς [divinare] as Euſtathius noteth upon Homer, Iliad. ξ. From whence, who ſeeth not that [Oſſe ma Offing both] are derived? The word then being not baſely born, but deſcended from the mother of all learning, the Greek tongue, and enfranchiſed in this Iſland time out of mind (howſoever it hath been confined into the North) would not be exiled clean, but rather reduced and received for a free denizen, quaſi poſtliminio.

C. Valerius having heard * * * * * * [The great clerks and deep D divins, thoſe alſo were profoundly ſeen in the common law, gave it forth. That ſeeing the two ordinary Conſuls (Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hiſpalus, and Q. Petilius Spurinus) of that year, were both dead, the one by ſickneſs, the other by the ſword, it was not lawful for the other Conſul (C. Valerius Levinus) ſubrogued in the place of the deceaſed, to hold the aſſembly general for the election of new Magiſtrats.] * * * * * * * * * This within theſe marks [] the Latine copies have not, but is partly ſupplied out of Priſcian in his 17 book.

* conducted. On this ſide the Apennine were the Garuls, Lapirins, and Hercatians: beyond the Apennine were the Briniats. Againſt them that had pilled and ranſacked Piſa and Luna, Q. Mutius made war within the compaſs of the River Audena: and when he had brought them in ſubjection, he took from them their arms. For which exploits atchieved in France and Liguria, under the conduct and happy fortune of the two Conſuls, the Senate ordained that there ſhould be pu-E blick proceſſion for three daies, and commanded to ſacrifice forty greater beaſts. And thus verily the tumultuous wars of the French and the Ligurians, which aroſe in the beginning of the year, were in ſhort time and without any great maſtry daſhed and appeaſed.

But now in lieu thereof, great care was taken for the Macedonian war, by occaſion that Perſeus ſowed the ſeeds of debate and quarrel between the Dardanians and the Baſtarnians. Beſides, the Roman Embaſſadors who were ſent into Macedony, to ſee in what terms things there ſtood, were now returned to Rome, and had brought word, That in Dardania they were up in arms. With them there came alſo from King Perſeus certain Orators to make excuſe in his behalf, and to cleer him in the action, namely, that the Baſtarnians neither were by him ſent for nor entred into any execution by his motive. The Senat would neither acquit the King as unguilty, nor yet directly F accuſe him as culpable in that point. Only they required, that he ſhould be advertiſed and admoniſhed, to be very well adviſed and careful to keep that league and accord inviolable, which he would ſeem to entertain with the Romans.

The Dardanians ſeeing that the Baſtarnæ were ſo far off from departing out of their countrey (as they well hoped they would) that they endamaged and endangered them ſtill every day more than other, as bearing themſelves bold upon the ſuccours of the Thracians neer neighbours, and the Scordiſci; thought it their beſt courſe in policy, to adventure upon ſome hardy enterpriſe, although it were raſh and inconſiderate: whereupon they aſſembled all in arms, and from every quarter of their countrey ſhewed and advanced before the next Town, to the camp of the Baſtarnians. Winter time it was, a ſeaſon of the year which they made choice of, that the Thracians and G the Scordiſci might be retired home into their own countries: which when they were advertiſed of, and that there remained none but the Baſtarnæ alone, they divided their forces in two parts: with the one, to march directly forward and openly to make head againſt them affront; with the other, to fetch a compaſs through by-waies and blind forreſts, and ſo to charge upon their backs. But before they could wheel about the enemies camp, the battail was begun: wherein the Dardanians had the overthrow, and were driven to put themſelves within their City, which was almoſt twelve miles diſtant from the camp of the Baſtarnæ. The conquerors followed the train of victory, and incontinently inveſted the Town, making full account, that the next day either the enemies H would yeeld, or elſe they ſhould be able to win the place by mere force. In the mean time, the other regiment aboveſaid of the Dardanians, which caſt about, knowing nothing at al of their fellows defeat, began to aſſail the camp of the Baſtarnians, left without a ſufficient guard for defence.

There wanteth the beginning of a diſcourſe as touching the demeanor of K. Perſeus.

* * * As the manner of the Kings was, he ſate in a ſtately throne of Ivory, to hear pleas and decide controverſies of the ſmalleſt and moſt trifling matters. So tranſported was he and caried away with an humor of levity and ſpirit of inconſtancy, ſo diſtracted & wandering in all the courſe of his life, that he was never ſetled and well contented in any condition or ſtate whatſoever: in ſuch ſort, as neither he knew his own ſelf, nor any man elſe wiſt well what to make of him. He would not ſeem to ſpeak unto his friends, and hardly was ſeen to laugh familiarly among thoſe of his neereſt acquaintance. He made a fool of himſelf, and mocked others likewiſe; ſuch was his in- I ordinate and irregular munificence. To men of honor ſtanding highly upon their worth and reputation, his manner was to beſtow childiſh trifles, as ſugar-plums to eat or to play withal, toyes and gewgawes inſtead of great and pretious preſents: others again that looked for nothing, thoſe he enriched. And therefore ſome deemed that he knew not what he did: others gave it out that he did all in plain mockage: and there were again that let not to ſay, how he was out of his right wits, and clean beſides himſelf. Yet in two things, which were both great and laudable, he carried with him a Princely and Royal mind indeed; to wit, in adorning Cities with ſtately gifts, and honouring the Gods with divine worſhip. He promiſed the Megapolitans in Arcadia to raiſe a wall about their City; and in truth the better part of the money to defray the charges thereof, he ſent unto them. He went in hand to build a magnificent Theatre of marble at Tegæa: at Cizicum, he K gave freely to the Prytaneum (a fair hall by it ſelf in the heart of the City, where, at the common charges, certain had their diet of free-coſt) by way of honourable reward, a cupbord of golden plate ſufficient for the furniture and ſervice of one table. As for the Rhodians, I cannot ſay, what one ſpecial gift ſingular above the reſt, he beſtowed upon them; ſo liberally minded was he to them-ward, and his hand ever open to give them of all ſorts whatſoever they needed or required.
Now, his magnificence in honoring the Gods, what it was (if there were nothing elſe) the Temple of Iupiter Olympius begun by him in Athens (ſo anſwerable every way to the Majeſty of that great God, that the like to it is not to be found again in the whole world) may teſtify ſufficiently.
Moreover, he beautified Delos with goodly ſea-enſigns, and with a great number of ſtatuts and images. Likewiſe he promiſed to edify at Antiochia, a ſtately Temple in the honor of Iupiter Capi- L tolinus; not only arched above-head with a golden embowed roof, but ſeeled all over the wall ſides with plates of gold: beſides many other things in divers places, which by reaſon that he reigned but a very ſhort time, he could not finiſh and perform. In magnificence alſo of playes, publick ſhews, and pageants of every ſort, he over-went all the Kings his progenitors before him, as well in regard of Grecian actors and gameſters, whereof he had many about him, as of the reſt who were acquainted with the faſhions of his own countrey. He repreſented the fight of ſword-players at the ſharp with unrebated ſwords, after the cuſtome of the Romans; with greater terror and fear at firſt, than pleaſure and delight of men, who were not uſed to behold ſuch ſights; but afterwards by often exhibiting the ſame, in ſuch manner, as ſometime they drew blood one of another, yea and otherwhiles gave not over ſo, but fought to the uttermoſt, even to death, he made it a familiar M exerciſe & a pleaſant ſpectacle to the eye; and thereby ſet an edge upon the courage of many yong gallants, and emboldned them to embrace chivalry and follow feats of arms. So as in proceſs of time, he that was wont at the beginning to ſend as far as Rome for theſe fenſers, and to hire them for great wages and reward, now with his own * * * L. Cornelius Scipio (had the juriſdicti-on) over forrainers. To M. Attilius the Pretor, the government of Sardinia by lot was fallen, but he was enjoyned to paſs over into Corſica with the new legion which the Conſuls had enrolled, conſiſting of 5000 foot and 300 horſe. And during the time that he ſhould be employed there in the wars, Cornelius had commiſſion to continue in his charge and place of command, within Sar- dinia. Unto Cn. Servilius Capio for low Spain, & P. Furius Philus for the higher, were aſſigned 3000 Roman footmen and an 150 horſe; but of Latine allies, 5000 of the one and 300 of the other. N As for I. Claudius, he was appointed to Sicily without any ſupply at all. Moreover, the Conſuls had commandment to enrol two legions beſides, with the full number as well of foot as horſe and to charge the [Latine] allies, with the ſetting out and maintenance of a 1000 footmen & 600 horſe.
This levy and taking of muſters, the Conſuls went through with, in more difficulty, by reaſon of a great mortality, which beginning the year before with a murrein of kine & oxen, turned this year into peſtilent epidemical diſeaſes of men. Look who fell ſick once, lightly they died before the ſeventh day: and thoſe that overlived and eſcaped that criſis, lay long ſick by it, and commonly of the quartan ague. The moſt that went of this malady were ſlaves, whoſe breathleſs carkaſſes lay ordinarily along every ſtreet unburied: and more than that, * men were not able to inter ſo much as the dead bodies of free perſons they died ſo thick; in ſuch ſort, as they putrified and rotted a- O bove ground: for neither hungry dog nor greedy gripe, would once touch them. And for certain it was known and noted, that neither all that year nor in the former, during the mortality of man and beaſt, there was not a vultur or gripe any where to be ſeen. Divers Prelats and Prieſts of State dropt away of this plague, and namely, Cn. Servilius Capio a Biſhop, the father of the Pretor: Tib.
Sempronius Longus the ſon of Titus one of the Decemvirs for ſacreed rites and divine ſervice: P.
Ælius Pætus the Augur: Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, C. Attelius Æmylius the chief ſuperintendent

A of all the parish-priests, and M. Semp. Tuditanus a Bishop. These were substituted Bishops in place of the dead, to wit, C. Sulpitius Galba in stead of Tuditanus. * * For Augurs were subordained, T. Veturius Crassus Sempronianus in the room of Gracchus; Q. Ælius Pætus for P. Ælius. Decemvirs over holy rites were elected, C. Semp. Longus; and C. Scribonus surnamed Curio, supplied the want of the grand superintendant aforesaid. Still continued the pestilence; whereupon the Senat ordained, That the Decemvirs should have recourse to the books of Sibylla: by whose order and direction, publick supplications held for one day long: and after a devout manner, the people conceived and made a solemn vow in the common-place, according to that form of words which Q. Martius Philippus indited and prompted unto them to this effect: That if this malady and pestilent disease, were removed out of the territory of Rome, they would for two daies space solemnize
B a feast, go in procession and pour out their prayers with all devotion. In the Veientian countrey a man child was born with two heads; and another at Sinuessa but with one hand. At Oximum a maid child came into the world with teeth in the head: and over the Temple of Saturn (standing in the market place of Rome) there was seen in the skie a bow full bent all the day long, if the air were cleer and the weather fair: and at one time there shone out three suns. Also in one night, there evidently appeared many flaming lights and fire-drakes shooting along in the air. The men of Lanuvium and Cære affirmed plainly, That within their Town they saw a Serpent with a crest and mane, yea, and the same marked all over with yellow spots like gold: and it was held for certain that in the territory of Capua an oxe spake.

Now were the Embassadors returned out of Affrick by the * Nones of June, those I mean who C went to Carthage, after they had been with King Masinissa, and spoken with him. But better & more certain intelligence they had by this King, than from the Carthaginian themselves as touching the affairs that had passed in Carthage. Howbeit, thus much they reported upon their assured knowledge, that Embassadors came from King Perseus, and had audience in the Senat secretly by night within the Temple of Æsculapius. Also both the King affirmed flatly, and the Carthaginians themselves but faintly denied, that Embassadors likewise had been sent from Carthage into Macedony. Whereupon the Senat was of advice and resolved to dispatch their Embass. also into Macedony. And these three were sent, to wit C. Lælius, M. Valerius Messala, and Sext. Digitius.

During this time, Perseus, by occasion that certain Dolopians obeied him not, and of some matters in controversy and difference referred the audience and decision to the Romans, and refused D the arbitrement of the King led forth an army against them, and reduced the whole nation under his obedience and jurisdiction. From thence he passed over the Oetæan mountains, and upon certain religious motions arising in his mind he went up to Delphos, for to visit the Oracle. Being thus on a suddain seen in the very heart and midst of Greece, he struck a terror not only into the cities next adjoining, but also the bruit of this tumultuous alarm was blown as far as to K. Eumenes. After he had staied at Delphi nor above 3 daies he returned into his own realm, by the way of Phthiotis, Achaia and Thessaly, without any dammage done or wrong offered to the territories through which he passed. Neither thought he it sufficient thus only to win the love and favor of those Cities & states through which he was to journey, but he addressed either Embassadors or wrote his letters, praying them to bear no longer in mind the enmities which had been between them and E his father, for asmuch as they were not so bitter and deadly but they might well enough, yea, and ought to end and die with him: as for himself, he saw no let or hindrance in the world to empeach them for entertaining a faithful amity with him. But above all others he sought means to be reconciled to the Achæans, and to reenter into grace and favor with them. This nation alone of all Greece, together with the City of Athens, were grown into those terms of despight and malice against the Macedonians, that they debarred them from once setting foot within their confines. And hereupon it came that when certain slaves fled out of Achaa, they retired into Macedony for refuge, and there remained: and because the Achæans had forbidden the Macedonians to come within their liberties, they durst not likewise for their parts enter into the marches and frontiers of his Kingdom to recover their bondmen. Which when Perseus perceived he caused all those fugi-
F tive slaves to apprehended and he dispatched his letters unto the Achæans, wherein he wrote, That he would right courteously send back their slaves home again, although they were run away from them unto him; advertising and advising them to beware and look well unto it, that there were no more any such escapes and runnings away of their bond servants hereafter. When these letters were read by Xenarchus their Pretor, who sought to curry some favor and to wind himself into grace with the King, most of them that were present judged the letters to have been written right graciously and with great government and moderation, but principally those persons, who beyond their hope were to recover and receive their slaves whom they had lost. But Callicrates one of them who were fully perswaded, that the safety of their whole estate depended upon the loiall observance and inviolable maintenance of the accord contracted with the Romans, spake
G thus or to this effect following. "It may seem to some here (qd. he) my masters of Achaa that we "are in question at this present of a small matter and of mean importance: but I for my part am "of opinion, that we are not now in hand to treat but have already debated, and after a sort con-"cluded, one of the greatest affairs and of most consequence that we know. For we who have in-"terdicted the KK. of Macedony and the Macedonians to come within our borders, and have de-"creed that this edict may stand firm and irrevocable, and that for this intent especially, Because "we would admit neither Embassadors nor messengers from the KK. for fear lest by entercourse

The oration of Callicrates the Achæan.

" of them, the hearts of ſome among us might be ſollicited and tempted to novelty and alterati-
" on: we now are content to hear the King, although abſent in perſon, preaching in ſome ſort to " us, yea, and more than that (God ſend us good luck) approve and applaud his Oration. And H
" whereas the very wild beaſts refuſe (for the moſt part) the meat which is laid for a bait to de" ceive and hurt them, yea, and have the wit to ſhun and avoid the ſame; we, blind beetles that we " are, ſuffer our ſelves to be caught and fed with the vain apparence and colorable ſhew of a little
" kindneſs, and for hope to recover ſome poor ſlaves (a matter of ſmall worth & reckoning) ſuffer
" our own freedom to be undermined, and in danger of ſubverſion. For who ſeeth not, that the " overture is made, and the way laid open for entrance into confederacy with the King, only to " violate and break our aſſociation with the Romans, wherin ſtandeth all our weal and welfare?
" Unleſs ſome man peradventure will make a queſtion, whether the Romans muſt levy war againſt I
" Perſeus? & no doubt therof now after Philip is dead which in his life time was expected and by " his death only interrupted? Two ſons, ye know full well, K. Philip had, Demetrius and Perſeus.
" For nobleneſs of parentage by the mothers ſide, for vertue, for wit, for the love and affection of " the Macedonians, Demetrius far ſurpaſſed his brother. But for that the father intended ever &
" meant, that whether of his two ſons hated the Romans, he ſhould have the crown after him for " recompence he cauſed Demetrius to be murdered, for no other crime in the world that could be " laid to his charge, ſave only that he was entred into amity with the Romans: but Perſeus he " made the King, whom he knew that the people of Rome judged more worthy to ſuffer puniſh-
" ment than to inherit a Kingdom, And this Perſeus, what other thing hath he done elſe after his " fathers deceaſe, but made preparation for war? Firſt and formoſt, he procured the Baſtarnians, to K
* Servia, as ſome think. " the terror of al the world for to invade * Dardania: who if they had ſettled there, Greece ſhould
" have had more troubleſome neighbors of them than Aſia hath of the Galatians. And albeit he " was diſappointed of this hope yet he gave not over to deſign and plot for war; nay, if we will " ſpeak a truth, he hath already begun the war. Dolopa he hath ſubdued by force of arms & could " not abide to hear that the determination of certain provinces which were debatable and liti" gious, ſhould be referred to the award of the people of Rome. From thence having paſſed over " the mountain Oeta, that all upon a ſuddain he might ſhew himſelf in the very centre of Greece,
" he aſcended up to Delphi. And to what end, think ye, hath he taken this diſwonted voiage and " unaccuſtomed expedition? After this he made his progreſs all over Theſſaly: And what if he an" noied and hurt none of them all, whom he hated in his heart? I fear me ſo much the more this L
" manner of dealing, and that it is a bait to catch them withal. Then forſooth, he ſendeth his letters " unto us, with a goodly ſhew of a bon-preſent, and willeth us to think eftſoons how to prevent " from henceforth, that we never had need again of the like bounty of his. What is that, but to " annul and repeal that edict of ours, wherin the Macedonians are debarred from ſetting foot with-
* Morea. " in * Peloponneſus? and to bring about, that we may have again the Kings Embaſſadors to come
" unto us, that we may entertain mutual hoſpitality between their Princes and ours? and anon
" after, ſee the Macedonian armies, yea, and the King alſo in perſon to croſs from Delphi (for a ſmal
" arm of the Sea lieth between) ſtreight over into Peloponneſus? and finally, that we band and com" bine with the Macedonians, when they ſhall take arms againſt the Romans? As for me, this is " mine advice, to make no new ordinance, but to let all alone in their entire order, as they now M
" ſtand until ſuch time as we are come to ſome certain terms. Whether we have cauſe to be afraid,
" or fear only our own ſhadows? If the league ſhal continue firm and ſure between the Romans &
" the Macedonians then may we have entercourſe of friendſhip, of commerce and traffick with " them. But for this preſent to think & conſider hereof in my ſimple judgment, is a nice and tick-" liſh point & beſides, out of ſeaſon untimely and ſomewhat with the ſooneſt. When he had thus
" ſaid, Arco brother to Xenarchus the Pretor diſcourſed in this manner following. " Callicrates, The Oration of Arcbo. " (qd. he) hath cauſed both me and all of us beſides, who are of contrary opinion to him for to find
" the more difficulty in ſpeaking our minds to the cauſe in queſtion. For whiles in maintenance " of the aſſociation which we have with the Romans, he ſaith that it is diſturbed and troubled,
" (albeit there be no man about either to diſturb or trouble it) he hath wrought cunningly and N
" contrived, that whoſoever ſeemeth to gainſay him, may be thought to oppoſe and ſet himſelf a-" gainſt the Romans. In the firſt place, as if he had been a man, not converſing here among us, but " one come from the Senat of Rome or ſome inward ſecretary and of the privy councel to the KK.
" he knoweth forſooth, and uttereth all that in great ſecrecy hath been done. Nay, he foretelleth
" like a wiſe man what would have enſued, in caſe Philip had lived longer: & namely, how it came " about that Perſeus thus inherited the crown: what the Macedonian deſigns are: and what the " Romans intend to do. But we, who know neither for what cauſe, nor in what manner Demetrius
" came by his death nor yet what Philip meant to have done if he had lived ſtill, muſt accommo" date & frame our counſel to thoſe occurrents which have openly paſſed in the view of the world.
" We take knowledge, that Perſeus, after he was inveſted in his throne and crowned King, repair- O
" ed to the Roman Embaſſadors; and we know likewiſe that he was intituled by the people of " Rome with the ſtyle of (King Perſeus.) We hear beſides, that Roman Embaſſadors came to the " King, and were by him well received and graciouſly entertained. If I have any judgment, theſe
" be all ſigns of peace and not of war neither can the Romans take offence, if, as we followed them
" when they bare arms ſo we follow them now likewiſe, as the authors of peace. And verily I ſee
" no reaſon why we alone of all other Greeks, ſhould make ſo mortal and inexpiable war againſt
" the

A "the realm of Macedony. What! is it becauſe we are ſo neer unto the Macedonians, and by that "vicinity expoſed to all dangers from thence? or that we are the weakeſt of all the reſt, and like to
"the Dolopians, whom Perſeus of late hath ſubdued? Nay I wis, it is far otherwiſe and clean con"trary. Sure enough we are for any harm they can do us, in regard either of our own forces (which "the Gods of their goodneſs have vouchſafed us) or of the diſtance of place ſo far remote. But
"ſet caſe we be as much ſubject as the Theſſalians and Ætolians: Say, we are of no more credit and "authority among the Romans (albeit we have been alwaies their aſſociats and friends) than the "Ætolians be, who were their open enemies but the other day: Then, what right, what priviledg
"and commerce, the Ætolians, the Theſſalians, the Epirots, and in one word all Greece beſides, "have and uſe with the Macedonians, we alſo may have and hold the ſame. How is it then, that we B "alone like curſed and damned creatures, ſhould thus practiſe to abandon the common law of "men, and (as it were) renounce all human ſociety. Be it that Philip (when time was) did ſome-
"what, and gave us juſt cauſe, armed as he was and ever warring upon us, to paſs this decree and "edict againſt him: what hath Perſeus deſerved? Perſeus (I ſay) the new King, a harmleſs Prince that "never did us injury; nay, who is willing and ſeeketh by courteſies and good turns to cancel and "raſe out all former quarrels and enmities of his father? why are we the only enemies that he "hath in the world? And yet, I might full well & truly ſay, that from the former Kings of Macedony
"we have received ſo great favors and benefits, that in regard thereof we ſhould put up and for-
"get the wrongs of Philip alone (if haply he have done us any) at leaſt wiſe now after he is dead "and his head laid. Indeed, at what time as the Roman fleet rid in the harbor of Cenchrea, and the C "Conſul lay encamped with his army before Elatia, we ſat in counſel three daies together, deba"ting and deviſing, Whether we ſhould band with the Romans or ſide with Philip? And albeit the "preſent fear of the Romans before our eies, might have made us in our opinions to encline
"ſomewhat and lean toward them: yet there was ſomething in it doubtleſs, that it was ſo long ere
"we could reſolve: and to ſay a truth, it was the ancient acquaintance and amity that we had with "the Macedonians, and the great benefits which in old time we had received from their Kings.
"Why then me thinks, thoſe ſelf ſame regards ſhould be of ſome force and efficacy to move us if "not to be their ſpecial and beſt friends, yet at leaſt wiſe not to be their principal and greateſt ene"mies. Let us not, Callicrates, make ſemblance and ſhew of that which we are not in hand with-"all, and is no point of this preſent queſtion. There is no motive made of a new ſociety: there is D "no perſon about to draw any capitulations of a new alliance; wherein we ſhould raſhly enwrap
"and entangle our ſelves, and be tied to any inconvenience. Only let there be a mutual commerce "between us, and an alternative intercourſe of yeelding and demanding right to and fro, as ap-
"pertaineth: let us not by interdicting and forbidding them to enter and traffick within our coun"try debar our ſelves likewiſe from all negotiation and dealing with them in their Kingdom: that
"by this means our ſlaves may have no place of retreat and refuge to flie unto. And what preju"dice is this to the Roman confederacy? Wherfore make we thus of a ſmall thing and evident, ſo "great a matter and ſuſpicious? Wherfore raiſe we ſuch troubles of nothing? Wherefore ſeek we to "draw others into jelouſy and hatred with the Romans, and all this to find means of courting &
"flattering them? If there will be war, Perſeus (ye may be ſure) maketh no doubt but that we alto-E "gether will follow the Romans: yet ſo long as the peace holdeth, ſurceaſe and ſuſpend we in ſome
"ſort our malice and hatred for the while; if ended for ever it may not be. When the ſame men who had conſented to the Kings letters before, gave their accord now alſo to this propoſe, the chief and principal perſons among them took great indignation and diſdain that Perſeus ſhould ſeem to demand and obtain that by a few lines in writing, which he deemed was not worth the ſending an embaſſage. Whereupon the time was deferred and no decree paſſed at this Seſſion. Afterwards were Embaſſadors addreſſed unto them from the King: at what time as a Diet was holden in Megalopolis: but the ſide which was for the Romans, and feared to give them occaſion of diſpleaſure and offence, did what they could to debar them of acceſs and entrance into the Councel. And much about this time, by reaſon of theſe jars the Ætolians grew enraged among them-F ſelves, and by diſcharging their mutual fury in killing one another, had like to have brought the ſtate to a final ruin and deſolation. But being weary thereof, they in the end as well of the one ſide as the other, ſent their Embaſſadors to Rome, and alſo laboured at home to have the quarre taken up, and to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was croſſed by a new miſchief that came between, which alſo rubbed the former galls and freted the old ſores. For whereas certain Hypateans, exiled perſons, and being of the faction of Proxenus, were promiſed liberty to return home again into their country, with ſafe conduct alſo granted by Eupolemus one of the chief & principal men of the City: ſo it was, that fourſcore of them, men of mark and quality (whom to meet upon the way as they returned, Eupolemus himſelf went out with the multitude) after they had been friendly received with courteous greetings, ſalutations, and ſhaking of hands, had no G ſooner entred within the gare of the City, but they were maſſacred notwithſtanding they pleaded the faithful promiſe of protection, and called the Gods to witneſs, but all in vain. By this occaſion the civil war between them waxed much hotter than before, and turned in the end to a light fire.
Now there arrived C. Valerius Lævinus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, C. Memmius, M. Popilius and L. Cæ-cilius, as ſent from the Senat of Rome. Before theſe commiſſioners the Embaſſadors from both factio-ons appeared at Delphi, and debated the matter with great earneſtnes and vehemency where Proxenus ſeemed to have the better hand as well in right of the cauſe, as through his eloquent tongue:

Proxenus (I ſay) who within few daies after, drank a cup of poiſon of his wives tempering, wherof H he died: & ſhe condemned therefore, departed into exile. The like madneſs haunted the Candiots alſo & diſtracted them with inteſtine diſſention. But upon the coming of Q. Mutius the Lieutenant General, who was ſent accompanied with a fleet of ten ſail, to appeaſe their debates, they fell to ſome terms of peace and attonement. There had been a truce alſo before of ſix months, but afterwards the war flamed out much more terrible. The Lycians likewiſe at the ſame time, were infeſted & plagued with war by the Rhodians. But my meaning is not neither is it any part of my purpoſe, to deſcribe the wars of forain nations, nor to diſcourſe of the circumſtances how to proceeded: for enough I have to do, & more than I can wel diſcharge, to write the acts only of the people of Rome.

The Celtiberians in Spain, who being tamed by force of arms, had ſubmitted to T. Gracchus, remained quiet all the time that M. Titinius the Pretor continued there in government. But imme- I diatly upon the arrival of Ap. Claudius they revolted: and began to ſhew themſelves in open action of rebellion, by giving a ſuddain aſſault upon the Roman camp. It was about the break of day, when the ſentinels upon the rampier and Corps de guard about the gates, might diſcover enemies coming a far off, and ſo they gave the alarm. Ap. Claudius having put out the ſignal of battail, & in few words exhorted his ſouldiers to fight and play the men, led them forth at three gates at once. The Celtiberians made head and oppoſed their forces as they iſſued forth. At the firſt the skirmiſh was equal on both parts: for that by reaſon of the ſtreights of the paſſage, all the Romans could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed ſtill apace, they were all at length gotten without the trench, ſo as they were able now to diſplay their battaillons & to confront their enemies from one point of their battail to the other, wherewith before they were en- K vironed: and then they made ſo forcible a ſally upon them, that the Celtiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the ſecond hour of the day, they were diſcomfited: and 15000 of them either died in the place, or yeelded their bodies priſoners: 32 military enſigns they loſt, and were turned out of the camp the ſame day: and here is an end of that war. For as many as eſcaped the conflict gat them home to their own towns & quietly afterwards bare the yoke of ſubjection.

That year were created Cenſors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus & A. Poſthumius Albinus: who made a review of Senators and choſe new. For Preſident of the Senat they elected M. Æmylius Lepidus the Archbiſhop. Nine they put out of the Senat-houſe. The principal perſons noted and diſgraced, were theſe, M. Corn. Maluginenſis, who two years before had been Pretor in Spain; L. Corn. Scipio, Pretor for the time being, and L. chief Juſtice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L
L. Fulvius, who was whole brother to the Cenſor himſelf, & as V. Antias reporteth, equal in degree of calling, and his fellow every way. The Conſuls alſo after they had made their vows within the Capitol, went forth to their Provinces. The one of them, (to wit, M. Æmylius) had in charge given him by the Senat, to appeaſe the ſedition of the Padoans in Venice, who as their Embaſſadors made report, by factious ſiding and part-taking, were all on a fire with civil war.

The Embaſſadors who were gone into Ætolia for to pacify the like troubles, brought word back, That it was not poſſible to bridle and reſtrain the furious rage of that nation. But the coming of the Conſul made all whole among the Padoans and cured the malady: who having nothing elſe to do in the province, returned to Rome.

Theſe Cenſors were the firſt that cauſed the ſtreets of Rome to be paved with hard flint and M pebble ſtone within the City; and the high waies and cauſeys without to be raiſed with gravel, & the ſides therof to be wel banked and kept in reparations: alſo bridges to be made in divers places: a ſcaffold beſides for the Ædiles and Pretors to behold the games & plaies. Moreover, the barriers in the race, from whence the horſes begin to run, and the [Ovales] to mark and ſcore up the number of courſes * * * Over and beſides the goles, beyond * * * the iron gates and cages * * * and at the feaſts in the mount Albane for the Conſuls. They took order beſides all this, for the paving with flint of the cliff or deſcent from the Capitol, and from the gallery or porch before the temple of Saturn looking toward the Capitol, unto the place called Senaculum, and the court Hoſtilia above it. Alſo the merchants Hall or burſe without the gate Tergemina they paved with ſtone, and fenced it about with ſtrong ſtakes and poſts of wood. The gallery alſo Æmylia they cauſed to be N repaired; and made an aſcent by ſtairs from the Tyber to the burſe or merchants Hall aforeſaid. Without the ſame gate alſo, they paved with pebble ſtone the gallery or walking place into the Aventine * * * from the Temple of Venus. The ſame Cenſors bargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Oxymum: and having made ſale of ſome publick edifices there, they employed the mony raiſed therof, in making of ſhops & ſtalls round about both the market places. The one of them, that is to ſay, M. Fulvius, (for Poſthumius ſaid plainly, that unleſs it were by vertue either of an act of the Senat, or grant of the people of Rome, he would put forth no works to be made with diſpenſe of their money) agreed upon a price for the building of a Temple to Iupiter at Piſaurum & at Fundi: alſo make a conduit, for water to be conveighed to Pollentia; and at Piſaurum for a way to be paved, and Sinueſſa * * * In theſe colonies, he cauſed alſo a ſink or vault to be made O about them, to carry away all filthineſs into the river: alſo the market place to be enclоſed with porches, galleries, and ſhops: and three ſtately halls called Iani, with quarrefours or four throughfares, and as many fronts. For theſe works one of the Conſuls diſburſed the money, and bargained with the Publicans and undertakers. In which regard, the inhabitants of thoſe colonies above-named, gave him great thanks. Theſe Cenſors were likewiſe ſevere and preciſe in exerciſing their office, for the redreſſing and reformation of mens maners: for many Gentlemen had their horſes of ſervice taken from them, which were allowed them by the City. A

A A little before the years end, there was a ſolemn proceſſion holden one whole day for the happy atchievement of the affairs in Spain, under the conduct and good fortune of Appius Claudius the Pro-conſul; and twenty head of great beaſts were killed in ſacrifice. And the morrow after they went in another proceſſion with ſupplications, at the Temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera: for that there was reported from the Sabines countrey, a mighty earthquake, which over-turned many houſes.

After that App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senat ordained, that he ſhould enter the City with the pomp of an Ovation. And now approached the time for the election of new Conſuls. Much ado there was and hard hold at this aſſembly, by reaſon of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Poſthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanas were elected Conſuls: B which done, the Pretors alſo were created, to wit, Cn. Fabius Buteo, M. Matienus, C. Cicereius, M. Fur. Craſſipes, A. Attilius Serranus, & C. Cluvius Saxula, theſe three laſt rehearſed, the ſecond time.

This buſineſs and ſolemnity finiſhed Ap. Claudius Cento entring with Ovant pomp into the City for his victory of the Celtiberians, brought into the common treaſury 10000 pound weight of ſilver, and 5000 of gold. Cn. Cornelius was conſecrated the Flamin of Jupiter.

The ſame year there was ſet up a painted Table in the Temple of the goddeſs Matuta with this inſcription, Under the conduct and happy government of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Conſul, the legion and army of the people of Rome, ſubdued Sardinia. In which Province, there were ſlain and taken priſoners 80000 enemies. Which Gracchus (after he had managed the affairs of ſtate moſt fortunatly, delivered many captives out of bondage, and recovered the tributes and cuſtomes to the Common-weal) C brought home with him his army ſafe and ſound, charged with an exceeding rich booty, and reentered the City of Rome, in a ſecond triumph. In memorial of which exploit, he cauſed this table to be ſet up as a preſent in the honour of Jupiter.

Now this table contained the portraiture of the Iland Sardinia, and the picture alſo and reſemblance of ſundry battails. Moreover, in this year were repreſented to the people certain paſtimes and ſhews of ſword-players, whereof ſome were ſmall and of no account: but one above the reſt, exhibited by T. Flaminius, ſurpaſſed. And this he did in honour of his father deceaſed: with a dole of fleſh among the people, a great publick feaſt beſides, and ſtage-playes for four dayes together. But the principal matter in this feſtival ſolemnity, was this, That in three daies ſpace there fought at utterance with unrebated ſwords, threeſcore and fourteen champions,

The two and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

AFter that L. Poſthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanas the Conſuls had before all other things propoſed unto the Senat as touching the government of the Provinces & conduct of the armies, ordained it was, that Liguria ſhould be the charge as well of the one of them as the other. Alſo that both of them ſhould levy new legions, (and two a peece they G were allowed to have) therewith to defend the ſaid province and keep it in obedience beſides 10000 footmen and 600 horſe of Latine allies. Moreover to enrol 3000 foot, and 200 horſmen of Romans for a ſupply in Spain. Laſt of all, commanded they were to preſs 1500 footmen and a 100 horſe of Roman citizens: with which ſtrength, that Pretor unto whom Sardinia fell, ſhould paſs over into Corſica, there to war, and M. Attilius the old Pretor, in mean time to ſee unto the government of Sardinia. This done, the Pretors went to caſt lots for their provinces. A. Attilius Serranus had the place of Lord chief juſtice within the City, and C. Cluvius Saxula the juriſdiction between between citizens and forrainers. Unto Cn. Fabius Buteo fell the higher Spain, to M. Matienus the lower. M. Furius Craſſipes was to govern Sicily, and C. Cicereius Sardinia. H

Before that theſe Magiſtrats took their journey, the Senat was of advice, that L. Poſthumius the Conſul ſhould go into Campain, for to limit out the City-lands apart from the grounds of private perſons: for that it was ſeen and known, that particular men letting out their bounds and encroaching by little and little upon the Commons, in proceſs of time held a great part of it in their own poſſeſſion. This Conſ. was angry and offended with the Prænetins, for that upon a time when he went thither amongſt them (in quality then of a priv at perſon) to offer ſacrifice in the temple of Fortune, they did him no honor neither in publike nor private. Wherupon, before he departed now from Rome, he addreſſed his letters before him to Præneſte, that the chief Magiſtrate ſhould come and meet him upon the way, provide him a lodging at their Cities charges, and at his departure from thence to ſee that there were ſumpter horſes and beaſts of cariage ready for him. Now I before this mans Conſulſhip the Magiſtrats of Rome had never been chargeable to their allies nor put them to coſt for any thing whatſoever: and therefore allowed they were from the City their mules, ſet out they were with tents and pavilions, and all other furniture and proviſion for the wars, to the end that they ſhould not lay upon the allies any ſuch burden. Privat lodging they had in friends houſes, which they entertained courteouſly & liberally with reciprocal hoſpitality. For at Rome likewiſe their houſes were open to receive thoſe hoſts of theirs, with whom they were wont before to have kind uſage and who had bidden them welcome. In like maner Embaſſadors (if they were ſent by chance to any place of a ſuddain) impoſed upon the town & cities through which they were to paſs, one ſumpter horſe only: to farther expence were no allies put for any Roman Magiſtrats. This revenge of the Conſul for a diſcourtely offered (due & juſt though it were, K yet not to have been exerciſed during his magiſtra y) and the ſilence of the Prenetins (proceeding either of too much modeſty or over-great fear) gave occaſion to the magiſtrats ever ſince to take it for a priviledge and cuſtome to do the ſemblable, yea, and to charge their allies with more grievous impoſitions every day than other in the ſame kind, as if the precedent example had been approved.

In the beginning of this year, the Embaſſadors who had been ſent into Ætolia and Macedony, made report, That they might not come to the ſpeech of K. Perſeus, for that ſome ſaid he was abſent: others, that he was ſick: and the one as falſe, as the other was untrue: howbeit, they might evidently perceive and ſee, that preparation was made for war, and that he would delay no longer, L but enter into arms. In like ſort they related that in Ætolia the civil diſſention and ſedition grew daily more and more: neither could the captains of theſe factious diſcords be repreſſed and held in awe by their countenance and authority.

As the City of Rome was amuſed upon the continual expectancy of the Macedonian war, before any enterpriſe thereof begun, thought good it was and requiſite, that order firſt ſhould be taken for the expiation of prodigies and the pacification of the Gods by way of humbly praiers, ſuch as were repreſented and delivered unto them out of the fatal books of Sibylla. For at Lanuvium were ſeen, as the common voice went, certain ſhews and reſemblances of a mighty great navy. Item, At Privernum there grew black wooll out of the earth. Alſo in the Veientian territory, neer a Town called Remens, it rained ſtones. Moreover all the countrey Pomptinum was overcaſt with M clouds of Locuſts: and within the Land of Gallia, there were ſeen certain fiſhes to leap from under the clots of earth, that were turned with the plow as it took ſtitch and made furrow. For theſe ſtrange and fearful ſights, the foreſaid books were looked into and peruſed, and out of them the Decemvirs declared and pronounced both unto what Gods ſacrifice ſhould be offered, and what beaſts were to be ſlain therfore: moreover, that the one ſupplication ſhould be holden, as propitiatory for thoſe prodigious tokens: as alſo the other, which the year before had been vowed for the health of the people, ſhould now be performed, and holydaies kept therefore. So the ſacrifices were accompliſhed according to the order and form ſet down in writing by the Decemvirs.

The very ſame year was the Church of Juno Lacinia uncovered, upon this occaſion: Q. Fulvius Flaccus the Cenſor was building of a temple to Fortuna equeſtris, which he had vowed during the N war againſt the Celtiberians, when he was Lord Pretor in Spain. His deſire and earneſt endevor was to ſtrain himſelf, that there might not be in Rome a temple of more ſtate and magnificence than this. And ſuppoſing that it would be a great beauty and ornament unto it, in caſe the roof were covered with tiles of marble: he went into the Brutians countrey, & there he was ſo bold with the Church above ſaid of Juno Lacinia, as to untile the one half thereof, making full account, that ſo much would ſerve for to cover that temple which he was a building. Boats and Barges he had ready for to receive and carry away the ſaid tiles or ſlates, without being empeached or controlled for this ſacriledg by the allies, whom he held in awe and frighted by his Cenſorian authority. Now after the Cenſor was returned to Rome, thoſe marble ſlates were diſbarked out of the foreſaid veſſels and conveighed to the temple. And albeit no words were made upon whence they came, O yet concealed it could not be. And herupon aroſe much muttering in the Senat, and from all parts thereof they called hard upon the Conſuls to have the matter put to queſtion and debated of. The Cenſor was ſent for, who was no ſooner entred into the Senat but both all in general, & alſo every one in particular had a fling at him: and much more ſharply reproached him to his face in theſe terms: That he could not be content to abuſe and violat the moſt holy and ſtately Church in thoſe parts, which neither Pyrrhus nor Annibal ever offered violence unto, unleſs he uncovered it alſo in foul foul sort, and in manner laid it ruinat. The lantern thereof was taken away and gone the roof left bare and naked, exposed and open to rain and foul weather, and thereby subject to rot: that he being chosen Censor for to reform the manners of other; to whom it appertained by his office to see that the Temples were close and covert; to call upon, that all publick places be kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in sufficient repair that he (I say) of all others should range over the Cities of allies & confederat States pulling down their Temples as he goeth & uncovering the roofs of the sacred edifices, and in demolishing the Churches of the immortal Gods, commit that, which if he did but practise upon the privat houses of allies, might seem an unworthy act and a great indignity: and finally, by rearing one Temple with the ruin of another, oblige the people of Rome with the very guilt of his own crime: as if (I wis) the immortal Gods were not the same in all places, but that we must honor and adorn some of them with the spoil of others. Now as it was apparent (before the matter was put to the censure of the Senate) which way the LL. enclined in opinion: so immediatly upon the proponing thereof, they all opined and gave one sentence, That order should be taken with the publicans of the City works, for the carrying back again of the same slates to the former Temple, and that certain propitiatory sacrifices should be offered for the pacification of Iuno. As for all ceremonies requisit toward the divine service aforesaid, they were with all complements performed accordingly: but the farmers who had undertaken at a price to recary to recary those tiles, brought word that they had landed them in the churchyard and there left them, because they might not meet with any workman who could devise with all the skill and cunning he had, how to bestow them as they were laid and couched before.

Of those Pretors who were gone into their Provinces, M. Fabius as he was in his journey toward high Spain died at Massiles by the way: and therefore upon intelligence given thereof by the Massilian Embassadors, the Senat ordained that P. Furius and Cn. Servilius whom to succeed others were to be sent should cast lots between themselves, whether of them should continue still in government, and have the charge of high Spain. And the lot fell out very well and fit that the said P. Furius who had ruled the said province before should there remain.

The same year, by occasion that a good part of the Ligurians and Gauls territory won by conquest lay void and was not as yet in the tenure and occupation of any man there passed an Act of the Senat, that it should be divided by the poll. So, A. Attilius the L. chief justice of the City of Rome, by vertue of a decree granted out of the Senat, created ten Decemvirs or commissioners for that purpose, to wit, M. Æmylius Lepidus, C. Cassius, T. Ebutius Parrus, C. Tremellius, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. and L. both named Apuleius, M. Cæcilius, C. Salonius, and C. Mynatius. To every Roman citizen they set out ten acres apeece: and to the Latine allies three.

About the same time that these affairs passed at Rome there arrived thither Embassadors out of Ætolia about their own civil discords and seditions. Likewise there came others from Thessaly reporting what was a doing in Macedony. For Perseus (casting now in his mind how to compass that war which during his fathers life he devised and thought upon) endevoured to draw and win unto him not only all the nations but the cities of Greece, by sending his embassages among them, & promising liberally more than he performed. Howbeit the hearts of the most part were inclined to him and favoured his designs, yea and much more affectionat than to K. Eumenes: notwithstanding that all the States of Greece, and most of the principal personages were obliged unto Eumenes, and in fee as it were with him, in regard of many courtesies and gracious favours received at his hands: & that he carried himself so in his own realm that the cities which were subject unto him, were not willing to change their condition with any of the free States whatsoever. Whereas contrarywise the bruit went, that Perseus after his fathers decease, killed his wife with his own hands: and likewise secretly murdered Apelles whose ministry and service in former time he had used in taking away the life of his brother Demetrius: for which cause he lived in exile, because Philip made search after him for to have him punished accordingly; him (I say) he murdered after he had sent for him upon his fathers death, and procured him to come unto him, with great promises to recompence him highly for the execution of the foresaid fact. Yet as infamous as he was with these domestical murders, and for no good part and worthy desert otherwise commendable; he was commonly better regarded of the States of the country than King Eumenes, a Prince so kind and good to his kinsfolk, so just and righteous to his subjects, so bounteous and effective to all men; whether it were that they, possessed aforehand with the fame and majesty of the Macedonian Kings, despised the rising of this new Kingdom: or that they were desirous of novelties and alterations: or lastly, that they wished and had a desire that he should make head against the Romans.

Now were not the Ætolians only together by the ears among themselves by reason they were dived so deep in debt, but the Thessalians also: and this pestilent malady as it were by catching and infection was spred as far as Perrhæbia. But after that the Senat was advertised that the Thessalians had taken arms, they sent App. Claudius as Embassador to see and appease those troubles: who having rebuked and chastised the Captains of both sides, eased and striken off a great part of the debt, which grew burdensome and grievous by excessive usury, and that with consent of the most of the creditors who had thus overcharged their debtors he parted the paiment of the due debt and principal, by even portions for certain years. The troblesom state of Perrhæbia likewise was reduced into good terms of quietnes, by the self-same Appius, and after the same order. And at the very same instant Marcellus visited the Ætolians & took knowledg at Delphi of their troubles and commotions which proceeded from very hostile hearts & minds, enemy-like, & were pursued with with civil war. And when he ſaw that they contended and ſtrove much to ſurpaſs one another in H raſh courſes and audacious; he would by his decree neither charge nor diſcharge the one party more than the other: but he requeſted them indifferently on both ſides to abſtain from war, to make an end of diſcord and diſſention, and bury all that was paſt in perpetual oblivion. Whereupon they were reconciled: and this their attonement was ratified with the aſſurance of pledges interchangeably given: and accorded it was, they ſhould meet at Corinth, there to beſtow their hoſtages. From Delphi and that general diet of Ætolia, Marcellus croſſed the Seas into Peloponneſus. where he had appointed and publiſhed a ſolemn aſſembly and councel of the Achæans. Wherein he highly praiſed and commended the whole nation, for obſerving ſo ſtedfaſtly their old decree, whereby they debarred and excluded the Macedonian Kings out of their confines; he declared evidently and preſented to the view of all the world, what malice and hatred the Romans I bare to Perſeus. And that it might break out the ſooner into open wars, King Eumenes came to Rome, and brought with him a note or abſtract of all the preparations for the war, which with diligent ſearch and enquiry into particulars, he had gathered.

Much about the ſame time, the five Embaſſadors ſent unto K. Perſeus for to ſee into the affairs of Macedony, were commanded to take a voyage as far as Alexandria, for to renew the old amity with King Ptolomæus. The names of them were theſe, C. Valerius, Cn. Lentulus, C. Cæcilius Cæcus, Q. Bæbius Sulca, M. Cornelius Mammula, and M. Cæcilius Denter. And even then or not much after, there came Embaſſadors from King Antiochus: and the chief and principal perſon among them, one Apollonius was admitted to come into the Senat, where he excuſed the King his maſter for many good and juſt reaſons in that he had not ſent his tribute & made paiment ſo ſoon as he ought by K the day appointed: but now (he ſaid) that he had brought it all, to the end that the King ſhould be to them beholden for nothing but the reſpite of time only. And beſides that they were come with a preſent of certain plate of gold, weighing 300 pound. That the King his petition was, That the ſociety and friendſhip which had been contracted between his father and them, might be renued alſo with him: promiſing, that if the people of Rome would impoſe any thing upon him to be done, which were meet to be laid upon a good and faithful ally, he would not fail in his devoir to perform all offices whatſoever. For why, the Senat had ſo well deſerved of him, at what time as he ſojourned in Rome, and ſuch courteſy he found among the flour of the Roman yong Gentlemen, that of all degrees and ſorts of men, he was reputed and uſed more like a King indeed, than an hoſtage for the time. Theſe Embaſſadors received a gracious anſwer: and withal, A. Attilius L the Pretor of the City was enjoyned to renew the league with Antiochus, which had been concluded with his father. As for the tribute, the treaſurers of the City received it: and the Cenſors took all the golden veſſels aforeſaid, who had the charge to beſtow the ſame in what Temples they thought good. Unto the chief Embaſſador was ſent a preſent in money, amounting to the ſum of one 100000 Aſſes: who alſo was allowed an houſe to lodg in at his pleaſure of free-coſt: and all his charges were defrayed by the City, during the time that he made abode in Italy. The Embaſſadors who had been in Syria, gave this report of him. That he was a man in great favour and highly honoured with the King: and beſides, ſingularly well affected to the people of Rome. Now concerning the affairs of the provinces for that year thus much as followeth.

C. Cicereius the Pretor fought in ranged battail with the enemies in Corſica wherein 7000 of M the Iſlanders were ſlain: and 1700 and better taken priſoners. In that conflict the Pretor had vowed to build the Chappel of Juno Moneta. After this was peace granted to the Corſians at their own ſuit and ſeeking: but they were compelled two pay to hundred thouſand weight of wax. Cicereius having thus ſubdued Corſica, paſſed from thence over into Sardinia. A field alſo was fought in Liguria, within the territory of the Statellats, neer the Town Cyniſtus: for thither aſſembled a great army of the Ligurians. At firſt upon the arrival of M. Popilius the Conſul they kept cloſe within the walls: but afterwards ſeeing the Romans at the point to give aſſault and to lay battery to the walls, they iſſued forth of the gates and embattailed themſelves. The Conſul for his part forſlowed not to come to hand-fight, the only thing he ſought for in threatning to give aſſault. The conflict continued above 3 hours, and the hope of victory hung in equal ballance: N which when the Conſ. perceived, namely, how the Ligurian enſigns removed not and gave no ground: he commanded his Cavalry to mount on horſeback, and to charge with all their force and violence upon their enemies in three ſeveral places: many of theſe horſemen pierced quite through the midſt of the battail, and paſſed ſo far, that they charged the enemies upon the back as they fought. Whereupon the Ligurians were much terrified and began to flie from all parts: very few retired back into the City, by reaſon that the horſemen made head againſt them that way moſt: beſides many of the Ligurians were left dead in the place; ſuch was their reſolute perſiſtance in fight: killed alſo they were every where as they fled. Ten thouſand (by report) fell upon the edge of the ſword, above ſeven hundred taken priſoners in one place or other, and 82 military enſigns were caried away. And yet was not this victory without effuſion of Roman O blood: for there died of them not ſo few as three thouſand ſouldiers by reaſon that the formoſt of both ſides fought ſo manfully in the forefront and while they would not give ground one to the other, were ſtriken down and ſlain without mercy. After this battail the Ligurians rallied themſelves into one place, out of all parts where they were ſcattered in the rout: and ſeeing that more of their men were loſt than left behind (for in all they were not above ten thouſand) they yeelded ſimply without any compoſition: howbeit in good hope they were, that the

A Consul would not deal worse by them nor in more rigorous manner than other Generals before him. But he disarmed them all, rased their Town, sold their bodies & all that they had, and sent letters to the Senat of these exploits of his. Which when A. Atilius the Pretor had read in the Senat, (for the other Consul Posthumius was absent, by occasion that he was employed in the survey and visiting of the Lands in Campania) they thought it a very hard and cruel course, that the Statellats, who only of all the Ligurians had not born arms against the Romans, who were then assailed first, when as they began not of their own accord to make war, who also put themselves into the protection of the Romans, should be thus rigorously intreated, thus torn, dismembred and consumed in most cruel manner: that so many thousands of frank condition, innocent persons, and imploring the mercy of the Romans, should be thus sold out-right, (a most dangerous example, B that never hereafter any one will venture to submit himself again:) and finally, that they should be distracted and carried away into all parts, to live in slavery under them, who having been sometimes professed enemies of the Romans, now enjoy peace and repose. In regard hereof, there passed an arest or act of the Senat, that M. Popilius the Consul should pay back the price unto the buyers, and restore the Ligurians to their former liberty; to take order also that their goods (asmuch as possibly might be recovered) should be rendred unto them: also that armour should be made in that nation with all speed possible, and that the Consul so soon as he had reestablished the Ligurians (upon their submission) in their former estate, should depart out of the Province: forasmuch as the honour of victory consisted not in exercising cruelty upon the poor and afflicted, but in vanquishing the obstinat. But the Consul, as he bare himself proud and cruel against the Ligurians, so C he shewed as great frowardnes and disobedience to the Senat. And having sent away the legions to winter in Pisa, he returned to Rome, carrying a fell and angry stomack against the LL. and as spightful and malicious a mind to the Pretor: where immediatly he assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellona, and ratled up the Pretor in broad and gros terms. For that he, whose part it had been to have moved the Senat for thanksgiving to the immortal Gods, in regard of the happy atchievement of the wars, in stead thereof passed an act of the Senat against him and in favor of the enemies, for to put him by his victory and to give it away from him to the Ligurians; and finally, being no better than a Pretor, would have had the Consul yeelded in manner up into their hands. Whereupon he said that he would be so bold as set a fine on his head: and withal, he required the LL. of the Senat to command and ordain, That the arest devised against him might be D reversed; and to give order, that the processions which in his absence they ought to have decreed (upon his letters sent of his good succes) might now be holden; in consideration first of the honour due to the immortal Gods, and then respectively in some measure for his own desert. But after he was checked by some of the Senators to his face, and that in no milder tearms than he had been rebuked in his absence, he went his waies into his Province again, and obtained neither the one suit nor the other.

The other Consul Posthumius having spent the whole summer in surueying the Lands only, and never so much as seen his own Province, returned to Rome against the general assembly for election, and created Consuls C. Popilius Lænas. Consequently were Pretors elected, to wit, C. Licinius Crassus, M. Iunius Pœnus, Sp. Lucretius, Sp. Cluvius, Cn. Sicinius, and C. Memmius, the second E time. In that year was holden a review of the City and the number taken of citizens, (when as Q. Fulvius Flaccus and L. Posthumius Albinus were Censors:) wherein were found and enrolled of Roman citizens 269015. The number was somewhat the less, by reason that L. Posthumius the Consul had proclaimed in a publick audience, That no person of those Latine allies, who were to return into their own Cities (by vertue of an edict made when C. Claudius was Consul) should be enrolled into the subsidy book at Rome, but every man in his several City. This Censorship was administred with concord and unity, yea and to the good and profit of the common-weal. What Senators soever they deposed from their place and dignity, and so many Gentlemen of Rome as they took their Horses from, they made them all no better than contributaries to pay all scot and F lot, yea, and displaced them out of their tribes. And look whomsoever the one of them noted with disgrace and ignominy, he was not relieved nor allowed again by the other. This Fulvius dedicated the Temple of * Fortuna equestris, now six years after he had vowed the same in a battail which he fought with the Celtiberians, at what time as he was Pro-consul in Spain: likewise he exhibited the stage-plaies for four daies together, and one day in the cirque or shew-place. Corn. Lentulus (a Decemvir for the holy rites and sacrifices) that year died; in whose room was substituted A. Posthumius Albinus. There were such mighty drifts and clouds as it were of locusts, brought suddainly at once by a wind from the Sea into Apulia, that with their swarms they overspread all the fields far and neer. For the riddance of which noisome vermine consuming the fruits of the earth, Cn. Sicinius, Pretor elect, was sent with his full commission of command into Apulia, who assembled a mighty number of people for to gather them up, and emploied much G time thereabout.

* The fortune of horse-fight.

In the beginning of the year ensuing, wherein C. Popilius and P. Ælius were Consuls, the remnant of the debates which arose the year before, was set on foot again. The LL. of the Senat would have had the matter proposed & debated again as touching the Ligurians, and the ordinance of the Senat in that behalf renewed. But, as Ælius the one Consul put up a bil therof, so Popilius the other was an earnest suiter, & besought both his collegue & also the Senat in the behalf of his brother; nay he proceeded so far, that he gave the house to understand, in case they went about any such decree decree prejudicial unto him, he would croſs and revoke the ſame: by which countenance of his he affrighted his colleague; but the LL. were offended ſo much the more and ſtormed againſt both the Conſuls, yea, and perſiſted ſtill in their enterpriſe. And therefore when it was debated in counſel as concerning the Provinces, albeit the Coſſ. made means to be ſent into Macedony (becauſe the war of Perſeus was ſo neer at hand) yet Liguria was aſſigned to both of them: for the LL. proteſted and ſaid, That they would not paſs a decree for the government of Macedony, unleſs the caſe of Popilius were propounded, and an act thereof entred. Afterwards, when they demanded a warrant to enrol new armies, or at leaſt-wiſe to levy a ſupply for making up the old, both the one motion and the other was denied. The Pretors alſo, who required to have a ſupplement with them into Spain, had a nay: and namely, M. Junius into the hither province, and P. Lucretius into the farther. As for C. Licinius Craſſus, to him there fell by lot the juriſdiction within the City over citizens, and to Cn. Sicinius that other over forrainers. C. Memmius was allotted to Sicily, and Sp. Clavius to Sardinia. The Conſuls for theſe cauſes being highly offended and angry with the Senat, cauſed the Latine feaſts and holydaies to be publiſhed againſt the very firſt day that poſſibly they might, with an intimation that they would go ſtraight into their province, and not attend the managing of any affairs touching the State, but only that which directly pertained to their government.

Valerius Antias writeth, that in theſe Conſuls year, Attalus the brother of K. Eumenes came in embaſſage to Rome, to inform criminous matter againſt Perſeus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for war. But the Annals of many other writers (more worthy of credit than he) deliver unto us, that K. Eumenes preſented himſelf in proper perſon: where he was received with ſuch honor, as the people of Rome thought not only meet & agreeable for his deſerts, but alſo fit and ſurable to their own favours and benefits, which they had in ample manner conferred and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senate, where he ſhewed the cauſe of his coming to Rome what it was; namely, "(beſides a fervent deſire that he had to ſee thoſe gods and men by whoſe grace favour he enjoyed ſo good eſtate as better he durſt not wiſh) becauſe he gladly would advertiſe the Senat by word of mouth, to prevent and withſtand the deſigns of Perſeus. And beginning his ſpeech with the platforms and enterpriſes of Philip, he recounted withal, how it coſt his ſon Demetrius his life, for that he ſtood againſt the war with the Romans: moreover, how he had cauſed the whole nation of the Baſtarnians to quit their own countrey where they were born and bred, to the end that by their aid he might paſs over into Italy: but whiles (qd. he) theſe matters he projected and caſt in his head, his time was come, and arreſted he was by death: but he left his Kingdom to him, whom he knew to be the moſt ſpiteful enemy that the Romans had. And therefore Perſeus having received this war (as a man would ſay) by way of inheritance left him by his father even together with the crown and ſcepter, from the very firſt day of his raign, doth nought elſe but entertain, foſter, and promote the ſame by all the means and devices that poſſibly he can. Mighty and puiſſant he is beſides in number of yong, luſty, and able men for ſervice, who during the time of long peace have ſprung up and multiplied exceedingly. In wealth and riches a great potentat he is, and beſides in his flouriſhing years and the beſt time of his age, which as it is accompanied with the very ſtrength and vigor of his body, ſo his ſpirit and mind is inured and hardned with ſkilfull experience and long practiſe of martial feats. For from his very infancy nuzled hath he been in the field and camp, converſing ordinarily within the royal tent and pavillion of his father, acquainted with the wars, not only waged againſt neighbour nations, but alſo againſt the Romans; and that which more is, employed by his father in many and ſundry expeditions and executions of ſervice. But ſince that himſelf entred upon the Kingdom, and ſwaied the regal ſcepter in his own hand, he hath exploited & accompliſhed many things with marvellous felicity and ſucceſs, which his father Philip before him could never compaſs and effect, notwithſtanding he tried and aſſaied all means, as well of open force as ſecret fraud. To augment this greatneſs of his, he hath purchaſed already that authority and reputation in the world, which others hardly in continuance of long time, and by many favors and ample benefits attain unto: and namely, throughout the States of Greece and Aſia, all men reverence his majeſty. For what good turns, for what pleaſures done for what bounty of his they ſhould thus do and honour him ſo much, neither ſee I, neither can I ſay for certainty; whether it happen by a ſpecial gift and fortune that he hath of his own, or that (which I am my ſelf afraid to ſpeak) it be the deep malice and hatred which he hath conceived againſt the Romans, which is the cauſe that he is of that countenance and ſo gracious among them. Nay, with the very Kings and Princes of other nations he is highly eſteemed and of paſſing authority. The daughter of Seleucus he hath taken to wife, without any ſuit of his own but being earneſtly woed and requeſted thereunto. And to Pruſias he hath given his own ſiſter in marriage, after much ſeeking and inſtant intreaty. Theſe two weddings were ſolemnized with the exceeding joy and innumerable preſents of infinite embaſſages: and who ſhould be preſent to celebrat the Auſpices and complements, yea and give thoſe ſpouſes in marriage, but the nobleſt and moſt renowned States that were? The Bœotian nation had been much ſollicited by Philip, yet could never be induced to draw or pen any covenants of accord and amity with him: but now there is to be ſeen a league engroſſed, yea, and engraven in three ſeveral conſpicuous places, the one in Thebes, a ſecond at Sidemus, within a moſt holy, ſacred and renowned Temple, and the third at Delphi. What ſhould I ſpeak of the general Councel of the Achæans? wherein, had not the deſign been daſhed by ſome there in place, who intimated and alledged

The Oration of Eumenes.

A "alledged hard the seignory and empire of the Romans, it would have gone very hard, but that he "should have set forth even within Achaia. But contrariwise I assure you my due and deserved
"honors (unto whom it is hard to say, whether they be more bounden and obliged for privat
"pleasures or publick benefits) are either forlent through retchlesse disuse and negligence, or else
"annulled and abolished of wilfull malice and hostile hatred. As for the Ætolians, who knoweth
"not, that in his civil broils, and seditions they fought to Perseus for to relieve and succour, and "not to the Romans? Being thus upheld with societies and amities, he hath provided such furni"ture of his own, and made that preparation for war at home, as he needs none from abroad. Of "himself he is thirty thousand strong in foot & 5000 in horse. For ten years he is stored with corn
"aforehand, so as for that kind of purveiance he may spare his own territories, and also forbear
"his enemies. As for mony in ready coin, he hath such abundance, that over and above the forces B "of naturall Macedonians, he wageth 10000 mercenary souldiers, and hath wherewith to make
"pay for as many years, besides the yeerly customes & profits that arise out of their Kings mines.
"Now for armour, he hath gathered together into his arcenals and armories, sufficient to furnish "three such armies. What should I speak of the youth and serviceable men of war? Set the case "that Macedony failed him and were not able to find enough; all Thrace is subject unto him, from "whence he may serve his turn as out of his ever running fountain and living spring. The rest of his speech he knit up with a exhortation in this manner. "I relate not these things (qd. he) my
"L.L. of Rome, as blown abroad and vented by headlesse heartsay and doubtfull rumors; neither
"have I been so ready to beleeve them, as a man desirous that such criminous imputations
"should be verified upon my enemy; but as undoubted and certain reports upon my own know"ledg, as if I had been sent by you of special purpose to be a spie: and declared that and no more, C "which I had seen with mine eyes and not otherwise. Neither would I have left mine own realm
"wherein (by your meanes and goodnes) in glorious and magnificent State I sit warm enough,
"for to sail, over so large a sea as I have done and to carry vain tales and untruths to you, thereby to "crack my credit with you for ever hereafter. But I tell you these eies of mine have seen the most "renowned and noblest Cities of Asia and Greece discovering more and more from day to day,
"what they intend and what their meaning is: who if they be let alone and permitted to run on as "they begin, would be engaged so far, as they might not possibly return again & save themselves
"by any repentance. Beheld I have Perseus (I say) how he containeth not within the realm of "Macedony, but one while seizeth upon this by force of arms, another while gaineth and getteth "that by favour and good will, which with violence he could never have conquered. I perceived D "and considered well how unequall the match and condition is, whiles he upon you prepareth "war, and you again perform to him security of peace. Although in my conceit, and so far as I "could see into it, he made no more any preparation thereof, but was already upon action and "execution. For he chased Abrupolis, a confederat prince and friend of yours, forth of his King"dom. And Artetaurus the Illyrian, another of your allociats and allies, he killed outright, be"cause he found that he had written some letters unto you. As for Eversa & Callicrates, both The"bans, & two principal States of that City, for no other reason, but because in a Parliament of the "Bœotians, they had spoken their mind against him too frankly, and avowed that they would re"peat unto you what things had passed, he caused to be murdered. The Bizantines he suc-
"coured against the order taken in the accord: upon Dolopia he levied war: Thessaly and Doris E "both he invaded and overran with his army, to the end, that in some intestine and civil war, by "the help of most parts he might afflict and plague the better. He shuffled all together, and made "a very confusion of the State in Thessaly and Perrhabia, upon the hope and cancelling all bonds
"and crosing out all debt books; that thus by a power and multitude of bankrupts, such as were "over-deeply engaged, and whom he had obliged and bound to himself, he might depresse and "oppresse the great men and principall personages. Having wrought these practises uncontrolled,
"whiles you sit still looking on and suffring all, he seeing you to let him do with Greece what he
"list, making full account, that no man will put him on arms and make head against him, before he
"be passed over into Italy. How safe this may be to you, nay, how this can stand with credit, see you F "to that and be advised. For my self, I assure you, I thought it meer shame and very villany, that "Perseus your enemy should enter into Italy to make war upon you, before that I your friend and "allie, came to give your warning for to take heed and stand upon your guard. Now since I have "in this maner performed my devoir, done that office which I was bound upon necessity, and in "some measure acquit my self and discharged my bounden duty and obligation of fidelity; what re-
"maineth behind for me to do, but to be your beadsman to all the gods & goddesses, to vouchsafe
"you that grace, that you may provide for your own Common weal, and also for us your friends and "allies, who depend wholly upon you? In this last speech he came neer unto the LL. of the Senat.
But for the present no man might know any thing, but only that the K. had been in the Senat, so si-G lent were they al, & kept the councel-house close shut with secresie. But after the war was brought to an end, then came abroad, both what the K. spake, and what answer was returned to him again.

Some few daies after, the Senat set to give audience unto the Embassadors of King Perseus:
but having their minds and ears both, possessed aforehand by King Eumenes, all the defence that the Embassadors made, and all the entreaty they used, was rejected. Besides, the stoutness used by Harpalus (the principal person of the embassie) moved their patience and exasperated their stomacks. For he said, that indeed the KK. desire & endevour was, to be credited and beleeved in his

Apology and and defence, that he neither had ſaid nor done any thing ſounding to hoſtility: many H
"in caſe he perceived and ſaw, that they came upon him thus, and would needs pick quarrels and give occaſion of war, he would ſtand upon his guard, and defend himſelf with a reſolute and va"liant courage. For the hazard of the field was common, and the iſſue of war uncertain. Now, all the Cities of Greece and Aſia both, would rather then their lives have known what the Em-
"baſſadors of Perſeus, and what Eumenes had done in the Senat: for in regard of his coming, moſt of the ſtates (ſuppoſing verily that he would ſtir coales and make ſome work) had ſent their Embaſſadors to Rome, pretending colourably other matters in ſemblance, but indeed to liſten after news: and among the reſt, was the Embaſſage of the Rhodians, and the chief thereof was one Satyrus, who made no queſtion nor doubt, but that Eumenes had done their errand, and put their City and Perſeus together in all their criminall matters laid to his charge. And therefore he made I all the means that poſsibly he could by the mediation of patrons, friends, and acquaintance, to debate the matter with King Eumenes before the body of the Senat: which when he had obtained, his tongue walked at large, and overbold he was and too round with the King, in broad invectives and intemperat termes; namely, that he had ſollicited and ſtirred up the nation of the Lycians a-gainſt the Rhodians, and was an heavier friend unto Aſia then Antiochus had been. Which ſpeech of his, as it was plauſible enough and pleaſing to the States of Aſia (for they likewiſe by this time inclined to affect and favour Perſeus) ſo it was unſavory altogether and odious to the Senat, and nothing profitable to themſelves and their City. But contrariwiſe, this banding and conſpiracy againſt Eumenes, wan him the more grace and favor among the Romans; ſo as they did him all they honour they could, gave him moſt rich and coſtly preſents, and endowed him with a curule K chair of eſtate, and a ſtaffe or ſcepter, both of ivory.

After theſe embaſſages had their diſpatch and were diſmiſſed, Harpalus returned into Macedony in all ſpeed and haſt poſsible, relating unto the King, how he had left the Romans not preparing as yet for war; but ſo far out with him and ſo highly offended, that it appeared evidently it would not be long ere they began. And Perſeus again for his part, beſides that he looked for no other, was well enough pleaſed therwith, preſuming upon the flour and ſtrength of his forces. But above all other he maliced Eumenes moſt: with whoſe bloud he laid the firſt foundation of the war: for he ſuborned one Evander a Candiot and captain under him of certain auxiliary ſouldiers, and three Macedonians beſides (whoſe ſervice and miniſtry he had uſed in the like feats) to murder the King. He gave them letters addreſſed to one Praxo an hoſteſſe of his, a jolly dame in L Delphi, and of greateſt credit and wealth among them. For aſſured he was, that Eumenes minded to go up to Delphi, there to ſacrifice unto Apollo. Theſe traitors together with Evander let forward; and to execute this their deſigned enterpriſe, they looked all about and ſought for nothing but the opportunity of ſome place or other. Now, as men aſcend from Cirrha to the temple, before they come to any place much peopled and frequented with houſes, there ſtood a mound or mud-wal on the left hand of the path or way, riſing ſomewhat higher than the foundations and ground-work; along which wall there was paſſage for one by one and no more; for on the right hand the earth was broken down and fallen, and breach made of ſome a good depth. Behind that mound aforeſaid, theſe traitors had hidden themſelves, and raiſed ſome ſteps like ſtairs; to the end that from above, as from the top of a wal, they might diſcharge their ſhot upon K. Eumenes as he M paſſed by. Before him there marched from the ſea, at the firſt a ſort of his friends and followers, together with his guard intermingled one with another; but afterwards as the way grew more ſtreight and narrow, the train waxed thinner. But when they were one come to the place where they could not go but by one at once, Pantaleon one of the States and princes of Ætolia, with whom the King had begun ſome communication, entred firſt into the narrow path aforeſaid:
with that the knaves that lay in wait behind, roſe up and rolled down two huge ſtones, wherof the one ſmote the King upon the head, the other aſtoniſhed his ſhoulder. And verily all the reſt of his friends and followers, ſeeing him fall with the blow, fled ſome one way, ſome another: only Pantaleon ſtaid behind all, fearleſſe, to protect and guard the King. The murderous villaines might have fetched a ſhort compaſs about the wall, and ſoon run to the King to make ſure work and diſ- N patch him quites but they ſuppoſing they had done the deed already, fled to the pitch of the mount Parnaſſus, and made ſuch haſt, that when one of the companie hindred and ſtaied their running, becauſe he dragged behind and could not keep pace and follow them hard at heels through thoſe ſteep and blind waies, they made no more ado but killed him out-right, for fear leſt if he were taken, he ſhould bewray and diſcloſe the whole treaſon. The body of the King lay along on the ground: and firſt his friends came running about him, then his guard and houſhold ſervants. When they reared him up, they found him aſtonied with the ſtroke and altogether ſenſeleſs in a trance:
howbeit, by ſome heat remaining, and the beating of his heart, they perceived there was ſome life, but little or no hope they had that he could eſcape and live. Some there were of his guard and penſioners about him, that made purſuit after theſe murderers by their tracts: and when they had O held on their chaſe as far as unto the creſt of Parnaſſus, wearying themſelves to no purpoſe, they gave over and returned as wiſe as they went. The Macedonians as they had begun an audacious enterpriſe inconſiderately, ſo they left it undone as fearfully and without advice. Now by this time was the King come again to himſelf. And the morrow after, his friends conveighed him to his ſhip: from thence to Corinth; & from Corinth along the ſtreights Iſthmus they brought their veſſels, & croſsed over to Ægina: where his cure was caried ſo cloſe & ſecret, without admitting any

A perſon to come unto him, that the rumor ran into Aſia how he was dead. And Attalus his brother (by your leave) gave good ear thereto, & beleeved the news ſooner then was beſeeming brotherly love and unity. For he entred into ſuch talk both with his brothers wife, and alſo with the captain of the caſtle, as if he had been the undoubted heir and aſſured inheritor of the crown. All this Eumenes knew full well afterwards: who albeit he purpoſed to diſſemble the matter, and to put it up at leaſtwiſe with ſilence; at their firſt encounter and meeting together, he could not hold, but reproved and reproached his brother, for being ſo forward and over-haſty to court and wooe his wife. The bruit alſo was blown to Rome, and a report there was of the death of K. Eumenes.

About the ſame time C. Valerius was returned out of Greece, who had been ſent thither as Embaſſador to look into the ſtate of the countrey; to mark alſo and obſerve the plots and proceedings
B of Perſeus. He reported all things ſutable and agreeable to the intelligences given by King Eumenes, and withall, brought with him from Delphi dame Proxo, in whoſe houſe thoſe villanous traitors were lodged and harboured: alſo one L. Ramnius a Brunduſian, who informed moreover and gave evidence as followeth. This Ramnius was one of the principall citizens of Brunduſium, and uſed to lodg and entertain in his houſe, not only of the Roman captains when they came to town, but alſo the Embaſſadors of forrein nations, ſuch as were of greateſt mark, and principally thoſe that were ſent from any Kings. By this meanes, acquainted he grew with Perſeus, albeit they never had ſeen one anothers face. And being invited by the King his letters, wherein he was promiſed great hope of ſome neer and inward friendſhip above others, and conſequently of great preferments thereby, he made a journey unto him. Within a ſhort time he was wound into very familiar acquaintaince with the King, and drawn into privat conference and diſcourſe of ſecrets, C farther, I wis, then himſelf was willing or liked of. For the King dealt with him, yea, and importuned him with inſtant praiers and large behеſts of rich rewards, that foraſmuch as the Roman captains and Embaſſadors uſed to take his houſe for their Inne, he would cauſe as many of them as he writ for, to be poiſoned. Now for that he knew it was a right difficult and dangerous matter to come by ſuch a poiſon and compaſſe this project, eſpecially if many were party and privy to him: and beſides, the event uncertain, either in the effect of the drug it ſelf to be ſtrong, quick and foreible enough to do the feat: or in the ſecret working thereof, leſt it ſhould be found and ſpied; he would therefore put into his hands ſuch a poiſon, as neither in the giving, nor after it was given, might be known by any ſign whatſoever. Ramnius fearing leſt if he refuſed & denied, he ſhould be the firſt man to make aſſay and make experiment of the poiſon, promiſed ſo
D to do, & then departed. But return to Brunduſium he would not before he had ſpoken with C. Valerius the Embaſſador, who then ſojourned (as he heard ſay) about Chalcis. Firſt unto him he revealed this plot, and by his commandment came along with him to Rome: where being brought into the Senat, after audience given, he laid abroad in every point all that had paſſed. This new matter, over and beſides thoſe which Eumenes had reported, was the cauſe that Perſeus was the ſooner taken for an enemy, and ſo declared: the rather becauſe they ſaw him not only about to make open war war of a princely and royall mind, but alſo to practiſe and execute privily all kind of miſchief, by way of covert brigandage, theeviſh ſtealth, and ſecret poiſon. The managing of this war was put off and referred to the new Conſuls: howbeit for the preſent ordained it was, that Cn. Cicinius the Pretor who had the juriſdiction between citizens and ſtrangers, E ſhould levy and enroll ſouldiers who being conducted to Brunduſium, ſhould with all convenient ſpeed commit to ſea, and ſail over to Apollonia in Epirus, for to ſeiz upon the maritime Cities: to the end that the Conſul unto whom the Province of Macedonia ſhould be allotted, might arrive there with his veſſels in ſafety, and ſet his forces on land with eaſe.

Eumenes, after he had been kept a long while at Ægina, during the time of his hard and dangerous cure, ſo ſoon as ever he might go ſafely abroad, went to Pergamus; where, over and beſides the old hatred ſetled in his breaſt, being pricked alſo with this freſh and bleeding villany practiſed by Perſeus, he prepared war with all his power to the uttermoſt: and thither repaired unto him Embaſſadors from Rome, to teſtifie their joy for his evaſion and eſcape out of ſo neer and F great a danger.

When the Macedonian war was delaied and put off for one year, and the reſt of the Pretors gone already into their provinces, M. Junius and Sp. Lucretius (unto whom befell the government of Spain) after that they had importuned and wearied the Senat, in ſuing ſo long for one thing, obtained at the length a commiſsion for a ſupply of ſouldiers to make up the army; by vertue whereof they enrolled 3000 foot, and 150 horſe for the legions: and levied 5000 foot and three hundred horſe for the army of the allies. Theſe forces were tranſported into Spain with the new Pretors.

The ſame year, after that a great part of the Campain territory, which privat perſons here and G there held in occupation without regard of lawful title & tenure, was (upon diligent ſurvey made by Poſthumius the Conſul) recovered again for the publick uſe of the City of Rome; M. Lucretius a Tribune of the Com. preferred a law, that the Cenſors ſhould let out to farm, the Campain lands to tenants for yeerly rent. A thing that had not been done for many yeers after the winning of Capua, namely, that particular men ſhould be ſo greedy as to encroach thus beyond their bounds upon the common waſt.

The Macedonian war being now concluded, but not as yet publiſhed and proclaimed, whiles the Senat was in doubtful expectation what KK. would friend them, & who would ſide with Perſeus:

there came to Rome Embaſſadors from Ariarates, bringing with them the Kings ſon, a very H child. The ſpeech they made was to this purpoſe, that the King their maſter had ſent his ſon to Rome, thereto have his education; to the end that being there brought up, might from his infan"cy be acquainted with their faſhions, and converſe with the people of Rome. His ſuit & requeſt to "them was, that they would vouchſafe unto him not only the ordinary entertainment and pro"tection that privat perſons afford to their gueſts, but alſo to take the charge of publick tuition, "and as it were the guardianage of him. This embaſſage of the K. was well taken of the Senat & pleaſed them highly. Whereupon they ordained, that C. Licinius the Pretor, ſhould ſet out a manſion houſe with all the furniture, wherein the yong prince and his train might keep their reſidence.

The Thracian Embaſſadors likewiſe preſented themſelves before the Senat, to debate their own controverſies in their hearing, and withall deſired their friendſhip and amity. They obtained I their ſuit, and beſides there was ſent unto them by way of preſent, the ſum of 2000 Aſſes a peece.
Glad were the LL. of the Senat that theſe States were received into their ſociety, by reaſon Thracia lyeth hard on the back ſide of Macedony: but to the end that they might have perfect intelligence and notice how all things went in Aſia and the Ilands, they ſent thither C. Claudius Nero, and M. Decimius in embaſſage: whom they commanded alſo to viſit Crete and Rhodes; and withall, both to renew the amity, and alſo ſpie and obſerve whether the hearts of thoſe allies had been ſollicited and tempted by K. Perſeus.

As the City was thus in doubtfull ſuſpence and expectation of the event of this new war, behold in a tempeſt that roſe in the night, a certain column or pillar, garniſhed and ſet out with the beak-heads of war ſhips (which had been erected in the Capitoll during the firſt publick war by K M. Æmilius the Conſul, who had for his companion in government Serg. Fulvius) was by a clap of thunder and lightning rent and cloven from the very baſe to the chapter. This was taken for a prodigious token, and report thereof was made to the Senat. The LL. gave order, that the Aruſpices ſhould be conferred with about it, and their advice taken: likewiſe they commanded the Decemvirs to look into their books of Sibylla. The Decemvirs for their part declared, that the City ſhould be purged and hallowed, publick ſupplications and praiers made to the gods, and greater beaſts killed for ſacrifice, as well at Rome in the Capitoll, as in Campain neer the promontory of Minerva. Alſo that with all convenient ſpeed, there ſhould be plaies ſolemnly exhibited for ten daies together, in the honour of moſt gracious Jupiter. All this was done with diligence accordingly: but the Aruſpeces aforeſaid, made anſwer out of their learning, that this prodigy L portended good and ſignified the advancement of their own territories: together with the deſtruction of their enemies; for that thoſe beak heads which the ſtorm overthrew, had been the ſpoils of ſhips won from the enemies. There hapned other occurrents beſides to encreaſe the ſcrupulous religion & devotion of men: for reported it was, how at Saturnia within the town it rained blood three daies together. Item, at Calatia an aſſe was foled with three feet; and a bull together with five kine were ſtrucken ſtark dead with one thunderbolt and flaſh of lighting: laſt of all, at Oximum there was a ſhowr of very earth and nothing elſe. In regard of theſe wonders alſo, ſacrifices were celebrated, ſupplications made, and one day kept holiday and all ſhop-windows ſhut.

Yet were not the Conſuls departed into their provinces, becauſe they neither would obey and condeſcend unto the Senat in propoſing the matter as touching Popilius at the councel table; and M the LL. were as reſolut for their parts to let no decree paſſe, before that were done. The ſpight and heart-burning they bare againſt M. Popilius, grew the more by occaſion of his own letters, wherein he wrote and gave them to underſtand, that being Proconſul, he had now a ſecond time fought with the Statellats in Liguria, and put ten thouſand of them to the ſword, by reaſon of which hard courſes and extreamities of war, the other nations likewiſe of the Ligurians were entred into arms. At which news not only Popilius was blamed behind his back of making war againſt all law and equity upon them that had yeelded, and thereby provoking thoſe who before were quiet, to go out and put themſelves in action of rebellion; but the Conſuls alſo were checked to their faces in the Senat, becauſe they ſet not forward to their charge and government. M. Martius Sermo and Quintius Martius Scylla, two Tribunes of the Commons, ſeeing the LL. of the Senat thus N drawing all in a line, took heart unto them, and both menaced the Conſuls to fine them, unleſs they made more haſt unto their province; and alſo recited in the Senat a law which they had drawn and framed, and were upon the point to promulge, as touching the forſaid Ligurians who had ſubmitted. The tenor whereof ran in this form, That what perſon ſoever of Statellæ had yeelded himſelf and was not reſtored to Liberty and freedom before the calends of Sextilis next enſuing, the Senat upon their oath ſhould ordain one ſpecial commiſſioner to make inquiſition by whoſe fraud, covin, and notice he was in villenage and puniſh the party accordingly. Then by authority and approbation of the Senat they publiſhed this for a law. Now before that the Conſuls took their journey, The Senat aſſembled in the Temple of Bellona in regard and favour of C. Cicereius the Pretor of the former yeer. Where audience was given him: and after he had declared what exploits he had performed in Corſica, thereupon demanded triumph: which when he could not obtain, he made no more ado, but rode triumphant in the Albane hill, for now it was taken up and grown for a cuſtome ſo to do, and aske the authority and the State no leave.

* 1 of Auguſt.

The ſorſaid law propoſed by the Martii the commons with a generall conſent by their voices granted

A question in the Senat, Whom they would have sit upon their inquisition according to the form of the said law. And the LL. ordained himself to be the inquisitor. Then at length and not afore, the Consuls put themselves in their way toward their province, and received the charge of the army from M. Popilius. This Popilius durst not yet return to Rome, for fear he should be called in question and put to his answer before that Pretor and supreme judg, who had required the advice of the Senat as touching that enquest framed and drawn of purpose against him: knowing full well how the Senat was not well affected to him, and the people much more maliciously bent and set against him. But the Tribunes of the Commons thought they would prevent and meet with this flinching of his and absenting himself, by intimation of another act and law provided in that behalf, namely, that if he entered not into the City of Rome before the * Ides of November imme-
B diatly following, it should be lawfull for C. Licinius to proceed in judgment, and give sentence against him in his absence. This cord towed and haled him to Rome with a witnesse; and when he was returned and entred into the Senat, they were upon his top, and gave him such a welcome thither, as testified their displeasure and hard conceit of him. After he had been well baited and shaken up among them, an act of Senat was entred in this wise, that so many of the Ligurians as had not been enemies, after the time that Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius were Consuls, those the Pretors, C. Licinius and Cn. Sicinius, should restore and establish in their former state of freedom, and that the Consul C. Popilius should set them out lands to occupy and possesse beyond the Po. By vertue of this arrest, many a 100 were set free and enfranchised, who being transported over the river Po, had land assigned unto them accordingly. Now M. Popilius upon the law Martia (promulged by the two Martii, Tribunes of the Com.) answered for himself judicially twice before C C. Licinius. At the third time, the Pretor overcome with a respective grace and favour to the Cos. absent, and the earnest praiers of the whole name and house of the Popilii, adjourned the defendant to make appearance into the court upon the * Ides of March: on which day the new magistrats were ot enter into their offices: and this he did, because himself by that time should be a privat person again & therfore not to sit upon the bench as judg to hear pleas and to determine. Thus the aforesaid act as touching the Ligurians, finely shifted and cunningly avoided, came to just nothing. * 13. of Novem. * 15. of March.

At that time the Carthaginian Embassadors were at Rome, with Gulussa the son of Masanissa; between whom hard hold and much debating there was in the Senat. The Carthaginians complained, that over and besides the lands (about which there had been sent commissioners from D Rome before time, to view the place and to enquire into the cause) Masanissa within the last two yeers and by force and arms possessed himself of more then threescore and ten towns and castles within the Carthaginian dominion and territory, and an easie matter was it for him so to do, who made reckoning of nothing, nor had regard of any person; whereas the Carthaginians were so tyed and obliged by their capitulations to the good-abearing, that they held their peace: for, inhibited they were to bear arms without their own countrey. And albeit they knew assuredly, that they should war within their own confines, if they dissiezed the Numidians of those peeces, yet feared they that one expres article of the accord, where they were debarr'd in plain terms to wage against the associats of the people of Rome. Howbeit, the Carthaginians could no longer endure this pride, cruelty, and avarice. Sent therefore they were unto the Senat as humble orators that it might E please them to grant one of these three requests: to wit, That either they might debate with indifferent audience before them (being allies to both alike) as touching the right of the one and the other: or that they would permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by just and lawfull arms, against unjust and ungodly force: or else finally (if partiall favour swayed more with them then the truth of the cause) to set down at once what their pleasure was should be given away out of their own, to Masanissa. For they yet, would have some gage of their hand, and know what they gave; whereas he himself had no stay, nor would ever see to make an end; so unsatiable was his lust and appetite. But in case they might obtain none of these points, and that there could be found any fault or trespass of theirs, commited since the peace granted unto them by Scipio;
F then, that they rather then any other would chastise them. For rather they had to live in servitude under the sigenory of Romans with safety, then enjoy such a liberty as should be exposed to the injuries of Masanissa. And better it were for them to perish and die once for all, then to live and languish under the yoke of a most cruell and bloudy butcher. At which words the tears trickled down their cheeks, and down they fell at their feet. Lying thus prostrate upon the the ground, as they moved pity and compassion to themselves, so they procured despight and malice against the King. Then thought good it was to demand of Gulussa, what he had to answer as touching these matters? or else (if he had so rather himself) to declare before, for what cause and upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Gulussa made answer, that neither it was easie for him to deal in those points, wherof he had no commission from his father: nor for his father G to give him any such charge, considering that the Carthaginians, shewed not unto him of what business they would treat; nor yet made him so much as privy of their coming to Rome. This only was known, that there was a close councel holden for certain nights, by the principal States of Carthage within the Temple of Æsculapius, from whence Embassadors were dispatched to Rome with hidden messages. And this was the cause that his father had sent him to Rome, to beseech the Senat not to give credit to the slanderous accusations that should be preferred against him by those that were common enemies as well to them as him; who hated him for no other cause but for that he had continued ſo conſtant in his fealty and allegeance to the people of Rome. The Senat thus having heard what they could ſay of both ſides, ſat in councell as touching the demands of the Carthaginians: and at length commanded this anſwer to be returned, how their advice and pleaſure was, that Maluſſa ſhould preſently depart and go into Numidia, and give his father to underſtand from them, that with all ſpeed he ſend his Embaſſadors to the Senat, as concerning thoſe complaints which the Carthaginians had made of him: alſo to give intimation and knowledg unto the Carthaginians, that they repair likewiſe thither to debate their controverſies & differences between them. And if it lay in their power to effect ought for the honor of Maſaniſſa, they would be as willing to do it hereafter, as they had been ready heretofore. Mary, to miniſter juſtice for favour and affection, that they would not do it in any wiſe. Willing they were that every man ſhould know and hold his own, and keep him within compaſſe; neither minded they to ſet out new limits, but to obſerve the old bounds. Indeed they had granted to the Carthaginians, after they were conquered, both towns to inhabit, and territories to poſſeſſe; not to this end, that in time of peace they ſhould pluck that away by wrong and outrage, which during the wars they could not take from them by martial law and force of arms. Thus was the yong prince, together with the Carthaginians, diſmiſſed. Preſents were given both to the one and the other, according to the order, and other courteſies of hoſpitality were friendly obſerved.

Much about the ſame time Cn. Servilius Capio, App. Claudius Centho, and T. Annius Luſcus, Embaſſadors ſent into Macedony, for to demand amends and reſtitution, and withall to diſclaim and renounce the Kings amity, returned to Rome. Who having related in order what they had ſeen and heard, enflamed the Senat more againſt Perſens, who were alreay of themſelves enkindled enough. They made report, "That through all the cities of Macedony they ſaw prep ration "for war in all forcible manner; that when they came to the court, for many daies they could "find no means of acceſſe to the ſpeech of the King; and in the end, after they were departed "from thence homeward (as being paſt all hope of parley with him) then and not afore, they were "called back again out of their way, and ſo brought unto his preſence: that the ſum of their embaſſage and ſpeech unto him was this, namely, to put him in mind of the league firſt contracted "with Philip, & afterwards renued with himſelf ſince the death of his father; wherein by expreſs "words he was inhibited to bear arms without his own frontiers, and likwiſe debared to levy "war upon any confederat allies of the people of Rome: after this, that they had recounted and "laid abroad from point to point thoſe ſpecialties, which they themſelves had lately heard King "Eumenes to declare and diſcourſe, which were all apparent truths, upon his own aſſured knowledg. Moreover, that the King held a ſecret councel for many daies together, with the Embaſſages of the Cities of Aſia: in regard of which injuries, that the Senat thought it reaſon and equity that he ſhould make ſatisfaction, yea, and reſtore back both to them and alſo to their aſſociats, whatſoever he held contrary to right, contained in the accord. That the King hereupon at the firſt fell into a fit of choler and indignation, and gave them hard terms, reproaching at every other word the Romans for their covetouſneſs and inſolency. And as for their Embaſſadors that came unto him one after another, he ſaid they were but ſpies, to liſten and ſee what he did or ſaid; & no marvel, for they thought it meet that he ſhould conform and frame himſelf in "all his words and deeds, according to their beck and commandment. At the laſt, when he had in "this wiſe diſcharged his choler with high words & broad ſpeeches for a long time, that he commanded them to repair again unto him the next morrow, for that he would give them their "anſwer in writing: and then he delivered unto them a ſcript to this effect as followeth. Firſt, as "touching the accord & covenant concluded with my father, that is nothing to me at all. If I ſuffered it to be renued, it was not for any liking or approbation therof, but becauſe I being new come "to the crown, and lately poſſeſſed of the Kingdome, I was to bear and endure all things whatſoever. But in caſe they will enter into a new league with me, requiſit it is that a treaty and agreement paſſe firſt of the conditions. And if they could be content that a covenant were drawn "with equall and indifferent capitulations, yet I will ſleep upon it and be well adviſed what to do "for the beſt, as I doubt not but they likewiſe will have a good regard to the profit of the Commonweal. And herewith, that he ſuddainly flung away from them, and we all began to avoid "out of the pallace. Whereupon we proceeded according to our commiſsion to abandon and "diſavow his amity and ſociety. At which word of ours, he ſtaied in great wrath and fury, and "with a loud and ſhrill voice, warned us upon our own perill and hazard, to be gone out of the "marches of his realm within three daies: finally, in this maner we departed and put our ſelves "in our journey, and found neither friendly welcome at our firſt coming, nor any courteous entertainment while we were there, nor yet a kind farewell at our departure. When they had once done, the Theſſalian and Ætolian Embaſſadors had audience.

The Senat, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captains and commanders the commonweal was to employ, thought good to write unto the Conſ. that the one or other of them (who firſt might) ſhould repair to Rome for the creation of new magiſtrats. And no great matter to ſpeak of, as concerning the ſtate, was that yeer done by the Conſ. But more expedient it was thought for the commonweal, to ſuppreſſe and appeaſe the Ligurians, whoſe bloud was up and chafed againſt them, conſidering that the Macedonian war was in daily expectance.

Moreover, the Embaſſadors of Iſſa gave occaſion, that Genthius alſo King of Illyricum was had in jealouſie: who at one time both complained of him, that now twice he had waſted to their

A their country: and also made report, how the Macedonian and Illyrian Kings were all one, and so great together, that with once consent and common counsel they prepared to war upon the Romans: finally, that the Illlyrians were now at Rome in shew and semblance of embassage, but indeed and very truth, no better then spies, addressed on purpose by the motive and advice of Perseus to hearken and learn whereabout they went at Rome. These Illyrians were sent for into the Senat house, and when they had said, that they were employed in embassage from King Gentius, to answer unto those accusations which it might be the Issians framed against him: it was again demanded of them, How it hapned that they went not directly nor shewed themselves in such sort to the magistrat, that according to the maner and custome, they might have had their lodging provided and presents given them, with the ordinary allowance of the City, meet for them during B their abode, that thereby knowledg might have been taken as well of their coming, as also of their businesse and errand? But being taken tripping and failing in their answer, they were commanded to void out of the Councel-chamber. For thought it was not meet, to give them their dispatch as Embassadors, since they made no means to present themselves unto the Senat: but rather they were of advice, to dispatch Embassadors of their own to the King, to signifie unto him, which of his associats had complained unto the Senat, how he had burnt their villages within their territories: yea, and to tell you it plainly, that it was not well done of him, that he could not forbear but do wrong to his own allies. In this embassie were sent, A. Terentius Varro, C. Pletorius, and C. Cicereius.

Likewise those Embassadors, whose commission was visit the associat Kings, returned out of Asia, and reported that in the said Asia they had communication with Eumenes; in Syria with An-
C tiochus, and in Alexandria with Ptolomaus: who all of them had been sollicited by sundry embassies of Perseus, howbeit they persisted firm and fast in their professed fealty, and promised to perform whatsoever the people of Rome would command them. Also that they went to the confederat states, whom they found true and loiall enough, excepting the Rhodians only, whom they perceived to be floting & wavering, as altogether infected & poisoned with the counsel of Perseus.

Now were the Rhodian Embassadors come to answer those things which they knew were commonly bruited aboad touching their City: howbeit the Senat was not of mind to give them audience, before the new Consuls entred into their office. But they were all of advice to delay no longer the preparation for war. C. Licinius the Pretor had in charge, out of the old Quinqueremes which were laid up in the docks and harbors, to repair as many as might serve at sea; to D rig also and prepare a fleet of 50 sail. But if he could not come to make up that full number, then to write unto his colleague C. Memmius in Sicily, for to repair, calk and trim those ships which were in Sicily, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Brundusium. The said Pretor C. Licinius was commanded to enroll of Roman citizens (and those, Libertins, such as of bondmen born, had been enfranchised) for mariners and sailers, as many as might serve 25 ships: and Cn. Licinius had commission to levy as many of Latine allies for the like number of ships; also the Pretor was enjoined to charge the Latine allies with 8000 foot, and 400 horse. A. Atilius Serranus, who had been Pretor the yeer before, was chosen to receive these forces at Brundusium, and to conduct them over into Macedony: and Cn. Sicinius the Pretor was appointed to have the army in readines for to be transported. As for C. Licinius the Pretor, he by authority E from the Senat, wrote to C. Popilius the Consul that he should command the second legion, which had been longest employed in Liguria, and consisted of the most experienced souldiers, together with four thousand footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be ready at Brundusium upon the * Ides of February. With this fleet of ships and forces of souldiers, Cn. Sicinius 13 of Novem- was commanded to keep Macedony, untill one were appointed to succeed him; and for this purpose his charge of command was continued for a yeer longer. All these directions of the Senat were put in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eight and forty Quinqueremes were set aflote out of their docks: and L. Porcius Licinius was ordained to conduct them to Brundusium: the other 12 were sent out of Sicily. Three Embassadors were dispatched into Apulia and Cala- F bria, to wit, Sex. Digitius, T. Iuventius, and M. Caecilius, for to buy corn to serve the fleet and the army. Now when all things were provided and in readines, C. Sicinius the Pretor departed from the City in his warlike coat of arms, and arrived at Brundusium. About the end of the year C. Popilius the Consul returned to Rome, somewhat latter then the Senat had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and withall speed to creat new magistrats, considering that so great a war approached so neer. And therefore when the Consull discoursed in the temple of Bellona as touching his exploits in Liguria, the LL. of the Senat were nothing well pleased to hear him: but in stead thereof, they muttered every where, and asked him oftentimes, Why he had not restored to liberty those Ligurians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his G father? The election of the Consuls was holden upon the twelfth day before the Calends of March according to the writs that went out: wherein were created Consuls, Pub. Licinius Gracchus and Caius Cassius Longinus. The morrow following, the Pretors were elected, to wit, Caius Sulpitius Galba, L. Furius Philus, L. Canulius Dives, C. Lucretius Gallus, C. Caninius Rebilus, and L. Villius Annalis. To these Pretors the provinces were assigned in this manner: that two of them should sit as LL. chief justices in Rome for civil jurisdiction: three other to have the government of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia: so as the fixt only should remain not allotted to any place, but to be employed whereseever the Senat would think good and ordein. The Consuls elect were were commanded by the Senat, upon the ſolemn day when they were to enter into their magi- H ſtracy, after they had ſacrificed greater beaſts, as it appertained, to pray in this form, that the gods would vouchſafe the war which the people of Rome intended now to enterp Conſul ſhould well and come to happy iſſue. The ſame day the Senat decreed, that C. Popilius the ſet out plaies for ten daies together in the honor of Iup. Opt. Max. and the offerings ſhould be made at all the ſhrines and altars, if ſo be commonweal continued for ten yeers in the ſame good eſtate as now it ſtood. And as the Senat ordained, the Conſul vowed into the Capitoll, that the ſaid plaies ſhould be exhibited, & offrings were preſented of as great value as it pleaſed them to ſet down. This vow was pronounced by the Conſul in the preſence of no fewer then 150 Senators, and according to that form of words which Lepidus the high-prieſt or ſoveraign Biſhop indited. That yeer died certain Prelats of State, to wit, L. Æmilius Pappus one of the Decem- I virs or ſuperindents over the holy rites, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Biſhop, who the yeer before had been Cenſor. This man had a il end. It fortuned that news came unto him of his two ſons, who then ſerved in the wars of Illyricum, how the one was departed out of this life, and the other lay ſick of a grievous and dangerous malady. The ſorrow for the one, and the fear for the other, happning ſo juſt at one time, brake his heart and oppreſſed his ſpirits: inſomuch as the next morning, when his ſervants entred betimes in to his bed-chamber, they found him hanged by a cord, and ſtrangled. It was thought abroad, that he had never been his own man, ſince he was Cenſor, and commonly it was ſpoken, that Juno Lacinia in wrathfull diſpleaſure againſt him for ſpoiling her temple, bereſt him of his right wits. In the room of Æmilius, M. Valerius Maſſala was ſubſtituted Decemvir: and in ſtead of Fulvius there was elected Archbiſhop, Cneus Domitius K Ænobarbus, who to ſay the truth was very yong to be made a prieſt.

In the year wherein P. Licinius and C. Caſſius were Conſuls, not only the City of Rome, and the whole land of Italy, but all the Princes and States of Europe & Aſia, were amuſed reſpectively upon the war between the Macedonians and Romans. Eumenes (King of Aſia) not only carried an old cankred malice againſt Philip, but alſo was pricked forward with new deſpite and anger upon a freſh occaſion, in that by the wicked practiſe of Perſeus, he had like to have been ſacrificed at Delphi. Pruſias King of Bithynia, was reſolved not to enter into arms, but attend the iſſue of the war. For he thought it not reaſon and ſeemly for him to take arms in the defence of the Romans againſt his wives brother; and this account was made, that if Perſeus hapned to have the better, he might ſoon obtain pardon at his hands by the mediation of his ſiſter. Ariarates King L of the Cappadocians, over and beſides that he had promiſed aid to the Romans in his own name, ever ſince that he had linked in affinity to Eumenes, drew the ſame way which he went, and joyned with him in all his counſels both of war and peace. As for Antiochus [King of Syria] his teeth watered verily at the Kingdome of Ægypt, as he, who deſpiſed as well the childhood of the yong King in his nonage, as the weakneſſe and negligence of his guardians: and conſidering there was ſome controverſie about the title of Cœloſyria, he ſuppoſed that he ſhould have good occaſion to levy war, to manage alſo and exploit the ſame without empeachment, whiles the Romans were buſied in the Macedonian war; howbeit as well by his own Embaſſadors ſent unto the Senat, as alſo unto theirs addreſſed unto him, he promiſed ſtoutly to be for them. Ptolomæus [the yong King of Ægypt] being yet under age, was at the diſpoſition of others: his tutors and M protectors, as they prepared to wage war againſt Antiochus for the recovery of Cœloſyria, ſo they promiſed the Romans withall to do their devoir in the Macedonian war. Maſſaniſſa [King of the Numidians] was altogether for the Romans; he furniſhed them with coin, and intended to ſend his ſon Miſagenes with aids both of men and elephants in that ſervice. Howbeit he ſo diſpoſed of his deſigns, as might ſerve his turn which way ſoever the world went: for if the victory fell to the Romans, he ordered that his affairs ſhould remain ſtill in the ſame ſtate; and better he was not to look for, becauſe the Romans would not ſuffer any violence to be offered unto the Carthaginians; but in caſe the Romans went down and had the overthrow (who then protected the Carthaginians) then he made full reckoning of Aſia to be his own. Gentius [King of Illyricum] had ſo demeaned himſelf, that he was ſuſpected of the Romans; yet was he not fully reſol- N ved which ſide to take unto: and it ſeemed he would joyn to one or the other, more upon a fit as it took him in the head, than with any diſcretion or advice. Cotys the Thracian, King of the Odryſians, took part evidently with the Macedonians. In theſe terms (I ſay) ſtood the KK. as touching this preſent war. As for the free Cities and States beſides, the common people every where (as alwaies lightly it is ſeen) enclined to the worſe part, and ran with the K. & the Macedonians: but the principal perſons and men of quality, a man might perceive affected diverſly. Some went with the Romans all upon the head, inſomuch as they greatly empaired their authority in exceſsive favour to them: few of them were induced by the juſt and upright government of the Romans, but the moſt part were carried away with the ſtrong conceit, that the more they emploied themſelves for them, the greater men they ſhould be at home in their own Cities. Another O ſort there were of the Kings flattering favorits, who being deeply drenched in debt, and deſpair of bettering their fortune (if the preſent ſtate held ſtill) abandoned and gave themſelves over to entertain all changes and innovations. And ſome there were beſides, poſſeſſed with a vain humor of their own, becauſe Perſeus ſeemed to have more favour of the common people. A third ſort there were (and thoſe of the beſt and wiſeſt of all other) who if it had lyen in their hands to determine

A they would have to be greater lord, wiſhed to have been under the Romans rather then the K. Mary if they might have had their liberty to be chuſers ſimply of their fortune, by their good wil they would not have had the one part advanced by the depreſſion and ſubverſion of the other: but that the forces and puiſſance of them both remaining entire and unfoiled peace therby might be entertained: and ſo between them both, the ſtate of the Cities ſhould continue in the beſt caſe, when as the one part might ever protect the weaker ſide from the injuries of the mightier. And thoſe that ſtood affected thus, held them quiet & ſaid not a word; but being ſafe themſelves, beheld the behaviour and deportments of thoſe that were the partakers and favourers of either ſide.

The Conſuls that day wherein they entred their government, when they ſacrificed (according to the ordinance of the Senat) with greater beaſts in all the temples and chappels, wherein (for B moſt part of the yeer) the ſacred beds and couches for the gods were prepared; and thereby had preſaged by good tokens, that their praiers were acceptable to the immortall gods, made report unto the Senat, That their ſacrifices were as they ought to be, as alſo their praiers, which they conceived as touching the war. The Bowell-priers likewiſe by their learning declared, that if they went about any new enterpriſe, they ſhould make ſpeed; for why? all did prognoſticate victory, triumph, and enlargement of their ſeignory. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat commanded the Conſuls to propoſe to the people the firſt day of the general aſſembly of the Centuries in this maner: In the name of God, and to the welfare and happineſſe of the Commonwealth: whereas Perſeus the ſon of Philip K. of Macedony, (againſt the accord and covenant concluded with his father firſt, and after his death renewed with him) hath levied war upon the allies of the people of Rome, waſted their territories, ſeized their Cities, complotted to enter into arms againſt the people of Rome, and to C that end hath provided armor, ſouldiers and a fleet: unleſſe he make ſatisfaction, pleaſeth it you that war be enterpriſed and waged againſt him. This bill paſſed by all the ſuffrages of the people. Then was there an act of the Senat likewiſe entered, that the Conſuls ſhould either agree together, or elſe caſt lots for the provinces of Italy and Macedony: and look whoſe lot fell to Macedony, he ſhould perſecute with fire and ſword K. Perſeus, and all that ſect and faction which took his part, unleſſe they made amends to the people of Rome. It was concluded alſo, that four legions ſhould be newly enrolled, for either Conſul twain: with this preheminence and advantage to the province of Macedony, that whereas to the legions of the other Conſul (according to the ancient cuſtome) there went but five thouſand foot and two hundred horſe apeece, there ſhould be enrolled for Macedony ſix thouſand foot and three hundred horſe equally to a le- D gion. Alſo for the one of the Conſuls in the army of the allies, the number was augmented, ſo as beſides thoſe ſix hundred horſmen which Cn. Sicinius had conducted already, he ſhould of thoſe allies tranſport over into Macedony, ſixteen thouſand footmen and eight hundred horſe. As for Italy, twelve thouſand footmen of allies and ſix hundred horſe were thought ſufficient. Moreover this prerogative had the Province of Macedony, that for Centurions and ſouldiers the Conſul might enroll of the elder ſort whom he thought good as many as were not above fifty yeers of age. In chooſing of Tribunes military and colonels, the old maner was this yeer changed, in regard of the Macedonian war; to wit, that the Conſuls (by advice and authority of the Senat) ſhould move unto the people, that the ſaid Tribunes might not that year be elected by voices of the people, but that their elections ſhould be referred to the judgment and diſcretion of the E Conſuls and Pretors. The charge of command was thus divided among the Pretors as followeth. That Pretor whoſe lot fell to go whither it pleaſed the Senat to ſend, was aſsigned to take his journey to the fleet at Brunduſium, and there to ſurvey and reviſe the ſea-ſervitors, and look how many he thought not meet for ſervice, them to diſcharge, & to make up the number with choſen Libertines; and in any wiſe to order it ſo, that two third parts conſiſted of Roman naturall citizens, and the other third of allies. Item, That proviſion of victuals for the navy and the army, ſhould be brought out of Sicily and Sardinia. And the Pretors of thoſe two provinces had in charge to exact a double tenth of the Sicilians and Sardinians, and this grain to be conveighed into Macedony for the army. Now Sicily fell to C. Cauninus Rebulus, Sardinia to L. Furius Philus, F and Spain to L. Canuleius. C. Sulpitius Galba was L. chief iuſtice for the citizens of Rome, and L. Iunius Annalis for the ſtrangers: but C. Lucretius Gallus his lot was to go where the Senat would employ him. Between the two Conſuls there was ſome jar and wrangling, rather then any great debate about their province. Caſſius for his part ſaid, That he was by the right to war in Macedony without any caſting of lots for the matter, foraſmuch as his colleague might not enter into lot with him, and ſave his oath. For he being Pretor, had ſworn ſolemnly in a frequent aſſembly of the people (becauſe he would ſhift off and not go into his province) that he had occaſion to celebrate ſacrifices in a certain place and upon ſet daies, which could not be performed (as they ought) if he were at ſea. And the ſame (as I take it) cannot be well done during his abſence now G that he is Conſul no more then whiles he was Pretor. Howbeit, if the Senat be of opinion and judg, that more conſideration is to be had to ſatisfie Caius Licinius his will now in the Conſulſhip, then regard of the oath he took before in the Pretorſhip, yet will I notwithſtanding accommodat my ſelf to the pleaſure of the Senat. The LL. were conſulted with hereabout, who judging that it were a proud part to deny him the government of a province, unto whom the people of Rome had granted the dignity of a Conſulſhip, commanded the Conſuls to caſt lots. Thus Macedony fell to P. Licinius, and Italy to C. Caſſius. Then they put to lottery alſo the conduct

and employment of the legions: whereby the first and third were to be transported into H Macedony, the second and fourth to remain in Italy. In the mustering and choise of souldiers, the Consul went more neerly and streightly to work by far, then customably they used at other times. As for Licinius, he enrolled the elder sort also, as well for souldiers as centurions; and many there were who voluntarily entred their names, because they saw how those thrived well and grew rich, who had served either in the former Macedonian war, against Antiochus in Asia. Now when as the marshal Colonels called forth the centurions by name one after another, and the principall first, there hapned to be three and twenty centurions of them, who beforetime had been * Primipalares, had led in the chief and best place, and when they were cited, they called unto the Trib. of the Com. for to be relieved by their lawfull assistance. But two of that fellowship and society of Tribunes, namely, M. Fulvius Nobilior, and I M. Fulvius Marcellus, referred them to the Consuls, alledging, that by right, the knowledg of these matters pertaining to those who had plenary commission to take musters, and to manage the war-affairs. But all the rest of the Tribunes avowed that they would assume it into their own hands, and determine of that for which they were called unto as competent judges; yea, and if iniurie were offered to their fellow-citizens, they would not fail but help and succour them. All this was debated in the Tribunes-court. Thither was M. Popilius, a Consular man, called to the hearing of this matter, and thither repaired the centurions and the Consul also. And when the Consul required that the case should be heard and decided in a generall assembly, thereupon the people was summoned to meet in publick together. In which solemn congregation M. Popilius who had been Consul two years before, spake in behalf of the centurions to this effect. "These martiall K
"men (quoth he) have accomplished their full time of service required by law; they carry about "them bodies as well spent and crasie for age, as broken by continuall travels: howbeit refuse they "will nothing, but are ready to do their devoir unto the Commonweal. This only they humbly "crave and request, that they may not be assigned to baser places of command, then wherein they "have been employed already when they bare arms. Then P. Licinius the Consul commanded, the act of the Senat to be openly read: wherein it was ordeined first to levy war upon Perseus; then to enroll as many as they could of the old experienced Centurions for that war; and last of all exempt none from souldiery but such only as were above fifty years of age. "After this he ear- L
"nestly besought them in this new war so neer to Italy, and against a Prince so puissant, neither to "hinder the Colonels in levying souldiers, nor forbid the Consul but that he might appoint to each "man what place and degree was thought to stand most for the good of the Commonweal. And in "case there arose any doubt and difficulty in this business, to submit the decision thereof to the Se- "nat. After that the Consul had delivered his mind, Sp. Ligustinus one of them who had appea- led to the Tribunes of the Commons, requested both the Consul and the Tribunes to give him leave for to speak a few words unto the people: who having liberty granted with all their good wils, made a speech unto them in this wise. "My masters, you Quirites, I Spurius Ligustinus of The oration of Sp. Ligustinus. "the tribe Crustumina, am descended from the Sabins. My father left me an acre of land and a lit- "tle cottage to it, wherein I was born, bred and brought up, and whereupon at this day I dwell. "So soon as I was come to mans estate, my father gave me to wife my cousin german, his neece M
"by the brother, who brought nothing with her former marriage-good, but freedom of birth, ho- "nesty of life, and therewith fruitfulnesse of womb, as much (I may say to you) as a rich man of "some wealty house may well maintain. Six sons God hath sent betweenus, and two daughters "to them, both maidens marriageable. Four of our sons are men grown, and have put on their "mans robe; two are boies still in their Pretexta, under seventeen years old. I my self was prest "to the wars, the year when P. Sulpitius and C. Aurelius were Consuls. In that army which "passed over sea into Macedony, I served in quality of a common souldier for the space of two "years against King Philip. In the third year T. Quintius Flamininus, in regard of my forward- "nesse assigned me the tenth place of leading among the Hastati in the vanguard. After that Phi- "lip and the Macedonians were vanquished, and we brought over again into Italy and discharged, "I went immediatly as a voluntary servitor into Spain with M. Porcius the Consul. And there N
"is not a commander alive at this day, who saw farther into a souldier, and could judg better of "vertue and valour then he: as they know full well, who by long warfare have had experience both "of him and also of other leaders. He being my captain reputed me worthy to have the first place "and leading of the formost century of the Hastati. A third time I became a voluntary again in "the expedition against the Ætolians and K. Antiochus; and M. Calius advanced me to the Cap- "tainship of the Principes, in the very first place of the formost centurie. When King Antiochus "was chased and the Ætolians subdued, we were brought back again into Italy, and two years "together I was in pay of the legions that received yeerly wages and allowance. Twice after "this, I bare arms and served in Spain, once under Q. Fulvius Flaccus, a second time under Tib. "Sempronius Gracchus the Prætor. By Flaccus I was brought home among others, whom for their O
"valour and prowesse he thought good to have in train for the honour of his triumph: and at the "request and entreaty of Tib. Gracchus I accompanied him into the Province. Where within few "years space I had the leading of the first company of the Pilani or Triarii in the rereguard. Four "and thirty times have I been rewarded with presents at my Gereral hands, in token of vertue "and prowesse. Six civick coronets have I received: two and thirty years full have I followed the "wars & neither fifty years old I am. Now if neither I had served out all the years required by law,

* The Centurions in the rereward over the Triarii who are called also Pilani. For so besides many other, witnesseth Ovid. 3 Fast. in these verses.
Inde pares centum denos secrevit in orbe
Romulus, Hastatos instituitque decem: Et totidem Principes totidem Pilanus habebat
Corpora legitimo quisque merebat equo.
And that it was the chiefest place of of Centurions in the legion, appeareth by Ligustinus in his oration following.

A "law, nor might plead exemption and immunity by mine age, yet seeing I am able to shew four "souldiers for one, my four sons [I say for my self alone] me thinks it were reason, O P. Licinius, that I were now freed and discharged. And all this I pray you take, as spoken for the be"hoof of my cause. Now as touching my person thus much. So long as any man who hath autho"rity to enroll souldiers, shall judg me sufficient and able to bear arms, I will not go about to ex"cuse and shift it off. And look what place the Colonels and Marshals shall suppose me worthy "of, it lyeth in his good will and pleasure to assigne me unto it: but to perform that no one per"son in the whole army surmount me in valor, that shall be my own indeavor; like as not only
"my captains, but those also who have served with me are able to testifie, That I ever had so car"ried my self and performed as much. And you likewise my fellow souldiers, albeit you practise B "and keep in ure the privileg and benefit of appealing to the Tribunes, yet meet and reason it is,
"since in your youthfull daies ye never did ought in any place against the authority of the Senat
"and the Consuls, ye now also in your declining age be at the disposition of the Senat and the "Consuls; yea, and to esteem all places worshipfull, wherein you shall defend and maintain the "Common weal. When he had thus said, the Consuls highly commended him, and from before the people brought him into the Senat. And there also by the advice and authority of that honorable house, thanked he was, and the Marshal-Colonels, in regard of his vertue, appointed him to be the principall Centurion of the Pilani in the first legion. So the rest of the Centurions renouncing their appeal to the Tribunes, yeelded obedience in the muster and levy abovesaid.

To the end that the Magistrats and great commanders might go more timely into their governments, the Latine feasts and holydaies were published to be holden upon the Calends of June.
C Which solemnity being finished, C. Lucretius the Pretor took his journey to Brundusium, having sent before all necessary furniture and provision for the fleet. Besides, those armies which the Consuls levied, a commission was directed out to C. Sulpitius Gala the Pretor, to enroll four legions of Roman citizens, with the ordinary full proportion of infantery and cavalry, and to chuse out of the body of the Senat four Colonels to command them. Also to levy Latin allies 15000 foot, and 1200 horse, and to take order that his army should be ready to go whithersoever the Senat thought good. P. Licinius the Cos. at his own instant request (that over and above the armies of citizens and allies, he might have an addition of auxiliaries) obtained of Ligurians 2000 of Candiot archers an uncertain number, namely, as many as the Candiots upon request would send. Moreover, certain Numidian horsemen and elephants: for which purpose L. Posthumius Albinus, Q. Terentius Culleo and C. Aburius were sent in embassage to Masanissa and the Carthaginians. Sem-
D blably it was thought good to send three Embassadors into Crete, to wit, A. Posthumius Albinus, C. Decimius, and A. Licinius Nerva.

At the very same time there arrived Embassadors from King Perseus. But suffered they were not to enter into the City; considering that both the Senat had ordained, and the people assented already to make war upon their King and the Macedonians. So, admitted they were into the Temple of Bellona before the Senat, where they delivered their message in this manner: That King Perseus marvelled why there were armies transported over into Macedony? And if the Senat might be intreated so much, as to recall them home, the King would make satisfaction for the wrongs done unto their allies, in such sort as the Senat in their discretion would appoint. Now there was E in the Senat-house at that time Sp. Carvilius, sent back for that very purpose out of Greece from Cn. Sicinius. He made report and remonstrance, how Perrhœbia was forced by arms, and certain Cities of Thessaly won: with other exploits that King Perseus had either performed, or else was in hand to enterprise. To which challenges the Embassadors were commanded to make answer. But after they were seen once to falter in their speech, saying they had no farther commission then that they had delivered already; they were willed to relate unto the King their master, that P. Licinius the Consul would shortly be in Macedony with an army, unto whom the King might address his Embassadors, if he minded to do as he said and to make amends. As for sending any more to Rome, there was no need nor cause, for almuch as they would not suffer any of them to pass through Italy. When they were dismissed with this short dispatch, P. Licinius the Consul had in charge, to command them to go out of Italy within 11 daies, and to send Spurius Carvilius for to guard them all the way to the sea-side untill they were shipped. These occurrents passed in Rome before the Consuls were gone into their provinces.

Now by this time Cn. Sicinius (who ere that he left his magistracy, was sent before as far as to Brundusium to the fleet and the army) having put over into Epirus 5000 foot and 300 horse, was encamped before Nymphæum in the territory of the Apollonists. From thence he sent certain colonels with 2000 souldiers, to seiz the forts and castles of the Dassaretians and Illyrians, by occasion that they of their own accord made meanes and sent for garrisons, to the end they might be better guarded & secured from the violence and invasion of the Macedonians bordering upon their confines.

Some few daies after, Q. Martius, A. Atilius, P. and Ser. both Cornelii and Lentuli, together with L. Decimius, who all had been sent in embassie into Greece, brought them to Corcyra one thousand footmen; where they both parted between themselves their several quarters whither they would go, and also their souldiers. Decimius was sent to Gentius King of the Illyrians, with commandment, If he saw him any waies coming on and enclined to entertain amity with the Romans, to sound him and give the assay; yea, and to draw him into the association of this war.

The

The two Lentuli were ſent into Cephalenia, from thence to traverſe and croſſe over into Peloponneſus, and before winter to fetch about and compaſſe the coaſt of the Weſt-ſea. Martius & Atilius were aſsigned to viſit Epirus, Ætolia and Theſſalis. From thence they were enjoyned to have an eye into Bœotia and Eubœa, and ſo to ſail into Peloponneſus where they appointed to meet with the Lentuli. But before that they departed from Corcyra, letters were brought from Perſeus, wherin he demanded what reaſon the Romans had either to tranſport any forces into Greece, or to ſeiz upon the Cities? thought good it was to return him no anſwer by writting, but only by word of mouth thus much to ſay unto the meſſenger that brought the letters, That the Romans did it for the defence and ſafeguard of the ſaid towns. The Lentuli as they rode their circuit viſiting the Cities and towns of Peloponneſus, exhorting the States and commonalties thereof indifferently one as well as another, To aid the Romans at this preſent againſt Perſeus, with ſemblable courage and like fidelty as they had ſtood with them firſt in the war againſt Philip, and afterwards in that with Antiochus; might here in their publick aſſemblies much muttering and grumbling therat. The Achæans (who from the very beginning of the Macedonian war had been altogether for the Romans, and during the war againſt Philip, enemies to the Macedonians) took it in diſdain that they were reputed in the ſame ranke with the Meſſenians and Eleans, and no better then they who had born arms againſt the people of Rome, for Antiochus their enemie: and who but the other day, being enrolled into the commonality and counſell of the Achæans, complained that they were delivered unto the victorious Achæans, as the recompence and guerdon of their conqueſt. Martius and Atilius as they went up to Gitana a town of Epirus, ten miles from the ſea, in a generall Councel holden there of al the Epirots, had audience with great contentment of them al. Four hundred of their yong and able luſty men they ſent into the Oriſtians countrey to lie in garriſon for defence of thoſe Macedonians who by them were ſet at liberty. From thence, they held on their progreſs into Ætolia; and after they had ſojorned there ſome few daies (whiles a new Pretor was elected in the room of him that was deceaſed, and Lyciſcus appointed the governor, a man known for certain to favour the Romans) they paſsed over into Theſſaly. Thither repaired the Embaſsadors of the Acarnanians and the baniſhed perſons of Ætolia. The Acarnanians were enjoyned to utter and declare before them what they had committed and done againſt the people of Rome, being inveigled and deceived by the promiſes of the two Kings Philip and Antiochus during the wars againſt the one and the other; ſince occaſion was now preſented unto them, for to make amends and ſalve all that was amiſs. For if upon their ill demerits towards the people of Rome, they had made triall and taſted of their clemency, they might now by good deſerts prove their boundy another while. As for the Bœotians, they were reproved and upbraided for entring into aſsociation with Perſeus: and when they ſeemed to lay the whole fault upon Iſmenias a captain of one of the two factions, and certain Cities and States which being of a different opinion were drawn to the ſide; Say ye ſo? (quoth Martius again) and that ſhall ſoon appear, for we all permit every commonalty and City to anſwer apart and ſeverally for themſelves the beſt they can.

Now was the Diet of the Theſſalians holden at Ariſſa: where, as the Theſſalians took good occaſion and found ample matter of thankſgiving the Romans, for the liberty which by their goodneſs they had obtained: ſo as the Roman legats had as copious an argument to render them thanks, for that firſt in the war with Philip, and afterwards of Antiochus, they had been ſo mightily aided by the Theſſalian nation. Thus by this mutuall rehearſall of pleaſures and good turns given and taken, the hearts of the multitude were enkindled with a fervent zeal to decree and ordain whatſoever it pleaſed the Romans to deſire. After this councell was diſſolved, there came Embaſsadors from K. Perſeus unto Martius, upon a ſpeciall affiance of the privat friendſhip and hoſpitality which had paſsed between his father King Philip, and the ſaid Martius [and his father.] Theſe Embaſsadors began the ſpeech with a commemoration of the ſaid familiar and inward acquaintance, requeſting him to permit the K. for to have acceſs unto him, and to commun together. Martius anſwered, that he alſo had heard his father ſpeak of the amity and mutuall hoſpitality between him and K. Philip: in regard and remembrance of which neer bond of familiarty he was the more willing to take upon him the charge of that embaſsage and commiſsion. As to the parly, he would not have deferred it at all, if he might commodiouſly have wrought it: & now for this preſent he promiſed (ſo ſoon as he poſsibly could) to ſend his coutriers before to advertiſe the King, that they might come to the river Peneus, whereas the paſsage lieth from Olimolium over to Dium. And verily at that time, Perſeus was retired from Dium into the inland quarters of his realm, and had gathered ſome prety gale of hope, in that Martius had given out, how for love of him he had undertaken this embaſsie. After ſome few daies they repaired to the place appointed. This King accompanied with a great train as well of his friends, as his courtiers and penſioners which guarded his perſon. The legats likewiſe were attended upon with no leſſe a troop, by reaſon as well of many that followed them from Ariſſa, as alſo of divers embaſsages from the States which aſsembled at Ariſſa, and were deſirous to carry home with them certain news of the ſequel, which they ſhould hear. Every man had an inward deſire ſetled in his heart to ſee the maner of the meeting of this noble K. & theſe high commiſsioners from the ſoveraign ſtate and mightieſt people of the whole world. Being come to the enterview one of another, they ſtood ſtill on either ſide of the river, which only parted them aſunder. For a while there paſsed entercourriers between: whiles they made it ſtrange on both parts, who ſhould paſs the river firſt; for the Macedonians ſtood ſomewhat upon the roiall majeſty of a King; & the Romans were as reſpective

A respective to the reputation of the people of Rome, considering withall, that Perseus sought the means & made first motion for this parley. Whereupon, to end this controversie, Martius cast out a merry word, What needs all this (qd. he) let the younger come to the elder without more ado, and the son to the father: this he spake, for that himself also was surnamed Philip. The K. soon condescended thereunto. But then arose another doubt and difference, namely, with what number he should pass over. The K. thought it meet & convenient to come with his whole train: but the legats would have had him either to bring over with him three persons, and no more; or else if he were minded to pass with so great a company, to put in hostages for assurance, that during the time of the parley no outrage should be committed. So Perseus sent as pledges, Hippias & Pantanchus, the principal and most especial friends that were about him, whom also he had employed B in the embassage. Now were these hostages required, not so much for a gage & pawn of security, as that it might appear unto the allies there present, that the K. in meeting and communing with the Roman Commissioners, should not keep state comparable with him, but abate somewhat of of the port and majesty which they carried. Their mutual greeting and salutation was nothing strange, as between enemies; but kind and amiable, as among familiar friends. Which done, they sat them down upon their chairs set ready for them. After they had thus sitten a while in silence and said nothing, Martius began in this manner: "You expect (I suppose qd. he) that we should "answer to your letters which you sent to Corcyra, wherein you demand, Why we are come in "embassie and commission after this manner with armed souldiers, and plant garrisons as we do "in every City? To which question of yours not to answer at all, I fear me you would take it to C "be pride in me; and again, to answer a truth, I doubt it will be too harsh and unpleasant to your "ears. But seeing that he who breaketh a covenant must be chastised either by word or sword, "(like as I had rather that any other but my self should have commission to make war upon "you:) so I will be so bold (however it fall out) to speak rough and tart unto you as to my friend: "and herein will I follow the manner of Physicians, who for the health of their patients, other- "whiles minister bitter medicins and apply stinking corrosives. Since time that you first attained "unto the crown, the Senat thinketh you have done but one only thing of all that you ought to "have done, namely, that you sent your embassadors to Rome for to renew the league; and yet "they judge you had done better in not renewing it, than after it was renewed, to violate the "same. Chased you have out of the Realm * Abrupolis, a confederat and friend of the people of D "Rome. The murderers of Artetarus you have received and entertained, yea, and given the world "thereby to understand, that you were well pleased (to say no worse) with his death: and killed "they have a Prince most fast and faithfull to the Romans, of all others in Illyricum. Thorough "Thessaly and the territory of Malia, you have marched with an army against the tenor of the "league, as far as to Delphi: and more than that, contrary unto the said accord, sent you have aid "and succour to the Byzantins. With our allies the Bœotians, you have entred into a secret asso- "ciation and bound the same with an oath, which by right you ought not to have done. Who it "was that murdered the Theban embassadors Eversa and Callicritus who came directly from us, "I had rather enquire than charge any man and declare. The civill wars in Ætolia the massacres "of their Princes & States, unto whom may they be imputed in any likelihood, but to your peo-E "ple? As for the Dolopians, wasted they were by your self in person and by no other. It grieveth "me and goeth to my heart, to speak who it is that K. Eumenes challengeth and burdeneth with "this, That in his return from Rome into his own kingdom, he was like to have been killed as a "beast for sacrifice & that at Delphi, in a sacred and hallowed place, even before the altars. As for "the secret practices which your host of Brundusium hath disclosed and set abroad, I know right "well that not only you have received letters thereof from Rome, but your own embassadors also "have told you all by word of mouth. You might have soon avoided all this, and heard nothing "thereof from me, if you would have forborn only to ask & demand, Wherefore our forces were "transported over into Macedony, & why we sent garrisons into our confederat Cities? But since F "you would needs put out such a question, more pride it had been in us to have held our peace, "than to utter the plain truth as we have done. Verily, for mine own part, in regard of the hospi- "tall and friendly curtesies that have passed between your father and us, I favour you, and will "gladly make the best of your cause: and would to God I had some good occasion ministred from "your self, to solicit and further your suit before the Senat.

The Oration of Martius Philippus to King Perseus.

To these challenges and imputations, the K. framed his answer in this wise: "Content I am to "plead my cause before you, the parties appellants and judges both, which would be found (I "doubt not) good, if it were debated and handled in the presence of indifferent and equall arbi-G "trators. And first, as touching those matters which are objected against me, they are such as in "part, I wot not well whether I may not glory in them, or at least wise not blush in the confessing "and avowing thereof. As for the rest, as they are charged upon me in bare words, so plain words "may serve flatly and simply to deny them. For say, that this day I were subject unto your laws, "and by them to have my triall, what can either that promoter of Brundusium, or K. Eumenes in- "form against me. but it will appear, that they accuse me not so much with matter of truth, as ex- "hibit only slanderous and reproachfull terms? A like matter, I wis, it is, that neither Eumenes had "had any other enemy but me, (he, I say, who hath done such wrong and injury to so many both "in common and also in particular:) nor I could find a fitter person to serve my turn in the exe- "cution of my projects but this Rammius, a fellow that I never had seen before, nor was ever like

The answer of King Perseus.

"to ſee again hereafter. I muſt (forſooth) give account for the Thebans, who as it is well known, H
"periſhed by ſhipwrack: as alſo for the murder of Artetarus; and yet therein I am no deeper "charged than thus, that the murderers of him lived in exile & were ſhadowed within my realm.
"Now ſurely this hard concluſion and unreaſonable condition I will not refuſe to undergo, in caſe
"you alſo will be content to take upon you and avow all thoſe crimes and facts, for which they
"ſtand condemned, who as baniſhed perſons have fled either to Rome or into Italy: but in caſe
"both you and all other nations will diſavow that, I alſo will be one among the reſt. And in good "faith, to ſpeak uprightly, to what end ſhould any man be baniſhed from one country, if he may "not find a place in another, and be permitted there to live in exile? And yet (ſo ſoon as ever I "found by advertiſement from you that they were within Macedony) I for my part, made diligent
"ſearch untill I had them, and then I commanded them to depart out of my kingdom, yea, and ex- I
"preſſely forbad them for ever ſetting foot again within my dominions. And thus much verily "concerning the criminal matters objected unto me as a defendant pleading at the bar. Now let "us argue and debate the reſt, inforced and laid againſt me in quality of a King, namely, which "concern and touch the accord contracted between me and you. For if the words run in this ſort
"and are thus written in the foreſaid covenants of accord, That I may not be ſuffered to defend
"my ſelf and my realm, no, not if any enemy of mine levy war againſt me; then I muſt confeſs
"indeed, that the league I have broken, in that I ſtood upon my guard and defence by force of "arms againſt Abrupolis, an aſſociat of the people of Rome. But if it were lawfull for me ſo to do
"by warrant of the accord, and allowed alſo by the law of nations, by force to repell force; what "ſhould I leſs, nay, what could I elſe have done I pray you? When Abrupolis had laid waſte the K
"frontiers of my kingdom even as far as to Amphipolis, led into captivity many perſons free-
"born, carried away a mighty number of ſlaves, and driven before him many thouſand head of "cattell; ſhould I have ſitten ſtill and ſuffered him untill he had come armed to Pella, even unto
"my royall palace? But ſome man may haply ſay. You did well indeed and juſtly, in making head
"and purſuing him by force of arms, mary, vanquiſhed he ſhould not have been, neither ought he
"to have ſuffered thoſe calamities which follow men vanquiſhed. Why? if I have endured the for"tune therof, provoked as I was to war, how can he juſtly complain of taſting the like, being him"ſelf the cauſe and firſt motive of all? I will not uſe the ſame manner of defence (O Romans) to "this, that by force of arms I have repreſſed the Dolopians: for if I have not done by them accor"ding to their demerits, yet I am ſure I have dealt by the vertue of the right I have over them, be- L
"ing as they are of mine own kingdom, under my obeyſance, and made ſubjects to my father even
"by a decree of your own drawing. And yet, were I to render a reaſon of my proceedings againſt
"them, I ſay, not unto you nor unto my allies, but even to thoſe who like not of any cruel com"mand ſo much as over bondſlaves; can I be thought to have exerciſed more rigor againſt them, "than equity and reaſon would bear? For, Euphranor, whom I deputed governor over them, they "killed in ſuch ſort, that death is too good for them, and the leaſt puniſhment of all others that "they have deſerved. And as I marched forward in my progreſs from thence to viſit the Cities of "Lariſſa, Antron, & Pylleon, I aſcended up to Delphi, there for to ſacrifice, to the end that I might "diſcharge my conſcience & pay thoſe vows which I had of long time owed. Now, to aggravate
"matter in this alſo againſt me, it is ſaid moreover, that I was there with my army, and intended M
"(no doubt) for to ſeiz Cities into my hands, and put garriſons into fortreſſes; for which at this
"preſent I complain of you. Call the States and Cities of Greece together to a generall aſſembly, "through which I paſſed. Let any one man come forth & make complaint of the leaſt harm done
"by any of my ſouldiers; then will I not refuſe to be reputed for one who under pretence of di"vine ſacrifice, went about another thing. We ſent indeed garriſons to the Ætolians and Bizan-
"tins, yea, and with the Bœotians we contracted amity. But theſe things, in what ſort & for what "purpoſe they were done, my embaſſadors have not only declared, but alſo excuſed oftentimes
"before your Senat: where I found ſome Umpires to hear and decide my cauſe, although not ſo "indifferent and favourable to me-ward, as your ſelf are, O Martius, my fathers old friend and fa"miliar. For as yet Eumenes my accuſer was not come to Rome, who by falſe ſuggeſtions, wreſting N
"at his pleaſure every thing to the worſt, to make all ſuſpicious and odious unto you, went about
"to make you beleeve that Greece could not poſſibly be reſtored to freedom, & enjoy the fruit of "your gracious benefit, ſo long as the kingdom of Macedony ſtood entire and upright. Well, the "world you ſhall ſee, will turn about; and anon one or other will be here, to make remonſtrance
"and prove, That to no purpoſe Antiochus is removed and confined beyond the mountains of "Taurus; that Eumenes is become much more grievous and unſupportable to all Aſia than An-
"tiochus ever was: and that your allies cannot be at reſt nor live in quiet, ſo long as he keepeth
"his royal court in Pergamus, a Cittadel (as it were) overlooking and commanding all the neigh"bour Cities bordering thereupon. Right well I know, O Q. Martius, and you A. Attilius, that "whatſoever either you have objected againſt me, or I anſwered for my defence & purgation, is O
"ſuch as the ears and affections are of the hearers; neither what I have done, nor what mind and
"intention I have carried in mine actions will be ſo much regarded, as how you take every thing "either done or intended. Mine own conſcience beareth me witneſs, that willingly I have not "faulted; now, if for want of knowledge and foreſight I have been overſeen and done ſomewhat
"amiſs it may be corrected and amended by this preſent chaſtiſement. This I am ſure, my treſpaſs
"is not incurable, neither have I committed ought that you ſhould deem worthy to be purſued

"by

A "by war & force of arms. And if ye do, then ſurely it is for nought, that there goeth this name a"broad thoughout all nations of your clemency and gravity both, if I ſay for ſo ſlight occaſions
"which hardly are worth the complaint and the reaſoning about, you be ready to enter into arms
"and levy war upon your confederat Princes. Martius for that time accorded to his ſpeech, and moved him to addreſs embaſſadors to Rome, being of advice and opinion himſelf to try all means to the very laſt point, and to let ſlip nothing whereof ſome hope of good might ariſe. It remained only to be debated in councill, how embaſſadors might paſs in ſafety. And to this purpoſe, when it was neceſſary for the K. to requeſt a ſurceaſe of arms, albeit Martius himſelf was willing and deſirous thereof (for that his drift was to nothing elſe by all this conference and parley) yet he ſeemed to make a hard matter and difficulty of it, and to do a ſpeciall favour and pleaſure unto Perſeus in B granting his petition. The truth was, the Romans yet were not ready nor throughly appointed at this preſent for the war; they had neither army puiſſant enough, nor captains ſufficient: whereas Perſeus (but that he was blinded in all his councils with a vain hope of peace) had all things prepared and in readineſs, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the beſt and moſt opportune ſeaſon for himſelf, ſo the worſt and unfitteſt of all other times for his enemies.

After this parley and the abſtinence of war aſſured faithfully on both parts, the Roman Commiſſioners were appointed and reſolved to go into Bœotia, where there was begun already ſome trouble and commotion, by reaſon that certain States of the Bœotians were departed from the ſociety of the common Councill, ever ſince it was reported back, how the Roman Legats made anſwer that it ſhould appear and be ſeen, what Cities they were indeed which took no pleaſure
C to have any aſſociation with the King. And firſt, the embaſſadors from Cheronea; afterwards, from Thebes encountred them upon the way, who aſſured them that they were not preſent in that Diet and Councill, where this aſſociation was concluded. To theſe embaſſages no anſwer for this time was made, but willed they were only to give their attendance and follow them to Chalcis.

At Thebes great variance there was, which aroſe by occaſion of another ſtrife and debate. In their ſolemn aſſembly for the election of the Prætor of the Bœotians that part which had the repulſe, in revenge of that injury and diſgrace, aſſembled the multitude and made a decree at Thebes, That the Bœotarches ſhould not be received within their Cities: in ſuch ſort, as like baniſhed men they retired to Theſpium: from whence (for received there they were incontinently without any ſtay) being called again to Thebes upon better adviſement and change of mind, they made D an ordinance, That if to the number of twelve privat perſons held any conventicle or publike meeting together, they ſhould be condemned to exile. After this, Iſmenias the new Prætor, a noble perſonage and of great puiſſance, by vertue of a decree adjudged them in their abſence for to loſe their lives. To Chalcis they were fled, and from thence to the Romans at Lariſſa they went: where they declared that Iſmenias was the cauſe of their aſſociation with King Perſeus. Upon that foreſaid difference, they grew to hot contention, yet embaſſadors from both parts came to the Romans, as well the baniſhed perſons and accuſers of Iſmenias, as alſo Iſmenias himſelf. But ſo ſoon as the Roman Legats were come to Chalcis, the States and heads of other Cities (who every one by a ſpeciall decree of their own had renounced aſſociation with King Perſeus) joyned with the Romans; whereat they took exceeding great contentment and joy. Iſmenias thought E it meet and reaſon that the Bœotian nation ſhould be committed to the protection of the Romans. Whereupon aroſe a tumultuous fray & but that he fled into the Tribunall of the Legats to ſave himſelf, he had eſcaped narrowly from being killed by the ſaid exiled perſons, with the help of their ſupports and favorits.

Alſo the City of Thebes, which is the capitall place of State within Bœotia, was in great trouble and uproar; whiles ſome drew to the K. others enclined to the Romans. Beſides, there was a multitude of Coronæans and Haliartians gathered together to maintain the ordinance and decree as touching the aſſociation with the K. But ſuch was the reſolute perſiſtance of the principall and chief men, who ſhewed by the late calamities of Philip and Antiochus, how great the forces, and how happy the fortune was of the Roman empire, that the ſame multitude relented, and being F overruled, paſſed a new decree, to reverſe and cancell the former confederacy with the King; ſent thoſe that were the motives and perſwaders of contracting that amity to Chalcis for to ſatisfie and content the Roman Legats; yea & to conclude, were of advice to recommend the City to the faithfull patronage of the ſaid Commiſſioners. Martius & Attilius took great pleaſure to hear the Thebans ſing this note, they perſwaded with them ſeverally apart, and gave them counſell to ſend embaſſadors to Rome for the renewing of this amity: but before all things they took order for the reſtoring of the baniſhed perſons: as for the authors of the confederacy contracted with the K. they by their own decree condemned. Having thus by this means infringed and made fruſtrat the Diet of the Bœotians (the thing which above all they moſt deſired) they took their journey to Peloponneſus, together with Ser. Cornelius, whom they had ſent for to Chalcis. For their ſakes a G Councill was holden at Argos, where they demanded nothing elſe of the Achæan nation but only to furniſh them with 1000 ſouldiers. This garriſon was ſent to the defence of Chalcis, untill the Roman army were tranſported into Greece. Martius and Attilius having thus diſpatched all the affairs that they had to do in Greece, in the beginning of winter returned to Rome.

Then was there ſent from thence about the ſame time an honourable embaſſie to the Iſles in Aſia. Theſe Embaſſadors or Legats were three in number, to wit, T. Clandius, P. Poſthumius, and M. Junius. They in their circuit and viſitation exhorted all their allies to take arms againſt Perſeus, for the Romans. And the mightier and more wealthy any City was, the more earneſtly travelled they there; becauſe the interior States were like to frame and ſort themſelves ſutable to the example and authority of the greater and ſuperior. Now of all others the Rhodians were reputed of moſt import and conſequence every way, for that they were able not only to favor with their countenance, but alſo aid and maintain with their forces this war: and by the perſwaſion of Hergeſilus they had got together a fleet of forty ſail. "This Hergeſilus their ſoveraign Magiſtrate "(whom they call Prytanis) had by many reaſons prevailed with the Rhodians, to abandon the "hope they had by entertaining theſe KK. (which they had found by often experience how vain "it was) and to hold themſelves to the ſociety and alliance of the Romans, the ſureſt hold of all "others at that time in the world, as well for ſtrength of forces as truſty aſſurance and fidelity. "There is intended war by them (qd. he) againſt Perſeus, and no doubt the Romans will require "of us the ſame proviſion and furniture of ſhips and ſea-forces, which they have ſeen in their war "lately againſt Antiochus, and before that, againſt King Philip: and then you will be to ſeek, and "forced in great haſte to provide a fleet, when it were more time it ſhould be ſet out and ſent "forth, unleſs ye begin betimes to repair and rig your ſhips, unleſs, I ſay, you ſet in hand to furniſh "the ſame with ſailers and mariners. And with ſo much more endeavour ought ye thus to do, "that by your deed and effectuall employment, you may refute and diſprove the falſe imputations "wherewith Eumenes hath charged you. By theſe remonſtrances induced they were inſomuch as at the arrival of the Roman Legats aforeſaid, they were able to ſhew unto them an armado of 40 ſhips ready rigged and well appointed, that they might know and ſee, they looked not for to be exhorted thereunto. And this embaſſage was of great moment and importance alſo to gain the hearts of the States in Aſia. Only Decimius returned to Rome without any effect of his errand and commiſſion, nay, he ran into an ill name and obloquy, upon ſuſpition that he had received certain bribes of the Princes in Illyricum.

Perſeus upon the conference and communication had with the Romans, retired into Macedony and ſent his Embaſſadors to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with Martius: to other Embaſſadors alſo of his he gave his letters to carry to Byzantium and Rhodes: the tenor of which letters was one and the ſame directed to them all: namely, That he had communed with the Roman Legats, but he had ſo placed and couched as well what he heard as what he ſpake, that it might ſeem he gave not one foot unto them, but gained the better hand in that diſpute & debating with them. Theſe Embaſſadors added moreover, and ſaid unto the Rhodians, "That they hoped aſſuredly there would be a peace, for that they by the motion and advice of "Martius and Attilius were addreſſed in embaſſie to Rome. Now if the Romans, ſay they, againſt "the covenants of accord proceeded to levy war, then the Rhodians were to endeavour with all "the credit and power they have, to reunite the peace again; but if with all their prayer and entreaty they might not prevail, then they were to look about and labour this one point, That the "might and puiſſance of the whole world were not devolved into the hands of that one people. "And as this imported and concerned all the reſt, ſo the Rhodians eſpecially, who ſurmounted "other States in dignity and wealth, both which ſhould be obnoxious and enthralled, if there "were regard and reſpect made of none but the Romans. The letters of the King and words of the Embaſſadors, were entertained with friendly audience, other effect they took none to change their ſetled minds: for now the authority of the better part began alſo to carry the greater ſway. But this anſwer was returned to them, & that by way of decree, That the Rhodians wiſhed peace with all their hearts: but if it ſhould come to war, their King and Maſter was neither to expect, nor yet to exact any thing at their hands, to disjoyn the ancient amity which they held with the Romans, and which they had acquired by many and great deſerts, as well in war as in peace. In their return from Rhodes, they went to the Cities of Bœotia, and namely, to Thebes, Coronea, and Haliartus, from whom it ſeemed a thing extorted forcibly againſt their will, that they were diſbanded from the King & clave to the Romans. The Thebans ſtood firm and immoveable, although they were ſomewhat diſcontented with the Romans, both for condemning their chief and principall Citizens, and alſo for reſtoring the baniſhed perſons. But the Coronæans and Haliartians upon an inbred and ſetled favour by kind unto the Kings, ſent Embaſſadors into Macedonia, requeſting a garriſon for their defence againſt the exceſſive pride of the Thebans. To this embaſſage the King thus anſwered, That a garriſon he might not ſend, by reaſon of the truce made with the Romans: howbeit, he adverтiſed them to maintain and guard themſelves againſt the injuries of the Thebans all that ever they could: but yet ſo, as they gave the Romans no cauſe to be their heavy friends, and ſo to proceed in rigour againſt them.

Martius and Attilius being come to Rome, made report of their embaſſie within the Capitoll, in ſuch manner, as in nothing they gloried more, than in deluding and deceiving the K. by means of a ceſſation from arms, and a pretended hope of peace. For ſo well appointed was he and furniſhed with all proviſion for war, and they contrariwiſe ſo unprovided every way, that he might eaſily have poſſeſſed himſelf of all places of opportunity and advantage, before that their army could paſs over into Greece. But now having this reſpit and time of the truce, as the King would come nothing better provided, ſo the Romans might begin the war, more fully furniſhed with all things convenient. Moreover, they related how they by their coming diſtracted and ſet a jar in the generall Council of the Bœotians, ſo as by no means any more hereafter they can be rejoyned to the Macedonians by conſent and accord. The greater part of the Senat approved this ſervice of theirs

A theirs as performed with ſingular diſcretion and dexterity: But the old Senators and thoſe that held in remembrance the ancient manner and cuſtome of the Romans, ſaid plainly, "That in all "the courſe of that embaſſie, they could ſee no Roman practice and dealing at all. Our anceſtors "(ſay they) were wont to war not by wait-laying and ſecret ambuſhes, nor by skirmiſhes in the "night-ſeaſon, nor yet by falſe ſemblant of running away and ſudden turning their face again at "unawares upon their unprovided enemies; neither ſought they to glorifie themſelves by ſubtill "ſlights more than by true vertue and valour: Their uſe and manner was, to intimate and publiſh "wars before they made any: yea, and to denounce and proclaim the ſame; otherwhiles alſo to "aſſign and appoint the very place where they went to ſtrike a battell. According to this plain and "faithfull dealing, they detected and diſcloſed unto K. Pyrrhus, the Phyſician that would by poy-
B "ſon have taken away his life: by the ſame they delivered bound unto the Faliſcians the villanous "traitor that would have betraied the children of their K. Theſe are the Roman faſhions (ſay "they) not to uſe the cunning caſts and ſlie ſhifts of the Carthaginians, nor the crafty policies of "Grecians, who ever reputed it more glorious and honourable by fraud to compaſs than by force "to ſurpaſs the enemy. Indeed otherwhiles for the preſent time, more good is done and greater "matters are effected by guile and policy, than by valour and vertue: but to ſay a truth the cou-"rage of that enemy is for ever conquered, who is forced to confeſs, that he was vanquiſhed not "by cunning nor by venture, but in juſt and lawfull war by main ſtrength and cloſe fight at handy "gripes. Thus ſpake the ancients, who had no great liking to the new-found devices of theſe poli-ticians. Howbeit, that ſide of the Senat which made more reckoning of profit than of honeſty, car-
C ried it away and imported ſo much, that not only the firſt embaſſie of Martius was approved, as well performed, but alſo himſelf was ſent back again with certain Quinqueremes, with a mandat alſo & commiſſion to deal in the reſt according as he ſhould think to ſtand with the good of the Common-weal. They diſpatched likewiſe Aul. Attilius to ſeiz Lariſſa in Theſſaly; for fear leſt if the term of truce were expired, Perſeus ſhould ſend a garriſon thither, and hold in his hand the ca-pitall City of Theſſaly. The ſaid Attilius had a warrant to receive 2000 footmen of Cn. Sicinius for to effectuat that enterpriſe. Alſo P. Lentulus lately returned out of Achæa was allowed the con-duct of 300 ſouldiers of the Italian nation, to the end that at Thebes he ſhould endeavour to bring all Bœtia under the obedience of the Romans. When all things were ſet in this forwardneſs, albeit they were at a point and fully reſolved to make war, yet thought good it was to give audi-
D ence unto the embaſſadors of Perſeus in the Senat; who rehearſed and related in manner the ſame reaſons which were delivered by the King in the late conference and parley. Much ado they made and laboured hard, to acquit the King of the imputation laid to his charge, for ſeeking the death of Eumenes; but with ſmall probability or none at all: for the thing was too too apparant. In the end they fell to prayer and intreaty: howbeit, no ear was given unto them, with any ſuch mind and heart, as could be either inſtructed or inclined. Inſtead thereof, warned ſtraightly they were to depart immediatly forth of the liberties of Rome, and within thirty daies out of Italy.

After this, P. Licinius the Coſ. who was charged with the Province of Spain, had commandment given him to aſſign unto the army the ſooneſt day that he could, for to meet in one certain place. C. Lucretius the Prætor who had the conduct of the fleet, took his leave of the City with forty E Quinqueremes: for adviſed it was, that the reſt of the ſhips which had been repaired, ſhould be ſtaid at home for to be employed otherwiſe about the City. And the Prætor ſent his brother Lu-cretius before with one Galeace or Quinquereme & commiſſion to receive of the allies that ſhip-ping which by covenant they were to find; and with them near the Iſland Cephalenia, to joyn with the reſt of the armado: to wit, from the Rhegins one trireme gally, from the Locrians twain, from the Urits 4. With which he coaſted along Italy, and having doubled the utmoſt point of Calabria within the * Ionian ſea, he arrived at Dyrrhachium. There he found 19 gallions or barks of * Adriatick.
the Dyrrhachians, 12 of the Iſſæans, and 54 belonging to K Gentius: which he took all with him along, making ſemblance that he ſuppoſed they were provided of purpoſe for the ſervice of the Romans: with this fleet by the third day he fell with the Iſle Corphu: and ſo forward he made ſail
F and arrived at Cephalenia. C. Lucretius the Prætor, having looſed to ſea from Naples, croſſed the ſtraights of Sicily, and on the fiftieth day cut over likewiſe to Cephalenia. Then the fleet ſtruck anchor, expecting as well the arrivall of the land-forces, as alſo that the hulks and veſſels of carri-age which were ſcattered upon the ſeas from the reſt of their company, might overtake them.

It hapned about this time, that Pub. Licinius the Coſ. having conceived and ſolemnly made his vows within the Capitoll, departed in his coat of arms from the City. A ſolemnity at all times ve-rily this is, done with much dignity and majeſty: but eſpecially with exceeding great pleaſure and contentment of the beholders; when the Coſ. is accompanied with a ſtately train at his firſt ſet-ting forth, to encounter ſome great and famous enemy, renowned as well for vertue as quality and fortune: for at ſuch a time men aſſemble and gather together, not only in regard of duty to acquit G themſelves of their devoir, but alſo upon a deſire they have of the very ſhew and ſight preſented unto their eyes; namely, to ſee their captain to whoſe conduct and counſell they have committed the managing and defence of the Common-weal. Moreover, they took occaſion thereby to think of the hazard of war, how adventurous is the event, and how doubtfull the iſſue of battell in the field. They call to mind the alternative courſe of good fortune and bad; and namely, how by the blind ignorance or the unadviſed raſhneſs of leaders, many foils and overthrows have hapned; and contrariwiſe by politick wiſdom and hardy courage, great matters have been effected, and happy victories atchieved. And what mortall man is he that knoweth, of what mind and carriage good or bad, how fortunat or unlucky the Cos. is, whom they send forth to war: whether he be like soon to be seen again, in triumphant wise with his victorious army mounting up the Capitoll unto those gods, of whom now he taketh his leave: or shall give occasion to the enemies in the same manner to rejoyce? As for Perseus the K. (against whom this expedition and journey is taken) a Prince he is, highly renowned both by the Macedonian nation (so famous for fears of arms,) and also by his father Philip) who among other fortunat atchievements of his, was ennobled by his war against the Romans. Moreover, the very name of Perseus himself (since time that first the diadem was set upon his head) was in every mans mouth, and no talk continually but of him and the expectation of this war. With these and such like cogitations (I say) a mighty number of men of all sorts and degrees attended and accompanied the Cos. at his departure. With him were sent two Colonels or knight-marshals above the rest, who had been Coss. namely, C. Claudius and Q. Mutius: also three brave and lusty young gallants, to wit, P. Lentulus and the two Manlii, both surnamed Acidini, the one son to * M. Manlius, and the other to L. Manlius. The Cos. thus accompanied, first went to Brundusium to the army, and from thence passed the seas to Nymphæum, and so encamped in the territory of Apollonia.

Perseus some few daies before, upon the return of his embassadors from Rome, who had clean put him out of all hope of peace, held a councill; wherein for a good while the matter was debated with great variety of sundry opinions. Some were of mind, that in case the Romans enjoyned them either to yield a tribute, or to forgo some of their lands; yea, if they imposed upon them some fine by way of amends and satisfaction: in brief, whatsoever else they set down and ordained, to do and suffer all for to redeem their peace, and not to refuse any condition were it never so hard but to take heed and provide in any wise, that Perseus put not himself nor the realm upon the dangerous hazard of so great a jeopardy. For if he held still the main point and continued in quiet possession of his kingdom, in time and space much good might happen; by means whereof he should be able not only to lick himself whole and recover his losses, but also become hereafter dread and terrible even unto those of whom now he standeth in fear. But the far greater part carried with them a more couragious spirit and gave advice accordingly. For they affirmed, "That if Perseus parted with ought and yielded never so little, he must make account withall to "quit the free-hold of his whole kingdom soon after. For, it is neither money nor land (say they) "that the Romans want; but this they wot full well, That as all things else in the world, so espe- "cially great monarchies & empires are subject to many accidents and casualties: right well they "know also, how they have quelled and bruised the puissance of the Carthaginians, and for "to yoak their necks and hold them down, have set up a mighty King to be their neighbour and "to command them; yea, and that Antiochus and all his race is removed and chased beyond the "mountain Taurus. There remaineth only now the realm of Macedony, which is both seated in a "near region, and also (if the fortune of the people of Rome should hap to fail) seemeth able to "give heart and courage to her Kings at this day, answerable to that of their noble progenitors "in former times. And therefore whiles the State standeth entire and unfoiled, Perseus ought to "resolve, whether he had rather by forgoing one thing after another, strip himself in the end of all "his goods and lands, & so turned clean out of his kingdom, be driven to request at the Romans "hand either Samothracia or some other such petty Isle, where, in quality of a privat person he "may survive his royall estate, and live to old age in base contempt and needy poverty: or else to "take arms in the defence and maintenance of his royall place and dignity, like a Prince of valour "and courage; and either abide all hazards whatsoever the fortune of the field shall plunge him "into; or after victory atchieved deliver the whole world from the dominion and imperious "seignory of the Romans. And no greater wonder and miracle is it to hunt the Romans out of "Grecce, than it was to chase Annibal out of Italy: neither see we in good faith (say they) how by "any reason it can well stand, that he who resisted with all his might and main his own bro- "ther, that would have made himself K. against all right and law, should now to strangers and ali- "ens render the possession thereof, which he came so well and truly by, and wherein he is so right- "fully invested? Finally, in war and peace howsoever men make questions, disputing and argu- "ing to and fro, yet this conclusion they all grant and agree upon, That as there is nothing more "shamefull and dishoneſt, than to abandon and lose a kingdom without battell, so there is no- "thing more glorious and honourable than for the maintenance of Princely dignity and regal ma- "jesty to hazard all fortune whatsoever. This Councill was holden at Pella, the ancient Palace wherein the Macedonian KK. kept their royall court. Why then (qd. he) on Gods name since you are of that mind and resolution, let us take arms & to the field: whereupon he sent his letters into all parts to his gallants and captains, and assembled & drew all his forces to Citium, a town of Macedony. Himself in person after he had performed a magnificent sacrifice (like a K.) of 100 head of beasts to the honour of Minerva, surnamed Alcida, he departed accompanied with a number of his courtiers, pensioners, and yeomen of the guard to Citium. To which place were gathered already all his forces, as well Macedonians as auxiliary strangers. He pitched his camp before the town and embattelled all his armed men in the plain. He was in all forty thousand strong; whereof one half well-near consisted of those whom they call Phalangitæ, and those were commanded by one Hippias of Berrhæa. Besides, there were two choice companies (for the flower of age and strength of body) selected out of the whole number of targettiers, called Cetrati. This regiment, them-

* This M. Manlius seemeth to be plebeiæ gentis: for that there passed an act long before, That no Manlius Patritius might be named Marcus: and that there were Manlii utriusque gentis, Fulvius Ursinus that learned Antiquary hath well collected out of Cicero in 1. Philip.

A themſelves called by the name of The legion; and the ſame was under the conduct of Leonatus and Thraſippus both * Eulyeſtanes. The reſt of the targettiers to the number of three thouſand or very near, were led by Antiphilus of Edeſſa. The Pæonians, thoſe alſo of Paeoria and Peſtrinzonia (places ſubject to the Thracian) and the Agrians, together with ſome inhabitants of Thracia intermingled among them, amounted alſo to the number of three thouſand. Didas of Pæonia had levied and armed them, even the man that murdered young Demetrius. There were beſides two thouſand Frenchmen in arms under the leading of captain Aſclepiodorus. From Heraclea likewiſe out of the Sintians country, there were three thouſand Thracians, free-men born, under a leader of their own. The like number well-near of Cretenſians followed their Commanders, Suſus of Phalaſarna, and Syllus of Gnoſos: alſo Leonides the Lacedæmonian, had the charge of five hundred B out of Greece, but a mixt company they were of divers nations. This Leonides was ſaid to have been of the bloud royall, a baniſhed perſon, condemned in a frequent aſſembly and Councill of the Achæans, for certain letters which he ſent to Perſeus, and were intercepted. The Ætolians and Bœotians, who in all made not above five hundred, were conducted by Lyco an Achæan. Theſe auxiliaries or aid-ſouldiers of ſo many ſtates and nations mixt and blended together, grew faſt upon the number of 12000 armed men. As for the Cavalry, he had levied out of all Macedony 3000 horſe or thereabout. Cotys King of the Odryſians, the ſon of Seuthes, was thither come with 1000 choſen men of arms, and almoſt as many footmen. In ſum, the whole army aroſe to the number of 39000 foot, and 4000 horſemen. And this was held for certain, that the like army was never raiſed by any King of Macedony, unleſs it were that again, with which Alexander the Great
C paſſed over into Aſia. Twenty years now and ſix were come and gone, ſince time that peace was granted unto Philip at his own ſuit and requeſt: during which ſpace between, Macedony being in reſt and quietneſs, had brought forth a goodly fry of freſh youth: a great part whereof was of ſufficient age to bear arms; and by the continuall skirmiſhes which they maintained with the Thracians their neighbours, were rather whetted than weakned, and more enured than wearied; and, in one word, lived ever in practice of martiall feats: whereby it came to paſs, that all things were preſt and in readineſs for the war, which Philip firſt, and Perſeus afterwards projected to wage againſt the Romans.

This army ſtirred and advanced a little, not in manner of a full march as to a preſent battell; but only for this, that they would not be ſeen to have ſtood ſtill in their arms: and thus armed as D the ſouldiers were, Perſeus called them to an audience, intending to make an Oration unto them. Being mounted up to his Tribunall, he ſtood there with his two ſons about him, one of either hand, whereof the elder (named Philip) he adopted to be his child, whereas indeed by nature he was his brother; but the younger (whom they called Alexander) was his own naturall ſon. Then and there he exhorted his ſouldiers to fight manfully, and laid before them what wrongs and injuries the people of Rome had done both to his father and alſo to himſelf. "As for my father (qd. "he) forced he was by all kind of indignities to enter into arms and begin war again; but in the "very preparation thereof, he was ſuddenly ſurpriſed and ſtricken with death. To my ſelf at one "time were embaſſadors from them ſent to treat of peace, and armed ſouldiers alſo for to ſeiz up-
E "on the Cities of Greece. Afterwards, by a deceitful ſhew of a parley under colour of reconcilia-"tion and peace making, we were born in hand and drawn out a whole winter, to the end that "they might gain time to prepare for war. And now is the Conſul coming with two Roman legions, "having either of them ſome 300 horſe beſides, and with a proportionable number (and that is "the moſt) of allies, as well foot as horſe. And ſay that the KK. both Eumenes & Maſaniſſa joyn "with their aid-forces, yet can they not amount above the number of 7000. Now that ye have "heard what the ſtrength is of the enemies, regard and compare your own army, namely how far F "both in number, as alſo in goodneſs and quality of ſouldiers, you ſurpaſs them; being your ſelves "from your childhood and infancy warriors trained in practice of arms and warfare wrought, "framed, and hardned in ſo many battels: where as they be new & raw ſouldiers taken up in haſte, "and enrolled now the firſt time againſt this preſent ſervice. As for the auxiliaries of the Romans, "what are they but Lydians, Phrygians, and Numidians? but we to ſet againſt them have to aid us "Thracians and Gauls, the moſt couragious nations under heaven. For harneſs and weapons, they "have no other than ſuch as every poor ſouldier is able to provide for himſelf: but the Macedo-"nians are furniſhed out of the Kings royall armory and arcenal with ſuch armors of proof, as my G "father in many years cauſed to be made with great care, & to his no ſmall expence. The Romans "be far from their proviſions, and the ſame expoſed to all the caſualties of the ſea: but we beſides "the revenues and iſſues out of the mines of metal, have laid by both coin and corn ſufficient to "ſerve for ten years. The Macedonians have ſtore and plenty in great abundance of all things ne-"ceſſary, & be provided as well by the gracious favour of the gods, as the careful diligence of a K. "It remaineth now that ye carry that mind and courage with you, which your noble progenitors H "bare before you, thoſe I ſay, who after they had conquered & ſubdued all Europe paſſed into A-"ſia, and by force of arms made way & diſcovered that part of the world that was never heard of "before, and gave not over to win ground ſtill and make more conqueſts, untill they were barred "by the red ſea, & could find no more land to conquer. But now beleeve me, fortune hath denoun-"ced a triall by war, not for the purchaſe of the utmoſt bounds & marches of India, but for our free "hold and poſſeſſion for our inheritance even of Macedony. Theſe Romans, when they warred a-"gainſt my father, pretended a goodly title, & made a glorious ſhew to the world, as though they " would deliver Greece, and eſtabliſh it in freedom: but now in open and plain terms they ſhoot H " at Macedony, intending to bring it into ſervitude; to the end there might be no K. near neigh" bor to the Roman ſeignory, nor any nation renowned for martiall proweſs, permitted to bear " arms and have weapon in hand. For theſe things and no leſs, forced ſhall be to part with, and " deliver up theſe proud LL. together with King and kingdom, in caſe ye ſurceaſe war; and to do " whatſoever they will command you. All the while that he delivered this ſpeech, there might be heard ſecret ſuccłamations oftentimes, ſufficiently teſtifying the generall aſſent of them all: but at theſe laſt words they liſt up their voices and cried out aloud part for anger & indignation, menacing the enemy, part for courage and reſolution, exhorting the King to be of good chear and take a good heart; inſomuch as he was conſtrained to give over, and make an end of his Oration: only he commanded them to be ready for the remove, & to put themſelves in the journey againſt the I enemy: for by this time advertiſed he was that the Romans were diſlodged from Nymphæum. After this aſſembly was diſmiſſed, he gave audience to the embaſſages from the States of Macedony: for, come they were to make promiſe and offer both of money & grain to maintain this war, every one according to their ability. Thanked they were each one, and releaſed of all that charge, with this anſwer, that the Kings proviſion was ſufficient. Only he commanded them to find wains and carts for carriages of the pieces of ordnance, the engins of battery, the darts, quarrels and other ſhot, whereof a mighty deal he had provided; and in ſum, all the inſtruments & furniture of war.

Then he ſet forward with his whole army marching toward Eordea, and near unto the lake which they call Begarites, he encamped. The next morrow he advanced to Elymea upon the river Haliacmon. After this, having paſſed over the mountains named Cambunii through a ſtraight and narrow K paſſage he deſcended to thoſe that inhabit Azorus, Pythous, and Doliche, which quarter is called Tripolis. Theſe three towns ſtaid ſome while in ſuſpence, by reaſon that they had given their hoſtages to the Lariſſæans: but in the end, overcome with the fear preſented before their eyes, were content to yield themſelves into his hands. Perſeus uſed gracious words to this people, making this account that the Perrhæbians would do the like: & in very deed he entred upon the City (which ſurrendered at his firſt arrival) without any doubt or ſtay at all made by the inhabitants within. As for the town Cyretiæ, he aſſaied to batter it, and the firſt day he was repulſed in a ſharp skirmiſh at the very gates made by the townſmen that put on arms, drew to an head, and made reſiſtance. But the morrow after, when he had aſſailed the City with all his forces, they ſubmitted all to his mercy before night. The inhabitants of the next town to it Mylæ, preſuming upon their fortifica- L tions, and ſtanding upon this, That their City was impregnable, were ſo proud and luſty, that they could not be contented to ſhut the gates only againſt the King, but moſt rudely and malapertly ſpared not to caſt out reproachfull taunts and gibing terms againſt his own perſon and the Macedonians. Which manner of dealing, as it envenomed the enemies and edged them the rather to enforce and follow the aſſault, ſo it kindled themſelves the more (upon deſpair of all pardon & mercy) to maintain and make good their place & ſtand more reſolutely in their own defence. Whereupon for three daies together the town was aſſailed by one part, and defended by the other with mighty courage right valiantly. The Macedonians were ſo many in number, that by turns they relieved the aſſault without any difficulty, and entred one in the place of another. But the townſmen who ever more day and night guarded the walls, without any change & new ſupply, were not only M overcharged with many wounds, but alſo wearied and enfeebled with continuall travell and want of ſleep. The fourth day, when at one inſtant the ſcaling ladders were reared againſt the wals in every quarter, and the gate aſſailed with greater force and violence than before, the inhabitants being driven from the curtain and battlements ran all to ward the gate, and made a ſudden ſally upon the enemies: which proceeding more upon inconſiderat and blind anger, than any true and aſſured confidence of their own ſtrength, cauſed them (few in number and wearied) to be diſcom-fited & put to flight by the enemies freſh and in heart, who entred pell-mell with them into the ſaid gate ſtanding wide open. Thus was this City taken and ranſacked. The bodies alſo of the free born perſons, as many as remained after the bloudy execution, were ſold in market. Perſeus after he had raſed, ruined, and burred a great part of the town, diſlodged and departed from thence to N Phalanna, and the next day following went onward, and marched to Gyrtone. But being adverti-ſed that T. Minutius Rufus and Hippias the Prætor of Theſſaly were entred thither with a garriſon, he paſſed beſides the the town, and never made offer of any aſſault. But he ſurpriſed Elatia and Gonnus, by reaſon that the townſmen were ſtrucken with exceeding fear upon his ſudden arrivall.
Theſe two towns are ſituat upon the very ſtraight which leadeth to Tempe, but Gonnus eſpecially.
And therefore he left it guarded with a ſtrong garriſon both of foot and horſe, as alſo fortified with a trebble trench and rampier. Himſelf in perſon went onward ſtil to Sycurium, minding there to attend the coming of the enemy: and withall he commanded his army to forrage and purvey corn every way all over the territory of the enemies lying under him. For Sycurium is ſeated upon the hanging of an hill toward the very foot of the mountain Oſſa, having upon the South ſide the O plain champian of Theſſaly under it, but behind on the back Macedony and Magneſia. Over and above theſe commodities, the place is very healthfull and plenteous of all good things, watered alſo with many quick and running ſprings round about.

The Roman Conſul having his army on foot about that time marching toward Theſſaly, at the firſt found good way and ready paſſage through Epirus: but afterwards, when he was paſſed over once into Athamania, he met with a rough country & rugged ſoil, & in manner inſuperable:

ſo

A ſo as with exceeding great difficulty and by ſhort journeys he had much ado to reach unto Gomphi. And if at that time, whiles his men and horſes were encumbred and tainted, the King had made head in battell arranged, taking the vantage of time and place againſt him, leading as he did an hoſt compoſed but of rude and untrained novices, the Romans themſelves cannot deny, but it would have gone very hard with them, and a great overthrow they muſt needs have received in that conflict. But when they were come once to Gomphi without any skirmiſh, beſides the joy which they conceived, for that they had eſcaped and overcome that dangerous paſſage, they began alſo to contemn their enemies, for that they knew not their own good, and were ſo ignorant of the opportunities which they had. The Conſul after he had duly ſacrificed (as it appertained) and diſtributed the allowance of corn among his ſouldiers, ſojourned there ſome few daies
B for the reſt and repoſe both of man and beaſt: where, hearing that the Macedonians ranged and over-ran the country of Theſſaly, waſting and ſpoiling the territory of the Roman allies, he led his ſouldiers now ſufficiently refreſhed unto Lariſſa. And having marched from thence within three miles of Tripolis (which they call Scea) he pitched his tents, and lodged upon the river Peneus.

At the ſame time Eumenes arrived by ſea at Chalcis together with two of his brethren, Attalus and Athenæus, leaving at Pergamus a third brother Philetærus for the defence of his Realm. From thence, accompanied with Attalus and a power of four thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe he came to the Conſul, and left at Chalcis two thouſand footmen commanded by Athenæus. Thither alſo repaired other aids which came in to the Romans from all the States of Greece, but moſt of C the particulars were ſo ſmall as now they are grown out of remembrance. The Apolloniats ſent 3 hundred horſemen, and a hundred footmen. From the Ætolians there came a Cornet of horſemen, even the whole Cavalry that the ſaid nation could make. Likewiſe all the Cavalry of the Theſſalians which exceeded not the number of three hundred that ſerved in the Roman camp & quartered apart. The Achæans ſent one thouſand men of their youth armed for the moſt part after the Candiot manner. And much about this time C. Lucretius alſo the Prætor, who had the conduct of the ſhips that anchored in the rode of Cephalonia, after he had given charge to M. Lucretius his brother, to make ſail with his fleet beyond the Cape of Malea, & ſo to paſs to Chalcis, himſelf went aboord unto a trireme galley, & ſailed toward the gulph of Corinth, for to be ſeized
D firſt of the country of Bœotia, and to prevent all matters there. He made way but ſlowly becauſe of the infirmity and weakneſs of his body. M. Lucretius being arrived at Chalcis, and advertiſed that P. Lentulus lay againſt the City of Haliartus, ſent a meſſenger commanding him in the name of the Prætor to raiſe the ſiege and diſlodge from thence. The lieutenant notwithſtanding he had ſet into that ſervice with the help of the youth of that part of Bœotia which took part with the Romans retired from before the walls. The levying of this ſiege gave occaſion of a new enterprize: for incontinently M. Lucretius beſieged and inveſted Haliartus with his own ſea-forces to the number of 10000 fighting men together with 2000 ſouldiers from K. Eumenes whereof Athenæus had the charge: and as they were now upon the point to give an aſſault, the Prætor came in unto them E from Creuſa. And very near to that time there arrived alſo at Chalcis certain ſhips from the allies, namely, two Quinquereme galeaces of Carthage, two trireme gallies from Heraclea in Pontus, four from Chalcedon, as many from Samos, and five quadrireme gallies of Rhodes. All theſe veſſels the Prætor ſent back again to the allies, and eaſed them of that charge becauſe there was no ſea-ſervice to be performed in any place. Q. Martius alſo came by ſea to Chalcis, after he had won Halops, and aſſaulted Lariſſa called Cremaſte.

This was the State of Bœotia, when Perſeus (as hath been ſaid before) lay encamped at Sycurium: who after he had from every coaſt thereabout got together all the grain that he could come by, ſent certain companies to give the waſte unto the territory of the Phocæans ſuppoſing th Romans might be ſurpriſed, when they ſhould be drawn far from their own camp to the ſuccouring of their diſtreſſed aſſociats. But perceiving that they ſtirred never the more for all that tumult:
F he dealt among his ſouldiers all the prey, but only of men and women: now the booty ſtood moſt upon cattell, wherewith they made good chear. After this, but near about one and the ſame time, the Coſ. & K. Perſeus both debated in their councill, how and where they ſhould begin the war. The K. had taken great heart and courage by occaſion that the enemy ſuffered him to make ſuch havock and do his pleaſure in the Pheræans territory. And therefore his reſolution was to march directly againſt the Roman camp without giving more time and making any further delay. The Romans likewiſe for their parts were of opinion, that all forſlacking now would greatly prejudice their reputation among the confederats, who took it exceedingly to the heart, that they had not ſuccoured the Pheræans. As they ſate conſulting what to do, (now Eumenes and Attalus both were preſent at this Councill) there came a meſſenger in poſt haſte with news that the enemy approached near at hand with a mighty army. Whereupon the Councill brake up, and preſently the G ſignall was given to arm. And adviſed it was in the mean while, that there ſhould go forth 100 horſe, and as many darters and foot out of King Eumenes his companies.

Perſeus about the fourth hour of the day being come within a mile and ſomewhat more of the Roman leaguer commanded the enſigns of the footment to ſtand. Himſelf in perſon with the men of arms and light armed ſouldiers advanced forward, and ſo together with King Cotys and the Captains of the other auxiliaries, they two marched before. Now when they were within half a mile from the camp, they might diſcover the horſemen of their enemies. Two Cornets they were,

both

moſt part Gauls, under the conduct of Caſſignatus; beſides the looſe and light armed forlorn hope, to the number well-near of a hundred and fifty, and thoſe were partly Myſians and partly Cretenſians. Hereat the King made a ſtand, not knowing well the number of the enemies: and anon out of the regiment that he had with him he drew two wings of Thracian horſe, and as many Macedonians; likewiſe two Cohorts of Cretenſian, and as many Thracian footmen. Hereupon enſued a skirmiſh: but foraſmuch as they were marched even in number, and no ſuccour came in to reſcue from the one part or the other, it ended likewiſe in doubtfull ballance of victory. Of Eumenes his part there died about thirty: in which number Caſſignatus the Commander of the Gauls was ſlain. So for that time Perſeus retired his forces to Sycurium: but the next morrow the King marched with them again to the ſelf-ſame place, and much about the foreſaid hour. Certain carts and wains laden with water followed after: and by reaſon that for a dozen miles ſpace, all the way was waterleſs, and full of duſt withall, hardly beſtead (as it ſhould ſeem) they had been for very drought and thirſt, in caſe they had been charged and put to skirmiſh, at the time when they were firſt in fight. But conſidering that the Romans kept quiet, yea, and had reduced their corps de guard within their rampier, Perſeus likewiſe retired with his forces into his camp. This did the enemies for certain daies together, hoping ever that the Roman Cavalry would charge upon the tail of the rereguard in their retreat: and when by that occaſion the skirmiſh was once begun and that they had trained and drawn them far from their camp; then they might with eaſe whereſoever they were, turn upon them and make head, having the odds of them in horſemen and light armed ſouldiers. But the King ſeeing this would not ſpeed, encamped nearer unto the Romans, and fortified the compaſs of half a mile. From whence betimes in the morning by the break of day, after he had embattelled his infantry in the uſuall place, he led all his Cavalry and light-armed men toward the camp of his enemies. The Romans ſeeing a greater duſt raiſed by more in number, and the ſame nearer than ordinary it had been, were mightily afraid within their camp. But at the firſt they would hardly beleeve the meſſenger that brought the news: for that continually all the former daies the enemy uſed not to be ſeen untill the fourth hour of the day, and now the ſun was but newly riſen. Howbeit, afterwards (I ſay) when about their gates there were thicker alarms given and more and more running from thence, and that now there was no doubt at all of the matter, there grew an exceeding trouble & hurliburly. The Marſhals, Colonels, Captains, and Centurions, betook themſelves into the quarter about the Prætors pavilion: and the ſouldiers ran every man to his own tent. Perſeus had embattelled his men leſs than half a mile from the rampier about a little hill which they call Calicinus. King Cotys had the charge of the left wing, with althoſe of his own nation. The ranks of the cavalry ſtood marſhalled aſunder one from the other by reaſon that the light armed ſouldiers were beſtowed between. In the right wing were placed the Macedonian horſemen, and the Cretenſians likewiſe intermingled among them. Milon of Berrhæa led theſe light armed ſouldiers: but Meno of Antigonia commanded the horſemen, and the whole regiment of that part. Next to thoſe wings the Cavalry of K. Perſeus was arranged together with the ſelected aid-ſouldiers of many and ſundry nations: and the ſame were conducted by Patrocles of Antigonia, and Didas the governour of Pæonia. In the midſt of all was the King himſelf: having about him a band called Agema, and certain cornets of horſemen named [The ſacred wings] Before him he planted the ſlingers and darters, who both together amounted to the number of 400: and over them he appointed for to be their leader one Ion of Theſſalonica, and Timanor the Dolopian. In this manner as is beforeſaid, ſtood the Kings forces embattelled. The Conſul, having put his Infantry in order of battell, ſent out his Cavalry likewiſe with the light armed companies, who were ſet in array before the camp. C. Licinius Craſſus the Conſuls brother had the leading of the right point, with all the Italian horſemen and the footmen lightly appointed intermingled among them, M. Valerius Lævinus in the left, commanded the horſemen of the greek aſſociats, together with the light armed ſouldiers of the ſame nation. Q. Mutius conducted the battaillon in the midſt with certain extraordinary choſen men of arms. Before their Guidons, 200 horſemen of the Gauls ſtood in ordinance: and of the auxiliaries of K. Eumenes, 300 Cyrtians, and 400 Theſſalian horſe. Not far from thence were ranged, ſomewhat above the left point King Eumenes himſelf and his brother Attalus, with all their power were planted behind, even between the rereward and the trench. Thus ſtood both battels much after this manner arranged, and having of either ſide a like ſtrength in manner of horſemen and light-armour, they encountred and charged one another; and then the conflict was begun by the forlorn hope of looſe ſhot to wit, the ſlingers and darters that went before. And firſt of all others the Thracians, faring like wild and ſavage beaſts, who had heen long pent up within ſome grates and cages, with a mighty cry advanced forth and ran upon the Italian horſemen in the right wing, to the end that they might trouble and amaze them; being otherwiſe a nation fearleſs, as well by nature as for long experience and practiſe of war * * * The footmen with their ſwords aſſaied to cut off the heads of their pikes; and one whiles they hought their horſes, and another whiles they ran them into their flanks. Perſeus rode into the midſt of the battell, and at the firſt ſhock forced the Greeks to turn ſide and give way: and when the enemy preſſed moreover hard upon them behind, behold, the Theſſalian horſemen who were placed in the rereguard for ſuccour, and ſtood ſomewhat apart and ſevered from the left wing, who at firſt were beholders only of the fight (as keeping without the danger of the charge) afterwards ſtood them in very good ſtead, even as they were at the point to go down & have the worſe. For as they retired leiſurely without breaking breaking their ranks, after that they once joyned with the aids of Eumenes, they both yielded the opportunity to their allies who were disbanded in the rout, to retire in safety within their ranks: and also espying their own vantage, when the enemies pursued not so thick in troops, they adventured to put themselves forward beyond, and so staid many of those their allies whom they encountred and received in their flight. Neither durst the Kings men, being now also disarraied and dispersed here and there in following the chase, come to hand-fight and joyn battell with those, continuing so well in order as they did, and marching firm and strong together; whereas the matter had been dispatched and the war brought to a finall end, in case the King who won the better in horse-fight, had never so little come in with help and succour. For as he encouraged his souldiers to fight, there came in place very fitly and in passing good time, the * Phalanx, which Hippias and Leonatus (because they would not be behind-hand in this hardy enterprise) brought of their own accord in great haste so soon as ever they heard of the winning-hand of the Cavalry. A strong battaillon of footmen,

"And "whiles the K. wavered in doubtful suspence, between hope and fear of this so great an adventure, "Evander the Cretensian, whose service Perseus had used in the await laid for K. Eumenes at Del-"phi, seeing that main battell marching heavily armed under their ensigns, ran unto the King and "earnestly advertised him to take heed, lest that presuming too much and bearing himself over-"confident of this good speed of his, he brought not unadvisedly the main chance of all his estate, "into a needless and unnecessary hazard. For if (quoth he) you can be content with the happy "fortune of this fair day and so rest, either you shall have the means to make an honourable "peace, or else (if you had rather prosecute the war) to win exceeding many allies to bear arms "with you in the field; who, no doubt, will follow the train of your good fortune. To this way stood the Kings mind ever, and thither he soon enclined. Therefore having commended Evander for his good advice, he commanded the ensigns to retire, and the footmen to return into the camp: likewise to sound the retreat unto the Guidons of the men of arms. In this battel 200 Roman horsemen that day lost their lives, and no fewer than 2000 footmen, and neer upon 200 of the Cavalry were taken prisoners. Of the Kings side there died not past 200 horsemen and forty of the other.

After that the victorious enemies were upon their return into the camp all were jocund & glad in general, but above the rest the Thracians shewed themselves in joy for this their victory, over insolent: for they returned singing full merrily, and carried the heads of their enemies fixed upon their spear-points. But the Romans were not only sad and heavy for this unfortunat journey, but fearfull also lest the enemy should forthwith assail their camp. Eumenes gave counsell to dislodge and remove to the other side of the river Peneus, that it might serve them instead of a defence and bulwark, untill such time as the amated souldiers had recovered their spirits and taken heart again. The Cos. was ashamed and abashed to bewray his fear; howbeit, over-ruled with reason, he set his army over the river in the dead time of the night, and encamped on the farther bank. K. Perseus the morrow after advanced forward to bid the enemies battel, but perceiving they were lodged in safety beyond the river, he confessed that he had faulted indeed, for that he had not followed his victory the day before; but more overseen a good deal he was in lying still and taking repose that night: for without troubling any else of his own men, he might have sent out the light armed souldiers only to set upon the enemies as they passed over the river in haste and fright, and so defeated a great part of their forces. Now the Romans shook off their fear for the present, considering they were encamped in a sure place: but among other damages, the blot especially of their honour and name grieved and troubled them. And as they sate in Councill before the Consul, every man for his part laid all the blame upon the Ætolians, who first began to be affraid and run away; and whose example of fear the other allies of the Cities of Greece followed: for it was said, that five principall men of mark among the Ætolians, were seen and noted first of all other to have turned their backs. But the Thessalians were praised in a full assembly of the whole army; and their Captains for their vertue and valorous service were honoured with presents. The spoils of the enemies were brought before King Perseus; out of which he bestowed freely upon some, brave and gorgeous armours; upon others goodly great horses; and finally, certain were rewarded with the prize of good prisoners. Targets there were above a thousand and five hundred, cuirasses and corslets not so few as a thousand; besides, a far greater proportion of murrions swords, "and shot of all sorts. Great matters these were, considered in themselves; but much more amplified and set out by the King himself with a speech that he made in a frequent audience of his army assembled together, after this or the like manner, "You see already by this (quoth he) "what you may judge before-hand of the finall issue of this war: discomfited ye have the bet-"ter part of your enemies, to wit, the Roman Cavalry, wherein they took themselves to be in-"vincible. For their horsemen are the very gallants and bravest of their youth; their Gentlemen "of arms (I say) are the seminary and nurse-garden of their Senat. From them they chuse their "Nobles and Peers to make Consuls of, yea, and Generals of the field another day. And the spoils "of these we have erewhiles divided among us. Neither is the victory less which ye have gai-"ned of the Infantry and legions, who although by night they made an escape from you, yet in "hasting to pass over the river, they resembled a sort that had suffered shipwrack at sea, and in "fearful haste for their lives have swom & overspread the river every where with their bodies. Soo-"ner shall we & with greater ease I trow, get over Peneus, to chase them thus already overcome, "than they did, making such haste for fear: and being once set on the other side, we shall out of "hand

" hand aſſail their camp, which we might have forced and won this day, but that they took them H
" to their heels and fled. But if they will come to a field and try the quarrel by the ſwords point,
" look ye for no other iſſue of the conflict with footmen, than was before of the other with " horſemen. Theſe words, both the horſemen (who bare upon their own ſhoulders the ſpoils of their enemies lying ſlain before their eyes in open view) heard with great pleaſure and contentment, as meaſuring the hope of the future ſpeed by the fortune paſſed; and alſo the footmen enflamed now with the glory of others (and namely, thoſe that were of the Macedonian Phalanx) wiſhed with all their hearts to have the like occaſion offered unto them, wherein they might not only ſhew their valiant ſervice before the K. but alſo win ſemblable glory of their enemies. Thus the aſſembly was diſſolved, and the morrow after the King marched forward and encamped upon Mopſelus, which is an hill ſituat in the mid way between Tempe and Lariſſa. The Romans remo- I ved their camp into a place of more ſecurity, howbeit, not far from the bank of Peneus. Thither repaired Maſſagenes the Numidian, with 1000 horſe and as many foot, beſides 22 Elephants. Now as K. Perſeus during theſe daies, ſat in Council what courſe to take as touching the main conduct of his affairs, when his courage was now well abated and not ſo luſty for his late victory, ſome of his friends were ſo hardy as to adviſe him to uſe this good fortune of his for the obtaining and compaſſing of ſome honourable peace, rather than upon a vain hope to carry his head aloft, and engage himſelf and his whole ſtate into ſome hazard & jeopardy, out of which he ſhould not be able to recover and retire into ſafety. For to keep a mean and moderation in proſperity, and not over-confidently to truſt upon the preſent flattering fortune, is the part (ſay they) of a wiſe man indeed and truly happy. And therefore the beſt courſe is, to ſend certain men of purpoſe unto the K Cof. for to renew the league upon the ſame conditions, with which your father Philip had accepted peace heretofore of T. Quintius the conqueror. For neither (ſay they) can the war be taken up with greater honour and reputation, than after ſo memorable a battel; nor ever will there be preſented more firm and aſſured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occaſion, which will work and mollifie the Romans as a man would have them, to come on and aſſent to any accord, conſidering they are well tamed with the infortunity of this battell. But in caſe the Romans upon an inbred peeviſhneſs and engraffed pertinacity of theirs, ſhould not hear reaſon but refuſe an indifferent end, then both God and man ſhall be witneſs, as well of the moderation of Perſeus, as of their pride & inſolent frowardneſs. The K. was willing enough to give ear to this, and indeed never miſliked ſuch diſcourſes; and therefore the advice was approved by the aſſent L of the moſt part; whereupon embaſſadors were ſent to the Cof. & in a frequent Council aſſembled, had audience given them. Peace they demanded, and promiſed that Perſeus ſhould pay unto the Romans as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for; and likewiſe quit the ſame Cities, coaſts, and territories, which Philip had given up and ſurrendred. To this effect ſpake the embaſſadors; who being retired aſide, the Romans debated in Council, and in the end Roman conſtancy imported and had the upper hand: for in thoſe daies the manner and uſe was, in time of adverſity to bear all out and ſet a good countenance, but in proſperity to hold an even hand and to uſe governance. So agreed it was to return this anſwer, That peace might be granted with this condition, That K. Perſeus ſhould permit full and free power to the Senat of Rome, for to diſpoſe both of his perſon and the kingdom of Macedony at their good pleaſure. When the Embaſſadors M had made relation hereof, this conſtant reſolution and invincible perſiſtance of the Romans made them to wonder again, as being not acquainted with their manners and faſhions: and moſt of them forbad to make mention any more of peace, ſaying, That the Romans would be glad ſhortly to ſeek for that of their own accord, which now at this preſent they loathed & rejected when it was offered. But Perſeus mightily feared, that this arrogant ſpirit of theirs, proceeded from the confidence they had in their own forces; inſomuch as he gave not over ſo, but aſſaied to tempt the Cof. if haply by augmenting the ſum of money, he might buy peace at any price & reckoning whatſoever. But ſeeing him nothing to come down, nor to alter one jot from the firſt anſwer; in deſpair now of all peace, he returned to Sycurium from whence he came, purpoſing once again to try the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late fight of cavalry was flown over all Greece N and diſcovered the minds and affections of men: for not only they that took part with the Macedonians rejoyced to hear this news, but alſo very many of them who were obliged and beholden unto the Romans for benefits and favours received at their hands, and ſome likewiſe who had taſted of their violence and proud government. And this they did for no other reaſon at all, but only upon a fooliſh and perverſe affection, like to that wherewith the common people ordinarily is carried away in the beholding of diſports and triall of maſteries, even to favour evermore the weaker and him that taketh the foil.

At the ſame time Lucretius the Prætor had with moſt forcible means aſſaulted the City of Haliartus in Bœotia: and albeit the beſieged defendants within were relieved by no forrain aid, but only the youth of the Coronæans (who at the beginning of the ſiege entred the City) nor hoped O for any to come; yet they ſtood out and made reſiſtance with courage of heart more than with ſtrength of hand: for they iſſued forth many times, and ſallied upon the fabricks and engins of the enemy, yea & when the ram approached hard to the wall, they let fall thereupon a mighty weight and counterpoiſe of lead and ſo depreſſed and drave it down to the ground. And if haply the enemies who ran with the ram againſt the wall, avoided the device of theirs, laid battery, and ſhook it in ſome other place; the townſmen within, raiſed preſently with great ſpeed another mure,

piling up haſtily the ſtones one upon another, which they found lying among the very ruins of the breaches. The Conſul ſeeing this manner of ſervice by way of ordnance and battery, to become ſlow and tedious, commanded to divide ladders amongſt every company, and purpoſed to inveſt the City round about with the Eſcalado; ſuppoſing that the number which he had would be ſufficient to exploit this enterpriſe, becauſe on that ſide whereas the Town is encloſed with a mariſh, it was bootleſs (or rather unpoſſible) to aſſault it. Himſelf in perſon preſented 2000 elect ſouldiers before that part, whereas two turrets, and all the wall between was beaten down and overthrown: to the end that in the very inſtant, whiles he aſſaied to enter at the breaches the townſmen ſhould run all thither to repulſe him, and in the mean while the walls void of defendants might in ſome part or other be ſcaled and won. But they within beſtirred themſelves luſtily to give him the repulſe. For having piled in the very open breaches a mighty number of faggots made of drie vine cuttings and ſuch ſmall bruſh, they ſtood ready with flaming firebrands and burning links, threatning ever and anon to kindle the ſame and ſet all on fire, to the end that being defended from the enemy by the means of fire between, they might have time to oppoſe an inner countermure againſt them. But by miſchance this device and enterpriſe of theirs was empeached. For there poured down on a ſuddain ſuch a mighty ſhower of rain that the fewel would not eaſily take fire, and look what was ſet a burning, it ſoon was quenched again. By which means not only the paſſage was made open between the ſmoking faggots drawn apart one from another here and there, but whiles they all intended wholly the defence of that one place the walls were taken at one inſtant by ladders reared up againſt many and ſundry parts thereof. In the firſt heat upon the winning of the City, old and yong, ſuch as chanced to come in their way, without any reſpect at all of age were put to the ſword. The armed ſouldiers fled into the Caſtle and the next day being paſt hope to make good the place, they yeelded and were all ſold under the garland in portſale, to them that would bid moſt, to the number of 2500 men or very neer. The ornaments and beauties of the City, as ſtatues, images, painted tables and pictures, and whatſoever was found in the pillage to bear a better price, was caried to ſhipbord, and the Town it ſelf raſed from the very foundations, and laid even with the ground. From thence the army was conducted to Thebes: which being won without any reſiſtance he put into the hands of the baniſhed perſons, and thoſe that took part and ſided with the Romans: but thoſe of the contrary faction, ſuch as favoured the King and the Macedonians, he ſold by whole families in open market to the beſt chapmen. Having performed theſe exploits in Bœotia, he retired himſelf to the Sea ſide to his ſhips.

Whiles theſe affairs paſſed thus in Bœotia, Perſeus lodged for certain daies in camp at Sycurium. Where being advertiſed, that the Romans made great haſt to inn the corn newly reaped down, and to cary it from all parts of the fields unto the leaguer, and that every ſouldier before his tent cut and ſhred off the ears as they lay bound in ſheaves, to the end they might thraſh and drive out the cleaner corn, by which occaſion they had made great heaps of ſtraw throughout all parts of the camp, he ſuppoſed it was an eaſy matter to ſet all their tents and pavilions on fire. Whereupon he commanded to provide torches, links and balls made of tow beſmeared with pitch and tar: thus provided and furniſhed, he ſet out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might put this device in execution without being deſcried before. But all came to nothing: for the foremoſt corps de guard although they were ſurpriſed with this ſuddain coming by their trouble and affright awakened and raiſed all the reſt, and immediatly the alarm was given; ſo as at one inſtant the ſouldiers were ready and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and preſt for to defend the camp. Perſeus likewiſe incontinently turned about with his enſigns, putting his fardage and carriage before, and then commanded the infantry to march after: himſelf with the cavalry and light-armors ſtaied behind to fortify and guard the rereward, ſuppoſing (as it fell out indeed) that the enemies would make after to charge upon the tail of the march. His light armed ſouldiers had ſome ſhort skirmiſhing eſpecially with the forlorn hope and looſe avant-courriers, but the horſe and footmen both retired without any impeachment into the camp. Thus when all the corn was cut down about thoſe quarters, the Romans diſlodged and removed into the territory of Crannon, which as yet was not endammaged. Whiles they lay encamped in ſecurity and miſtruſting nothing (becauſe the enemies were ſo far off, and by reaſon that the way between Sycurium and Crannon was ſo difficult for want of water;) behold all on a ſuddain early in the morning by day light, the Kings cavalry and light armed ſouldiers ſhewed themſelves upon the hills that overlooked them from above, and put them into great trouble. Departed they were from Sycurium at noon the day before, and had left the infantry behind about the break of day upon the plain next thereto. For a while he ſtood upon thoſe ſaid hills, hoping that the Romans might be trained forth to an horſe-fight. But perceiving them not to ſtir at all, he ſent one on horſeback to command the footmen to retire again to Sycurium, and himſelf in perſon followed ſtreight after. The Roman horſemen made after a prety diſtance off, if haply they could ſpie any vantage in one place or other to charge upon them, diſbanded and ſtragling aſunder. But when they ſaw that in their diſmarch they kept cloſe together following their guidons and keeping their ranks they alſo returned into the camp. After this, the King weary of making ſo long journies diſlodged and removed to Mopſium. The Romans for their part likewiſe having mowed down all the corn of Crannon, paſſed into the territory of Phalannæum. The King having intelligence by a renegate revolt, that the Romans were ſcattered all over the fields and reaping the ſtanding corn without any guard of armed men, made a rode with 1000 horſe & 2000 Candiots & Thracians:

who marching with as great haſt as poſſibly they could, ſet upon the Romans at unawares all un- H provided; where he took a thouſand carts or thereabouts, together with their teams, moſt of them laden, and upon 600 men beſides. The guard and convoy of this booty into the camp he committed to the charge of 300 Cretenſians. Himſelf having rallied his cavalry diſperſed here and there buſy in execution, and reunited with all the reſt of the footmen, led them to the next corps de guard or garriſon of the enemies, ſuppoſing that with little ado they might be ſurpriſed and vanquiſhed. L. Pompeius a Colonel had the command of them, who ſeeing his ſouldiers affrighted with this ſuddain coming of the enemies, retired with them to an hill neer at hand, for to defend himſelf by the vantage and ſtrength of the place, conſidering that otherwiſe in number and forces he was too weak. Where after he had caſt his men into a ring, for to ward againſt the ſhot of arrows and darts by a roof and fence of targets couched cloſe together over their heads: Perſeus having envi- I roned the hill round about with armed men, commanded ſome to mount up and aſſay to win the place on all parts, it poſſibly they could, and then to fight cloſe hand to hand: others he charged to lance their darts and ſhoot their ſhafts thick at them a far off. The Romans were beſet with a double fear; for neither could they maintain skirmiſh and fight cloſe together becauſe of thoſe who laboured to climb the hill: and ſay they had broke any ranks with excurſions and outrodes upon them, yet were they expoſed and lay open to the ſhot of arrows and darts. Moſt hurt they had by certain weapons called Ceſtroſphendonæ [ſling-darts.] A new kind of dart this was and lately deviſed in the time of this very war. It had a ſharp head of iron the length of two hands breadth, and the ſame ſet faſt in a ſteel which was half a cubit long, and about the thicknes of a mans finger: for to flie direct and ſtreight, three feathers it had about it in man of a ſhaft: the K
